PREFACE
TO THE PRESENT EDITION.

SINCE the publication of the last edition of this work in 1847, death has been more than usually busy among those whose names and achievements ought to be commemorated in our "BIOGRAPHICAL TREASURY." Instead, however, of adding these new names to the work by way of supplement, it has been deemed expedient to embody them in the work itself, together with the various supplements that have appeared from time to time, thus facilitating consultation, and making the work a complete manual of Biographical reference, down to the date of publication. The more satisfactorily to effect this object, the whole work has been reprinted on a larger page, and with a new type; and the opportunity has been taken to correct mistakes that had crept into former editions, to supply not a few names that had been omitted, to re-write numerous memoirs that appeared either imperfect or inexact, and in a word to maintain the long-established character of this work, as a trustworthy repository of Universal Biography. Considerable space has been devoted in this edition to the lives of foreigners, distinguished in science, literature, art, politics, or arms, in whom Englishmen might be presumed to take an interest; and on the whole it is hoped that few important names, whether native or foreign, will be found to have been omitted.

January, 1851.

PREFACE
THE FIRST EDITION.

THE publication of this volume having been protracted very considerably beyond the time I had originally calculated on, and the task having proved a far more onerous one than my sanguine expectations had led me to anticipate, I freely confess, that, whatever its ultimate fate may be, I feel no ordinary degree of gratification in having at length brought it to a close — a gratification arising from a practical knowledge of the labour required for its production;

heightened by a recollection of the serious interruption I met with, from severe and prolonged illness, during its early progress. Yet, though sometimes daunted, and often discouraged (if I may apply the words of a great man, on an important subject, to my comparatively insignificant undertaking), "despondency has never so far prevailed as to depress me to neglect."

On the present occasion, I have but little to say. I shall not trouble the reader with a needless dissertation on the uses and value of Biography; the subject is too obvious to require demonstration—too trite to call for a pre-fatory remark. Neither, in what I deem it necessary to state, do I wish to arrogate to myself any peculiar merit. But let no one imagine that I am indifferent as to the success of this volume, or that I should not honestly exult to learn that it met with the approbation of a discerning public. If I had no other motive, the highly favourable reception given to its precursor would have been a sufficient inducement, I trust, to make me anxious to execute the present Work in a manner that might not be deemed discredit-able either to my judgment, or my regard for truth and strict impartiality.

Persons not in the habit of consulting different biographical authorities, can have no idea of the discrepancies that are to be met with in the relation of mere matters of fact; but this, perplexing as it is, bears no proportion to the wilful perversions that abound where scope is given for the expression of political feeling, or the promulgation of a particular doctrine. So prone, indeed, are many to this corrupt practice, that it appears as though they considered it a paramount duty to carry on, per fas et nefas, an eternal crusade against all opinions which are not in accordance with their own—against every one who is disposed to take a straightforward and rational view of things, rather than to glance at them through the oblique medium of some wild or fanciful theory. The amount of injury thus done to the cause of truth, it is impossible to estimate: sentiments, glossed over by a false philosophy, are slavishly copied from one work to another, till the dissemination of error becomes general, and the evils inflicted on society are past redemption.

Throughout the following pages, I have never allowed myself to be satisfied with one authority, where more were obtainable; nor have I grudged my labour in any way that I thought would render the volume more acceptable to the public;—but to expect that it can be immaculate, would be the height of absurdity. If I have fallen into errors similar to those which I have condemned, a heavy responsibility will rest on me; if I have committed any of a less serious nature, I hope they will be found so venial, that their obliteration may be an easy employment when revising a future edition.

The steady patronage bestowed upon "THE TREASURY OF KNOWLEDGE" demands my reiterated thanks. Thirty thousand* copies of that work have been legitimately sold in this country, and a still greater number, as I am credibly informed, pirated in America: it is therefore not unreasonable to expect, that, unless there be more defects in the present volume than I am conscious of, it will meet with a proportionate circulation. Nothing but a large sale can ever repay me; and I naturally cherish the hope that, in a commercial as well as in a moral sense, I may not have laboured in vain.

* This was written in 1838; and that "The Treasury of Knowledge" has since that time greatly risen in public estimation, its increased sale is a most gratifying proof.

NEW DICTIONARY OF UNIVERSAL BIOGRAPHY.

AA, CHARLES HENRY VAN DER, a Lutheran minister, born at Zwolle, who took a leading part in establishing at Haerlem the Academy of Sciences. Born, 1718; died, 1792.

AA, GERARD VAN DER, and his sons ADOLPHUS and PHILIP (three distinguished members of an ancient family in the Netherlands), are honourably mentioned in the annals of the United Provinces for the prominent part they took in resisting the tyranny of Philip II. of Spain, and the subsequent liberation of their country.

AA, PETER VAN DER, a distinguished lawyer, born at Louvain, who became president of the council of Luxembourg, in 1574.

AA, PETER VAN DER, an eminent bookseller of Leyden, who, early in the 18th century, compiled and published several extensive collections of voyages and travels, among which was his "Galerie du Monde," an Illustrated Atlas, in 66 vols. He also published the great collection of Gronovius on Greek, and of Grævius on Roman, antiquities. Died, 1730.

AAGARD, CHRISTIAN, a Danish poet, and professor of poetry at Sorø, and of theology at Rissen in Jutland. Born, 1616; died, 1664.

AAGARD, NICHOLAS, brother of the above, a philosophical writer, and a professor at Sorø. Born, 1612; died, 1657.

AAGESEN, SUEND or SVEND (called also SÜENO AGONIS), a Danish historian and antiquary of the 12th century.

AALST, EVERARD, a Dutch painter, eminent for fruit pieces and armoury. Born at Delft, in 1602; died, 1658.

AALST, WILLIAM, nephew of the above, and still higher in repute as a painter. Born, 1620; died, 1679.

AARON, St. a British martyr, who, with his brother Julius, suffered during the persecution of the Christians, under the emperor Diocletian, A. D. 303, and was canonized ten centuries afterwards.

AARON of ALEXANDRIA, a priest and physician of the 7th century. He was a voluminous author, and the first who described the measles and small-pox, diseases which were at that time new to Egypt, and by him supposed to have originated there.

AARON of BARCELONA, a Spanish Jew of the 13th century; author of "Precepts on Moses," printed at Venice in 1523.

AARON BEN ASSER, a learned Jew of the 5th century; said to be the inventor of Hebrew points and accents.

AARON BEN CHAIM, a Jew of Morocco; author of "Treatises on the Scriptures," printed at Venice in 1609.

AARON HACHARON, a Jew of Nicomedia, born in 1346. He was the author of a work on the Jewish doctrines and customs, entitled "The Garden of Eden."

AARON HARISCHON, the Carait, a rabbi of the 13th century, author of a Commentary on the Pentateuch.

AARON, ISAAC, a Greek; interpreter to the emperor Manuel Comnenus, by whom he was deprived both of his office and his sight, on a charge of wilful misinterpretation. He was subsequently reinstated in his office; and revenged himself on his enemies with savage cruelty; but died in consequence of torture inflicted on him by order of the emperor Isaac Angelus, on his accession to the throne, in 1203.

AARON, PIETRO, a Florentine of the 16th century, canon of Rimini, and an elaborate writer on music.

AARON SCHASCON, a rabbi of the 17th century; author of "The Law of Truth," printed at Venice in 1631.

AARSENS, FRANCIS VAN, lord of Someldyck and Spyeck, in Holland, a celebrated Dutch diplomatist, who, after residing 15 years at Paris, first as agent and then as ambassador for the United States, was twice sent as ambassador to England. Born at the Hague in 1572; died, 1641.

AARTGEN, a painter, of very considerable merit, but of low and dissolute habits. He was born at Leyden in 1498; and is said to have met his death by being drowned in a drunken frolic, in 1564.

ABA, or ALBON, crowned king of Hungary on the deposition of Peter, surnamed the German, in 1041, and put to death for his cruelty in 1044.

ABACO, AVARISTO FELICE D'ALL, a celebrated composer and violinist of Verona, in the 18th century.

ABACO, Baron, also a native of Verona (in the 18th century), and celebrated as an amateur composer and performer on the violoncello.

ABAGA, or ABAKA-KHAN, a warlike emperor of the Moguls, and a formidable opponent of the crusaders. He succeeded his father in the empire in 1264, and died in 1282.

ABANO. See APOÑO.

ABANTIDAS, son of Pasenas, made himself master of Sicily, after putting to death

Clinias, who was regent for his son Aratus, then a minor. He was assassinated B.C. 251.

ABARIS, a celebrated character of antiquity, said to have possessed vast abilities, and to have been endowed with the power of performing miraculous cures, but of whom even the country which gave him birth is very uncertain; some calling him a Scythian, while others maintain that he was a native of one of the Western Isles of Scotland: a personage, in short, of whom there is far more of fable recorded than of truth.

ABAS, SCHAH, surnamed the Great, 7th king of Persia. With the assistance of the English, in 1622, he took Ormus, and made Ispahan the capital of Persia. Died in 1629.

ABASCAL, DON JOSE FERNANDO, viceroy of Peru during several years of the South American war of independence, was born at Oviedo in 1743, and having entered the military service of Spain, served in the numerous campaigns of that country during the latter half of last century in all parts of the globe. Appointed viceroy of Peru in 1804, he governed with a firm but gentle hand till 1816, when he was superseded by General Pezuola; and, on his retirement, he left behind him a character for ability and moderation which is still held in grateful remembrance. Died at Madrid, 1821.

ABASSA, or ABBASSA, sister of the caliph Haroun al Raschid, who gave her in marriage to his vizier Giafar, on condition that their marriage should never be consummated; but having broken the contract, the caliph put Giafar to death, and banished his wife from the palace, giving orders that no one should afford her relief. The romantic incidents arising from this strange marriage have furnished themes for many an oriental tale.

ABASSON, an impostor: who was put to death for pretending that he was grandson to Abas the Great.

ABATE, ANDREA, a Neapolitan artist, who, as a painter of fruit and objects of still life, acquired great celebrity. He was employed, together with Luca Giordio, in adorning the Escorial for Charles II. of Spain. Died, 1732.

ABATI, NICOLÒ, more frequently, but erroneously, called Dell'Abate, a renowned painter in fresco. Born at Modena, 1512; died at Paris, 1571. Several of his relations also distinguished themselves as painters.

ABAUZIT, FIRMIN, a French author of great merit, and whose modesty was equal to his erudition. His father died in his infancy; and his mother, in order to secure his education in the Protestant faith, sent him, at two years of age, to Geneva. After finishing his studies he went to Holland, and from thence to England, where he formed an intimacy with Sir Isaac Newton, by whom he was much admired and esteemed. He was also highly panegyrised by Voltaire and Rousseau. In short, though he published little, he had acquired among literary men a character for profound learning, and his correct judgment was universally acknowledged by them. Born at Uzes, 1679; died at Geneva, 1767.

ABBADIE, JAMES, an eminent Protestant divine, who accompanied Marshal Schomberg to England in 1688, and was present when that great commander fell at the battle of the Boyne. On his return to London he was appointed minister of the French church in the Savoy, and was subsequently made dean of Killaloe. He wrote many works, chiefly theological and in the French language; the most esteemed of which is entitled "Traité de la Vérité de la Religion Chrétienne." Born at Nay, in Béarn, in 1658; died in London, 1727.

ABBAS, the uncle of Mahomet, of whom, though opposed to him at first, he became a disciple, and served in his army as a general. He died in the 32d year of the Hegira—A.D. 653.

ABBAS, EBN ABBAS ABDALLA, son of the foregoing; chief of the "Sahabah," or companions of the Prophet, and author of a "Commentary on the Koran."

ABBATISSA, PAUL, a poet of Sicily, who flourished about the year 1570, and translated the Iliad and Odyssey into Latin verse.

ABBIATI, FILIPPO, an historical painter, of considerable eminence. Born at Milan in 1640; died in 1715.

ABBON, or ABBO, CERNUUS, a Norman monk of the 9th century, who wrote, in Latin verse, an account of the siege of Paris by the Normans.

ABBON, or ABBO, FLORIANCENSIS, a learned Frenchman of the 10th century, and abbot of Fleury; the author of numerous ecclesiastical biographies. For a short time he presided over the monastery of Ramsay, and was a great favourite with Ethelred. He was killed in 1004, while endeavouring to quell a tumult between two contending parties of French and Gascons.

ABBOT, GEORGE, archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., and one of the most active political characters of that period. He was born, in 1562, at Guildford in Surrey, where his father was a weaver and clothworker. After receiving his education at the grammar school in that town, he was sent to Balliol college, Oxford; and became successively master of University college, dean of Winchester, vice-chancellor of Oxford, bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, then of London, and lastly, primate of all England. Towards the close of his life an event occurred, which for a time caused his suspension from the archiepiscopal office; for being at the seat of Lord Zouch in Hampshire, while on a hunting party he accidentally shot one of his lordship's keepers. He was the author of several theological works; and was one of the eight divines, who, in 1604, by the order of James I. translated the edition of the Bible now in use. He died at Croydon in 1633, and was buried in his native town, where he had founded and liberally endowed a hospital.

ABBOT, ROBERT, bishop of Salisbury, and elder brother of the above. He was an eminent divine, and famous for his skill in conducting polemical discussions and vindicating the supremacy of kings. Born, 1560; died, 1617. Dr. Fuller, speaking of the two brothers, says, "George was the more plausible preacher, Robert the greatest scholar;

George the abler statesman, Robert the deeper divine; gravity did frown in George, and smile in Robert."

ABBOT, MAURICE, youngest brother of the foregoing, was an eminent London merchant, and one of the first directors of the East India Company. He served the office of sheriff in 1627, was afterwards lord mayor, and represented the city in parliament at the commencement of the reign of Charles I., by whom he was knighted.

ABBOT, GEORGE, son of Sir Maurice, was the author of a Paraphrase on the Book of Job, and several other religious works. He took up arms in favour of the parliamentarians in the civil wars. Born, 1600; died, 1648.

ABBT, THOMAS, a German writer, was born at Ulm, in Suabia, in 1738. After filling the chair of philosophy at Frankfort on the Oder, and of mathematics at Rinteln in Westphalia, he was fortunate enough to attract the notice of the prince of Schaumburg-Lippe, by whom he was held in high estimation and effectually patronised. His treatises on "Merit," and on the "Duty of Dying for our Country," are full of talent and promise: but the latter he was not destined to fulfil, as he died at the early age of 28, in 1766.

ABDALLA, the father of Mahomet. Though originally only a camel-driver, it appears that he was held in high estimation by his tribe: indeed, so extravagant is the praise bestowed upon him, that, among other absurdities which are related, it is said that on his wedding a hundred girls died of grief and disappointment, for having lost the honour of being his bride.

ABDALLA II., caliph of the Saracens, a celebrated warrior, who took Jerusalem, and ordered all the Christians and Jews to be branded in the hand. Died, 781.

ABDALMALEK, fifth caliph of the race of the Omniads. His reign, which was very prosperous, commenced in 681, and continued for 21 years, having during that time extended his conquests into India and Spain, and conquered Mecca and Medina. On account of his extreme avarice, he was called the peeler of stone; whence, we are told, the vulgar saying of skinning a flint is derived.

ABDALONYMUS, a descendant of the kings of Sidon, but reduced to the condition of a husbandman. When Alexander the Great conquered that country, and allowed Hephæstion to dispose of the crown, Abdalonymus was selected, and brought before the Macedonian hero; who, observing the dignity of his aspect, said to his courtiers, "I wish to know how he bore his poverty." Abdalonymus, hearing this, said, "Would to heaven I may bear my prosperity as well;" which answer so pleased the conqueror, that he confirmed the appointment.

ABDAS, a Christian bishop in Persia, in the time of Theodosius the Younger, and an intemperate zealot, to whose frenzy has been attributed the thirty years' persecution of the Christians, of which he himself was one of the earliest victims.

ABDIAS, of Babylon, an impostor who affirmed that he was one of the 72 disciples sent by Our Saviour, and that St. Simon and St. Jude had appointed him first bishop of Babylon. He was the author of a legend entitled "Historia certaminis Apostolici," printed at Basle in 1571.

ABDOA, a Persian, who suffered martyrdom in support of Christianity, A. D. 250.

ABDOLLATIPH, a Persian historian, born at Bagdad in 1161. He is said to have been a man of great learning and a voluminous writer; but the only one of his works known in Europe is an abridged history of Egypt, entitled "Al-kital Alsager," or the little book, which was published from a MS. in the Bodleian Library, by Professor White, in 1800.

ABDOLMUMEM, or ABDALMON, the son of a potter, but who became a general, and afterwards a monarch, the conqueror of Morocco, and the destroyer of the Almora-vidæ family. He assumed the title of EMIR AL MUMENIN (head of the true believers), and died in 1156.

ABEILLE, GASPARD, a French poet and dramatic writer, was born at Riez, in Provence, 1648. His ready wit and conversational powers rendered him a general favourite, and in private life he was greatly esteemed; but his works though numerous are now nearly forgotten. Died at Paris, 1718. His brother, Scipio, was the author of "A History of the Bones," and "The Complete Army Surgeon." Died, 1697.

ABEILLE, LOUIS PAUL, secretary to the council-general of trade, &c., and author of several works on agriculture and commerce. Born at Toulouse, 1719; died at Paris, 1807.

ABEL, king of Denmark, second surviving son of Vladimir II. His father created him duke of Sleswick and South Jutland, and at his death, in 1240, left him independent master of those provinces. Slain in battle, 1252.

ABEL, CHARLES FREDERICK, a German musician and composer, remarkably skilful on the viol di Gamba, was born at Cothen, 1725. He resided many years in England, and was appointed musician to Queen Charlotte. He died in 1787.

ABEL, Dr. CLARKE, was the historian of Lord Amherst's embassy to China, which he accompanied as chief medical officer and naturalist. He was a deep and philosophic thinker, a close observer of the mysteries of nature, and a man of a benevolent mind. Died, 1826.

ABEL, GASPARD, a German historian, born at Hindenburg, in 1675; died in 1763.

ABEL, JOSEPH, a distinguished German painter of the present century, born near Linz on the Danube, 1780. Many of his historical pictures are to be seen at Vienna, where he died, 1818.

ABEL, THOMAS, teacher of music and grammar to Catharine, queen of Henry VIII. Having written a tract against the divorce of Catharine, he incurred Henry's displeasure; and for denying the king's supremacy he was tried, condemned, and executed, in 1540.

ABELA, JOHN FRANCIS, commander of the order of St. John of Jerusalem; author of a valuable and interesting work entitled "Malta Illustrata," which was printed in that island, in 1647. Died, 1655.

ABELARD, or ABAILLARD, PETER, 80

celebrated for his learning and his misfortunes, the latter arising from his love of the equally celebrated Heloise, was born at the village of Palais, near Nantes, in Brittany, 1079. Having made extraordinary progress at the university of Paris, and surpassed all his compeers, he opened a school of theology, philosophy, and rhetoric, which was thronged with pupils, and where some of the most distinguished characters of the day imbibed their scholastic philosophy. While he was thus in the zenith of his popularity he became so violently enamoured with the beautiful and accomplished niece of Fulbert, a canon of Paris, as to forget his duty, his lectures, and his fame. Under the pretext of teaching her philosophy, he obtained the uncle's permission to visit her, and at length to reside in the house. Though Abelard was at that time in his 40th year, and Heloise only in her 18th, a mutual passion, fatal to the happiness of both, was encouraged. Fulbert suspecting this, separated the lovers; but the imprudent intercourse had gone too far for concealment; and Abelard, who had retired to his sister's house in Brittany, was followed there by Heloise, who gave birth to a son. He then resolved to marry her secretly; but although the uncle's consent was obtained, Heloise, by a strange infatuation, chose rather to be considered Abelard's mistress than his wife, and at last very reluctantly complied. Still she would not own her marriage, and even had the hardihood to deny it with an oath. This so greatly incensed her uncle, that he manifested his displeasure by treating her with great severity; and Abelard in consequence determined on releasing her. He accordingly carried her away, and placed her in the convent of Argenteuil, where she put on the religious habit, but did not take the veil. Irritated at Abelard for placing Heloise in a monastery, the canon hired some ruffians, who broke into his chamber, and subjected the unfortunate victim to an ignominious mutilation. Filled with shame and sorrow, he now became a monk in the abbey of St. Dennis, and Heloise took the veil. After time had somewhat moderated his grief, Abelard resumed his lectures, but the violence of his enemies increased; he was charged with heterodoxy, and his works condemned by council. He next erected an oratory in the diocese of Troyes, called the Paraclete, but persecution still followed him; and after a life of extraordinary vicissitudes he died in the priory of St. Marcel, near Chalons-sur-Saone, in 1142. On the corpse being sent to Heloise, she deposited it in the Paraclete, of which establishment she was at that time the abbess, and with the view of being buried by his side. In 1800 the ashes of both were taken to the museum of French monuments at Paris; and on the museum being destroyed, in 1817, they were removed to the cemetery of Pere la Chaise. As an orator, logician, poet, philosopher, theologian, and mathematician, Abelard had acquired the highest fame; but the memory of his splendid attainments has been swept down the gulf of oblivion, while the tale of his passionate love and its bitter fruits is likely to descend to the remotest posterity.

ABELLI, LOUIS, bishop of Rhodes, and author of "Medulla," and other theological works. Born, 1604; died, 1691.

ABENDANA, JACOB, a Spanish Jew; author of a Hebrew Commentary on some portions of the Scripture. Died, 1685.

ABERCROMBIE, JOHN, M. D., an eminent Scotch physician and author, was born at Aberdeen, Nov. 11. 1781. Having taken his degree at Edinburgh in 1803, he permanently fixed his residence in the Scotch metropolis, where he soon gained the first rank as a practising and consulting physician. But the writings of Dr. Abercrombie contributed no less to the maintenance of his fame, than his skill as a physician. His purely professional works procured for him a high place among the modern cultivators of science; but the most permanent monument to his memory are his "Inquiries concerning the Intellectual Powers, &c.," published 1830, and the "Philosophy of the Moral Feelings," published 1833. In these works he has brought all the medical facts accumulated in the course of his extensive experience and research, to bear on the various moral and metaphysical systems in vogue, and constructed out of the whole a view of human nature in which the facts of science and the revelations of religion are blended in peculiar harmony. To his wide range of acquirements he added a piety as genuine as it was unassuming, and he will long be remembered for his large but unobtrusive benevolence. Died, Nov. 14. 1844.

ABERCROMBIE, JOHN, a horticulturist; author of a "Universal Dictionary of Gardening and Botany," and a "Gardener's Calendar," published under the name of Mawe. Died, 1806, aged 80.

ABERCROMBY, ALEXANDER, brother of Sir Ralph Abercromby, an eminent lawyer and occasional essayist, was born 1745. Admitted a member of the Faculty of Advocates in 1766, he distinguished himself at the bar, and was raised to the bench in 1792, when he assumed the title of Lord Abercromby. He was one of the originators of, and contributors to, the "Mirror" and the "Lounger," in connection with Henry Mackenzie. Died, 1795.

ABERCROMBY, PATRICK, a native of Forfar, in Scotland, physician to James II. of England, and author of the "Martial Achievements of Scotland," and a "Treatise on Wit." Died, 1726.

ABERCROMBY, Sir RALPH, one of the bravest of British generals, was born in 1738, at Tillibodie, Clackmannanshire, and entered the army in 1756, as a cornet in the 2nd dragoon guards. He served with honour during the seven years' war, and in that of American independence; gradually rising in his profession till he attained the rank of major general in 1787. His military skill was severely put to the test in the disastrous campaigns in Flanders and Holland in 1794 and 1795. After this he was employed in the West Indies, where he distinguished himself by taking some of the most valuable islands belonging to the enemy. On his return to Europe he was made governor of the Isle of Wight, and raised to the rank of lieutenant-general.

He was then appointed to the command of the troops in Ireland, where he displayed equal firmness and moderation; and, soon after, he again shared in the profitless perils of an expedition to Holland. His next and last appointment was that of commander-in-chief of the expedition sent to Egypt to oppose the growing power of the French, and dispossess them of that country. Having defeated the enemy at Aboukir early in March, 1801, he again came to action with them on the 21st of the same month, in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, where, after a desperate battle, the British troops were again signally victorious; but their gallant general was so severely wounded, that he died a week after the battle, on board the admiral's ship, which was conveying him to Malta. His widow was created a baroness, with a pension of two thousand pounds.

ABERCROMBY, Sir ROBERT, younger brother of the above, a general in the army, K.B., and for thirty years governor of the Castle of Edinburgh. Died, 1827.

ABERLI, JOHN LOUIS, an eminent Swiss landscape painter. Born at Winterthur, 1723; died at Berne, 1786.

ABERNETHY, JOHN, an Irish dissenter and divine, of whose sermons there are two volumes, which are held in considerable esteem. Born at Coleraine, 1680; died at Dublin, 1740.

ABERNETHY, JOHN, F.R.S., a surgeon of great repute and extensive practice. He was brought up under Sir Charles Blick, surgeon to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and was acknowledged to possess great talent and originality; though he doubtless owed much of his fame to a blunt eccentricity of manner, by which he was ever distinguished. He was the author of "Surgical Observations," "Physiological Essays," &c. Born, 1764; died, 1831.

ABGARUS, a king of Edessa, in Mesopotamia, cotemporary with Our Saviour, to whom he is said to have written a letter and received an answer to it. Both letter and answer are pronounced by the best critics to be mere forgeries.

ABGILLUS, surnamed PRESTER JOHN, son of a king of the Fris. He accompanied Charlemagne to the Holy Land; and after his leader's return to Europe, made vast conquests in Abyssinia, which was long called "Prester John's Dominion." He is reputed to have written an account of Charlemagne's deeds in the East.

ABINGER, Lord, JAMES SCARLETT, was the second son of Robert Scarlett, of Jamaica, where the future lord was born in 1769. He was early sent to England for education, entered at Trinity college, Cambridge, in 1786, and took his B. A. degree in 1790. In 1791 he was called to the bar, and may be said to have become eminent from his very first appearance in the courts. A fine figure, a singularly familiar and unpretending style of elocution, and an almost unrivalled tact in managing a jury, caused him to have immense business. In 1818, after having twice been defeated in contested elections, he obtained a seat in parliament through the patronage of Earl Fitzwilliam. For very many years Mr. Scarlett was considered a Whig, and voted as well as spoke in favour of the various measures proposed by Romilly and Mackintosh for the amelioration of the criminal code. On the formation of a mixed ministry under Canning, in 1827, he became attorney general and received the honour of knighthood. In 1834, on the formation of the Peel cabinet, he was raised to the bench as chief baron, with the title of Lord Abinger. In his judicial capacity, he gave the highest satisfaction; nothing could be sounder than his law, or purer than his impartiality. Died, April, 1844, aged 75.

ABINGTON, FRANCES, a celebrated comic actress, born in London, 1731; died, 1815. She was the original Lady Teazle, and that character is regarded as her masterpiece.

ABISBAL, HENRY O'DONNELL, Count of, a celebrated Spanish general, born in Andalusia, 1770. Having entered the royal guards at the age of fifteen, he served in the war against the French republic; and on Napoleon's invasion of Spain, the part he took in the relief of Gerona in 1800, led to his promotion to the command of Catalonia, where he displayed great energy, and reaped much success. Though defeated in the plains of Vich by General Sonham, he a month afterwards forced Augereau to abandon Lower Catalonia; and, at the village of Abiesal, he compelled the surrender of a whole French column under General Schwartz. From this action he took his title. Towards the close of the war, he commanded with brilliant success at the capture of Pancorvo. In 1819 he suppressed a mutiny of the troops in the isle of Leon; but he fell into disgrace on suspicion of treachery, and it was not till 1823, on the invasion of Spain by the French under the Duke d'Angoulême, that he recovered his position and his fame. After the restoration of Ferdinand, he retired to France, where he resided, almost entirely forgotten, till his death in 1834.

ABNEY, Sir THOMAS, an eminent magistrate of London, lord mayor in 1700, and M.P. for the city. When the king of France had proclaimed the Pretender king of Great Britain, he proposed an address to king William, and the measure having been followed by other corporations, proved of great service to the king, who was thereby encouraged to dissolve the parliament, and take the sense of the people, which was almost universally in favour of the Protestant succession. He was one of the first promoters of the Bank of England, and one of its earliest directors. Died, 1722.

ABOS, chapel-master of the conservatory of La Pietà at Naples, about the middle of the 18th century; and author of the opera of "Tito Manlio."

ABOU, JOSEPH, a learned Mussulman and supreme judge of Bagdad, during the caliphate of Haroun al Raschid.

ABRESCH, FREDERICK LOUIS, a celebrated critic. He was an admirable Greek scholar, and his scholia on Greek authors are deservedly held in very high esteem. Born at Homburg, 1699; died in Switzerland where he was rector of a college, 1782.

ABRIAL, ANDREW JOSEPH, a distinguished French statesman, was born at Paris, 1750. After finishing his legal studies, he went to Senegal to superintend one of the French factories; and some years after his return, he was sent to Naples to organise the republican government, and the mildness and moderation he displayed here, gained him general good will. After the 18th Brumaire, he was appointed by Napoleon minister of justice, and is said to have been one of the framers of the Code Napoleon. But though Napoleon loaded him with honours, he was among the first to vote for his dethronement in 1814; and after the restoration of the Bourbons, he was created a peer, and continued to devote himself to the improvements of the law, till his death in 1828.

ABSALOM, archbishop of Lund in Denmark; eminent as a statesman and warrior, and founder of the castle and city of Copenhagen. Died, 1201.

ABSTEMIUS, LAURENTIUS, an Italian author of the 15th century. He is chiefly known by his fables, which have been appended to some editions of Æsop and Phædrus, and by a commentary on some passages of Ovid.

ABU, MOSLEM, governor of Khorassan. At an enormous sacrifice of human life, he aided in establishing the Abasside dynasty upon the ruin of that of the Ommiades; but his services to the caliph Almanzor did not prevent that prince from causing him to be put to death, A. D. 759.

ABUBEKER, father-in-law and successor of Mahomet. His original name was changed to that of Abubeker, or "Father of the Virgin," on the occasion of his daughter Ayesha becoming the bride of Mahomet. On succeeding his son-in-law he assumed the title of caliph, which signifies both successor and vicar, and which was first borne by him. He won vast territory from the Syrians, Persians, and Greeks. Died, 634.

ABUCARA, THEODORE, bishop of Caria in the 8th century; author of some controversial treatises which were published at Ingoldstadt in 1606, and of a treatise "De Unione et Incarnatione," published at Paris in 1685.

ABUDADHER, chief of the Arabian sect of Karmatians, and a bitter enemy of the Mahometans. On one occasion he plundered Mecca, murdered vast numbers of pilgrims, and carried away the celebrated black stone, which the Mahometans so highly value on the supposition that it fell from Heaven. The stone was subsequently ransomed. Died, 953.

ABULFARAGIUS, GREGORY, originally a physician of Armenia, but subsequently a bishop. Of his various works the most esteemed is a Universal History, an edition of which, with a Latin translation, was published at Oxford, by Dr. Pococke, in 1663. He eventually became primate of the East, and died in 1286.

ABULFAZEL, vizier to the celebrated Mogul emperor Akbar, and author of "Ayeen Akberry"—a statistical and geographical account of the Mogul empire, and an history of the reign of the emperor Akbar: the former work was translated into English by Mr. Gladwin in 1785. Died, by the hands of an assassin, in 1604.

ABULFEDA, ISMAEL, prince of Hamah in Syria. He was distinguished as a military commander; but still more as an excellent historian and geographer, being the author of a description of Chorasmia and Mawaralnahre, and the lives of Mahomet and Saladin, &c. The former work has been published with a Latin translation, added to the Arabic original; and portions of his various works have been separately translated into English. Died, 1333.

ABULGAZI, BAYATUR, khan of the Tartars, and author of an esteemed Tartar history. Some Russian exiles in Siberia having discovered the MS. of this work, it was brought to Europe and translated into German and French. Born at Urgens, the capital of Karasm, 1605; died, 1663.

ABU-OBEDAIAH, a friend and associate of Mahomet, and the conqueror of great part of Palestine and Syria. Died, by the pestilence, 639.

ABU-TEMAN, a celebrated Arabian poet. Some of his works have been published in England. Died, 845.

ABUZAIID, MIRZA, a soldier in the service of Uleg Beg, who, taking advantage of the feud between that personage and his son, proclaimed himself in 1450; but after gaining considerable territory, he perished in an ambuscade, in 1468.

ABYDENUS, the reputed author of an history of Assyria and Chaldea, which is now lost, except some fragments inserted by Eusebius in his Preparatio Evangelica.

ACACIUS, bishop of Berea, in Syria, the opponent of St. Chrysostom and Cyril of Alexandria. Died, 436.

ACACIUS, bishop of Amida, on the Tigris, a man honourably distinguished for having sold the church-plate to ransom 7000 Persians, who had been taken prisoners in the war between Theodosius the Younger, and Varannes, king of Persia. The latter monarch was induced by this truly Christian benevolence to consent to the termination of the war. This good prelate flourished early in the 5th century, but the exact time of his death is unknown.

ACACIUS, surnamed MONOPHTHALMUS, from having lost an eye, was the disciple and successor of Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, whose life he wrote. He was the founder of a sect called Acaciani, and died about the year 365.

ACADEMUS, an Athenian citizen, who, in the time of Theseus, had the honour of founding the Academic grove, and of giving his name to a sect of philosophers.

ACLIUS, CAIUS, a valiant soldier under Julius Cæsar: he grappled an enemy's galley with his right hand, which being cut off, he seized it with his left, and boarded it, notwithstanding he was opposed by all the crew upon deck.

ACINDYNUS, SEPTIMIUS, a Roman consul, and governor of Antioch, in the 4th century. Having sentenced a man to be hanged for a debt owing by him to the public treasury, if it was not paid by a certain day, a very rich citizen proposed to pay the sum for him if he would consent to his wife's dishonour; but having accomplished his base design, he treacherously gave her a bag of earth, instead of the money; which being reported to Acindynus, he condemned the citizen to pay the debt, and to give the land from whence the earth was taken, to the wife.

ACKERMANN, CONRAD, a German comedian, and founder of the modern German theatre. Died, 1771.

ACKERMANN, JOHN CHRISTIAN GOTLIEB, an eminent physician; author of a "Manual of Military Medicine," and other valuable works. Born in 1756; and died at Altdorf, in Franconia, in 1801.

ACKERMANN, RUDOLPH, an ingenious and enterprising tradesman, was born at Stolberg, Saxony, in 1764, and came to England previous to the French revolution. After following for a time the occupation of a carriage draughtsman, he settled in the Strand as a printseller, where he established a flourishing and extensive concern, furnishing employment to numerous artists, and judiciously catering for the public taste in elegant and ornamental works of art. His "Forget me Not" was the first of that class of "Annals" which appeared in this country; and to him also are we indebted for the introduction and much of the success of the lithographic art; while the good taste and spirit he evinced in producing the "Histories" of Westminster, Oxford, &c., and other handsomely embellished works, entitle him to the respect of all who know how to appreciate them. Died, 1834.

ACKMAN, WILLIAM, a Scotch artist of the 18th century. As a portrait painter, he was held in high estimation; but is chiefly remembered as the first person who appreciated and encouraged the poet Thomson.

ACOLUTHUS, ANDREW, a learned professor of languages at Breslaw; author of a treatise "De Aquis Amaris," and numerous other works. Died, 1704.

ACONTIUS, JAMES, a native of Trent, eminent, in the 16th century, as a philosopher, a divine, and a civilian.

ADAIR, JAMES, serjeant-at-law, born in London, and educated at Peter-House, Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. A. in 1767. In 1771, he was chosen recorder of London; an office which he held for ten years. At his death, which happened in 1798, he was member of parliament for Higham Ferrers, king's prime serjeant-at-law, and chief-justice at Chester.

ADAIR, JAMES, a trader and resident among the N. American Indians, whose lineage he deduces from the Jews, in a publication dated 1775.

ADAIR, JAMES MAKITTRICK, a physician of some eminence, and a native of Scotland; author of a number of medical and other works. Died at Harrowgate, in 1802.

ADALARD, or ADELARD, a German divine and theological writer, the grandson of Charles Martel, and cousin-german of Charlemagne. He is most distinguished for the foundation of a distinct abbey, called New Corbie, as a seminary for the education of missionaries, who were to be employed in the conversion of the northern nations. Born, 753; died, 827.

ADALBERON, a celebrated archbishop of Rheims, and chancellor of France; who distinguished himself, as a prelate and a politician, under Lothaire, Louis V., and Hugh Capet. Died in 988.

ADALBERON, ASCELINUS, ordained bishop of Laon, in 977, by the preceding. He treacherously delivered up Arnoul, archbishop of Rheims, and Charles, duke of Lorraine, to Hugh Capet. Died, 1030.

ADALBERT, archbishop of Prague, in the 10th century. He was one of the first founders of the Christian religion in Hungary; and also preached the gospel in Prussia, and in Lithuania, where he was murdered by Sego, a pagan priest. Boleslaus, prince of Poland, is said to have ransomed his body with an equal weight of gold.

ADALBERT, an ambitious, eloquent, and designing prelate, created archbishop of Bremen and Hamburg, 1043. During the minority of Henry IV. of Germany, he acted as regent, but his despotic conduct rendered him obnoxious to the people. Died, 1072.

ADAM, ROBERT, author of "The Religious World Displayed," &c., was born in Aberdeenshire, 1770. After pursuing his studies at Oxford, he entered into holy orders, and was appointed to a church in the Danish island of St. Croix, where he was much annoyed by the authorities, and compelled to return without any redress for the injuries he had sustained. He was subsequently appointed to a charge in the island of Tobago; but he died almost before entering upon his duties, 1826.

ADAM, the Right Hon. WILLIAM, lord chief commissioner of the Jury Court, was born at Blair Adam, 1751. After finishing his studies at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Oxford, he obtained a seat in Parliament; but in consequence of some family losses he resigned his seat in 1794, and obtained such success in his profession as to be successively appointed counsel for the East India Company, and chancellor of the duchy of Cornwall. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, and many of the nobility honoured him with their confidence; and in 1815 he was made a privy councillor, and was appointed one of the barons of the Scottish Exchequer, chiefly with the view of enabling him to introduce and establish the new system of trial by jury in civil cases. In this he was completely successful. Nominated chief commissioner, he continued to discharge his arduous and important duties to the satisfaction of all, till his retirement in 1833. In the course of his parliamentary career, in consequence of something that occurred in a discussion during the first American war, Mr. Adam fought a duel with Mr. Fox, which happily ended without bloodshed, when the latter jocularly remarked, that had his antagonist not loaded his pistol with government powder, he would have been shot. Died, 1839.

ADAM, SCOTUS, a doctor of the Sorbonne, in the 12th century, and author of a life of David I. of Scotland.

ADAM, ALEXANDER, LL.D., well known to the literary and scholastic world by his "Latin Lexicon," "Roman Antiquities," &c.; raised himself to great eminence by almost unprecedented efforts, and became rector of the High School of Edinburgh, an office which he held till his death. Born, 1741; died, 1809.

ADAM, LAMBERT SIGISBERT, an eminent French sculptor, many of whose works were executed for the decoration of Versailles and St. Cloud. Born, 1700; died, 1759.

ADAM, NICHOLAS SEBASTIAN, brother of the above, and eminent in the same profession. He executed the admired statue of "Prometheus Chained." Born, 1705; died, 1778.

ADAM of Bremen, canon of the cathedral of Bremen about the close of the 11th century; author of an ecclesiastical history, and numerous other works; and indefatigable as a Christian missionary.

ADAM, MELCHIOR, a German divine and biographical author of the 17th century, to whose voluminous writings subsequent biographers have been greatly indebted. Died, 1622.

ADAM, NICHOLAS, a French grammarian; author of "The True Mode of acquiring a Language whether Living or Dead, by means of the French," and other works of considerable ingenuity. Born, 1716; died, 1792.

ADAM, ROBERT, F.R.S. and F.S.A.; a celebrated architect, much employed upon the public buildings and noblemen's mansions of London. One of his works, executed in conjunction with his brother, is the noble range of buildings called the "Adelphi," the name being the Greek word for "Brothers." He at one time represented the county of Kinross in Parliament. Born at Kirkaldy, Fifeshire, 1728; died, 1792. His brother James, the coadjutor in most of his labours, died, 1794.

ADAM, THOMAS, an English divine, and for 58 years the rector of Winttringham, in Lincolnshire, having repeatedly refused preferment. He was the author of some religious works. Born at Leeds, 1701; died, 1784.

ADAMANTEO, a learned Italian mathematician and orientalist; author of "Glossæ et Interpretationes in Talmud Hebraeorum." Died, 1581.

ADAMANTIUS, a Greek physician of the 5th century; author of a work on physiognomy, which has been often printed.

ADAMANUS, abbot of Icolmkil, in the 8th century; author of a life of St. Columba.

ADAMI, LEONARDO, an Italian scholar, eminent for his skill in the Greek and Oriental languages, and librarian to Cardinal Imperiali. Born, 1690, at Bolsema, in Tuscany; died, 1719.

ADAMS, GEORGE, a celebrated maker of mathematical instruments; author of "Micrographiæ Illustrata," and other scientific works. Died, 1786.

ADAMS, GEORGE, son of the above, and of the same profession; author of "An Essay on Vision, &c." Born, 1750; died, 1795.

ADAMS, JOHN, second president of the United States of America, and a political writer of considerable reputation. Before the Revolution, Mr. Adams attained great eminence as a lawyer, and published an essay "On Common and Feudal Law." On the breach with the mother country, he espoused the colonial cause, and employed his pen with great activity. He was one of the principal promoters of the memorable resolution passed July 4, 1776, declaring the American States free, sovereign, and independent. Mr. Adams subsequently proceeded with Dr. Franklin to the court of France, in order to negotiate a treaty of peace and alliance with that country. He was afterwards nominated plenipotentiary to Holland, and materially contributed to hasten a rupture between the United Provinces and Great Britain. Lastly, he was employed in negotiating a general peace at Paris; and was the first ambassador received by this country from America after it was effected. This distinguished individual also took a great share, in conjunction with Washington, Hamilton, and other federal leaders, in forming the present constitution of the United States, in 1787, when General Washington was elected president, and Mr. Adams vice-president. On the retirement of Washington, Mr. Adams was elected his successor; and, at the conclusion of his presidency, retired from public life, with the character of an able, active, independent, and upright statesman, even among those whose party views were opposed to his opinions. Born, 1735; died, 1826.

ADAMS, JOHN QUINCY, formerly president of the United States, son of John Adams, the second president, was born at Boston in 1769. His father having been appointed commissioner to France in 1778, embraced the opportunity of securing for his son all the advantages of an European education. When only fourteen years of age he went to Petersburg as private secretary to the American minister, and on his return to his native country he entered Harvard University, where he graduated with honour in 1787, and subsequently commenced the practice of the law at Boston. In 1794 he was appointed by Washington minister of the United States at the Hague; and in 1796 he went in the same capacity to Berlin, which office, however, he resigned on the defeat of his father, and Mr. Jefferson's accession to the presidency, in 1801. Here too he wrote his famous "Letters from Silesia," which were favourably noticed in the Edinburgh Review. After representing Massachusetts in the United States Senate for six years, he went as ambassador to St. Petersburg in 1809, and to the influence which his character and abilities procured for him at that court is mainly to be attributed the intervention of Russia which terminated in the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain. After the peace he was appointed ambassador to the court of St. James's; and he subsequently acted as secretary of state during the administration of Mr. Monroe. In 1825 he was himself elected president of the United States. His administration was a perfect illustration of the principles of the constitution, and of a republic purely and faithfully governed. On the expiry of his term of office, he retired into private life; but he was soon elected by his district as representative in Congress, and though he never afterwards held office, he long continued to benefit his country by his speeches and his pen. Manly, straightforward, and independent, he never swerved from what he believed to be the path of duty,—no easy matter in the United States, where party feeling runs so high; and he has left behind him a reputation for purity and disinterestedness of motives, second only to that of Washington. Died, 1848.

ADAMS, JOHN, "the patriarch of Pitcairn's Island," is famous for the share he took in the mutiny of the Bounty, in 1789, and in the subsequent establishment of the colony of the mutineers at Pitcairn's Island. His real name was Alexander Smith. Died, 1829.

ADAMS, JOSEPH, an able English physician; author of a treatise on epilepsy, and numerous other medical works of great merit. Born, 1758; died, 1818.

ADAMS, SAMUEL, an active member of the first American congress, and one of the most powerful advocates of the political separation of that country from England. Born, 1722; died, 1803.

ADAMS, SIR THOMAS, an eminent citizen of London, of which he was lord mayor in 1645. He was a loyal and prudent magistrate, and distinguished by many public acts of munificence. Born, at Wem, in Shropshire, 1586; died, 1667.

ADAMS, WILLIAM, an English divine of the 18th century; author of an answer to Hume on the Miracles. Died, 1789.

ADAMSON, PATRICK, archbishop of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, and ambassador from James VI. to Queen Elizabeth; but chiefly remembered for his disputes with the presbytery, by which he was involved in ruin. Born, 1536; died, 1599.

ADANSON, MICHAEL, an eminent French naturalist, of Scottish extraction, born at Aix, in Provence, 1727. At the Revolution, he was reduced to extreme indigence, and died in 1806, leaving behind him a vast number of manuscripts.

ADDINGTON, ANTHONY, a physician, born in 1713, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. About 1756, he settled at Reading, where he had considerable practice in cases of insanity. He was the father of Viscount Sidmouth. Died in 1790.

ADDISON, LANCELOT, an English divine, was born at Crosby Ravensworth, Westmoreland, in 1632. He early distinguished himself by his attachment to the Stuart family, and appears to have supported a consistent and upright character. He held the living of Milston, Wilts, with a prebend in the cathedral of Salisbury, and was eventually made dean of Lichfield. He died in 1703.

ADDISON, JOSEPH, so highly celebrated in English literature, was the son of Dr. Lancelot Addison. He was born May 1. 1672, at Milston, and, after receiving the rudiments of education at Salisbury and Lichfield, was sent to the Charterhouse, where he contracted his first intimacy with Mr., afterwards Sir Richard Steele. At the age of 15, he was entered of Queen's college, Oxford, where he soon became distinguished for classical literature, and for his skill in Latin poetry. At 22, he addressed some English verses to the veteran poet, Dryden; and shortly afterwards published a translation of part of Virgil's fourth Georgic. In 1695, he addressed a complimentary poem, on one of the campaigns of King William, to the Lord Keeper Somers, who procured him a pension from the crown of 300*l.* per annum, to enable him to travel. On his return home, in 1702, he found his old friends out of place; but, in 1704, he was introduced by Lord Halifax to Lord Godolphin, as a fit person to celebrate the victory of Blenheim; on which occasion he produced "The Campaign," for which he was appointed commissioner of appeals. After this he accompanied the Marquis of Wharton to Ireland, as secretary. While there, Steele commenced the "Tatler," to which Addison liberally contributed. This was followed by the "Spectator," which was also enriched by the contributions of Addison, whose papers are distinguished by one of the letters of the word Clio. This publication was succeeded by the "Guardian," a similar work, in which Addison also bore a considerable share. In 1713, his famous tragedy of Cato was brought upon the stage, and performed without interruption for thirty-five nights. In 1716, Addison married the Countess Dowager of Warwick; but the union is said to have been far from felicitous. The following year, he became secretary of state, which place he soon resigned, on a pension of 1500*l.* a-year. In his retirement he wrote "A Defence of the Christian Religion," and also laid the plan of an English Dictionary, upon the model of the Italian Della Crusca. He closed his life in a manner suitable to his character. When given over by his physicians, Addison sent for his step-son, the young earl of Warwick, whom he was anxious to reclaim from irregular habits and erroneous opinions, and grasping his hand, exclaimed impressively, "See in what peace a Christian can die!" but whether this affecting interview had any effect upon the young earl is not known, as his own death happened shortly after. Addison died at Holland House, June 17. 1719; leaving an only daughter, who died, unmarried, in 1797. Of Addison's numerous and well-known writings, it may be affirmed, that they rest on the solid basis of real excellence, in moral tendency as well as in literary merit; vice and folly are satirised, virtue and decorum are rendered attractive; and while polished diction and Attic wit abound, the purest ethics are inculcated. May we not then repeat the laudatory and emphatic words of Dr. Johnson;—"Whoever would attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison."

ADELAIDE, MADAME, aunt to Louis XVI. of France. This princess, in order to avoid the sanguinary fury of the revolutionists, and accompanied by her sister, Mad. Victoire, quitted Paris on the 19th of February, 1791. After seeking protection in Rome, Naples, and other places, they found a temporary asylum in Corfu, from whence they were conveyed to Trieste by the Russian general Outschacord, and there fixed their residence. Victoire died the 8th of June, 1799; and Adelaide survived her sister only nine months.

ADELAIDE, EUGENE LOUISA, princess of Orleans, and sister to Louis Philippe, ex-king of the French, was born 1777. Educated with the greatest care by Madame de Genlis, the princess passed her childhood in peaceful retirement, till the outbreak of the French Revolution compelled her with her governess to take refuge successively in the Netherlands, Switzerland, and Spain, where she resided with her mother till 1808. She then joined her brother Louis Philippe at Portsmouth, and participated in all the subsequent vicissitudes of his career. After the restoration, she contributed in no small degree to rally round her brother all the important men to whose wishes for improvement the government of Louis XVIII. made no response; and during the "three glorious days" in 1830, it was mainly owing to her influence that her brother was induced to accept the crown, then offered—since reclaimed—by the people. She subsequently shared and aided the king's high fortune, by her judicious counsels and reflective courage; and it is not perhaps going too far to say, that had she lived to witness the 23rd of February, 1848, Louis Philippe might not have persevered in a course which ultimately cost him and his family a crown. Madame Adelaide was privately married to General Athalin, a peer of France. Died, Dec. 31st 1847.

ADELAIDE, queen dowager of Great Britain and Ireland, was born August 13. 1792. She was the eldest child of George, duke of Saxe Coburg Meiningen, and Louisa, daughter of Christian Albert, prince of Hohenlohe Langenburg. Her father died when she was only eleven years of age, leaving herself and a younger brother and sister under the guardianship of their mother. The early years of the Princess Adelaide were passed in great retirement; but her great natural abilities were fully matured by the accomplishments which form so prominent a feature in many of the small German courts; and no sooner was her education finished, than she entered upon a career of active benevolence, which gained her "golden opinions" wherever she was known. The mournful event which, on November 6. 1817, left the British empire without an heir to its crown in the third generation, having produced the natural result of hastening the marriages of those princes of the blood royal who still remained unwedded, negotiations were set on foot, at the special desire of the queen, for the union of the Duke of Clarence with the Princess Adelaide; and the marriage took place on the 11th July, 1818. Few events of any importance marked the domestic life of the Duke and Duchess of Clarence for many years after their marriage. The hopes of providing a future heir to the crown of England were repeatedly raised, only to be disappointed. In March, 1819, a daughter was born, but lived only a few hours; and a second daughter, the Princess Georgiana Adelaide, who was born on the 10th of December, 1820, expired on March 4th, in the succeeding year. On the 26th of June, 1830, by the death of George IV., the Duchess of Clarence passed from the retirement of Bushy Park, and from the constrained circumstances arising from a comparatively narrow income to all the publicity and splendour of a throne. An onerous and difficult duty devolved upon her majesty on her accession. Twelve years had passed since there had been a queen consort to preside over the hospitalities and ceremonials of the court, and during that interval the etiquette of presentations and the lists of the presented to the royal presence had become relaxed to a degree which was no longer permissible. In reforming the personnel as well as the morale of the court circles, Queen Adelaide undertook a duty which was in many instances as painful and invidious as it was necessary, and which was accomplished with all gentleness and firmness. After a reign of 7 years, Queen Adelaide passed once again into retirement, on the death of William IV., whom she had tended with unwearied care during the tedious illness which closed his life, but displaying throughout the resignation which was consonant with the tenor of her whole life. The Queen Dowager, to whom Marlborough House had been assigned as a residence, with 100,000*l.* a year, thenceforward lived in a carefully guarded privacy, avoiding even the honours which might be considered due to her rank and position, although offered under circumstances that would have given singular temptations to a more ambitious spirit. Besides her visits to her royal relatives in Germany, the Queen had for some time past undertaken repeated journeys into various parts of the country in search of health. Her winters for several years were spent in some climate less ungenial than that of England, and the islands of Malta and Madeira were successively honoured with her Majesty's residence. But she never fully recovered; and towards the close of 1849, her debility assumed an alarming form, and, after lingering a few weeks, she died December 2, sincerely regretted by the people to whom she had endeared herself by her numberless acts of public and private benevolence, as well as by her constant practice of all the Christian graces.

ADELARD, a monk of Bath in the 12th century; a man of considerable learning. He travelled into Egypt and Arabia; and translated Euclid's Elements out of Arabic into Latin, before any Greek copies had been discovered. He also wrote several treatises on mathematical and medical subjects, which remain in MS. at Oxford.

ADELBOLD, bishop of Utrecht, the cathedral of which he founded. He wrote the life of his patron, the emperor Henry II., and died in 1027.

ADELER, CURTIUS, named also Servinus, an eminent naval commander, born in Norway, 1622. He went to Venice, where he was made admiral; and, after performing many gallant exploits against the Turks, retired to Constantinople, where he ended his days in honour and tranquillity, being made admiral-in-chief of the Danish fleet, and created a noble. He died in 1675.

ADELUNG, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a German philologist of great merit; chiefly celebrated for his "Grammatical and Critical Dictionary," 5 vols. 4to. Born, 1732; died, 1806.

ADEMAR, a monk of the 10th century, who wrote the chronicles of France, published by Labbe.

ADER, WILLIAM, a physician of Toulouse, who wrote a book in 1621, entitled, "De Ægrotis et Morbis Evangelicis;" in which he proves that the diseases healed by Our Saviour were incurable by medicine.

ADET, P. A., envoy from France to the United States in 1796; author of several chemical works, original and translated, and of a design for new chemical characters and nomenclature.

ADHAD-EDDOULAT, emperor of Persia, born about 935. In 977 he became master of Bagdad, which he adorned with hospitals, mosques, and other public works. He was also a great encourager of learning. Died, 982.

ADHELME, a learned prelate under the Saxon Heptarchy, and nephew to King Ina. He was the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, the first who brought poetry into this country, and the first bishop of Sherborne. He died in 709, and was canonised.

ADIMARI, an old Florentine family

often mentioned in the history of Florence during the middle ages. Two of their descendants were distinguished in literature. Alessandro, born at Florence 1580, a classical scholar, and poet of some note; and Ludovico, born at Naples 1644, chamberlain of the Duke Gonzaga of Mantua, and afterwards professor of the Tuscan language at Florence, and a satirical writer of great ability.

ADLER, JAMES GEORGE, a learned Danish orientalist, born in 1756; author of "Museum Cuficum," some works on the Jewish language, laws, and rites, and several philological publications.

ADLER, PHILIP, a German engraver of the 16th century, whose style of etching appears to have founded a school which gave rise to the Hopfers and Hollar. He died about 1530.

ADLERFELDT, GUSTAVUS, a Swedish historian in the time of Charles XII., whom he accompanied throughout his campaigns, of which he wrote an esteemed account; and it is not a little singular that his history is continued up to the very day when a cannon ball deprived him of life, at the battle of Pultowa, in 1709.

ADLZREITER, JOHN, a German historian, and chancellor of Bavaria. He wrote the annals of that state in Latin; and died about the year 1662.

ADO, archbishop of Vienne, distinguished by his piety, and who acquired considerable celebrity as an historian. Died, 875.

ADOLFATI, an Italian composer and author of several operas. In imitation of Marcello, he wrote a piece in which there were two sorts of time in the same air; the one of two notes, the other of three.

ADOLPHUS, emperor of Germany, was count of Nassau, and elevated to the imperial throne in 1292. Slain by Albert, duke of Austria, 1298.

ADOLPHUS, count of Cleves, celebrated by the institution of the Order of Fools, in 1380, which consisted of the principal noblemen of Cleves. This order has long ceased to exist.

ADOLPHUS FREDERIC II., king of Sweden, born in 1710, succeeded his father, Frederic, in 1751. He died, greatly regretted, in 1771.

ADOLPHUS, JOHN, for many years well known as a barrister at the criminal courts of the metropolis, was born in London, in 1766. He entered the legal profession, and was admitted an attorney and solicitor in 1790. Naturally fluent, ready, and acute, he aspired to higher honours than the issuing of legal processes, &c., and he was called to the bar in 1807, where, although for many years he was regarded as a clever, adroit counsel, his forensic abilities attracted no decided attention until the year 1820, when his ingenious and elaborate defence of Arthur Thistlewood and the other "Cato Street" conspirators brought him prominently forward. As an historical writer also he obtained considerable reputation. His principal works are "The History of George the Third," 7 vols.; "Biographical Memoirs of the French Revolution," 2 vols.; a "History of England," 3 vols.; "Memoirs of John Bannister, Comedian," 2 vols. &c. Died July 16, 1845, aged 79.

ADRETS, FRANCIS DE BEAUMONT, Baron des, a Huguenot leader, of a cruel, fiery, and enterprising spirit. Resentment to the Duke of Guise led him to side with the Huguenot party in 1562; and he signalled himself by many daring exploits, the skill and bravery of which, however, were sullied with the most detestable cruelty. The aspect of Adrets, like his character, was most forbidding; he lived abhorred, and died universally hated, in 1587. It must, however, be admitted, that many of the aspersions with which historians have branded his memory, rest on very doubtful evidence.

ADRIA, JOHN JAMES, a Sicilian writer and physician, who practised with great reputation at Palermo, and was made physician-general to Charles V. He died in 1560.

ADRIAM, MARIE, a female, who, at the age of 16, fought valiantly during the whole time that her native town, Lyons, was besieged, in 1793. After the engagement she was arrested, and being asked how she had dared to use arms? she replied, "I used them to serve my country, and deliver it from its oppressors." She was instantly condemned and executed.

ADRIAN, or HADRIAN, PUBLIUS ÆLIUS, the Roman emperor, born A. D. 76. His father, who was cousin-german to Trajan, died when he was ten years old, and left him in the guardianship of his illustrious kinsman. He married Sabina, the heiress of Trajan, whom he accompanied in his expeditions, and became successively prætor, governor of Pannonia, and consul. On the death of Trajan, in 117, he assumed the government, made peace with the Persians, and remitted the debts of the Roman people. In 120 he visited Gaul, and thence passed over to Britain, where he built a wall, 80 miles in length, from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway Frith, to secure the Roman provinces from the incursions of the Caledonians. He next travelled into Africa and Asia, and, on his return, was initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens. In his reign the Christians suffered a dreadful persecution; he built a temple to Jupiter on Mount Calvary, and had the images of swine engraven on the gates of Jerusalem. Adrian died at Bala, in 138, aged 63. Though in general he was a just and able ruler, he was often capricious and vindictive.

ADRIAN. There were several popes of this name. The first who bore it was a noble Roman, raised to the Papal chair in 772. He had a taste for architecture, which he evinced in the embellishment of St. Peter's church, and expended vast sums in re-building the walls, and restoring the ancient aqueducts of the city. He died in 795.

ADRIAN II. succeeded to the pontificate in 867. During the five years in which he filled it, his ambitious and intriguing disposition did much towards the subjection of the European sovereigns to the see of Rome. He died in 872.

ADRIAN III. was selected in 884, and died the following year, while on a journey to Worms, whither he was proceeding to hold a diet.

ADRIAN IV., the only Englishman who attained the Papal dignity, was born towards the close of the 11th century, at Langley, near St. Alban's. His name was Nicholas Breakspear; and, in his childhood, he was dependent for his daily subsistence on the charity of the monastery, to which his father was a servitor. Unable through poverty to attend the schools, he was refused admission into the monastery for deficiency in learning; and went to France, where he became a clerk in the monastery of St. Rufus, near Avignon, of which he was afterwards chosen abbot. Eugenius III. made him a cardinal in 1146; and, two years afterwards, sent him legate to Denmark and Norway, where he made many converts. In 1154 he was chosen pope, and assumed the name of Adrian, on which Henry II. of England sent the abbot of St. Alban's with three bishops, to congratulate him. The pope, disregarding the slight put upon him in his youth, treated the abbot with great courtesy, and granted the abbey extraordinary privileges; he also issued in favour of Henry the celebrated bull which sanctioned the conquest of Ireland. In 1155 he excommunicated the king of Sicily for ravaging the territories of the church; and, about the same time, the emperor Frederic having entered Italy with a powerful army, and meeting Adrian near Sutrium, concluded a peace with him. At this interview Frederic held the pope's stirrup while he mounted on horseback; after which the former was conducted to St. Peter's church, and his holiness consecrated him king of the Romans. The death of Adrian took place in 1159.

ADRIAN V. was a Genoese, and raised to the pontificate in 1276, but survived his elevation little more than a month.

ADRIAN VI., who succeeded Leo X., in January, 1522, was a native of Utrecht, of mean parentage, and born in 1459. He received his education at Louvain, and successively became canon of St. Peter, professor of divinity, dean of the cathedral, and vice-chancellor of the university, where he founded a college. Ferdinand, king of Spain, gave him the bishopric of Tortosa; and, in 1517, he was made cardinal. He was also appointed regent during the minority of Charles V., who procured him his election to the Papal chair. Died, 1523.

ADRIAN, DE CASTELLO, an Italian of great learning and ability, was born at Cornetto, in Tuscany. By his talents he rose to several employments under Innocent VIII.; and came to England in the reign of Henry VII., who made him his agent at Rome, and gave him first the bishopric of Hereford, and afterwards that of Bath and Wells. Adrian farmed out his latter bishopric to Wolsey, living himself at Rome, where he built a superb palace, which he left to the king of England and his successors; and in 1503 he was made cardinal by Alexander VI. A vague prophecy had gone abroad that Leo X. should be succeeded by an Adrian; and Castello was so far the slave of superstition as to allow this absurd prediction to influence him in organising a conspiracy, the object of which was the dethronement of that pontiff, and his own elevation to the vacant chair. Before the plot was matured, the vigilance of Leo detected his designs, and a fine of 12,500 ducats was imposed upon him, with a peremptory prohibition of quitting the Roman territories. He fled, however, from that city in 1518, and was excommunicated; and it is uncertain what became of him afterwards, though it is supposed he died in Asia.

ADRIANI, MARCEL VIRGIL, chancellor of the republic of Florence, was born in 1464. He was highly accomplished in the Greek and Latin languages, as appeared in his translation of Dioscorides from the former into the latter. Died, 1521.

ADRIANI, JOHN BAPTIST, son of the above, was born at Florence in 1513, and became secretary to that republic. He was a man of considerable attainments; and his chief work is entitled "Dell' Istoria de suol TempI," or history of his own times, from 1536 to 1574. Died at Florence in 1579.

ADRIANI, MARCEL, son of the preceding, succeeded his father in the professorship, and was a member of the academy of Florence. He also published some works, and died in 1604.

ADRIANO, a Spanish painter of some repute, and a Carmelite friar, who is said to have destroyed his paintings almost as soon as he had finished them. Died, 1650.

ADRY, J. F., a French professor of rhetoric, born in 1749; author of a great variety of publications—"Histoire de Vittoria Accarambono," "Vie du Père Malebranche," "Vie de la Duchesse de Schomberg," &c.: with new editions, or translations from standard authors, enriched with ingenious prefaces and notes. Died, 1818.

ÆGIDIUS, DE COLUMNA, a Roman monk of the Augustine order, was distinguished in the 13th century among the scholastics, and obtained the appellation of the most profound doctor. He was preceptor to the sons of Philip III. of France, and taught philosophy and theology with high reputation at Paris. He died in 1316.

ÆGIDIUS, PETER, a lawyer and notary of Antwerp, and a man of considerable learning, who was educated by Erasmus, and obtained the friendship of Sir Thomas More. Born, 1486; died, 1533.

ÆGINETA, PAULUS, a native of the island Ægina; a medical author, and the first who noticed the cathartic qualities of rhubarb. Died about 630.

ÆGINHARD, a German, was secretary to Charlemagne, and wrote the life of his master, and also annals from 741 to 889; the first edition of which is that of Paris, 2 vols. folio, 1575. This writer is famous for a singular love adventure with the Princess Emma, daughter of Charlemagne. While carrying him across a court-yard from her chamber, to prevent the traces of his footsteps in the snow, she was observed by the emperor, who generously agreed to their union.

ÆLFRIC, son of an earl of Kent, and archbishop of Canterbury in the middle of the 10th century, was a luminary for the dark age in which he lived. He became a monk of the Benedictine order at Abingdon, under the abbot Athelwold, who, on his promotion to the see of Winchester, took Ælfric with him to instruct youth in his cathedral. Here he drew up his "Latin Saxon Vocabulary," which was published at Oxford in 1659. He also translated from the Latin into the Saxon language most of the historical books of the Old Testament, as well as "Canons for the Regulation of the Clergy," which are inserted in Spelman's Councils. He subsequently became abbot of St. Alban's, and composed a Liturgy for the service of his abbey, which was used in Leland's time. In 989, he was created bishop of Wilton; and, in 994, was translated to the see of Canterbury, where he exerted himself with spirit and prudence in the defence of his see against the incursions of the Danes. This active and able prelate died in 1005.

ÆLIAN, CLAUDIUS, an historian and rhetorician, was born in Italy, in 160. All his productions are written in Greek, which, although he never left his native country, he wrote with the greatest purity. He was surnamed Honeytongue, on account of the sweetness of his style.

ÆLIANUS, MECCEUS, a Greek physician of the second century, and the master of Galen, who mentions him in terms of high praise. He was the first who made use of the theriaca as a remedy and preservative against the plague.

ÆLIUS, SEXTUS POETUS CATUS, a Roman lawyer, who was made consul at the close of the second Punic war. He published a collection, entitled "Novella," which were called, after him, the Ælian laws; and was author of "Tripartite," the oldest treatise on jurisprudence now known.

ÆLST, EVERHARD VAN, a Dutch painter, born at Delft in 1602, and died in 1658. He was famous for his skill in painting fruit pieces and dead game. His nephew, WILLIAM VAN ÆLST, also distinguished himself as a painter, and studied in France and Italy, where he received flattering marks of favour. He died in 1679.

ÆMILIANI, ST. JEROME, a Venetian nobleman, who, being taken prisoner in his youth, made a vow that, on his release, he would devote his life to the care of orphans. In pursuance of this pledge, he laid the foundation of a hospital and religious order, the object of which was to instruct young persons, and particularly orphans, in religion. To this and other pious works he sacrificed his whole income; and, at his death, in 1537, was enrolled by a papal decree among the saints.

ÆMILIUS, PAULUS, an illustrious Roman general, the son of Paulus Æmilius, the consul, who fell at Cannæ, was born about 228 B.C. At the age of 46, he served the office of consul; and, when he was 60, accepted the command of the armies against Perseus, king of Macedon, whom he took prisoner, and led in triumph to Rome. He afterwards served the office of censor, and died in the 64th year of his age, amidst the general lamentations of his countrymen. He greatly enriched his country by the spoil taken in his warfare with Perseus, which was so great, that it freed the Romans from taxes for 125 years.

ÆMILIUS, PAULUS, an historian of great celebrity, born at Verona. Thirty years of his life were employed in writing the history of France, from Pharamond down to Charles VIII. Died, 1529.

ÆNEAS, or ÆNGUS, an Irish abbot or bishop of the 8th century, who compiled a curious account of Irish saints in five books, and also wrote the history of the Old Testament in verse. Died, 820.

ÆNEAS, GAZEUS, a Platonic philosopher, who embraced Christianity in the 5th century. He wrote a book on the Immortality of the Soul.

ÆNEAS, TACTICUS, an ancient Greek writer who flourished about 360 B.C. He is one of the oldest authors on the art of war, and is said to have commanded at the battle of Mantinea.

ÆPINUS, JOHN, a Franciscan friar, who became a zealous and able follower of Luther, and was appointed pastor of the church of St. Peter, at Hamburg. Born, 1499; died, 1553.

ÆRSENS, PETER, surnamed LONGO, an eminent painter, born at Amsterdam, 1519, and died, 1573.

ÆSCHINES, a philosopher of Athens, in the 4th century, B.C. He obtained instruction from Socrates, by whom he was much esteemed. He went to the court of Dionysius, of Syracuse, who liberally rewarded him for his Socratic dialogues; and, on the expulsion of the philosophers from Sicily, he returned to Athens, and taught philosophy in private.

ÆSCHINES, a celebrated orator, born at Athens, 327 B.C., and died at Samos, aged 75. He was a cotemporary and rival of Demosthenes.

ÆSCHYLUS, one of the most famous tragic writers of Greece, was born at Athens about 500 years B.C. His mind very early received an impulse from the poetry of Homer; and, before his 25th year, he composed pieces for public representation. So great was his fertility, that he wrote 70 tragedies, of which 25 gained the prize. This great father of the Grecian stage has been very ably translated into English by Archdeacon Potter, and more recently by Professor Blackie. He died in Sicily, in his 69th year.

ÆSOP, the unrivalled fabulist, was born in Phrygia, about 600 B.C. His whole history is very obscure; but we are told that he was sold as a slave to Demarchus, an Athenian, by which means he acquired a knowledge of the Greek language; that he afterwards passed successively into the service of Xanthus and Idmon, of Samos; and that, having obtained his freedom by the kindness of the latter, he travelled into Greece and Asia Minor, inculcating morality by his fables. Being sent to Delphi with an offering, he so irritated the people by his censures on their manners, that they threw him from the top of a rock. The Athenians erected a statue to his memory, and all Greece lamented his tragical fate, which happened about 600 B.C.

ÆSOP, CLODIUS, a Roman actor, cotemporary and rival of Roscius, and like him the friend of Cicero, to whom he gave lessons on oratorical action. His excellence was in tragedy; and he entered so thoroughly into his part, as occasionally to lose all recollection of his own identity. Plutarch asserts, that once, when performing the character of Atreus, he was so transported with fury, as to strike a servant with his sceptre, which killed him on the spot. Æsopus was greatly addicted to luxury; yet, notwithstanding, so well was he rewarded, that he left a fortune equal to 160,000*l*.

ÆTION, a Grecian painter, celebrated for his pictures, and particularly for one, representing the nuptials of Alexander the Great and Roxana.

ÆTIUS, a physician of Mesopotamia, in the fifth century, who is said to be the first Christian physician whose medical writings have come down to us.

ÆTIUS, a famous Roman general, who lived under the third Valentinian, and nobly defended the declining fortunes of the empire, thrice vanquishing the Burgundians and Franks, and driving the ferocious Attila beyond the Rhine; but having excited the jealousy of the dastardly emperor, he was stabbed by him, in 454.

ÆFER, DOMITIUS, an ancient orator, born at Nismes. During the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, he made himself formidable as an informer, and contemptible as an adulator. Under Caligula he was made consul. Died, A. D. 59.

AFFLITTO, MATTHEW, an Italian lawyer, born at Naples in 1448. He attained great eminence, and published several voluminous works on Sicilian and Neapolitan law. Died, 1524.

AFFO, IRENEUS, a native of the duchy of Placentia; author of "Istoria di Parma," and other historical works, valuable for their research, but written in a loose and rambling style. He died about the close of the 18th century.

AFFRY, LOUIS AUGUSTINE PHILIP, Count, a Swiss statesman, appointed chief magistrate of Switzerland after Buonaparte had proclaimed himself protector of the Helvetic confederacy, was born at Freyburg, in 1743. From the commencement of the French revolution, when he commanded the army on the Upper Rhine, till his death, he bore a prominent part in the affairs of his country; but, finding the power of the French irresistible, he endeavoured to promote the views of Buonaparte, by assisting in the formation of the government; while he displayed the skill of an experienced statesman in endeavouring to benefit the interests of his countrymen, and to shield them from the perils of war. Died, 1810.

AFRANIO, of Ferrara, the inventor of the bassoon, flourished in the 16th century.

AFRANIUS, a Latin dramatist, who lived about 100 years B. C., and wrote several comedies in imitation of Menander.

AFRANIUS, a Roman senator, put to death by Nero for writing a satire on him.

AFRICANER, CHRISTIAN, a Namaqua chief of South Africa, who, after a long career of violence and bloodshed, was converted to Christianity, and continued to aid the operations of the missionaries at the Cape of Good Hope till his death in 1823. An interesting account of his life and adventures will be found in Moffat's "Missionary Labours and Scenes in Southern Africa."

AFRICANUS, JULIUS, an eminent Christian historian of the 3rd century; principally known by a chronological work in five books, which contains a series of events from the beginning of the world to the year of Christ, 221.

AGANDURU, RODERIC MORIZ, a Spanish missionary of the 17th century, who distinguished himself by his zeal in propagating Christianity in Japan, and other parts of the East.

AGAPETUS I., pope in 535; author of some extant letters: he pawned the sacred vessels of St. Peter, in order to travel to Constantinople. The second pope of this name was elected in 946, and died, 956. He has left behind him the reputation of a man of wonderful sanctity.

AGARD, ARTHUR, an English antiquary of great learning and research, one of the original founders of the Antiquarian Society, was born in Derbyshire, 1540, and died, 1615.

AGASIAS, a sculptor of Ephesus, celebrated for his admirable statue called the Gladiator, which was found with the Apollo Belvedere at Nettuno, the ancient Antium.

AGATHANGELUS, an Armenian historian of the 11th century; author of an account of the introduction of Christianity into his native country.

AGATHARCHIDES, tutor to Ptolemy Philadelphus, and author of numerous works, of which only some fragments remain, which were preserved by Diodorus and Photius. He was the first author who described the rhinoceros.

AGATHARCUS, an ancient painter, born at Samos about 400 years B. C. Vitruvius speaks of him as the first who painted scenes for the theatres.

AGATHEMERUS, a Greek geographer of the 3rd century, whose "Sketch of Geography in Epitome" may still be read with great interest from the curious facts with which it abounds.

AGATHIAS, a Greek historian of the 6th century, who wrote a history of the reign of Justinian.

AGATHO, a native of Palermo, raised from a monastery to the pontificate in 679, and died in 682.

AGATHOCLES, the Sicilian tyrant, was the son of a potter, a native of Rhegium, Italy, and became successively a soldier, centurion, general, and pirate. After defeating the Carthaginians, he proclaimed himself king of all Sicily. His soldiers, on account of arrears, obliged him to fly from his camp, and murdered his sons, whom he had left behind. Returning with a strong force, he put to death the mutineers, with their wives and children. Unable to live in tranquillity and inaction, though now far advanced in years, he made an expedition into Italy, and thence to the Lipari Islands, which he laid under contribution, and plundered of all the treasures of the temples. After his return he is said to have been poisoned by means of an envenomed tooth-pick, aged 72, B. C. 289.

AGELADAS, an admired Greek sculptor, who lived about 432 B. C.

AGELIUS, ANTHONY, a learned ecclesiastic of Naples in the 16th century. He was one of the curators of the Vatican press, and bishop of Acerno. Died 1608.

AGELNOTII, an Anglo-Saxon prelate, promoted to the see of Canterbury in 1020. He distinguished himself by great religious zeal, and still more by the firm manner in which he refused, on the death of Canute, to crown Harold, who had seized the throne in the absence of his brother, Hardekanute. Died, 1038.

AGER, or AGERIUS, NICHOLAS, a physician and botanist in the 16th century, and professor of medicine at Strasburg. Died, 1634.

AGESANDER, a Rhodian sculptor, supposed to have lived in the 5th century B. C. He is celebrated by having, in conjunction with his sons, executed that admirable monument of Grecian art, the Laocoon, which was discovered in the 16th century in the baths of Titus.

AGESILAUS, king of Sparta, succeeded his brother Agis. He acquired great renown by his exploits against the Persians, and also against the Thebans and Athenians, but was defeated by Epaminondas. Agesilaus next went to assist Tachos, in his attempt to take the throne of Egypt, but was bribed to espouse the part of Nectanabls, his antagonist. On his return, he died in Africa, 360 B. C., after a reign of 41 years.

AGGAS, RALPH, a surveyor and engraver of the 16th century, who first drew a plan of London, which, although referred to the time of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., appears not to have been made on wood until about 1560. It was re-published in 1618, and re-engraved by Vertue in 1743. He also drew plans of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dunwich, in Suffolk. Died, 1579.

AGILULF, king of the Lombards, crowned at Milan in 591. Soon after his accession, he quitted the Arian communion for the Catholic, in which he was followed by numbers of his subjects, many of whom had hitherto been Pagans. In the third year of his reign, he had to sustain a war against some of his own rebellious dukes, whom in the end he forced to submit; and having secured and augmented his dominions, and employed himself in rebuilding and endowing churches, he died in 619.

AGIS III., king of Sparta, succeeded his father, Archidamus, B. C. 346. He was a prince of great magnanimity; and, though he detested the Macedonian domination, he would not expose his country to ruin by resisting it, until Alexander was deeply engaged in his Persian expedition; when he raised an army of 20,000 men, which was defeated by Antipater, governor of Macedonia, and Agis himself slain. His end was most glorious; for, being carried severely wounded from the field, the soldiers who bore him were on the point of being surrounded by the enemy; on which, commanding them to set him down, and preserve their own lives for the service of their country, he fought alone on his knees, and killed several of the assailants, till he was struck through the body with a dart, B. C. 337.

AGIS IV. king of Sparta, was the son of Eudamidas, and celebrated by his virtues and death. His first attempt was to renew the original law for the equal division of landed property, which was opposed by a party, at the head of which was his colleague, Leonidas. The latter was deposed, and the joint sovereignty devolved to his son Cleombrotus, who entered into the views of Agis. Previously, however, to a partition of the lands, Agesilaus, uncle to Agis, who was deeply in debt, proposed the abolition of all debts, which would render the former measure more palatable. This deed accomplished, the influential and wily Spartan found means to postpone the other equalising operation, until Agis was obliged to march on an expedition. During his absence, Agesilaus conducted himself so tyrannically, that a conspiracy was formed to restore the deposed king, Leonidas; which succeeding, Agis and his colleague, Cleombrotus, took sanctuary in a temple. The latter was immediately dragged forth and banished, but Agis remained a considerable time in safety, until his friends were bribed to betray him, and he was thrown into a prison. He suffered death with great magnanimity, B. C. 241.

AGLIONBY, EDWARD, an old English poet, who wrote a genealogy of queen Elizabeth, for which she granted him a pension.

AGLIONBY, JOHN, a learned divine, born in Cumberland. He was made chaplain to queen Elizabeth, was concerned in the present translation of the New Testament, and died at Islip, of which he was rector, in 1610.

AGLIONBY, WILLIAM, an English diplomatist and polite writer, of the 17th and 18th centuries; author of a book entitled "Painting Illustrated."

AGNELLUS, ANDREW, an archbishop of Ravenna, in the 9th century. He wrote the lives of his predecessors in that see.

AGNESI, MARIA GAETANA, an Italian lady of extraordinary talents, born at Milan, 1718. So profound were her mathematical attainments, that when, in 1750, her father, who was a professor in the university of Bologna, was unable to continue his lectures in consequence of ill health, she obtained permission from the pope to fill his chair. At the early age of 19, she had supported 191 theses, which were published in 1738 under the title of "Propositiones Philosophicæ." She was also mistress of the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, French, German, and Spanish languages. Agnesi retired to the monastery of Blue Nuns, at Milan, where she died at an advanced age, in the year 1799.

AGNESI, MARIA TERESA, sister of the above, was a musician of much genius, born at Milan, 1750. She composed three operas, "Sophonisba," "Ciro," and "Nitocris."

AGNOLO, BACCIO, a Florentine sculptor, and architect of great reputation; born, 1460; died, 1543.

AGOBARD, archbishop of Lyons, was one of the most celebrated prelates of the 9th century. His works were buried in obscurity, until the manuscript of them was accidentally found in a bookseller's shop at Lyons. Died, 840.

AGOP, JOHN, a learned Armenian critic and grammarian of the 17th century. His works were printed at Rome, 1675.

AGORACRITES, a Grecian statuary in the fifth century B.C. He was a pupil of Phidias, and one of the most skilful artists of his time.

AGOSTINI, LIONARDO, an eminent antiquary of the 17th century, officially employed by pope Alexander VII.

AGOSTINO, PAUL, of Valerano, a celebrated musician. Born, 1593; died, 1629. He surprised the world with his productions for four, six, or eight choirs or choruses, some of which might be sung in four or six parts only, without diminishing the harmony.

AGOULT, WILLIAM, a Provençal gentleman of the 12th century, who was one of the most pleasing poets, and amiable persons of his time. He died in 1181.

AGREDA, MARIA, the writer of some wild legends, indicative of either insanity or most impudent imposture, was born at Agreda, in Spain, in 1602; took the veil, 1620, in a convent founded by her father and mother, dedicated to the "Immaculate Conception," of which she was chosen superior, 1627, and died, 1665. The piece of absurdity which she pretended to have divine authority for writing, was translated by Father Crozet into the French language in 1696, and republished at Brussels, 1718, in 3 vols. 4to.

AGRICOLA, CNEIUS JULIUS, an eminent Roman commander, born A. D. 40, in the reign of Caligula. His first military service was under Suetonius Paulinus in Britain; and, on his return to Rome, he was made quæstor in Asia, and became tribune of the people, and prætor under Nero. By Vespasian, whose cause he espoused, he was made a patrician and governor of Aquitania; the dignity of consul followed; and, in the same year, 77, he married his daughter to Tacitus, the historian, who has so admirably written his life. Next year he was appointed governor of Britain; extended his conquests into Scotland; and built a chain of forts from the Clyde to the Frith of Forth, to prevent the incursions of the inhabitants of the North. He defeated Galgacus on the Grampian Hills, and then made peace with the Caledonians. On the accession of Domitian, Agricola had a triumph decreed him, but was recalled, and sent governor to Syria, where he died, A. D. 93; aged 54.

AGRICOLA, GEORGE, the most celebrated metallurgist of his time; born at Glauchen, Misnia, in 1494, and died, 1555.

AGRICOLA, GEORGE ANDREW, a German physician, author of a curious work on the multiplication of trees and plants, of which a French translation appeared at Amsterdam in 1720. He was born at Ratisbon, 1672, and died, 1738.

AGRICOLA, JOHN, a polemical writer of celebrity, born at Eisleben, Saxony, 1492, and died at Berlin, 1566. From being the friend and scholar, he became the antagonist of Martin Luther, against whom, as well as Melancthon, he maintained a spirited controversy, advocating the doctrine of faith in opposition to the works of the law, whence the sect, of which he became leader, received the name of Antinomians.

AGRICOLA, RODOLPHUS, one of the most learned men of the 15th century, spoken of both by Erasmus and Bayle with great respect, was born in Friesland, 1442, and died, 1484. Agricola was the first who introduced the Greek language into Germany.

AGRIPPA, CAMILLE, a celebrated architect of Milan in the 16th century, who, under the pontificate of Gregory XIII., accomplished the removal of a vast obelisk to St. Peter's Square; an account of which labour he published at Rome, 1583.

AGRIPPA, HENRY CORNELIUS. This highly-gifted but eccentric man was born in 1486, at Cologne, of a noble family. He became secretary to the emperor Maximilian, by whom he was knighted for his bravery in the Italian wars. He next travelled through various parts of Europe, and, while in England, wrote a commentary on St. Paul's Epistles. In 1518 he settled at Metz, which place, however, he was obliged to quit, at the instigation of the monks, and went to Cologne, and thence to Geneva. He next travelled to Antwerp, in 1528, and was taken into the service of Margaret of Austria, governess of the Low Countries. In 1530 he published his treatise of the "Vanity of the Sciences," and soon afterwards his "Occult Philosophy." In 1535 he was at Lyons, where he was imprisoned for defaming the king's mother, but soon obtained his discharge, and died the same year at Grenoble. All his works were collected and printed at Lyons, 1550, in 3 vols.

AGRIPPA I., HEROD, grandson of Herod the Great. He gave great offence to Tiberius, who threw him into prison; but, on Caligula's succession, was not only released, but received from that emperor a golden chain equal in weight to the iron one he had worn in his confinement, as also the kingdom of Judea. He commenced a persecution of the Christians, in which the apostle St. James perished; and he is the person represented to have been eaten by worms, on account of his impiety in accepting the adoration of the people.

AGRIPPA II., HEROD, son and successor of the preceding, was the seventh and last of the Jewish monarchs of the family of Herod the Great. It was before this prince that St. Paul pleaded his cause with so much eloquence, that Agrippa acknowledged he had almost persuaded him to be a Christian. He died at Rome about the year 94.

AGRIPPA, MARCUS VIPSIANUS, the celebrated friend and general of Augustus Cæsar, acquired great fame by his military exploits, for which triumphs were decreed to him. He died B. C. 12.

AGRIPPA, MENENIUS, consul of Rome, B. C. 508. He is celebrated for having appeared a commotion among the Romans, by the political fable of the belly and the members; and died at an advanced age, very poor, but universally esteemed for his wisdom and integrity.

AGRIPPINA, the elder, daughter of Marcus Agrippa, was married in the first instance to Tiberius, who divorced her, and she became the wife of Germanicus Cæsar, whom she accompanied in his military expeditions. On the death of the latter at Antioch, A. D. 19, she returned to Rome with his ashes, and took advantage of the public grief for the death of her husband to accuse Piso, who was suspected of having hastened it. The latter was shortly afterwards found dead in his bed; and Tiberius, jealous of the affection of the people for Agrippina, banished her to a small island, where she died of hunger, in 35.

AGRIPPINA, the younger, daughter of the foregoing, and mother of Nero, was at once cruel and licentious. After losing two husbands, she married her uncle, the emperor Claudius, whom she poisoned in 54, to make way for her son Nero, who caused her to be assassinated, and exhibited to the senate a list of all the crimes of which she had been guilty.

AGUESSEAU, HENRY FRANCIS D', called by Voltaire the most learned magistrate that France ever produced, was born at Limoges in 1668, and died 1751. His works were published in 13 vols. 4to.

AGUILLON, FRANCIS, an eminent mathematician at the beginning of the 15th century, was a Jesuit of Brussels, and died at Seville, 1617.

AGUIRRA, JOSEPH SAENS D', a Spanish Benedictine, made cardinal by Innocent XI. He wrote voluminously on theology, philosophy, &c. Died at Rome, 1699.

AGUJARI, LUCRETIA, a celebrated singer, who received a salary of 100*l.* a night for two songs. Died at Parma, 1783.

AGYLEUS, HENRY, a lawyer and general scholar, born at Bois-le-Duc, 1533; died, 1595.

AHLWART, PETER, a learned German, son of a shoemaker at Greifswalde, where he was born in 1710, and died, 1791. He was the founder of the Society of Abelites, the object of which was to promote sincerity.

AHMED-BEN-FARES, surnamed El Razi, an Arabian lexicographer and lawyer. Died about 969.

AHMED-BEN-MOHAMMED, or ABOU AMROU, a Spanish Moor, who wrote poems in the eastern style, and an historical work on the annals of Spain. Died in 970.

AHMED-KHAN, emperor of the Moguls, succeeded his brother, Abaker Khan, in 1282; and was slain after a short reign of two years.

AHMED RESMY HAJI, a Turkish historian, who was counsellor of the Divan, and chancellor to the sultan Mustapha III.

AHMED SHAH EL ABDALY, founder of the kingdom of Candahar and Caubul, erected them into a kingdom, and took the royal title. He died in 1773, leaving the crown to his son, Timur Shah.

AHRENDT, or ARENTS, MARTIN FREDERIC, an antiquary and palmographer, was a native of Holstein. He spent forty years in travelling on foot through Norway, Sweden, Denmark, France, Spain, Italy, and other parts of Europe, in search of Scandinavian antiquities and Runic monuments, and carried on an extensive correspondence with his learned contemporaries relative to the objects of his investigation. He died at a small village near Vienna, in 1824.

AIDAN, a monk, who converted a large portion of the northern part of Britain to Christianity. He was afterwards bishop of Lindisfern. Died about 651.

AIGNAN, STEPHEN, a French writer, and a member of the Académie Française. He was a zealous republican, and at the early age of 19, in the fiercest time of the revolution, he was appointed to an official situation in the district of Orleans. He subsequently filled offices under Napoleon; and also distinguished himself as the author of several dramas and poems, as well as by the translation of part of the works of Goldsmith and Pope. Born, 1773; died, 1825.

AIGNEAUX, ROBERT and ANTHONY, brothers, natives of Vire, in Normandy, who jointly translated Virgil and Horace into French verse, and wrote several poems. They died about the same time, at the close of the 16th century.

AIKIN, EDMUND, an architect, and the author of an account of St. Paul's Cathedral. Died, 1820.

AIKIN, JOHN, M. D., born Jan. 15. 1747, at Kibworth, Leicestershire, was the only son of Dr. T. Aikin, a dissenting minister and schoolmaster. In 1764 he became a student in the university of Edinburgh. On his return he went to Yarmouth, Norfolk, where, with little interruption, he continued till 1792, when he removed to London, and devoted himself chiefly to literature, in which he was eminently successful. In 1796 he became the editor of the Monthly Magazine, which he superintended from its commencement till 1806. In 1799, he published, in conjunction with Dr. Enfield, the first volume of a General Biographical Dictionary, in 4to., which, however, was not completed till 1815. Died, 1822, aged 75.

AIKMAN, WILLIAM, a painter of eminence, born at Cairney, in Scotland, in 1682. After finishing his education, he travelled to Italy, Turkey, and Smyrna. In 1712 he returned home, and was encouraged by the Duke of Argyle, through whom he was employed at court, and by the principal nobility. Died, 1731.

AILLY, PETER D', a cardinal and legate in the time of Charles VI. of France, was born at Compiegne, 1350. He received from that monarch the see of Puy and Cambrai, with the chancellorship of the university of Paris; and, before his elevation to the purple, presided at the famous Council of Constance, which condemned John Huss to the stake. Died, 1419.

AIMON, of Aquitaine, author of a legendary history of France, is supposed to have lived in the 9th century. The history is brought down to 1165 by another hand; and is in the third volume of the collection of Duchesne.

AINSWORTH, HENRY, an eminent biblical commentator and divine among the English nonconformists, flourished at the latter end of the 16th century. His writings exhibited much learning and acuteness, and excited the attention of Hall, bishop of Exeter, who entered the lists against him. He subsequently went to Amsterdam, where he died in 1622.

AINSWORTH, ROBERT, a grammarian and classical author. His most important work is the celebrated Dictionary of the Latin tongue which bears his name. He was a native of Woodyale, in Lancashire, where he was born in 1660. He died in London in 1743.

AITON, WILLIAM, an excellent botanist, born in Lanarkshire. He was a great favourite with George III., who appointed him head-gardener to the royal demesne at Kew in 1759. In this situation he formed one of the best collections of rare exotic plants in the known world, catalogues of which he published in 1780. Died, 1793.

AITZEMA, LEO, an historian of Friesland, born, 1600, and died, 1669. He was author of the History of the United Provinces, in 15 vols.; an extremely valuable work.

AKAKIA, MARTIN, physician to Henry III., and author of several medical works. Born, 1479; died, 1588.

AKBAH, a celebrated Saracen conqueror, who overran the whole of Africa, from Cairo to the Atlantic Ocean; but a general revolt among the Greeks and Africans recalled him from the West, and he eventually fell a sacrifice to it.

AKBAR, or AKBER, MOHAMMED, sultan of the Moguls, and a descendant of Timour Tamerlane, was only 14 years of age when he succeeded to the throne. He was a warlike, liberal, and able monarch; and the first action of his reign was to recover Delhi from the Patans. He reigned 50 years, was eminently successful as a conqueror, and died in 1605, leaving behind him a character for justice, clemency, valour, and a love of learning, surpassed by few monarchs, whatever their creed or country.

AKENSIDE, MARK, a poet and physician, but who claims attention from his eminence in the former character, more than from his professional fame, was born in 1721 at New-castle-upon-Tyne. He finished his studies at the universities of Edinburgh and Leyden, in the latter of which he took his degree as a doctor of medicine in 1744. In the same year appeared his most distinguished poem, "On the Pleasures of the Imagination," which raised him at once into poetical eminence. This was followed by the "Epistle to Curio," a satire; and, in 1745, he published ten odes on various subjects. He continued, from time to time, to send forth his poetical effusions, most of which appeared in Dodsley's Collection. Dr. Akenside also wrote a number of medical works. He died in 1770, aged 49.

AKERBLAD, JOHN DAVID, a learned Swede, who accompanied the Swedish embassy to Constantinople, and distinguished himself as an oriental linguist and antiquary. Died, 1819.

AKIBA, a Jew, of low origin, but whose devotion to literature raised him to eminence, and to the rank of rabbi. On the defeat and destruction of Barcochebas, who had declared himself the Messiah, and to whose faction Akiba had joined himself, he was taken prisoner by the emperor Hadrian, and flayed alive, at the age of 120.

ALABASTER, WILLIAM, an English divine, born in Suffolk, and educated at Cambridge. He was the author of a Latin tragedy called "Roxana," and of a Lexicon Pentaglotton. Died, 1640.

ALAIN, DE L' ISLE, surnamed the Universal Doctor, was a divine of great renown in the university of Paris, and the author of several works. Died, 1294.

ALAIN, CHARTIER, a French writer of the 14th century. He was the author of some esteemed works, of which his "Chronicles of Charles VII.," to whom he was secretary, is the principal.

ALAMANNI, LOUIS, a Florentine poet and statesman, born in 1496, and died, 1556; he was distinguished from his youth for his progress in philosophy and Greek literature. He had two sons, one of whom, BAPTISTE, became almoner to queen Catherine de Medici, and successively bishop of Bazas and Maçon. Two others of this family, and both named LOUIS, also became famous in the world of letters.

ALAN, of Lynn, Norfolk, was a doctor of divinity in the 15th century, and acquired great reputation both as a student and a preacher.

ALAN, of Tewkesbury, was author of the "Life and Banishment of Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury." Died, 1201.

ALAN, ALLEYN, or ALLEN, WILLIAM, an Englishman of good family, was born at Rossal, Lancashire, in 1580. Educated at Oxford by a tutor warmly attached to popery, he entered upon the world under a strong prepossession in favour of the Catholic faith; and, while very young, became principal of St. Mary's College, and proctor of the university. On the accession of Elizabeth, he went to Louvain, and was appointed head of the English College. He now strenuously exerted himself, both by his writings and example, to advance the papal cause; and by his suggestions, Philip II. was induced to undertake the invasion of England; to facilitate which, Alan published a defence of the pope's bull against Elizabeth, with an exhortation to her subjects to rise in favour of the Spaniards. For these services he was made archbishop of Mechlin, and a cardinal. It is said, that towards the close of his life he repented of the measures he had recommended against his country; and, on his death-bed, wished to address the English students at Rome, but was prevented by the ascendant Jesuit. He died in 1594, not without suspicion that he was poisoned.

ALAND, Sir JOHN FORTESCUE (Lord Fortescue), a baron of the Exchequer, and a pious judge of the courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas, in the reigns of George I. and II., was descended from the famous Sir John Fortescue, lord chief justice and lord high chancellor of England in the reign of Henry VI. He was born in 1670, and received his education at Oxford; was an able lawyer, an impartial judge, and well versed in Saxon literature. He lived in habits of intimacy with Pope, and the other wits of the day; and wrote the legal burlesque of "Stradling versus Styles."

ALARD, FRANCIS, a native of Brussels, was bred in the Romish faith; but, meeting with the works of Luther, he turned Protestant, and escaped to Wittemberg. After some time he returned to Brussels, and died in 1578.

ALARD, WILLIAM, son of the above, became rector of the college of Krempen, where he died, 1644.

ALARD, LAMBERT, son of the last named, compiled a Greek Lexicon, wrote some theological works and Latin poems, and was inspector of the public schools of Brunswick. Died in 1672.

ALARIC I., king of the Visigoths, and conqueror of Rome, was descended from a noble family, and for some years served in the imperial armies; but, being refused preferment, he revolted against Arcadius, and desolated many of the provinces, sparing neither age nor sex. In the year 400, being then the acknowledged sovereign of the Visigoths, he invaded Italy, and carried off immense plunder. In 402, he made a second irruption, but was defeated by Stilicho, and compelled to sue for peace. After this, he was employed in the service of the emperor Honorius, but soon violated his engagements, and again entered the Roman territory, and laid siege to the capital. His terms were complied with, and he retired into Tuscany; but, being joined by his brother, Ataulphus, he returned again to Rome, which he sacked in 410. After ravaging Italy, he sailed for Sicily; and having taken the city of Cosenza, died there.

ALARIC II., king of the Visigoths, succeeded his father Euric in 484, and reigned over all the country between the Rhone and the Garonne. He adapted to his states the Theodosian collection of laws, and published it as the law of the Visigoths, since known by the title of the code of Alaric. He was slain in a battle by Clovis, king of the Franks, 507.

ALASCO, JOHN, uncle to Sigismund, king of Poland, was born in 1499. He was in great esteem with most of the learned men of his day, and enjoyed the friendship of many of them, particularly Erasmus and Zuinglius, through which he became a convert to the Protestant faith; to which he was so zealously devoted as to obtain the title of the Reformer of Poland. He died at Frankfort, in 1600.

ALBAN, ST., celebrated as the first Christian martyr in Great Britain, was born at Verulam, near St. Alban's, Hertfordshire, in the 3rd century. In his youth he visited Rome, and served as a soldier under Diocletian; and, on his return to Verulam, became a convert to Christianity, for which he suffered death in 303.

ALBANEZE, an Italian musician of great repute, died at Paris, in 1800.

ALBANI, ALEXANDER, an eminent virtuoso, born at Urbino, 1692, raised to the rank of cardinal by Innocent XIII., and died, 1779, aged 87, very highly esteemed. In 1762, his collection of drawings and engravings, consisting of 300 volumes, was purchased by George III. for 14,000 crowns.

ALBANI, JOHN FRANCIS, nephew of the above, was born at Rome, 1720, and in 1747 was made a cardinal, which was followed by numerous preferments. He opposed the suppression of the Jesuits, as a measure fraught with danger to the church; but, in all other respects, was a most enlightened prelate. He imitated his uncle in his encouragement of letters and learned men; but his liberality could not save him from republican rigour, when the French entered Rome, where they plundered his palace, confiscated his estates, and reduced him, then in his 77th year, to poverty; all his valuable collection was sent off to Paris, and even the plants of his garden were rooted up and sold. Amidst this devastation, the cardinal took refuge in a convent, whence he removed to Naples; and returned to Rome, in 1800, where he lived in private lodgings till his death in 1803.

ALBANI, or ALBANY, Countess of, was the Princess Louisa Maria Caroline, who married Charles Stuart, "The Pretender." She was cousin of the last reigning Prince of Stolberg-Gedern; was born in 1753; married in 1772, when she took the title of Countess of Albany; but to escape from the barbarity of her husband, who lived in a continual state of intoxication, she retired, in 1780, to a cloister. At his death, in 1788, the French court allowed her an annuity of 60,000 livres; and she survived the house of Stuart, which became extinct at the death of her brother-in-law, the Cardinal of York, in 1807. She died at Florence, in 1824; and Victor Alfieri has transmitted her name and misfortunes to posterity.

ALBANI, JOHN JEROME, a civilian and theological writer, born at Bergamo in 1501, arrived at the dignity of a cardinal in 1570, and died in 1591.

ALBANO, FRANCISCO, a very celebrated painter, born at Bologna, 1578, and died, 1660. Albano excelled in delineating feminine and infantine beauty, and his pictures are exceedingly valuable.

ALBANO, GIOVANNI BAPTISTA, a younger brother of the above, was also a painter, and chiefly excelled in landscape.

ALBATEGNI, an Arabian chieftain and eminent astronomer. He lived in the 9th century, and wrote a work, entitled "The Science of the Stars."

ALBERGATI, CAPACELLI, a Bolognese marquis, was a dramatic writer and actor, and called the Garrick of Italy. Died, 1802.

ALBERIC, a monkish historian of the 13th century, who compiled a Chronicle of Universal History up to 1241.

ALBERONI, GIULIO, a cardinal, and minister of the king of Spain, was the son of a gardener; but being possessed of uncommon talents, and with a disposition suited to the intriguing policy of the court, he obtained patronage, and rapidly reached the highest offices in the state. By his ability and activity he created a naval force, re-organised the army, and rendered Spain more powerful than it had been since the time of Philip II.; but he was eventually foiled by the combined efforts of England and France, who made his dismissal from the councils of the Spanish monarch the chief condition of peace. Born, 1604; died, 1752.

ALBERT, ERASMUS, a learned German divine of the 16th century, who composed a Latin work called "The Koran of the Cordeliers." Died, 1551.

ALBERT, of Aix, or ALBERTUS AQUENSIS, a canon of Aix-la-Chapelle in the 12th century. He wrote in Latin what is esteemed an accurate "History of the Expedition to Jerusalem, under Godfrey of Bulloyn, and other Leaders," reprinted in 1662.

ALBERT, marquis of Brandenburg-Culmbach, surnamed the German Alcibiades, born in 1522, was a principal actor in the troubles of Germany during the reign of Charles V., against whom he made war. Died in indigence and exile, 1558.

ALBERT, LOUIS JOSEPH, son of Louis Charles, duke de Luynes, born in 1672, and died, 1758. He distinguished himself in several battles, for which he was appointed field-marshal by the emperor Charles VII., who sent him ambassador to France, and created him prince of Grimberghen.

ALBERT, CHARLES, duke of Lynes, born in 1578. Henry IV. of France, who was his godfather, placed him as a page about his son, afterwards Louis XIII., over whom, by his artful manner, he gained such an ascendancy, that he obtained the highest honours in the state, and was made constable of France; but his ambition and tyranny rendered him odious to the people. Died, 1621.

ALBERT, of Stade, a monk of the 13th century, who wrote a "Chronicle from the Creation to 1256."

ALBERT, of Strasburg, the compiler of a "Chronicle from 1273 to 1378." He flourished in the 14th century.

ALBERT, HENRY CHRISTIAN, professor of the English language at the university of Halle, Germany, died in 1800.

ALBERT I., emperor and duke of Austria, surnamed the Triumphant, was son of the emperor Rudolph of Hapsburg, and a competitor for the imperial crown with Adolphus of Nassau, whom he defeated and killed in battle. He was born in 1248; and died, by assassination, in 1308.

ALBERT II., emperor and duke of Austria, was son of Albert the fourth duke of Austria, and succeeded to the kingdom of Hungary and Bohemia on the death of Sigismund, whose daughter he had married. Died, 1429.

ALBERT, archduke of Austria, son of Maximilian II., was born, 1559. He was at first destined for the Church, and, when very young, was created cardinal and archbishop of Toledo. In 1598, Philip II. of Spain contracted his daughter Isabella to Albert, who thereupon renounced his cardinalate and ecclesiastical character. The Netherlands, and the provinces of Burgundy and Charleroi, were her portion, and they were henceforth considered as joint sovereigns of those countries. Died in 1621.

ALBERT, JANE, daughter of Margaret, queen of Navarre, and the mother of Henry IV. of France, at whose birth the following strange incident is said to have occurred:—The king, her father, promised to put into her hands his will, on condition that during the pangs of child-birth she should sing a Bearnoise song. To this she acceded, and when her father entered the chamber, she sang a popular song in the language of her native country. On this he presented her with a gold box containing his will, and threw round her neck a chain of gold, saying, "These are for you, my daughter, but this is mine!" at the same time taking the infant in his arms, and carrying it to his chamber. Died, 1572.

ALBERT, king of Sweden, was elected to the throne on the deposition of Magnus II. in 1363. The latter, supported by Denmark and Norway, endeavoured to recover his crown, but was defeated by Albert, and taken prisoner. The nobles, however, became dissatisfied with his rule, and applied for aid to Margaret, queen of Denmark and Norway, by whom he was defeated in a bloody battle, taken prisoner, and confined for seven years. He was at length liberated on condition of surrendering Stockholm to Margaret; and he passed the remainder of his days at Mecklenburg, where he died in 1412.

ALBERTET, a mathematician and poet of Provence in the 13th century.

ALBERTI, ARISTOTILE, a mechanic of Bologna in the 15th century. It is said he removed entire the tower of St. Mary del Tempio thirty-five paces, and, at Cento, set upright another, which was five feet out of its perpendicular.

ALBERTI, CHERUBINO, a famous Florentine painter, born in 1552, and died, 1615. His works, both in fresco and oil, are much esteemed.

ALBERTI, GIOVANNI, brother of the above, was also an eminent painter at Rome, and greatly admired for the excellence of his perspective.

ALBERTI, DOMINICO, a Venetian composer and harpsichord player of eminence in the last century.

ALBERTI, GEORGE WILLIAM, a learned German divine, born, 1725; died, 1758.

ALBERTI, JOHN, a German lawyer, who abridged the Koran, with notes, and also published, in 1556, the New Testament in Syriac, most of the copies of which were sent to the East. He died in 1559.

ALBERTI, LEANDER, a Bolognese monk of the 16th century; author of a history of his native city, and one of Italy. Died, 1552.

ALBERTI, LEONI BAPTISTA, an eminent architect, painter, sculptor, and scholar, born at Venice in the beginning of the 15th century. At the age of twenty he composed a Latin comedy, entitled "Philodoxius," which many learned men believed at first was the work of the ancient poet Lepidus; and, as such, it was printed by the younger Aldus. The invention of the camera obscura has been attributed to him. Died, 1485.

ALBERTI DI VILLANOVA, FRANCIS, an eminent Italian lexicographer of the 18th century. Born, 1737; died, 1803.

ALBERTINI, FRANCIS, an ecclesiastic of Florence, and an able antiquary, in the beginning of the 16th century; author of several valuable works.

ALBERTINI, PAUL, a Venetian priest and author, so highly esteemed in his day for his skill as a politician, that he was entrusted with an embassy to Turkey. His preaching and his writings, chiefly on theology, were so much valued, that at his death a medal was struck to his memory. Born, 1430; died, 1475.

ALBERTUS, MAGNUS, a Dominican, and one of the most celebrated schoolmen of the 13th century, was born at Lauingen, Suabia. He was successively vicar-general and provincial of his order; and his celebrity as a public preceptor attracted the attention of pope Alexander IV., who appointed him master of the holy palace. In 1260, he was elected bishop of Ratisbon, but afterwards resigned this dignity, and went to Cologne, where he died in 1280. His works, which were voluminous, and on various subjects, were published at Lyons, 1651.

ALBICUS, archbishop of Prague, whose encouragement of John Huss caused him to be much abused by the opponents of that reformer.

ALBINOVANUS, C. PEDO, a Latin poet of the time of Augustus. He was the friend of Ovid, and author of several poems, &c. Two elegies of his are still extant; one on the death of Mæcenas, the other on the death of Drusus.

ALBINUS, a Roman, consul in the year 157 B.C.; and author of a history of Rome, written in Greek, which is commended by Cicero.

ALBINUS, BERNARD SIEGFRED, one of the ablest anatomists of modern times, was born at Frankfort in 1696. He was a pupil of the celebrated Boerhaave, and became professor of anatomy in the university of Leyden, which situation he filled for nearly half a century, during which time he published numerous professional works. Died, 1770.

ALBINUS, CHRISTIAN BERNARD, brother of the above, professor of anatomy at Utrecht, and author of two valuable works on that science. Died, 1778.

ALBO, JOSEPH, a learned Spanish rabbi, who assisted, in 1412, at a conference between the Christians and Jews, and wrote a book, called "Sopher Hikkariin," against the gospels.

ALBOIN, king of the Lombards in the 6th century. He succeeded his father, Audoin, in 561; conquered and slew Cunimund, king of the Gepidae, whose daughter, Rosamond, he afterwards married. He subjugated great part of Italy; but having incurred the just resentment of his wife, by sending her wine in a cup, wrought from the skull of her own father, and forcing her to drink from it, she had him assassinated, A.D. 574.

ALBON, JACQUES, marquis de Fronsac, and mareschal de St. Andre, a French general, who acquired great reputation about the middle of the 16th century. Quesnoy, St. Quentin, Renti, &c., were the chief scenes of his exploits. He was deputed to carry the collar of the order of St. Andre to Henry VIII., of England, who made him a knight of the Garter. At the death of Henry II., he was chosen one of the regency, and fell in the battle of Dreux, 1562.

ALBRECHTSBERGER, a German musician, and one of the most learned of modern contrapuntists, was born at Kloster Neubar, in 1736; became court organist and a member of the academy at Vienna; was the instructor of Beethoven; and died in 1803.

ALBUMAZAR, an Arabian philosopher in the 9th century, who combined the study of physic with that of judicial astrology and astronomy.

ALBUQUERQUE, ALPHONSO, the founder of the Portuguese empire in the East, was born at Lisbon, at the end of the 14th century. In 1503, he headed an expedition sent out by Emanuel, king of Portugal, and gained large possessions on the coast of Cochin, took the island of Ormuz, in the Persian Gulf, subdued Goa, extended his conquests over the whole coast of Malabar, and made the islands of Sumatra, Malacca, and various others, tributary to the Portuguese government. An order for his recall had been issued, and even his successor in the command appointed, when death put an end to his career, at Goa, in 1515.

ALBUQUERQUE COELHO, EDWARD, a Portuguese nobleman in the 17th century, who fought with great bravery against the Dutch in the Brazilian war, of which he wrote a history. Died, 1688.

ALBUQUERQUE, MATTHIAS, a Portuguese general, who was sent to Brazil in 1628, and successfully defended the province of Pernambuco against the Dutch. He was recalled in 1635; espoused the cause of the House of Braganza, and was made commander of the army in 1643, when he gained the decisive victory of Campo Major, and was created a grandee of Portugal.

ALBUTIUS, CAIUS SILIUS, a Roman orator in the time of Augustus, was a native of Novara, and starved himself to death on account of some insult he had received.

ALCAMENES, a Greek statuary, who was the disciple and rival of Phidias.

ALCÆUS, the Lesbian, an ancient lyric poet, was born at Mitylene about 600 years B.C., and is said to have been enamoured with Sappho.—There was also an early Athenian poet of this name, said to have been the author of some tragedies in the infancy of that species of composition.

ALCIATI, ANDREW, a Milanese lawyer of eminence in the 16th century, who enjoyed many dignities. Died at Pavia, 1550.

ALCIATI, FRANCIS, nephew of the above, was also a distinguished lawyer, and a professor at Pavia. Pope Pius VI. made him chancellor of Rome, and a cardinal. He died in 1580.

ALCIATI, TERENCE, a Jesuit of the 17th century, who collected the materials from which Cardinal Pallanacino wrote the history of the Council of Trent.

ALCIATI, JOHN PAUL, a native of Milan in the 16th century, who quitted his country and the Roman faith for the Calvinistic doctrine, which he also renounced, and embraced Socinianism.

ALCIBIADES, a celebrated Athenian general and statesman, the son of Clinias, and a descendant of Ajax, of Salamis, was born B.C. 450. He is generally quoted as one of the most striking instances on record of an individual imitating, within himself, all the gifts and graces both of nature and fortune. He early became the disciple of Socrates, who took great pains to form his mind to the love of virtue, and accompanied that philosopher on some of his military expeditions. In the Peloponnesian war, he was appointed to command with Nicias, in an expedition against Syracuse; but while thus employed, a charge was preferred against him of impiety. On one night all the Hermæ, or half-statues of Mercury, in Athens, were defaced and mutilated; and information was given that this sacrilege was the work of Alcibiades and his dissolute companions, in one of their frequent moments of revelry and intemperance. For this he was ordered home; but, fearful of the consequences, he withdrew to Sparta, and stirred up the Lacedæmonians to declare war against Athens. He afterwards went over to the king of Persia, by whose interest he obtained his pardon and recall. He then commanded with success against the Lacedæmonians; and having compelled them to sue for peace, was received at Athens in triumph. The defeat of the Athenian fleet, by Lysander, being attributed to Alcibiades, he was deprived of his command. On this he retired into Thrace, and afterwards to a small town in Phrygia, where Pharnabazus, the Persian satrap, at the instigation of the Athenian tyrants, caused the house in which he resided to be set fire to in the night, and when he attempted to escape, he was slain by arrows, B. C. 404.

ALCIDAMUS, a Greek rhetorician, who flourished about 400 B. C., of whose orations two are still extant—one appended to Aldus's edition of Æchines, and the other to Aldus's edition of Isocrates.

ALCINOUS, a philosopher of the second century, who wrote an "Introduction to the Philosophy of Plato," which is deemed a good summary, and has been translated into English by Stanley.

ALCIPHON, a Greek epistolary writer, who is supposed to have flourished in the third century before Christ. His letters, which give an excellent picture of Grecian customs and manners, are distinguished by clearness and simplicity; but it is suspected that they are the production of a much later era.

ALCMEON, a Pythagorean philosopher of Crotona, who is said to have been the first anatomist.

ALCMAN, a lyric poet, of Greece, flourished B. C. 672. Some verses of his are preserved in Athenæus.

ALCOCK, JOHN, successively bishop of Rochester, Worcester, and Ely, founder of Jesus College, Cambridge, and of the grammar school at Kingston-upon-Hull, was a prelate distinguished for his love of learning and of learned men. His temporal honours kept pace with his ecclesiastical dignities; Edward IV. conferring on him the presidency of Wales, and the chancellorship of England. Died 1500.

ALCOCK, JOHN, author of some excellent choral music; died, 1806.

ALCOCK, NATHAN, an English physician of the 18th century, celebrated for his anatomical lectures at Oxford.

ALCUINUS, or ALBINUS, FLACCUS, an English prelate of the 8th century, educated by the venerable Bede. He went on an embassy from Offa to Charlemagne, whom he instructed in rhetoric, logic, divinity, &c. Died at Tours, 804.

ALCYONIUS, PETER, an Italian philologist and critic of the 16th century. He wrote a treatise on Exile, and translated four treatises of Aristotle into Latin. Died, 1527.

ALDEGRÆF, a Westphalian, born in 1502, was both a painter and an engraver: his principal work is a large picture of the Nativity.

ALDERETE, DIEGO GRATIAN an eminent Spanish author of the 16th century. Besides a variety of original writings, he left translations from Xenophon, Thucydides, and other Greek classics. Died, 1580.

ALDERETE, BERNARD, a Spanish Jesuit, the first of his order on whom the university of Salamanca conferred the degree of doctor. Died, 1657.

ALDHelm, or ADELM, St., an English prelate, born at Malmesbury, where he founded a monastery, of which he was the first abbot. Died, 709.

ALDHUN, an English bishop in the 10th and 11th centuries, chiefly memorable as the founder of the bishopric of Durham. Died, 1018, having enjoyed the prelate 29 years.

ALDOBRANDINI, SYLVESTER, a Florentine lawyer and writer of the 16th century. He was appointed advocate of the treasury and apostolic chamber, by pope Paul III. Died, 1558.

ALDOBRANDINI, CLEMENT, son of the preceding, became pope under the name of Clement VIII.

ALDINI, TOBIAS, a physician and botanist of Cesena. He was superintendent of the Farnesian garden at Rome, on which account his name was prefixed to the description of it written by Peter Cashell.

ALDINI, A., nephew of Galvani; born at Bologna in 1756; author of "Essai Théorique sur la Galvanisme;" and "Account of late Improvements in Galvanism," published in London.

ALDRED, the first English bishop who visited Jerusalem, lived in the reigns of Edward the Confessor, Harold, and William the Conqueror. On the death of Edward, he crowned Harold, and performed the same ceremony for William. Died 1068.

ALDRICH, HENRY, born in Westminster, 1647, and educated by Busby. From Westminster School he went to Christ Church, Oxford, and was elected student and afterwards canon and dean. He built an elegant chapel to Trinity College, and the beautiful church of All Saints. He had also great skill in music, and composed many services for the Church. Dean Aldrich died, 1710.

ALDRICH, ROBERT, a native of Buckinghamshire, was educated at Eton, of which college he subsequently became master and provost. In 1537, he was made bishop of Carlisle; a station for which his learning and piety, which are extolled by Leland, well fitted him. Died 1555.

ALDROVANDUS, ULYSSES, a celebrated natural historian, born at Bologna, 1522. He was a great traveller, and formed a most superb collection of minerals, plants, animals, &c., by which he ruined his fortune, and died in an hospital, 1605, aged 80.

ALDUS. See MANUTIUS.

ALEANDER, JEROME, a cardinal, born in 1480, distinguished himself in the 16th century as a violent opposer of Luther and the reformation. He died, 1542. His great nephew, of the same name, inherited the ability of his ancestor, and was eminent as a scholar and an antiquary.

ALEMAN, a cardinal of the 13th century. He was degraded from the purple for his opposition to Eugenius IV. The sentence was reversed by Nicholas V. ; and after the cardinal's death, in 1400, he was canonised.

ALEMANNI, NICHOLAS, a learned Greek antiquary, born 1583, and became keeper of the Vatican library at Rome. Died, 1626.

ALEMBERT. See D'ALEMBERT.

ALEN, JOHN VAN, an eminent Dutch landscape painter. Died, 1698.

ALENIO, JULIUS, a Jesuit of Brescia, who rendered himself distinguished by his zeal in propagating Christianity in China, where he laboured for 36 years, and died 1649.

ALER, PAUL, a learned French Jesuit, died, 1727. His "Gradus ad Parnassum" has been long in established use in all the public schools of Europe.

ALES, ALEXANDER, a Scotch divine, who opposed the tenets of Luther, which he afterwards eagerly embraced. Died, 1565.

ALESIO, MATTHEW PEREZ D', a painter and engraver at Rome, whose figure of St. Christopher, in fresco, in the great church of Seville, is much admired. Died, 1600.

ALESSI, GALEAS, an architect, born at Perugia, whose works are spread over Germany and the south of Europe ; but his fame principally rests on the monastery and church of the Escorial. Died, 1572.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, whose heroism is so universally a theme, was the son of Philip, king of Macedon, by Olympias, daughter of Neoptolemus, king of Epirus, and born B. C. 356 ; the same year in which the temple of Diana at Ephesus was destroyed. Alexander received his education under Lysimachus and Aristotle, and gave several proofs of manly skill and courage while very young ; one of which, the breaking-in of his fiery steed, Bucephalus, is mentioned by all his historians as an incident which convinced his father of his future unconquerable spirit. Alexander was much attached to his mother, and sided with her in the disputes which led to her divorce from Philip. While the latter was making preparations for his grand expedition into Asia, he was assassinated by Pausanias ; and Alexander succeeded to the throne in his 20th year. His youth at first excited an inclination in several of the states of Greece to throw off the yoke of the Macedonian usurpation ; but the hero soon quelled the design, and was acknowledged general of Greece. He then marched into Thrace, and gained several conquests. During his absence Thebes revolted ; and when Alexander returned, he took that city by storm, made a dreadful carnage of the inhabitants, and destroyed all the buildings except the residence of Pindar the poet. This severe example had its effect on the other states ; and even Athens distinguished itself by a servile submission to the conqueror. Alexander next turned his arms against Darius, king of Persia ; and, at 22, crossed the Hellespont, at the head of 40,000 men. With this force he defeated the Persians at the Granicus, and made himself master of numerous places. At Gordium, where he assembled his army, he is said to have cut the famous knot on which the fate of Asia depended. Shortly after this, he again defeated the king of Persia near Issus, and took immense treasures and many prisoners ; among whom were the mother, wife, and children of Darius. This victory was followed by the conquest of Phœnicia, Damascus, and several other states. Alexander next besieged Tyre, which long resisted him, and, in revenge, he committed horrible cruelties on the inhabitants. He then went to Jerusalem, passed into Egypt, subdued it, and founded the city of Alexandria. Darius now collected another army, and was defeated at Arbela, which decided the fate of Western Asia. This great battle was followed by the capture of Susa and Persepolis ; the last of which Alexander destroyed at the instigation of his mistress. He now prepared for an expedition to India ; and, after a perilous march, reached the Indus, B. C. 327, which he crossed at the part where the city of Attock now stands. Alexander received the submission of several of the petty princes of the country, but was opposed by Porus, who valiantly withstood the invader ; and, although conquered and made prisoner, the victor, pleased with his spirit, restored him his dominions, and made him an ally. The conqueror next entered the fertile plains now called the Punjab, took the city of Sangala, and directed his course to the Ganges ; from which object, however, he was diverted by the rainy season, and the disaffection of his own troops. He accordingly erected twelve altars of an extraordinary size to mark the limits of his progress, remnants of which are said to be still in existence. Alexander, therefore, retraced his steps to the Hydaspes, on the banks of which he built two cities, Nicæa and Bucephala ; and embarked, with his light troops, on board a fleet he had constructed, leaving the main army to march by land. After a severe contest with the Mallii, in which he was wounded and his whole army nearly lost, he proceeded down the river to Patala ; and having entered the Indian Ocean, and performed some rites in honour of Neptune, he left his fleet ; giving orders to Nearchus, who had the command, to sail to the Persian Gulf, and thence up the Tigris to Mesopotamia. Alexander then prepared to march to Babylon, towards which capital he proceeded in triumphal progress. Reaching Susa, he began to give way to a passion for pleasure and joviality, and married Statera, the daughter of Darius. At length he reached Babylon, where he gave orders indicating future undertakings of great magnitude ; when he was seized with an illness, in consequence of indulging in habits of intemperance, and died of a fever, in the 13th year of his eventful reign, and the 33d of his life, B. C. 323. When required to name his successor, he is said to have replied, "to the most worthy." Pursuant to his own direction, his body was conveyed to Alexandria in a golden coffin, enclosed in a sumptuous sarcophagus, supposed to be now in the British Museum.

ALEXANDER SEVERUS, emperor of Rome, was born at Acra, in Phœnicia, in 205. The principal public event of his reign was the war with Artaxerxes, king of Persia, over whom he gained a great victory in person, and on his return to Rome was honoured with a triumph. He next marched against the Germans, who had invaded Gaul; and, while there, a sedition broke out in his army, headed by Maximin, and the emperor and his mother were murdered, A.D. 235.

ALEXANDER, king of Poland, elected on the death of his brother, John Albert, in 1501, was a prince of little genius and of remarkable taciturnity, but courageous and humane. Died, 1506.

ALEXANDER I., bishop of Rome, succeeded Evaristus in the tenth year of Trajan, and suffered martyrdom under Hadrian, in 119. This pontiff is said to be the first who introduced the use of holy water into the service of the Romish Church.

ALEXANDER II., elected to the papal throne in 1061, was a man of a humane and tolerant disposition, though the licentiousness of his life and manners caused great scandal. Died, 1073.

ALEXANDER III. succeeded Adrian IV. in 1159; was a pontiff of great ability, and deservedly popular with his subjects. Died at Rome, 1181.

ALEXANDER IV. ascended the papal throne in 1254, and seemed more concerned to preserve and enlarge the privileges of a monastic order, than to correct abuses or encourage improvements. Died, 1261.

ALEXANDER V., originally a Greek monk from Candia, was raised to the papal throne in 1409 by the Council of Pisa. His munificence, during his pontificate, was so unbounded, that he used to say, "When I became a bishop, I was rich; when a cardinal, poor; and when a pope, a beggar." Died, 1410.

ALEXANDER VI., a native of Valencia, in Spain, was raised to the papedom in 1492. As an ecclesiastic, Alexander was in the highest degree ambitious, bigoted, and intolerant; and formed alliances with all the princes of his time only to break them. This pontiff pursued his profligate career till 1503, when he was cut off by the same means he had used for the ruin of others. At a banquet which he and his son, the infamous Cæsar Borgia, had prepared for some newly created cardinals, the poison intended for them was by some mistake administered to the contrivers of the plot; and Alexander died the next day in great agony.

ALEXANDER VII. This pontiff expended vast sums in improving and embellishing the city of Rome, and was a great friend to the fine arts and literature. He was born at Sienna in 1559, elected to the papedom in 1655, and died in 1667.

ALEXANDER VIII., the last pope of that name, was elected 1689, at the advanced age of 80; and died two years afterwards. He was unpopular on account of his excessive nepotism.

ALEXANDER I., king of Scotland, son of Malcolm III., ascended the throne in 1107; and merited, by the vigour and impetuosity of his character, the appellation of The Fierce. Died, 1124.

ALEXANDER II., son of William the Lion, was raised to the throne of Scotland, 1214, being then in his 16th year. In 1221, he married Joan, sister of Henry III., of England; by which peace was restored to the two kingdoms. Died, 1249.

ALEXANDER III., son of the preceding, succeeded, 1249, when only eight years of age. He married Margaret, daughter of Henry III. of England, and lived upon terms of close friendship with his father-in-law, whom, in his wars with the barons, he assisted with 5000 men. Alexander was accidentally killed while hunting, in 1285.

ALEXANDER DE MEDICI, a licentious duke of Florence, assassinated by Lorenzo de Medici, a relation, at the instigation of Strozzi, a republican, 1537.

ALEXANDER, an English abbot, who supported the rights of his master, Henry III. at the court of Rome, with such boldness, that Pandulphus, the pope's legate in England, excommunicated and imprisoned him. Died about 1217.

ALEXANDER, NOEL, a Dominican, a laborious writer, born at Rouen, 1639, and died at Paris, 1724. His most celebrated work is a Latin Church History, in 26 vols.

ALEXANDER, of Paris, a Norman poet of the 12th century, who wrote a metrical poem called "Alexander the Great," in verses of twelve syllables, which measure has ever since been called "Alexandrine."

ALEXANDER, NEUSKOI, grand duke of Russia, born 1218. The most noted action of his life was a great victory he obtained over the more northern tribes on the banks of the Neva. Died, 1283.

ALEXANDER, the Right Rev. SOLOMON, bishop of Jerusalem, was born of Jewish parents in the grand duchy of Posen, 1790. Very little is known of his youth and education; but from his Hebraic and Talmudic acquirements he exercised the functions of Rabbi at a very early age. After much meditation he was baptized a Christian in 1826 at Plymouth, by the Rev. John Hatchard, and his ordination by Dr. Whately, archbishop of Dublin, and induction to a curacy in Ireland, shortly followed. He subsequently became a home missionary of the Society for the Propagation of Christianity among the Jews, and professor of Hebrew in King's College; and after the mission of Chevalier Bunsen to London for the establishment of a Protestant bishopric at Jerusalem, under the joint auspices of the sovereigns of England and Prussia, his character and peculiar acquirements having marked him out as one eminently fitted for this office, he was consecrated the first Protestant bishop of Jerusalem in 1841. His mission was at first beset with great difficulties, arising from sectarian jealousy at the Ottoman court; but the good sense and sincerity of Bishop Alexander surmounted them all, and he was entering on what promised to be a long and successful career, when he was suddenly cut off during a journey to Cairo, whither he was bound on a mission of sympathy and good will to the Egyptian Christians. Died Nov. 23, 1845.

ALEXANDER, Sir WILLIAM, earl of Stirling, an eminent Scottish statesman and poet in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. Died, 1640.

ALEXANDER, WILLIAM, an ingenious artist, born at Maidstone, 1786. He came to London, and studied the fine arts with so much success, that he was selected to accompany the embassy of Lord Macartney to China. On his return, he published a splendid work on the costume of China; and, on the formation of the Royal Military College at Marlow, Mr. Alexander was appointed drawing-master. At the time of his death, in 1816, he was keeper of the antiquities at the British Museum.

ALEXANDER, WILLIAM, styled, through courtesy, earl of Stirling, was born at New York, and became a major-general in the service of the United States during the American war. He was a brave officer, but more distinguished by his attention to mathematics and astronomy than by his military talents. He died, 1783.

ALEXANDER, THOMAS, earl of Selkirk, known as the founder of a colony in Canada, and for his writings on politics and statistics. He died in 1820.

ALEXANDER I., emperor of Russia and king of Poland, eldest son of Paul I., was born Dec. 22. 1777; succeeded, March, 1801; and was crowned at Moscow, September following; when a ukase was published for diminishing taxes, liberating debtors, prohibiting prosecutions for the recovery of fines, discontinuing the mode of recruiting the army, and granting a free pardon to all deserters. In 1803, Alexander offered his mediation to effect a reconciliation between England and France; and in 1805, a convention was entered into between Russia, England, Austria, and Sweden, for the purpose of resisting the encroachments of the French on the territories of independent states. On the 2d of December the battle of Austerlitz took place, at which Alexander appeared at the head of 50,000 men, but was defeated, and compelled to retreat to his dominions. Ere long, however, he again appeared on the theatre of war, but the scene of it was changed to Poland. On November 26, 1806, was fought the battle of Pultusk; and on the 7th and 8th of February, 1807, that of Eylau, neither of which engagements was decisive; but on the 14th of June the Russians were completely defeated at Friedland by Napoleon. The result of this victory was an interview between the two emperors, which led to the treaty of Tilsit. The seizure of the Danish fleet by the English occasioned a declaration of war from Russia against this country; but hostilities only extended to the cessation of trade between the two nations. A second meeting of the French and Russian sovereigns took place at Erfurt, Sept. 27. 1808; Buonaparte being anxious to secure the friendship of Alexander previously to his meditated subjugation of Spain. While the former was engaged in this undertaking, the latter made himself master of the Swedish province of Finland, in 1809. The interruption of commerce with England now began to be severely felt by Russia, and Alexander determined to throw off the French yoke. On the 23d March, 1812, an imperial ukase was issued, ordering a levy of two men out of every 500 throughout the Russian empire, and all matters of dispute with Great Britain was pacifically arranged. The invasion of Russia which followed, though the most important event in the reign of Alexander, is not one in which he was so far personally concerned as to require a detailed relation here. On joining his army in Poland, February, 1813, Alexander published the famous manifesto, which served as the basis of the coalition of the other European powers against the rapacity of the French emperor. Germany, and then France, became the scene of hostilities; and the capture of Paris, April 30. 1814, was followed by the abdication of Buonaparte, and the restoration of the Bourbons. After the conclusion of peace, Alexander visited England, in company with the king of Prussia; and, on his return to his own dominions, he zealously employed himself in ameliorating the internal condition of his empire. His death took place at Tagaurog, in the Crimea, Dec. 1. 1825; and he was succeeded by his second brother, Nicholas, agreeable to a document signed by his eldest brother, Constantine, resigning to him the right of succession. Alexander was a sincere lover of peace; vigilant, brave, and active in war; tolerant in his religious principles; mild and amiable in private life, yet strict in the administration of public justice; a patron of literature and the arts; and though, as a monarch, ambitious of power, yet recognising the spirit of the age, and frequently acting in accordance with liberal principles.

ALEXANDRINI, JULIUS, a physician of Trent, in the 16th century. He was the first who endeavoured to prove the connexion of bodily diseases with the passions; and was the author of several medical works.

ALEXIS, a Greek comic poet, uncle and instructor of Alexander. Of his writings, only a few fragments remain, which are preserved in the collection of poems of the more ancient Greek authors.

ALEXIS, MICHAELOVITSCH, czar of Russia, born in 1630; succeeded his father Michael in 1646; died, 1677. He was the father of Peter the Great, and the first Russian monarch who acted on the policy of a more intimate connexion with the other European states.

ALEXIS, PETROVITSCH, only son of Peter the Great, born 1690. This unhappy prince opposed the new policy of his father, and expressed an unalterable attachment to the ancient barbarous usages and customs of his country; for which the czar resolved to disinherit him. Alexis fled to his brother-in-law, the emperor of Germany, and lay concealed for some time at Vienna, until his retreat was discovered by his father, before whom he was conducted as a criminal, and compelled formally to renounce the succession; after this he was tried by secret judges, and condemned to death, 1719.

ALEXIS DEL ARCO, a Spanish painter, born at Madrid, in 1625. He was deaf and dumb; but his reputation, particularly as a portrait painter, was considerable. Died in 1700.

ALEXIUS I., COMNENUS, emperor of the East, born at Constantinople, 1048. He signalised himself in the wars with the Turks and Saracens, was bountiful to his friends, and clement to his enemies, a lover of letters, and equally versed in the arts of government and of war. He died, 1118.

ALEXIUS II., COMNENUS, succeeded his father Michael on the throne of Constantinople, in 1180, when only twelve years of age; and, with his mother, was murdered two years afterwards by Andronicus, who usurped the crown.

ALEXIUS III., ANGELUS, emperor in 1195, gained that station by the basest perfidy towards his brother, Isaac Angelus, whom he confined in prison, and caused his eyes to be put out. His effeminate reign rendered him despicable, and his capital was besieged and taken, 1203, by an army of Venetian and French crusaders, headed by his nephew, Alexius, son of Isaac. The usurper received the same punishment he had inflicted on his brother, and died a few years afterwards in a monastery at Nice; and the conqueror placed his blind father on the throne, with whom he reigned as Alexius IV.; but his elevation was succeeded by a rebellion, and he was deposed, imprisoned, and put to death, 1204.

ALEXIUS V., DUCAS, surnamed MURTZUFFLE, from his black shaggy eyebrows, was raised to the throne after the murder of Alexius IV., but deposed by the crusaders, who attacked and took his capital, and he was put to an ignominious death.

ALEYN, CHARLES, an English historical poet. Died, 1640.

ALFARABI, an eminent Arabian philosopher in the 10th century, who obtained much reputation in his day, as being a great traveller, and master of seventy languages. Among his works are several treatises on Aristotle, and an Encyclopædia, the manuscript of which is in the Escorial.

ALFARO Y GAMON, JUAN DE, a distinguished Spanish painter, born 1640. He died in his 40th year, of grief, occasioned by the banishment of his patron, the admiral of Castile.

ALFENUS VARUS, PUBLIUS, a Roman civilian, who became consul, and is mentioned by Horace and Virgil with gratitude.

ALFIERI, VICTOR, a celebrated Italian poet, born at Asti, in Piedmont, in 1749. His first work was a tragedy, entitled "Cleopatra," which was acted at Turin, 1773; this was followed by a farce, called "The Poets;" and within seven years he produced fourteen dramas, besides various other works. At the age of 48, he began to study Greek, and made several translations from that language. His incessant labours at length undermined his constitution, and he died, at Florence, in 1803, unexcelled by any poet of his age and country.

ALFORD, MICHAEL, an English Jesuit, born in London, 1587. He died at St. Omer's, 1652, leaving behind him two celebrated works, "Britannia Illustrata" and "Annales Ecclesiastici Britannorum."

ALFRAGAN, or AHMED BEN FERGAN, an Arabian astronomer of the 9th century; author of an "Introduction to Astronomy," and other scientific treatises.

ALFRAGO, ANDREW, an Italian physician; author of a history of Arabian physicians and philosophers, and other works connected with the East, where he resided for some years. Died, at Padua, 1520.

ALFRED THE GREAT. This monarch was the youngest son of Ethelwolf, king of the West Saxons, and born at Wantage, Berks, in 849. On the death of his brother Ethelred, Alfred succeeded to the throne of England, 871, in his 22d year, at a time when his kingdom was a prey to domestic dissensions, and to the invasions of the Danes, whom he engaged at Wilton, but, after a hard conflict, was forced to retreat, and conclude a treaty on disadvantageous terms. The Danes soon violated their engagement, and renewed their hostility with such success, that, in 877, the king was under the necessity of laying aside the ensigns of royalty, and concealing himself in the cottage of one of his herdsmen. He afterwards retired to the island of Athelney, and there received information that one of his chiefs had obtained a great victory over the Danes, and taken their magical standard. Alfred then disguised himself as a harper, entered the Danish camp, and gained a knowledge of the state of the enemy. After this, he directed his nobles to meet him at Selwood, with their vassals, which was done so secretly, that the Danes were surprised at Eddington, and completely routed. He now put his kingdom into a state of defence, increased his navy, and brought London into a flourishing state; but, after a rest of some years, an immense number of Danish forces landed in Kent, and committed great ravages; they were, however, soon defeated by Alfred, who caused several of the leaders to be executed at Winchester. Thus he secured the peace of his dominions, and struck terror into his enemies, after 56 battles by sea and land, in all of which he was personally engaged. But the warlike exploits of Alfred formed, perhaps, the least of the services he rendered his country. He composed a body of statutes, instituted the trial by jury, and divided the kingdom into shires and hundreds; was so exact in his government, that robbery was unheard of, and valuable goods might be left on the high roads. His great council, consisting of bishops, earls, aldermen, and thanes, was, by an express law, called together twice a year in London, for the better government of the realm. The state of learning in his time was so low, that, from the Thames to the Humber, scarcely a man could be found who understood the service of the church, or could translate a single sentence of Latin into English. To remedy this evil, he invited men of learning from all quarters, and placed them at the head of seminaries in various parts of his kingdom; and, if he was not the founder of the University of Oxford, it is certain he raised it to a reputation which it had never before enjoyed. Alfred himself wrote several works, and translated others from the Latin, particularly "Orosius's History of the Pagans," and "Boethius's Consolations of Philosophy." He divided the twenty-four hours into three equal parts, one devoted to the service of God, another to public affairs, and the third to rest and refreshment; his revenue, also, was divided into two equal moieties, one dedicated to sacred, the other to civil uses. To Alfred, England is indebted for the foundation of her naval establishment, and he was the first who sent out ships to make the discovery of a north-east passage. To crown his great public character, Alfred is described as one of the most mild and amiable men in private life; of a temper serene and cheerful, affable, kind, and merciful, and not averse to society, or to innocent recreation; he was also personally well-favoured, possessing a handsome and vigorous form, and a dignified and engaging aspect. Died, 900.

ALFRED, surnamed "the Philosopher," an Englishman, was greatly esteemed at the court of Rome, and attended Cardinal Otoboni, the legate, to England. He wrote five books on the "Consolations of Boethius," and died, 1270.

ALFRED, an English bishop of the 10th century; author of a "History of the Abbey of Malmesbury," a treatise "De Naturis Rerum," &c.

ALGARDI, ALEXANDER, a Bolognese sculptor of the 17th century. There is an admirable group of his, at Bologna, of the beheading of St. Paul.

ALGAROTTI, FRANCIS, an eminent Italian writer, born at Venice, 1742. He was a great connoisseur of the fine arts, and his works are critical and philosophical. Died, 1764.

ALHAZEN, an Arabian mathematician, who was the first that showed the importance of refraction in astronomy. He died at Cairo, in 1038.

ALI, cousin, son-in-law, and vizier of Mahomet, and one of the main pillars of the new faith. He obtained the name of the Lion of God, always Victorious; but was opposed in his succession to the caliphate by Omar and Othman, and retired into Arabia, and made a collection of the sayings of the prophet. There he laid the foundation of a new sect, and, after the death of Othman, he was declared caliph, 655; but was murdered four years afterwards in the mosque.

ALI BEG, a man of extraordinary learning and attainments, born in Poland, of Christian parents, but was kidnapped in his infancy by a horde of Tartars, who sold him to the Turks, in whose language and religion he was educated. His skill in languages procured him the post of chief interpreter to the grand signior; while his leisure hours were employed in translating the Bible and the catechism of the Church of England into the Turkish language. The work by which he is principally known to Europeans is an account of the religious ceremonies, &c. of the Turks. Died, 1675.

ALI BEY, a Greek, son of a Natolian priest, born, 1728. He fell when a child into the hands of robbers, who carried him to Cairo, and sold him to Ibrahim, lieutenant of the Janissaries, who reared and adopted him. Ali soon rose to the rank of sangiak, or member of the council; and when his patron was assassinated by Ibrahim the Circassian, he avenged his death, and slew the murderer with his own hand. This action raised him numerous enemies, and he was obliged to fly to Jerusalem, and thence to Acre; but in time he was recalled by the people, and, being placed at the head of the government, Egypt began to recover its former splendour. In a battle fought against the troops of a rebellious Mameluke, Ali was cut down, after defending himself with a degree of desperate valour that has scarcely ever been exceeded, and died of his wounds eight days afterwards, 1773.

ALI PACHA (or, more correctly, ALI, pacha of Jannina), a bold, intelligent, and crafty Albanian, was born at Tepelini, in 1744. His father, an Albanian chief, died of grief, in consequence of being stripped of his territories; but his mother, who was remarkable for energy of character, spirited up her son to assume the conduct of a predatory troop of his countrymen. With this band he committed so many depredations, that the adjacent tribes took up arms in their own defence, and carried off his mother and sister, whom they treated with great cruelty. This roused the naturally implacable temper of Ali, and he vowed the extermination of the whole race. He raised a body of 2000 men, assumed great authority, and wreaked his vengeance upon the Sulutes, whom he treated with the most horrible barbarity. During fifty years of constant warfare he brought under his sway a wide extent of territory, which the Porte sanctioned his holding, with the title of pacha. He received agents from foreign powers, and ultimately intrigued with England, France, and Russia. But the jealousy of the Porte was at length excited, and Hassan Pacha was sent to demand his head. On declaring his errand, Ali replied, "My head is not to be delivered up so easily;" accompanying the words with a pistol-ball, which broke his opponent's thigh. He shot two more dead upon the spot, but fell the same moment. His head was severed from his body, and sent to Constantinople.

ALIAMET, JAMES, an eminent French engraver of the 18th century.

ALISON, REV. ARCHIBALD, the celebrated writer on Taste, was born, 1757. Educated at Glasgow and Oxford, he entered into holy orders, and obtained successively livings in Durham and at Edinburgh, his native town, where he continued to officiate till 1831, when a severe illness compelled him to relinquish all public duties. Mr. Alison was one of the first members of the Royal Society of Edinburgh; and he was intimately associated with most of the men of genius and learning of the present century. His "Essay on the Nature and Principles of Taste" has passed through numerous editions; and the theory therein set forth has met the approval of the first critics, both at home and abroad. Died, 1839.

ALISON, RICHARD, one of the ten composers, who, by command of Elizabeth, adapted the Psalms to music.

ALIX, PETER, a French abbot of the 17th century; author of a "Dialogue entre Ponté noir et la Pillorie," and other works.

ALKMAAR, HENRY, a German poet of the 15th century.

ALLAINVAL, LEONOR SOULAS D', a French abbé and dramatic poet, of considerable merit. He died at Paris, 1753.

ALLAN, DAVID, a Scottish portrait and historical painter of the 18th century, born at Alloa, 1744. There are several engravings from his pictures. Died, 1796.

ALLAN, GEORGE, F. A. S., son of the above, M. P. for the city of Durham, and a principal contributor to Nicholls' Literary Anecdotes. Born, 1768; died, 1823.

ALLAN, SIR WILLIAM, an eminent historical painter, was born in Edinburgh in 1782. Of humble parentage, he at an early age evinced a decided predilection for art; and, when still a young man, he pursued his favourite study with equal enterprise and ability, visiting Morocco, Greece, and Spain, and penetrating the remote and semi-barbarous territories of Russia and Turkey, that he might familiarise himself with the rude and picturesque aspects there presented. "The Polish Captives," "The Slave Market of Constantinople," and various kindred subjects, testify to his skill in this department of art; but he did much also to illustrate the historic lore of his own land, as his vivid representation of Mary and of Rizzio, the Murder of Archbishop Sharpe, and the Battle of Waterloo amply testify. He was an old and attached friend of Sir Walter Scott; and his amiable, unassuming manners, and his vast fund of anecdote, procured him general love and esteem. In 1841 he succeeded Sir D. Wilkie as president of the Royal Scottish Academy, and was soon afterwards knighted. Died, 1850.

ALLARD, GUY, a French writer, known principally by numerous works upon the genealogical history of Dauphiny. Died in 1716.

ALLARD, JEAN FRANÇOIS, a French general officer, much distinguished during the Empire. On the final downfall of Napoleon, he entered, successively, the Egyptian and the Persian services, and at length became the confidential adviser of Runjeet-Singh, whose troops he disciplined in the European manner. Born, 1785; died, 1839.

ALLATIUS, LEO, a Greek physician and man of letters, librarian of the Vatican at Rome, and professor in the Greek college there. Died, 1669, aged 83.

ALLEGRAIN, CHRISTOPHER GABRIEL, an eminent French sculptor. Died, 1795.

ALLEGRI, ALEXANDER, an Italian satirical poet, who first served in the army, and then became an ecclesiastic. He had a great turn for burlesque poetry; and his principal work, "Rime Piaccevoli," has gone through several editions.

ALLEGRI, GREGORIO, a celebrated Roman musical composer, whose works are still retained in the pontifical chapel. The chief is the "Miserere," which is always sung on Good Friday. Died, 1640.

ALLEIN, JOSEPH, a nonconformist minister, known chiefly as the author of "An Alarm to Unconverted Sinners," which has gone through numerous editions. Born in 1623, at Devizes; died at Bath, 1688.

ALLEN, JOHN, archbishop of Dublin and chancellor of the Earl of Kildare, cruelly murdered by the son of the Earl, 1534.

ALLEN, JOHN, M. D., a distinguished writer on historical subjects, was born at Redford, his paternal property, near Edinburgh, in 1771. He studied at Edinburgh, and took his degree in medicine in 1792. But his predilection for politics soon withdrew him from his medical pursuits; and he early connected himself with the movements for Parliamentary Reform, which commenced in Scotland at the outbreak of the French Revolution. In 1802, having been recommended to the late Lord Holland as a medical friend and companion, he accompanied the noble lord and his family on successive tours through France, Italy, and Spain; and the similarity of their tastes and opinions soon led to a lasting friendship between them, which death alone interrupted. On his return from the continent, he devoted himself to literary pursuits. The extent and variety of his attainments are shown in his numerous contributions to the Edinburgh Review, chiefly on subjects connected with the British constitution, and with French and Spanish history. But the most lasting monument to his literary fame is his valuable work called an "Inquiry into the Rise and Growth of the Royal Prerogative," of which a second edition has been recently published. In 1811 he became warden, and in 1820 master of Dulwich College; but he continued to reside chiefly at Holland House, where the manliness, sincerity, and independence of his character, his kindly nature and extensive information, gained him the esteem of all who were admitted to that "Temple of Wit" and hospitality. Died, April 10, 1843.

ALLEN, THOMAS, an eminent scholar in the reign of Elizabeth, considered the first mathematician of his day. Born, 1642; died, 1632.

ALLEN, THOMAS, an industrious writer and compiler of antiquarian and historical works; the chief of which were, "The History and Antiquities of Lambeth;" "The History and Antiquities of London, Westminster, and Southwark;" with various county histories. Born in 1803, and died, of cholera, July 1833.

ALLERSTAIN, a German Jesuit of the 18th century. He was one of the missionaries to China, where he died; and was author of some valuable astronomical observations. Died about 1778.

ALLESTRY, RICHARD, born at Uppington, in Shropshire, 1619, was a student of Christ Church, Oxford, and originally designed for the Church; but, during the civil wars, he joined the royal army, and was present at the battle of Keinton. At the Restoration he took orders, and subsequently enjoyed many clerical dignities. Died at Eton, 1680.

ALLEY, WILLIAM, a zealous member of the Reformed Church, was born at Great Wycombe, Buckinghamshire, made bishop of Exeter in 1560 by Elizabeth, and died, 1570.

ALLEYN, EDWARD, a celebrated actor in the reigns of Elizabeth and James, and founder of Dulwich College, was born in London, 1596. He was the first master of his own college, and, dying in 1626, was buried in its chapel.

ALLIONI, CHARLES, a celebrated physician, medical writer, and professor of botany in the university of Turin. Born, 1725; died, 1804.

ALLIX, PETER, a learned divine, born at Alen, on, in France, 1644, was minister of the Reformed Church at Rouen and Charenton. On the repeal of the Edict of Nantes, he came to England, was created D.D. at Oxford, and made treasurer of the church at Salisbury. Died in London, 1717.

ALLOISI, BALTHAZAR, a Bolognese historical and portrait painter, who obtained the name of GALANINO. Died, 1638.

ALLORI, ALEXANDER, a Florentine painter, who excelled in naked figures. He died in 1607.

ALLORI, CHRISTOPHANO, called also BRONZINO, the son of the above, was also an eminent painter, chiefly distinguished for his small pictures. Died, 1619.

ALLY, VIZIER, ex-nabob of Oude, was the adopted son of the former nabob of Oude, Yusuf ab Dowlah, who declared himself successor. The English government, however, deposed him in favour of the brother of Yusuf, but settled on him a pension of 25,000*l.* While engaged with the agents of the East India Company, who had been sent to meet him at Benares for the purpose of making arrangements for his future residence, he gave a signal, on which his armed followers rushed in and treacherously murdered the Company's officers. For a time he made his escape, but surrendered on condition that his life should be spared. Died in prison, 1817, aged only 36.

ALMAGRO, DIEGO D', a Spaniard of low origin, who accompanied Pizarro in the expedition against Peru, in which his valour, profligacy, and cruelty were equally displayed. In 1525, he took Cuzco, the capital of Chili, by storm, and put Atahualpa, the last of the incas, to a most horrid death; but quarrelling with the brothers of Pizarro about the division of their spoil, a schism ensued, and Almagro was eventually taken prisoner and strangled, 1538.

ALMAMON, or ABDALLAH, caliph of Bagdad, son of Haroun al Raschid, succeeded his brother Al Amin, 814, and died, 833. He founded an academy at Bagdad, to which he invited able professors of languages and sciences, and left behind him a character for clemency and benevolence.

ALMANASOR, JACOB, a caliph of the Saracens in Africa, who, after conquering territory to the extent of 1200 leagues in length, met with such a reverse of fortune, that he became a baker at Alexandria, in the exercise of which business he died, in 1205.

ALMANZOR, surnamed the Victorious, the second caliph of the house of Abas, succeeded to the throne in 753. During his reign the city of Bagdad was raised from the foundation, and was made the imperial residence.

ALMARUS, abbot of the monastery of St.

Austin, Canterbury, made bishop of Sherborne, 1022.

ALMEIDA, FRANCISCO, a Portuguese, appointed, in 1505, the first viceroxy of India. After a perilous voyage, he crossed the Cape of Good Hope, and proceeded along the coast of Africa, spreading terror and desolation; he reduced several places under the dominion of Portugal, gained some extraordinary victories, and was killed on his return in a quarrel with the natives at the Cape, in 1509.

ALMEIDA, LORENZO, son of Francisco, was also an enterprising commander and navigator, and distinguished himself by many expeditions in the Indian seas. Ceylon was by him made tributary to Portugal. Lorenzo lost his life in an engagement with the Egyptian fleet in the bay of Cambaya.

ALMELOVEEN, THEODORE JANSEN VAN, a physician, born near Utrecht, was a man of deep reading and research, and professor of history, the Greek language, and medicine, at Harderwick. He died at Amsterdam, 1742.

ALMINARA, Marquis, Spanish envoy to France from Charles IV.; diplomatist, and the author of an able "Reply to Cevallos," respecting the former's abdication, and of "A History of the Inquisition."

ALMON, JOHN, a political writer and publisher, and the friend of Wilkes, was born at Liverpool in 1738. In 1774 he commenced the Parliamentary Register; he was also the author of a Life of Lord Chat-ham, and various biographical, political, and literary anecdotes. He died in 1805.

ALOADDIN, commonly called the Old Man of the Mountains, prince of the Arsacides, or Assassins. He was the sheik of a Syrian tribe professing the Mahometan religion, and from his followers the word assassin has its derivation.

ALOMPRA, the founder of the Burman empire, a man of obscure birth, but who raised himself to independence and sovereign power, and established a new dynasty about the middle of the 18th century.

ALONZO DE VIADO, a Spanish Liberal, born, 1775; author of a plan for reforming the Spanish army, of a treatise on architecture, and several translations.

ALPHERY, MIKEPHER or NICEPHORUS, a Russian prince, who, during the civil dissensions in his country, came to England, was educated at Oxford, and, in 1618, obtained the living of Warley, Huntingdonshire, whence he was ejected in the civil war. At the Restoration he was reinstated in his living; and, although twice invited to return to Russia, for the purpose of being placed on the throne, he preferred remaining in this country with his flock. He died at Hammersmith, at the age of 80.

ALPHONSO L, or ALONZO ENRIQUEZ, first king of Portugal, son of Henry of Burgundy, count of Portugal. He fought successfully against the Moors, raised his country to a powerful monarchy, and died, 1185, after a reign of 57 years.

ALPHONSO III., the Great, king of the Asturias, born 847, succeeded his father Ordogeno, 865, and died at Zamora, 912. He conquered many places from the Moors, was a patron of learned men, and distinguished himself for piety and justice.

ALPHONSO IV., surnamed the Brave, son of king Denis, whom he succeeded, 1324, was an able and impartial sovereign, and died, 1357.

ALPHONSO V., surnamed the Magnanimous, king of Arragon, born, 1384; succeeded his father, Ferdinand the Just, 1416, and died at Naples, 1458, leaving his Neapolitan dominions to his natural son Ferdinand, and those of Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily to his brother Juan, king of Navarre. This monarch was accounted the most accomplished prince of his time: he gave shelter to the Greek literati expelled from Constantinople, and was in other respects a great patron of learning.

ALPHONSO X., called the Wise, king of Leon and Castile, succeeded his father, Ferdinand III., 1251, and died, 1284, aged 81. As a ruler, Alphonso was misguided and unfortunate; but as a patron and an encourager of the sciences, he obtained much reputation. He completed a code of laws, began by his father, still known under the title of "Las Partidas," and preceded the other nations of Europe in substituting the vernacular tongue for the Latin in law proceedings. His favourite pursuit, however, was astronomy, and he employed the most famous astronomers to draw up the celebrated tables called after him the Alphonso sine Tables, which were first published at Venice, 1483.

ALPHONSUS, TASTADUS, bishop of Avila, a voluminous Spanish writer, who flourished during the 15th century.

ALPINI, PROSPERO, a Venetian physician, born, 1553, and died, 1617. He was the greatest botanist of his day, the first who explained the impregnation and generation of plants by the sexual system, and is the author of many valuable works on his favourite pursuit.

ALSTEDIUS, JOHN HENRY, a German philosopher and Protestant divine, born about 1588, and died, 1638; author of some celebrated theological collections, but chiefly known for his Encyclopaedia.

ALSTON, CHARLES, an eminent Scotch physician and botanist; author of "Tirocinium Botanicum Edinburgense," &c.; and public lecturer at Edinburgh. Born, 1683; died, 1760.

ALSTROEMER, JONAS, a distinguished Swede, born of poor parents at Alingas, West Gothland, in 1685. After struggling with poverty for a long time, he visited London, and paying particular attention to the commercial and manufacturing sources of British prosperity, he returned to Sweden in 1723, resolving to carry the plans he had formed into execution. Having obtained a license to establish manufactures in the town in which he was born, it soon became the seat of industry and activity, which afforded an example to the whole kingdom. He established a sugar house at Gottenburg, and traded to the Indies and the Levant; improved rural economy; cultivated plants proper for dyeing; and improved the wool trade by importing sheep from Spain and England, and the goat from Angora. For these important benefits, Alstroemer received a patent of nobility, was made Knight of the Polar Star, and honoured with the title of Chancellor of Commerce; the Academy of Sciences chose him a member; and the national states decreed him a statue, to be erected to his memory on the exchange of Stockholm. Died, 1761.

ALTEN, General CHARLES, count, a brave and experienced officer, was born at Wilkenburg, at Hanover, in 1764, and in 1781 received his commission as ensign in the foot-guards of the electorate. After taking part in the operations of 1793, against the revolutionary troops of France, he was made colonel of the king's German legion in 1803, and from that time till the end of the war he was almost constantly on service. He was at the taking of Copenhagen, and afterwards served under Sir John Moore as a brigadier-general in the fatiguing and arduous duties of the disastrous campaign which ended in the battle of Corunna. At Walcheren also, and at the siege of Flushing, he distinguished himself; and on his return to England, in 1810, he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and placed in command of the south-west district. From this station, however, he was speedily removed, his brigade being destined for the operations of the Peninsula, where he served under Marshal Beresford at the first siege of Badajoz, and at Albuera. In 1812, Wellington placed him at the head of the light division, which he commanded in the general actions of Salamanca, Vittoria, Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, Orthes, and Toulouse. Like that of many of his brave compeers, his active duty closed with the battle of Waterloo; and his services at the head of the third division, during the memorable 16th, 17th, and 18th of June, will ever be classed among the most devoted and glorious on military record. He was now created a count; and when recovered from the dangerous wounds he had received, he took the command of the Hanoverian troops forming part of the army of occupation in France. In 1831, Count Alten was nominated one of the ministers of state, and placed at the head of the war department in Hanover. This appointment he held till his death, which took place in April, 1840.

ALTER, FRANCIS CHARLES, a German Jesuit and laborious critic; Greek teacher in the school of St. Anne at Vienna, in which capital he died, 1804.

ALTILIO, GABRIEL, a Neapolitan; author of some Latin poems of great beauty. He was tutor to Prince Ferdinand, son of Alphonso II., and was subsequently made bishop of Policastro. Died, 1501.

ALTING, HENRY, an eminent German divine, born at Embden, 1583; died, 1644. He distinguished himself at the synod of Dort, as deputy from the Palatinate, and did much in advancement of the Protestant interest in Germany by his temperate conduct and abilities as a reasoner. Born, 1583; died, 1644.

ALTING, JAMES, son of the above, was educated at Groningen, and came to England, where he was ordained a priest of the church by the Bishop of Worcester. In 1643, he was chosen Hebrew professor at Groningen, and afterwards professor of divinity. Born, 1618; died, 1679.

ALTING, MENSON, a burgomaster of Groningen, author of the best description of the Low Countries now extant. Died, 1718.

ALTISSIMO, the poetical surname of an Italian poet named Christopher. His surname and a poetic crown were given to him on account of his great popularity as an improvisatore.

ALTMAN, JOHN GEORGE, a Swiss historian and divine, curate of Inns in the same canton, and professor of moral philosophy and Greek at Berne. Born, 1697; died, 1758.

ALTDORFER, or ALTORF, ALBERT, a Bavarian painter, architect, and engraver. He raised himself by his merits to the rank of senator of Ratisbon, which city he adorned with many handsome edifices. Born, 1488; died, 1578.

ALURED, an ancient English historian, who flourished in the beginning of the 12th century. His annals are very valuable, and comprise the history of the Britons, Saxons, and Normans, down to his own time, 1129.

ALVA, FERDINAND ALVAREZ, Duke of, the descendant of an illustrious family in Spain, was a famous general under the emperors Charles V. and Philip II. He made his first campaign at the battle of Pavia. At the siege of Metz he performed prodigies of valour; and in the war with the pope he was completely successful; but he was as cruel as he was brave. In 1567, Philip sent him to reduce the Low Countries, then in a state of revolt. Here he landed with 10,000 men, and immediately commenced a series of cruelties almost unparalleled in the annals of history, annihilating every remaining privilege of the people. He was subsequently employed against Don Antonio, who had assumed the crown of Portugal, and drove him from that kingdom, the whole of which he reduced to Philip's authority. Died in 1589, aged 74.

ALVARADO, DON PEDRO, one of the rapacious conquerors of Spanish America, who accompanied Cortes to America. He was appointed to the government of Guatimala, and was slain in 1541.

ALVARADO, ALPHONSO D' a Spanish adventurer, who accompanied Pizarro in his expedition to Peru; and who was equally distinguished for his bravery and his cruelty. Died, 1553.

ALVAREZ, EMANUEL, a distinguished Portuguese grammarian, born at Madeira, 1526, and died at the college of Evora, of which he was rector, 1582.

ALVAREZ, FRANCIS, a Portuguese divine, born at Coimbra, towards the end of the 15th century, and died, 1540, leaving behind him in Portuguese an account of his embassy to David, king of Abyssinia, and a description of Ethiopian manners and customs, which is deemed the first accurate account of Abyssinia.

Latin, is a poem on the Order of the Golden Fleece. Born, 1488; died, 1538.

ALVAREZ, DON JOSÉ, one of the most eminent sculptors of the 19th century, was born near Cordova in Spain, 1768. Patronised by Charles IV., he proceeded to Paris in 1799, with a view of prosecuting his studies; and he soon gained himself a name in the French metropolis. Napoleon presented him with a gold medal; but his subsequent conduct towards Spain inspired the artist with such aversion for him, that he would never model his bust; and he afterwards was imprisoned for refusing to take the oath of allegiance to Joseph Buonaparte, when proclaimed king of Spain. Many of his best works are at Madrid. Died, 1827.

ALVAROTTO, JAMES, a lawyer of Padua, distinguished for his attainments both in the civil and canon law; author of "Commentaria in Libros Feudorum." Born, 1474; died, 1542.

ALVENSLEBEN, PHILIP CHAS., Count of, son of a counsellor of war at Hanover, was a distinguished diplomatist, and in 1701 was placed at the head of the department for foreign affairs at Hanover, in which he gave general satisfaction. The count wrote a "History of the War from the Peace of Munster to that of Hubertsbourg." Born, 1745; died, 1802.

ALVIANO, BARTHOLOMEW, an eminent Venetian general, whose exertions against the emperor Maximilian, in 1508, caused the republic to decree him triumphal honours. In the siege of Padua by the emperor, and at the battles of La Motte and Alarigiano, Alviano displayed the most heroic qualities. His death was occasioned by excessive fatigue while laying siege to Brescia. Born, 1455; died, 1515.

ALXINGER, J. B., born at Vienna, in 1755; author of some admired German poems and translations. Died, 1797.

ALYPIUS, an architect of Antioch, employed by Julius in his attempt to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem. He was subsequently banished, on a charge of practising the black art, and died in exile. Alypius wrote a "Geographical Description of the World," published in 1628 at Geneva.

ALYPIUS, bishop of Tagasta, Africa, the friend of St. Augustine, with whom he was baptized at Milan, in 388. He opposed the Donatists and Pelagians with great zeal; and died in 430.

AMADEDDULAT, first sultan of the Buian dynasty, was the son of a fisherman of Dilem, on the Caspian Sea. He rose to distinction in the armies of Makan, sultan of Dilem, and subsequently gained possession of Persia Proper, Persian Irak, and Kerman, of which he assumed the sovereignty, and fixed the seat of his government at Shiraz, in 933. He died, 949, and left his crown to his nephew, Adadeddulat.

AMADEUS V., count of Savoy, succeeded to the sovereignty of that state, 1285, and died at Avignon, 1323. Although a prince of such small dominions, he acquired the surname of Great, from his wisdom and success.

AMADEUS VIII., count of Savoy, elected, 1391, and died, 1451. He was one of the most singular characters of his time; and, from his prudence in keeping peace with his neighbours, obtained the title of the Pacific.

AMADEUS IX., count of Savoy, although undistinguished by deeds of renown, deserves honourable mention as a prince who possessed all the Christian virtues in an eminent degree, and particularly that of charity. He married Iolande, of France, who seconded him in all his good works; and his subjects conferred on him the title of the Blessed. He died, universally regretted, 1472.

AMADUZZI, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a learned Roman of the 18th century; inspector of the printing office of the Propaganda at Rome.

AMALA, FRANCIS, a Spanish lawyer of much reputation, and professor of legal science at Salamanca, but afterwards a counsellor at Valladolid, where he died, 1640.

AMAK, or ABULNAGIE ALBOKHARI, a Persian poet in the 5th century, entertained at the court of sultan Khedar Khan, who instituted an academy of poets, of which he made Amak president. His chief poem is the "History of the Loves of Joseph and Zoleiskah."

AMALARIUS, FORTUNATUS, archbishop of Treves in 810. He established Christianity in Saxony, consecrated a church at Hamburgh, and was sent ambassador in 813 to Constantinople by Charlemagne. Died, 814.

AMALTHEUS, ATTILIUS, made archbishop of Athens by Paul V., who sent him nuncio to Cologne. Died, 1600.

AMALTHEUS, JEROME, an Italian physician and poet of some repute; born, 1507; and died, 1574.

AMALTHEUS, JOHN BAPTIST, brother of the above, was born, 1525; attended the Venetian ambassador to England, and, on his return, was made secretary to pope Pius IV. His Latin poems were printed 1550; and he died, 1573.

AMALTHEUS, CORNELIUS, another brother of the above, was also eminent in physic and poetry.

AMAND, MARK ANTHONY GERARD, Sieur de St., a French poet, born at Rouen, 1594, and died, 1661. He was one of the first members of the French academy, and distinguished himself in amatory and comic poetry.

AMAR DURIVIER, J. A., born in 1765; author of a great variety of literary works, translations from Gay, Terence, Lucan, &c.

AMARA-SINGHA, a Hindoo author of great antiquity, who compiled a dictionary of the Sanscrit language, part of which was published at Rome, 1798. An entire manuscript copy of the original is in the royal library at Paris, written in the century preceding the birth of Christ.

AMARETTI, Abbé C., a Milanese mineralogist, born in 1743; author of "Viaggio di Trilaghi," "Memoirs of Leonardo da Vinci," &c. &c. He was a knight of Napoleon's order of the Iron Crown.

AMASEO, ROMULUS, an eminent teacher of the belles lettres at Padua, where he had himself completed his education. Removing to Bologna, where he married, he acquired so high a reputation that he was admitted to the citizenship. His celebrity at length caused him to be invited to Rome by Paul III., by whom he was employed in various embassies; and by Julius III. he was appointed secretary of the briefs. He translated Pausanias and the Cyrus of Xenophon into Latin; and published a volume of his own Latin speeches. Born, 1489; died, 1552.

AMATI, a celebrated violin maker of Cremona, who lived about the year 1600.

AMATUS, a Portuguese Jew, born, 1511, at Castel Bianco. He studied medicine with success at the university of Salamanca, and afterwards gave lectures on the science at Ferrara, Ancona, and other places. He published two treatises on subjects connected with his profession.

AMAURI, DE CHARTRES, a French visionary of the 13th century, who maintained the eternity of matter, and that religion had three epochs, agreeable to the three persons of the Trinity. His opinions were condemned by the council of Paris, 1209, and some of his followers burnt. To avoid a similar fate, he renounced his errors, but died of vexation.

AMBERGER, CHRISTOPHER, a painter of Nuremberg in the 16th century, was a disciple of Hans Holbein. His principal work is the history of Joseph, in twelve pictures. Amberger was likewise a good engraver in wood. Died, 1550.

AMBOISE, FRANCIS, a French writer, educated in the college of Navarre, and afterwards an advocate in the parliament of Paris, and counsellor of state. He published several poetical pieces in French and Latin, but is chiefly known as the collector and editor of the works of the celebrated Abelard. He died about 1612.

AMBOISE, GEORGE D', a French cardinal and minister of state, born of a noble family, 1460. He became successively bishop of Montauban, archbishop of Narbonne, and lastly of Rouen. Louis XII. made him prime minister, and he soon acquired great popularity by taking off the taxes which had been usually levied on the people at the accession of every new monarch. The king, by his advice, undertook the conquest of the Milanese, which succeeded. Soon after this, he was appointed the pope's legate in France, with the dignity of cardinal, and in that capacity effected a great reform among the religious orders. He died in 1510.

AMBOISE, AMERY D', a famous French admiral, and brother of the above, who gained a splendid victory over the sultan of Egypt, in 1510.

AMBOISE, MICHAEL D', a natural son of Amboise, admiral of France, born at Naples, and died in great poverty, 1547. He was the author of numerous poems in the French language, which he published under the name of the Signor de Chavillon.

AMBROGI, ANTOINE, a Roman Jesuit and poet, was born in 1712. He translated Virgil and some of the works of Voltaire into Italian. Died, 1788.

AMBROGIO, TESCO, one of the most celebrated among the early Italian orientologists, was born at Pavia, in 1469, and died, 1540.

AMBROSE, St., bishop of Milan, was born, 340, at Arles, in Gallia Narbonensis, of which province his father was licutenant. While yet a youth he pleaded causes with so much eloquence, that Probus, prefect of Italy, chose him one of his council, and afterwards nominated him governor of Milan, which office he held five years. In 374, Auxentius, bishop of Milan, died; and so fierce was the contest in the election of a successor to the vacant see, that the governor was called upon to quell the tumult. This he attempted by persuasion in the great church; and at the conclusion of his address, a voice in the crowd exclaimed, "Ambrose is bishop." This circumstance was considered as of divine direction, and Ambrose was declared to be the object not only of the popular choice, but of divine selection. His first efforts were directed to the extermination of Arianism, which was then making great progress. He also successfully resisted the Pagans, who were attempting to restore their ancient worship. When Maximinus invaded Italy, and actually entered Milan, Ambrose remained at his post, to assuage the calamities produced by the invading army. When, in consequence of a tumult at Thessalonica, Theodosius sent an order for a general massacre, Ambrose repaired to the emperor, remonstrated with him on his barbarity, and prevailed on him to promise that the command should be revoked. The mandate was, however, carried into execution, and 7000 persons were slaughtered in cold blood. Shortly afterwards, when Theodosius, in the anguish of self-reproach, was about to enter the great church of Milan, Ambrose met him at the porch, and sternly forbade him to appear in the holy place. The emperor pleaded the example of David:—"You have imitated David in his crime, imitate him in his repentance," was the reply; and Theodosius was compelled, not only to perform a penance, but to sign an edict, which ordained that an interval of thirty days should pass before any sentence of death or of confiscation should be executed. He died at Milan, in 397.

AMBROSINI, AMBROZIO, a Ferrarese; author of several oratorios, canzoni, and sonnets; died in 1700.

AMBROSINI, GIULIO, a Mantuan, born in 1580; author of a work on Demonology.

AMBROSIUS AURELIANUS, king of the Britons. He came from Armorica to assist in expelling the Saxons, who had been invited over by Vortigern; and on the death of that monarch the sovereignty was invested in him. Died, at Winchester, in 508.

AMELHON, HUBERT PASCAL, a learned Frenchman, born, 1730; author of "Histoire du Bas Empire," of a celebrated work on the Commerce of the Egyptians, and of "Researches into the Mechanical Arts of the Ancients." Died, 1811.

AMELIA, ANNE, princess of Prussia, sister of Frederic the Great; born, 1723; and died, 1787. She was distinguished by her taste for the arts, and set to music "The Death of the Messiah," by Ramlar.

AMELIA, duchess dowager of Saxe Weimar, born, 1739; duchess of Brunswick and Luneburg. At the age of 17 she married, and in 1757 gave birth to a son, but lost the duke, her husband, the year following. In the discharge of her duties as regent she was most exemplary; and liberally patronised men of learning and genius, among whom were Wieland, Goethe, Schiller, and Herder. Died, 1807.

AMELIA, youngest child of George III. and Queen Charlotte; a princess who in mind and manners was amiable and accomplished, and whose taste for the fine arts was only equalled by her fervent piety and pure benevolence. She possessed in the highest degree the affection of her royal father, and her death is supposed to have had the most serious effect upon the state of his mind. Born, 1783; died, 1810.

AMELOT, N., a French minister of state in 1788, who was accused of persecuting one Latude, as the agent of M. Pompadour, during the ancient regime. For some offence to the republicans, he was imprisoned in the Luxemburg, where his life was saved and prolonged by a young female, who avowed a passion for him; but at length he died in the prison. His victim, Latude, on escaping from the Bastille, brought an action of damages, and recovered from Amelot's heirs.

AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAYE, NICHOLAS, a French historian of the 17th century. He resided for some time at Venice, as secretary to the French embassy, and wrote a history of its government. He also translated the "Prince" (by Machiavel) and other Italian works into French. Died, 1708.

AMELUNGHI, JEROME, a Pisan poet, preceding Tasso in the mock-heroic style; author of "La Gigantea del Foraboseo," in 1547.

AMENTA, N., an admired Neapolitan poet, born in 1659; author of "La Costanza," "La Forza," "La Carlotta," "La Gemelle," comedies, &c. &c.

AMERBACH, JOHN, a printer of Basle, in the 15th century; the first who used the Roman type instead of Gothic and Italian. Died, 1515.

AMERBACH, BONIFACE, son of the above, syndic of Basle; an intimate friend of Erasmus. Died, 1562.

AMERICUS VESPUCCIUS, or, more properly, AMERIGO VESPUCCI, an eminent navigator, was born at Florence, in 1461. After receiving a liberal education, he was sent by his father to Spain for the purpose of conducting his commercial affairs; and, being at Seville when Columbus was making preparations for his second voyage, he resolved to quit mercantile pursuits, and enter on the career of discovery. His first expedition to the new continent was in 1499, under the command of Ojeda, a year after the discovery and examination of that part of the coast by Columbus. After this he entered the service of king Emanuel of Portugal, and made two voyages in Portuguese ships; the first in 1501; the second in 1503. The object of this last voyage was to find a westerly passage to Malacca. He arrived at Brazil, and discovered the Bay of All Saints. In 1505, he again entered the service of the king of Spain, but made no more voyages, as appears from memoranda, showing that he was at Seville till 1508, at which time he was appointed principal pilot. His duties were to prepare charts, and prescribe routes for vessels in their voyages to the new world, which soon received his name. This honour certainly belonged to Columbus rather than to Amerigo, for the prior discovery of the continent by the former is not to be questioned. He died in 1516.

AMES, FISHER, an American political writer. In 1788 he became a member of the house of representatives, and distinguished himself as a politician. He retired from professional business in 1796, but was chosen president of Harvard College. The works of Mr. Ames were published at Boston, 1809. Born, 1753; died, 1804.

AMES, JOSEPH, the celebrated historian of British typography, was born at Yarmouth, 1689, and died, 1759. His father apprenticed him to a plane-maker in London; and, after serving out his time, he became a ship-chandler at Wapping, which business, notwithstanding his antiquarian pursuits, he carried on until his death. He early discovered a taste for English history and antiquities; and brought out, in 1749, after a labour of 25 years, "Typographical Antiquities;" being an historical account of printing in England, with some memoirs of ancient printers, and a register of the books printed by them from 1471 to 1600; with an appendix concerning printing in Scotland and Ireland to the same time.

AMES, WILLIAM, an English divine of the time of James I. and Charles I. He was author of a vast number of controversial treatises, but is now chiefly known by his "Medulla Theologica" and "Treatise on Conscience." Died, 1633.

AMHERST, JEFFERY, Lord, a distinguished British officer, was descended from an ancient Kentish family, near Sevenoaks, where he was born, 1717. He entered into the army in 1731, and became aide-de-camp to Lord Ligonier, with whom he served at the battles of Rocoux, Dettingen, and Fontenoy. In 1758 he was sent to America, where he captured Louisbourg, and all its dependencies in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This was followed by the reduction of Fort du Quesne, Niagara, and Ticonderoga, which paved the way for the entire conquest of Canada. For these services, General Amherst received the thanks of parliament, and the order of the Bath. In 1763 he was made governor of Virginia; and, in 1776, created Baron Amherst. In 1795, he resigned the commandership-in-chief to the Duke of York, and the following year received the rank of field-marshal. He died in 1797.

AMHURST, NICHOLAS, an English political and miscellaneous writer, born at Marden, Kent, 1701, and died, 1742. He was author of the "Terræ Filius," a satirical work on the university of Oxford; and published, with the assistance of Pulteney and Lord Bolingbroke, the work by which he is most known, entitled "The Craftsman."

AMICO, ANTONIO, a Sicilian priest, and canon of the cathedral of Palermo, distinguished by some considerable works in history and antiquities; for which Philip IV.

of Spain made him historiographer royal. Died, 1641.

AMICO, VITO MARIA, a professor of theology in the 18th century; principally known by his Sicilian antiquities.

AMICONI, GIACOMO, a Venetian historical and portrait painter, who visited England in 1720. He afterwards went to Spain, was appointed portrait painter to the king, and died there, 1752.

AMILCAR, a Carthaginian general, of great valour, was descended from the ancient kings of Tyre; and being early entrusted with military command, he distinguished himself in the wars of Carthage, particularly against the Romans, towards whom he bore an implacable hatred. He was the father of Hannibal.

AMIOT, Father, one of the most learned of the French missionaries to China, born at Toulon, 1718, and died at Peking, 1794, aged 77. This zealous Jesuit, who arrived at Macao in 1750, was invited to Peking, in 1751, by the emperor of China, and remained in that capital 43 years. By continued application he became acquainted with the Chinese and Tartar languages; and, from time to time, remitted to France the result of his labours, which afterwards appeared in several publications.

AMINTA, T., author of the mock-heroic poem, "La Nanea," in 1566.

AMMAN. There were three noted physicians of this name. The first, JOHN CONRAD, a native of Schaffhausen, was born, 1669, and died, 1724, at Marmund, in the Netherlands. He was chiefly distinguished by his success in teaching persons born deaf and dumb to speak.—His son, JOHN, was a fellow of the Royal Society in London, and a member of the Academy of Sciences at Petersburg, where he lectured on botany, and acquired great reputation; he died, 1740.—The third, PAUL, was a native of Breslaw, who settled in 1674 at Leipsic, where he gave lectures on physiology, natural history, and botany; he died, 1691.

AMMAN, JUSTUS, a famous engraver and painter at Zurich, in the 16th century. He painted with great brilliancy on glass, but excelled chiefly in engraving, both on wood and copper. Died, 1591.

AMMANATI, BARTOLOMEO, a Florentine architect and sculptor in the 16th century, whose chief performances are the colossal statue of Neptune at Venice and the statue of Hercules at Padua.

AMMIANUS, MARCELLINUS, a Latin historian of the 4th century, born at Antioch. He wrote the Roman history from the reign of Nerva to the death of Valens, in 31 books, of which only 18 are extant; and died about 390.

AMMIRATO, SCIPIO, an esteemed Neapolitan poet, born in 1531; author of a "History of Florence," which he wrote at the instance of the grand-duke Cosmo; of the "Argomenti" to "Orlando Furioso;" and of numerous prose tracts, political and historical. Died, 1601.

AMMON, ANDREAS, a Latin poet, born at Lucca, in Italy, of whose genius Erasmus made frequent and honourable mention. He was sent to England in an official character, by pope Leo X., and was appointed Latin secretary to Henry VIII. He subsequently became prebendary of Salisbury, having previously received some valuable church preferment. Died, 1517.

AMMONIUS. There were two philosophers of this name, of the Peripatetic school; one flourished at Athens about the year 60, and the other taught at Alexandria in the 6th century. The latter was a disciple of Proclus, and obtained great reputation as a preceptor.

AMMONIUS, a surgeon of Alexandria, who invented a method of extracting the stone from the bladder, which procured him the surname of the Lithotomist.

AMMONIUS, LEVINUS, a monk of Flanders, much esteemed by Erasmus for his learning and piety. Died, 1556.

AMMONIUS SACCAS, a philosopher of the 3rd century, founder of the Neo-platonic sect, was born of Christian parents at Alexandria, and died about 243.

AMONTONS, GUILLAUME, a French mathematician, born in Normandy, 1663, and died, 1705. He devoted himself to the study of natural philosophy; and constructed a new thermometer, hygroscope, and other philosophical instruments.

AMORE, S. D., a Sicilian poet, born in 1644; author of "L' Augusto" and "Il Sesostri," tragedies, &c. &c.

AMORETTI, CHARLES, a mineralogist, born at Oneglia, in the Milanese, 1740, and died, 1816. He became one of the keepers of the Ambrosian library, at Milan, and published, in Italian, "A Tour from Milan to the Three Lakes of Como, Lugano, and Maggiore." He composed also a great number of memoirs and tracts, for which he was rewarded with the decoration of the order of the Iron Crown.

AMORY, THOMAS, a dissenting minister of eminence, born at Taunton, 1701, and died, 1774; leaving behind several volumes of sermons, and also the lives of Grove, Benson, and Chandler.

AMORY, THOMAS, a singular character, was son of Counsellor Amory, appointed by William III. secretary for the forfeited estates in Ireland. He led a very reclusive life in his house in Orchard Street, Westminster, carefully shunning company, and never stirring out till the evening. He was the author of "John Bunce," "Memoirs," and other eccentric books. Died, 1789, aged 97.

AMPERE, ANDRÉ MARIE, whose name is imperishably connected with the great discoveries in electro-magnetism, was born at Lyons, 1775. In 1804 he was nominated professor in the Polytechnic School of Paris; and here, in connection with Oersted, Faraday, and other distinguished men of science, with whom he was in constant correspondence, he paved the way for those brilliant discoveries that have already issued in the electric telegraph, and promise an illimitable extension of the boundaries of science. Died, 1836.

AMURATH II., emperor of the Turks, was son of Mahomet I., whom he succeeded in 1421. He was an exceedingly warlike prince, and among his numerous victories was that of Varna, in 1444, when the Christians were defeated, and numbered among their slain the king of Hungary. George Castriot, celebrated by the name of Scanderbeg, at length put a period to the career of Amurath, who died of chagrin at his reverses, in 1451.

AMURATH III. succeeded his father, Selim II., in 1575. On his accession, he caused his five brothers to be murdered. Died, 1596.

AMURATH IV. succeeded his uncle Mustapha in 1622. He recovered Bagdad from the Persians in 1637; after which he put 30,000 of his prisoners to the sword. Died, 1640.

AMYN AHMED, a learned Persian of the 17th century, who wrote an elaborate work, entitled "The Seven Climates, or a Geographical Description of the East."

AMYOT, JAMES, bishop of Auxerre, and grand almoner of France, born at Melun, of obscure parents, 1514, and died, 1593. He left the university of Paris at the age of 23, and was recommended to the Duchess of Berri, by whose means he became professor of Greek and Latin at Bourges. He was afterwards appointed preceptor to the sons of Henry II., and, while engaged in this employment, he translated the Lives of Plutarch. Charles IX. gave him the abbey of Cornelius de Compeigne, and conferred on him the high offices above mentioned.

AMYRAUT, MOSES, a learned French theologian, born at Bourgueil, 1596, and died, 1664; very generally respected, not only for his moderation and abilities, but also for his beneficence and charity. His voluminous works are chiefly theological.

AMYRUTZES, a Peripatetic philosopher, born at Trebizond. He was high in favour with the emperor David, and accompanied that prince to Constantinople, whither the Turks carried him after their reduction of Trebizond in 1461. Here he deserted both his sovereign and his religion, and assuming the name of Mahomet Beg, and embracing the Mahometan creed, he was much employed by Mahomet II.

ANACHARSIS, a Scythian philosopher, flourished about 600 years B.C. He travelled to Athens, where he was much esteemed by Solon, and was the only stranger the Athenians ever admitted to the honour of citizenship. On his return to Scythia he attempted to introduce some of the institutions and customs of Greece; but while in the act of performing a rite to Cybele, he was killed by an arrow.

ANACLETUS, or CLETUS, reckoned by Roman Catholics the third pope, succeeded Sinus as bishop of the church of the Romans in 79, and held that office till his death in 92, when he was enrolled among the saints and martyrs.

ANACREON, a famous Greek lyric poet, born at Teos, Ionia, about the 6th century B.C. He was entertained by Polycrates at Samos, and afterwards lived with Hipparchus, at Athens, whence he returned to Teos, and remained there till the revolt of Histæus, when he removed to Abdera, where he was choked by a grape-stone in the act of drinking. His poems are exquisitely beautiful, lively, and natural. There have been several English translations, but the one in highest esteem is by Moore.

ANARIA, G. L., a noble Calabrian cosmographer, born in 1561; author of a celebrated work on demonology, published at Venice, "apud Aldum," 1589.

ANASTASIUS I., emperor of the East, born in Illyricum, 430, and died, 518. He was elevated to the throne in 491.

ANASTASIUS II., raised to the throne of Constantinople from the condition of secretary, 713, was a man of learning, and a zealous Catholic, yet he did not neglect the defence of the empire, then threatened by the Saracens. He was put to death by Leo, who had usurped the crown.

ANASTASIUS I., pope, a Roman, succeeded Siricius in 323, and died, 402. His epistle to John, bishop of Jerusalem, who had written to him in behalf of Rufinus, a presbyter of Aquileia, is extant, together with Rufinus' apology.

ANASTASIUS II., son of a Roman citizen, succeeded pope Gelasius in 496, and died in 498.

ANASTASIUS III., a Roman by birth, was raised to the papal chair, after Sergius, 911, and died two years afterwards.

ANASTASIUS IV. succeeded Eugenius III., 1153, and died the following year. Ten letters of this pope are preserved in the Collections of Councils by Labbé and Harduin, and in Du Chesne's History of France.

ANASTASIUS, THEOPOLITANUS, bishop of Antioch in the 6th century, banished by Justin the Younger for holding the opinion that the body of Christ was incapable of suffering even before the resurrection. He was afterwards restored to his see by Mauritius, and died, 599.

ANASTASIUS, called BIBLIOTHECARIUS, a Roman abbot, of Greek origin, of the 9th century; author of "Liber Pontificalis." He was principal librarian in the Vatican.

ANATOLIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, who contended against pope Leo for the equality of the two churches. Died, 458.

ANAXAGORAS, of Clazomenæ, a celebrated philosopher, born B.C. 500. He inherited a considerable estate in his own country, which he relinquished to indulge his thirst for knowledge at Athens, where he applied to the study of poetry and eloquence, and taught philosophy, having had among his pupils Euripides, the tragedian, and Pericles, the orator. His reputation, however, created him enemies, and he was condemned to death on a charge of atheism, but the sentence was commuted into banishment. Anaxagoras then withdrew to Lampsacus, where he taught philosophy undisturbed until his death, which happened in his 72d year, B.C. 428.

ANAXANDRIDES, a Greek comic poet, said to have been the first who introduced love adventures on the stage. He was a native of Rhodes, and starved to death at Athens for libelling the government, B.C. 400.

ANAXARCHUS, a Grecian philosopher of the Eleatic sect of Leucippus. He was the friend and companion of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied on his Asiatic expedition, and who admitted him to great freedom.

ANAXIMANDER, the friend and disciple of Thales, of Miletus, born, B.C. 610. He had a considerable knowledge of astronomy and geography, and was the first who noticed the obliquity of the ecliptic; he also taught that the moon receives her light from the sun, and that the earth is globular; and to him is ascribed the invention of the sphere and geographical charts.

ANAXIMENES, the pupil and successor of Anaximander. He maintained that air is the first principle of all things; and Pliny attributes to him the invention of the sundial.

ANAXIMENES, of Lampsacus, a Greek historian and philosopher, son of Aristocles. He was one of the preceptors of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied in most of his campaigns, and afterwards wrote the history of his reign, and that of his father Philip.

ANCIIETA, Jos., a Portuguese Jesuit, surnamed the Apostle of the New World; born at Teneriffe, 1538, and died, 1597. At the age of 28, he went to Brazil, where he founded the first college for the conversion of the savage natives.

ANCHWITZ, N., the Cracovian nuncio to the Polish Diet; a man as talented as base; who sold Poland to Russia and her partitionary colleagues, in 1782, and was hanged the year after, in an insurrection of the people.

ANCILLON, J. P. F., a celebrated historian, born in 1766; author of "Tableau des Révolutions du Système Politique," &c.

ANCILLON, DAVID, a learned French divine, born at Metz, 1617, and died, 1692. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he retired from Meaux, of which he had been for some time the pastor, to Frankfort, and thence to Hanau, where he attained to great celebrity by his theological writings and discoveries; and he afterwards accepted a situation in the French church at Berlin. His eldest son, Charles Ancillon, obtained through his influence the office of historiographer to the king of Prussia, and was afterwards made inspector of the French courts of justice. He was a man of much general reading, wrote several treatises, &c., and died, 1715.

ANKARSTROM, or ANCKARSTROM, JOHN JAMES, a Swedish military officer, who assassinated king Gustavus III. at a masked ball; for which crime he was scourged on three successive days, had his right hand cut off, and was then decapitated. Born, 1758; executed, 1792.

ANCONA, CYRIACO D', an Italian antiquary, collector of inscriptions, and author of "Itinerarium Illyricum;" born in 1420.

ANCOURT, FLORENT CARTON D', a celebrated French actor and dramatic writer, born at Fontainebleau, 1661, and died, 1726. He was educated in the Jesuits' College at Paris, and was admitted an advocate at the age of 17; but, falling in love with an actress, he married her, went upon the stage, and began to write for the theatres. Retiring from this employment in 1718, to his estate in Berry, he applied himself almost wholly to devotion, and composed a translation of the Psalms in verse, and a sacred tragedy. He was the author of 52 dramatic pieces, of which about one half still keep the stage.

ANCUS MARTIUS, fourth king of Rome, elected on the death of Tullus Hostilius, B.C. 634. During his reign, Rome was enlarged by taking in the walls of the Aventine Hill, and occupying the hill Janiculum, beyond the Tiber. He also built the bridge called Sublicius, erected a public prison in the forum, extended the territories of Rome quite to the sea, and built the town and port of Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber. Ancus died after a prosperous reign of 24 years.

ANDERSON, ADAM, a native of Scotland, was for many years a managing clerk in the South-Sea House, a trustee for the settlements in Georgia, and in the court of the Scotch corporation in London. He wrote a work on the Historical and Chronological Deduction of Trade and Commerce; and died, 1765, aged 75.

ANDERSON, ALEXANDER, an eminent scholar of the 17th century, born at Aberdeen, and afterwards professor of mathematics at Paris; author of various treatises principally connected with his favourite science.

ANDERSON, SIR EDMUND, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas under queen Elizabeth, to which situation he was promoted in 1582. He sat on the trials of the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots, and of Davidson, the secretary, for issuing the warrant under which she was executed. Anderson's Reports, folio, 1644, is still a book of authority. He was a native of Lincolnshire, and died, 1605.

ANDERSON, GEORGE, a native of Tundern, Sleswick. During 1644, and the six following years, he spent his time in travelling through the East, and visited the Arabias, Persia, India, China, the Japanese Islands, Tartary, and the Holy Land. The Duke of Holstein-Gottorp, on his return, having vainly endeavoured to induce him to commit his adventures to writing, employed his librarian, Olearius, to take down the account from his own mouth as he related them to his highness, the scribe being concealed behind the tapestry of the apartment. This work was afterwards published in Sleswick, 1669.

ANDERSON, GEORGE, a young man of extraordinary talents, born at Weston, Buckinghamshire, in 1760, and died, 1796. His parents were peasants, and he worked as a day-labourer in the fields; his genius, however, overcame every difficulty, and he attained of himself so great a knowledge of the mathematics, as procured him a clerk's place at the Board of Control, and afterwards the situation of accountant-gen. Mr. Anderson published a "General View of the Affairs of the East India Company, since the conclusion of the War in 1784;" and translated from the Greek of Archimedes, "Arenarius, or a Treatise on numbering the Sand."

ANDERSON, JAMES, an advocate at the Scottish bar, eminent for his learning and antiquarian research, born at Edinburgh, 1662, and died, 1798, through an apoplectic stroke. His first work, "An Essay, proving the Independence of the Crown of Scotland," published 1705, procured him the thanks of the Scottish parliament, under whose auspices he subsequently produced a series of the "Charters and Seals of the Scottish Monarchs from the earliest Antiquity down to the Union with England." But the book which gained him the greatest reputation was, "Selectus Diplomatum et Numismatum Scotiae Thesaurus."

ANDERSON, JAMES, a Scottish miscellaneous writer, born at Hearnston, near Edinburgh, 1739, and died, 1808. He published a series of "Essays on Planting," which procured him much reputation as an agriculturist; and, in 1780, the university of Aberdeen conferred on him the degree of LL.D. In 1783, he removed to Edinburgh, and projected the establishment of the North British Fisheries; for which purpose he was employed by government to survey the coast of Scotland, and received great commendation for his services. Dr. Anderson was the author of a number of publications chiefly on agricultural affairs; he also wrote for the Encyclopædia Britannica, and was a monthly reviewer.

ANDERSON, JOHN, F. R. S., professor of natural philosophy in the university of Glasgow, and founder of the useful institution in that city bearing his name, was born in 1726, at Roseneath, in Dumbartonshire. His great characteristic was an ardent desire for the instruction of his fellow-men, and he was indefatigable in studying and exemplifying the application of science to mechanical practice; for which purpose, in addition to his academical labours, he taught his anti-toga-class, as he called it, twice every week, during the session, to the end of his life. He died in 1796, directing by his will that the whole of his property should be devoted to the establishment of an educational institution in Glasgow, to be denominated Anderson's University, for the use of the un-academical classes; which may justly be considered as the parent of the various Mechanics' Institutions which have of late years arisen throughout the country.

ANDERSON, JOHN, son of a merchant at Hamburgh, of which city he himself became principal magistrate in 1725. He was employed in various negotiations to different European courts; and during his residence there, he cultivated an acquaintance with all whom he found distinguished for their literary attainments, and kept up a voluminous correspondence with them after his return. He died, 1743, aged 79. His principal work is, "The Natural History of Greenland, Davis's Straits, and the Countries situated in the Arctic Circle."

ANDERSON, LAWRENCE, one of the chief promoters of the reformation of religion in Sweden. He was chancellor to Gustavus Vasa; but having engaged in a conspiracy, he passed the years of life left to him by the king's clemency, in retirement. Died, 1552.

ANDERSON, ROBERT, M. D., a native of Carnwath, in Lanarkshire; author of numerous works, critical and biographical. Of those most highly valued are the following:—"Lives of the British Poets," in 14 vols., published in 1795; "Works and Life of Tobias Smollett;" and the "Life of Samuel Johnson." He was the friend and patron of genius wherever it appeared; to him Campbell dedicated his "Pleasures of Hope," as it was chiefly owing to him that that matchless poem was first brought before the world. Died, 1830.

ANDOCIDES, one of the ten Greek orators, whose lives are written by Plutarch; he flourished, B. C. 468.

ANDRE', C. C., a laborious German author; born in 1763; editor of the "Compendiose Bibliothek," 1789; and many works on history, botany, mineralogy, and geology.

ANDRE', J., born in 1741; one of the most celebrated German composers. Died, 1800. His son, J. A., was the first to employ lithography to the printing of music, 1801.

ANDRE', B., an ex-jesuit, born in 1745; editor of "Gazette Littéraire de Wurzburg," and author of many works, chiefly Latin, on Pedagogy, &c. &c.

ANDRE', JOHN, a major in the British service in the American war; who, being led to offer his services to negotiate between the noted General Arnold and general Sir Henry Clinton, was taken prisoner by the Americans within their lines; and, owing to his disguise and the nature of his mission, was tried and executed as a spy, Oct. 2, 1780. On going to the place of execution, he said, with concern, "Must I die in this manner?" Being told it was unavoidable, he replied, "I am reconciled to my fate, but not to the mode; it will, however, be but a momentary pang." His fortitude excited the admiration, and melted the hearts of all the spectators. When asked if he had anything to say, he replied, "Nothing, but to request that you will witness to the world that I die like a brave man." A monument is erected to him in Westminster Abbey.

ANDRE', Y'VES MARI, a French Jesuit, and professor of mathematics at Caen; author of "Traité sur l'Homme," &c. Born, 1675; died, 1764.

ANDREA, CAVAL CANTI, a noble Italian, and voluminous author, remarkable for the copiousness and elegance of his style. He died in 1672, and left a collection of novels, an Italian biography, and many minor poems.

ANDREA, CECCHENI, a Tuscan; author of "Troja Distrutta," a tragedy, and several minor pieces, published in 1663.

ANDREA, SALVADORI, a Tuscan poet, born about 1600; left three volumes of comedies, masks, operas, and poems—"Il Medoro," "La Flora," "Le Fonti di Ardenna," &c.

ANDREADA, FERDINAND, a Portuguese admiral, who, in 1518, commanded the first European fleet that ever visited the coast of China.

ANDREÆ, JOHN GERHARD REINHARD, an ingenious naturalist of Hanover, born, 1724, and died, 1793. He published a "Tour in Switzerland," and a "Treatise on the several kinds of Earth in Hanover."

ANDREAS, JAMES, a German reformer, born at Wirtemberg, 1528, and died, 1590. He was at the diets of Ratibon and Augsburg; secretary at the conference of Worms; and afterwards made chancellor and rector of the university of Tubingen.

ANDREAS, JOHN, bishop of Aleria, in Corsica, born, 1417, and died, 1475. He was a zealous promoter of the art of printing, and superintended the impressions of several classical works at Rome.

ANDREINI, FRANCIS, a celebrated comic writer of Pistoia; author of "Le Bravure del Capitano Spavento," &c. Died, 1616.

ANDREINI, ISABELLA, wife of the preceding, was a celebrated and beautiful improvisatore, comedian, and comic writer. She displayed great precocity of genius, was well versed in philosophy and languages, sang and played with exquisite taste, and was of irreproachable morals. Born at Padua, in 1562; died at Lyons, in 1604.

ANDREINI, JOHN BAPTIST, son of Francis; and author of several dramas and poems, among which is "L'Adamo," a mystery, which suggested (as it is said) to Milton, while at Milan, his Paradise Lost.

ANDRELINI, PUBLIO FESTO, a native of Italy, poet laureat to Louis XII., of France, and professor of poetry and philosophy in the university of Paris. Died, 1518.

ANDREOSSI, FRANCIS, an eminent French engineer and mathematician, was born at Paris, in 1633. He assisted Riquet in forming the canal of Languedoc, the sole merit of which stupendous work has been unjustly claimed for him. Died, 1688.

ANDREOSSI, ANTHONY FRANCIS, Count, a distinguished French military officer and engineer, and eminent also as a diplomatist, was descended from the subject of the preceding article, and born in Languedoc, 1761. He was a lieutenant of artillery at twenty; served with distinction in Italy and Egypt; and had reached the rank of inspector-general of the artillery when Napoleon ascended the throne. He was successively ambassador to London, Vienna, and Constantinople; and received many marks of the imperial favour. On the restoration of Louis XVIII. in 1814, Andreossi was recalled from his embassy to the Porte, and presented with the cross of St. Louis; but on the return of Napoleon from Elba, he again attached himself to his old master; and was one of the commissioners chosen to treat with the allies by the provisional government. He wrote "Histoire Générale du Canal du Midi;" the "Campaign of the Gallo-Batavian Army on the Maine and Rednitz," &c. Died, 1828.

ANDREOZZI, G., one of the most celebrated composers of Italy. Born, 1767.

ANDRES, DON JUAN, a Spanish author, celebrated in the controversy respecting the Amalfian origin of the mariner's compass; author of a work on the "Origin of Letters," in Italian, and of another in Spanish, entitled "Cartas Familiares a se Hermano."

ANDRES DES VOSGES, J. F., born in 1744; author of "Le Tartare," "Paris," and many translations from English works.

ANDREW, JOHN, a learned bishop of Aleria, in Corsica; and editor of the works of Herodotus, Livy, and other classics. He died, 1493.

ANDREW, bishop of Crete, born at Damascus, and died about 720. He wrote commentaries on the Scriptures, &c., published at Paris, 1644.

ANDREW, of Ratisbon, an historian of the 15th century, who wrote a chronicle of the dukes of Bavaria, and a history of Bohemia.

ANDREW, of Pisa, a sculptor and architect, born in 1270, and died in 1345. He built several grand structures at Florence and Venice, and also obtained great reputation as a painter, poet, and musician.

ANDREW, of Cyrene, an impostor who, in the reign of Trajan, had the art to deceive his fellow-countrymen, the Jews, into a belief that he was ordained to be their liberator. They accordingly revolted, and horrible cruelties were committed on both sides before they were reduced to obedience.

ANDREWS, HENRY, a self-taught mathematician, born of poor parents at Frinton, near Grantham, 1743, and died, Jan. 26, 1820. Having, while in a menial employment, occupied his leisure moments in the study of astronomical science, he attained therein great proficiency, and for more than 40 years was a computer of the Nautical Ephemeris, and the calculator of Moore's Almanack.

ANDREWS, JAMES PETTIT, an English miscellaneous writer, youngest son of Joseph Andrews, Esq., of Newbury, Berks, where he was born, 1737, and died at Brompton, 1797. He received a private education, and was early distinguished by an attachment to literature and the fine arts, to the former of which he may be said to have been professionally attached until his death.

ANDREWS, LANCELOT, an eminent English divine, bishop of Winchester in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., born in London, 1565; died at Winchester House, Southwark, 1626, and buried in the church of St. Saviour, in which an elegant monument was erected to his memory.

ANDREWS, MILES PETER, a dramatic writer, son of a merchant in the city of London, in whose counting-house he was brought up; but having a decided turn for theatrical amusements, and coming into a considerable fortune by the death of an elder brother, he bade adieu to mercantile pursuits, and amused himself by writing for the stage. He died suddenly in 1814.

ANDRIEU, BERTRAND, a medallie engraver, born at Bordeaux, 1761, and died at Paris, 1822; considered as the restorer of the art of engraving medals, which had declined after the reign of Louis XIV.

ANDRIEUX, F. G. T. S., a clever and voluminous French author, dramatist, poet, and politician, born in 1755. He was member of the legislative assembly in 1793; opposed to arbitrary power, he advocated warmly the liberty of the press and the system of "Ecoles Primaires." He was one of the projectors and chief contributors of the "Decade Philosophique," and was an active member of the Institute and the Académie Française. Among his dramatic pieces are "Anaximander," "Les Etourdis," "Le Vieux Fat," and "Le Jeune Homme à l'Épreuve," &c. &c.

ANDRISCUS, a man of mean extraction, who, pretending to be the son of Perseus, the last king of Macedonia, took the name of Philip, and was called Pseudo-Philipus. Having obtained a signal victory over Juventus, the Roman prætor, he assumed the kingly power; but in the end was conquered, and served to grace the triumph of Metellus, before whom he walked in chains.

ANDROMACHUS, of Crete, physician to Nero; he wrote, in elegiac verse, a description of the Theriaca, a medicine which he invented, and dedicated it to the emperor.

ANDRONICUS, of Cyresthes, a Greek architect, who built the famous octagonal temple of the winds, at Athens, which, till lately, was used as a mosque by the Turks. He is also said to be the inventor of the weathercock.

ANDRONICUS, LIVIVS, the oldest dramatic author in the Latin language, who flourished about 240 years B.C. Nearly all his works are lost.

ANDRONICUS, of Rhodes, a follower of Aristotle, and to whom we are indebted for restoring and publishing the works of that philosopher, n. c. 63.

ANDRONICUS, of Thessalonica, a learned Greek of the 15th century, whose reputation was great at Rome and Florence, where he taught. Died, 1478.

ANDRONICUS I., emperor of the East, was the son of Isaac, and grandson of Alexis Comnenus. He was of an active martial mind, and eloquent; but had many vices. On the death of his cousin, the emperor Manuel, in 1163, he was chosen partner in the government with Alexis II., who, being a mere youth, soon fell a sacrifice to his coadjutor's thirst of power; but the people, exasperated at his various cruelties, proclaimed Isaac Angelus emperor, put out the eyes of Andronicus, led him through the streets in derision, and at length stabbed him, aged 73, A. D. 1185.

ANDRONICUS PALÆOLOGUS II., surnamed the Elder, succeeded Michael VIII., in 1283; but was glad to find refuge in a cloister, in 1325, his grandson having driven him from the throne.

ANDROUET DU CERCEAU, JAMES, an eminent French architect of the 16th century, who designed the Pont Neuf, and commenced the building of it in 1578. He was also employed, in 1596, to continue the gallery of the Louvre; but was obliged to quit France during the persecution of the Protestants, and no further account of him is on record.

ANDRY, NICHOLAS, a physician and medical author, of Lyons, in the 17th century; afterwards dean of the faculty of medicine in the royal college of Paris, where he also filled a professor's chair. He died in 1742.

ANEURIN, a British poet and chieftain of the 6th century, supposed by some authors to be the same with Gildas, the historian; he took a part in the battle of Cattraeth, which he made the subject of a poem; this, and "Odes of the Months," form the whole of his known works; and are to be found in the Welsh Archaeology. Died, 570.

ANFOSSI, PASQUALE, an Italian musician, born at Naples, 1736; died, 1795. He was composer to the theatre at Rome, and afterwards travelled to Paris, where he presented to the Academy of Music his "Inconnue," adapted to French words.

ANGELI, BONAVENTURA, a celebrated historian, of Parma; died in 1576.

ANGELI, PETER, a distinguished modern Latin poet; born at Barga, Tuscany, 1517; died at Pisa, 1596.

ANGELICO, JOHN, an Italian painter; a Dominican; he painted the chapel of Nicholas V., who offered him the archbishopric of Florence, which he refused. Died, 1448.

ANGELIS, STEPHEN DE, an Italian mathematician; he was for some time a Jesuit, but quitted the order, and became a teacher of mathematics at Padua, where he died at the close of the 17th century.

ANGELO, FIORIOZZOLA, a Florentine poet, honoured by Clement VIIIth's friendship, and much esteemed; died in Rome, 1548; author of "Discorso degli Animalì," "I Lucidi," and "La Trinzuzia," comedies, and a great variety of other works. He is chiefly admired by his countrymen for the purity and beauty of his diction.

ANGELO, POLICIANO, born in 1454; author of numerous works, in prose and verse, translations from Greek and Latin; "Rusticus," "Orfeo Favola," &c.

ANGELO, MICHAEL DE BUONAROTTI, the descendant of a noble but reduced family in Tuscany, was born, in 1474, in the territory of Arezzo. He was endowed with extraordinary abilities, being incomparable as a painter, sculptor, and architect; while as a poet he was far above mediocrity. To record his great achievements here would be impossible. As a designer he is allowed to be without an equal, and his knowledge of anatomy was perfection itself. Many of the most splendid edifices in Italy owe their existence to his masterly hand; and as a painter, in his delineation of the grand and the terrible he has never been equalled. After a life of glory, spent in the most exalted pursuits, he died, immensely rich, at Rome, 1564, and was there buried; but the Grand-duke of Tuscany had his body removed to Florence, and re-interred with princely honours. Sir Joshua Reynolds, in a discourse to the students of the Royal Academy in 1790, speaking of Michael Angelo, emphatically exclaimed—"to kiss the hem of his garment, to catch the slightest of his perfections, would be glory and distinction enough for an ambitious man!"

ANGELONI, FRANCESCO, an Italian historian, born at Terni, and died at Rome, 1652; principally known by an elaborate work, published in 1685, on the history of Rome, which he illustrated by a reference to ancient medals.

ANGELUCCI, THEODORE, an Italian poet and physician, who held a professorship at Padua, was a member of the Academy at Venice, and principal physician at Montagnana, where he died, 1600.

ANGELUS, CHRISTOPHER, a Greek, who, being driven from his own country by the Turks, found an asylum in England in 1608; and, under the patronage of the Bishop of Norwich, he was placed in Trinity College, Cambridge, whence he removed to Balliol College, Oxford, where he was of great service to the junior students, and where he died, 1638. He published many works in Greek, English, and Latin.

ANGERSTEIN, JOHN JULIUS, a distinguished patron of the fine arts, born at St. Petersburg, 1735; died at Blackheath, Jan. 22. 1822. He came over to England under the patronage of the late Andrew Thompson, Esq., with whom he lived in partnership upwards of 50 years. Mr. Angerstein exhibited much public spirit on several occasions, and was the first who proposed a reward of 2000*l.* from the fund at Lloyd's to the inventor of the life-boats. His celebrated collection of paintings esteemed inferior to none of the same extent in Europe, was purchased by the English government for 60,000*l.*, and forms the nucleus of a national gallery.

ANGILBERT, ST., the son-in-law of Charlemagne, and afterwards abbot of St. Riquier. He had a great taste for poetry, but nothing remains of him except a history of his monastery. He died, 814.

ANGIOLELLO, JOHN MARIO, a Venetian historian of the 15th century, taken captive by the Turks, and made slave to Sultan Mustapha, whom he attended in an expedition to Persia, 1473, and wrote the history of Mahomet II., in the Turkish and Italian languages; also the history of Ussun Cassan. He died about 1530.

ANGOULEME, CHARLES DE VALOIS, Duke of, natural son of Charles IX.; born, 1575; and died, 1650. Catherine de Medici bequeathed to him her estates, but the will was set aside in favour of Margaret de Valois. Charles, however, retained the title of count d' Auvergne, and in 1619 was made duke of Angoulême. He gained great reputation as a military commander, but was twice charged with treason, and the second time condemned to death, which sentence was changed into perpetual imprisonment. He was, however, once more pardoned, and employed both in a military capacity and in various embassies; he also wrote his own memoirs.

ANGUIER, FRANCIS and MICHAEL, two sculptors, natives of Eu, Normandy. Francis, the eldest, was keeper of the royal cabinet of antiquities, and executed several great works, particularly the mausoleum of the Duke of Montmorency. Michael's best piece was a crucifix over the altar of the church of the Sorbonne. The former died, 1669; the latter, 1686.

ANGULLARA, GIOVANNI DELL', one of the most esteemed modern Italian poets, born in 1517; author of "Edipo, Tragedia." His translations of the "Euclid" and "Metamorphoses" are standard Italian works.

ANGUISCIOLA, SOPHONISBA, a famous Cremonese painter, born in 1550. Her style as an author is said to have been as admirable as her paintings.

ANICH, PETER, a native of Inspruck, son of a labourer, born, 1723, and died, 1766. His early genius being discovered by Father Hill, a Jesuit, he gave him instructions, and in a short time he became an able astronomer and mechanic, and constructed various mathematical instruments.

ANICHINI, LEWIS, a celebrated medallist. His chief work is a medal representing the interview of Alexander the Great and the High Priest at Jerusalem, which Michael Angelo pronounced to be the perfection of the art.

ANNA COMNENA, was the daughter of the emperor Alexius Comnenus I., at whose death she conspired to place the crown on the head of her husband, Nicephorus Briennius, but without success. She then turned her attention to literary pursuits, and wrote the "Alexiad," a history of her father's reign. Died, 1148.

ANNA IVANOWNA, empress of all the Russias, daughter of the czar Ivan Alexiowitch; born, 1693; succeeded to the crown on the death of Peter II., 1730; and died, 1740. During her reign, Russia was on a peaceable footing with all her neighbours, without engaging in any of their quarrels, except a war with the Ottoman Porte in 1737.

ANNE, of Austria, queen of France, eldest daughter of Philip III. of Spain; born, 1604; married to Louis XIII. of France, 1615, at whose death, 1643, she was declared sole regent during the minority of her son, Louis XIV., who assumed the reins of government, 1661. Anne then retired, passing the remainder of her life in pious exercises, and died in 1666.

ANNE, of Beaujeu, daughter of Louis XI. of France, and wife of Peter Beaujeu, duke of Bourbon; appointed by her father's will gouvernante during the minority of his son, Charles VIII. This preference excited a civil commotion, which was terminated by the defeat of the insurgent nobles, 1488. The princess held the reins with much firmness, and in general acted prudently. She died, 1522.

ANNE, of Brittany, queen of France, daughter and heiress of Francis II., duke of Brittany; born, 1476; married to Charles VIII., of France, 1491; and, on his death, 1498, to Louis XII.; and died, 1514. This princess first instituted the order of maids of honour to the queen, first had the prerogative of guards and gentlemen of her own, and was the first who gave audience to foreign ambassadors.

ANNE, of Cleves, daughter of John, third duke of Cleves, and wife of Henry VIII. of England, who divorced her. Died, 1557.

ANNE, queen of Great Britain, second daughter of James II., by his first wife, Anne Hyde, was born in 1664; married to Prince George of Denmark, 1683; succeeded to the crown on the death of William III., 1702; and died, 1714, aged 50. The contention of parties during the reign of Anne was extremely violent, in consequence of the hopes entertained by the Jacobites that she would be induced by natural feelings to favour the succession of her brother, the Pretender. Her reign was also much distinguished for learning; and the number of eminent writers who flourished under her, several of whom rose to high stations, has rendered it a sort of Augustan age of English literature, though neither her own disposition or acquirements had any share in making it such.

ANNESLEY, ARTHUR, earl of Anglesea, and lord privy seal in the reign of Charles II.; born at Dublin, 1614; and died, 1686.

At the commencement of the civil wars he joined the royal party, and sat in the parliament at Oxford, 1643; but having made peace with the republicans, he was sent commissioner to Ulster, 1645. He, however, took an active part in the restoration of the king, for which he was created earl of Anglesea, made treasurer of the navy, and, shortly afterwards, lord privy seal.

ANNESLEY, SAMUEL, an English divine, born in Warwickshire about 1620; died, 1696. At the time of the rebellion, he preached some violent sermons against the crown and church, for which he received the vicarage of St. Giles, Cripplegate; but, in 1662, he was ejected from it for nonconformity.

ANNETT, PETER, a deistical writer of the 18th century; author of "The Free Enquirer," and other works of a sceptical turn. He was a native of Liverpool, and died, 1778.

ANNIUS, of Viterbo, a Dominican monk, who wrote various books which he pretended were the remains of eminent ancient authors, particularly Manetho, Archilochus, and Xenophon. For a time the imposture succeeded, and they were printed in 1498. Annius died at Rome, 1502.

ANNO, archbishop of Cologne in the 11th century. He was chancellor to the emperor Henry III., and regent during the minority of Henry IV.; and from the exemplary conduct he displayed in those situations, as well as from the sanctity of his life, he acquired the title of Saint.

ANQUETIL, LOUIS PIERRE, a celebrated historian, born at Paris, 1728; died, 1808. Having distinguished himself as an able teacher of theology and general literature, he was appointed prior of the abbey de la Roe, in Anjou, director of the college of Senlis, and prior of Chateau Renard. During the height of the revolution he was thrown into prison, where he began his "Universal History," which was afterwards published in twelve volumes. At the formation of the French Institute, Anquetil became one of the original members, and obtained a situation under government.

ANQUETIL DU PERRON, ABRAHAM HYACINTHE, brother of the preceding, was born at Paris, 1731; and died, 1805. In order to gratify his taste for oriental literature, he joined the expedition fitting out for India, in 1754, as a private soldier; employed every moment of his leisure in the study of the Sanscrit; and made sufficient progress in that tongue to translate the "Vendidad Sade," a dictionary of the language. On the taking of Pondicherry by the English, he returned to Europe, visited London and Oxford, and conveyed the various MSS. he had obtained to Paris. He was then appointed oriental interpreter in the king's library, with a pension, and devoted himself to the publication of his researches.

ANSALDI, C. J., a celebrated savant, of Piacenza, born in 1700. His best antiquarian treatises are in Latin.

ANSART, ANDREW JOSEPH, a French historian and ecclesiastical writer; born, 1723; died, 1790. He became a Benedictine, but being appointed to a place of trust in his order, he decamped with the funds, and joined the order of Malta.

ANSCARIUS, bishop of Hamburg and Bremen, born in France, 801; died, 864. He preached the gospel to the Danes and Swedes, and was very instrumental in converting the northern nations to Christianity.

ANSELM, archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I.; born at Aost, Piedmont, 1033; died at Canterbury, 1103, and canonised in the reign of Henry VII. He was originally a monk, and afterwards superior of the abbey of Bec, Normandy. Visiting England several times during his abbacy, he was called to attend William Rufus in a fit of sickness at Gloucester, which led to his appointment to the primacy. But differences arising between the king and the prelate, in consequence of the attachment of the latter to the pope, Anselm left the kingdom, and the king seized his revenues. On the death of William, he however returned to England, and was well received; but a new rupture arising, in consequence of the archbishop's refusing to be re-invested by the king, the dispute was referred to the pope, who decided in favour of Anselm. This was resisted; and at length the pope made a concession, by allowing the English bishops and abbots to do homage to the king for their temporalities, which restored Anselm to favour.

ANSELME, of Paris, an Augustine monk, born, 1625; died, 1694. He was the original compiler of the Historical Genealogies of the House of France.

ANSELME, GEORGE. There were two of this name: the elder, a mathematician of some eminence in the early part of the 15th century; died, 1440. His grandson, who assumed the name of Nepos, was a physician at Parma, of which city he was a native, and died, 1528.

ANSON, Lord GEORGE, a celebrated naval commander, was born at his father's seat in the parish of Colwich, Staffordshire, 1697, and died at Moor Park, Hertfordshire, 1762. He entered early into the navy, and was made post-captain in 1724. Being ordered to the South Carolina station, he purchased land, and built a town there, called after his name. In 1739 he was appointed commodore of an expedition against the Spanish settlements in the Pacific Ocean; and sailed from Portsmouth the following year with five men-of-war, a sloop, and two victuallers; doubled Cape Horn in March, 1741, after losing two of his ships; and in June following arrived off Juan Fernandez, with only two ships and two tenders. This place he left in September, took some prizes, burnt Païta, and continued on the American coast, in expectation of falling in with the annual Acapulco ship, till May, 1742; when, having only his ship, the Centurion, left, he crossed the southern ocean for China, where he stayed several months, and returned in quest of the galleon, which he fell in with, and captured after a smart action. Having sold his prize in China, he sailed for England, and arrived at Spithead, June 15. 1744, passing in a fog through the midst of a French fleet, then cruising in the Channel. In 1747 he commanded the Channel fleet, and captured six French men-of-war, which were convoying a large fleet bound to the East and West Indies. Two of these prizes were the Invincible and the Glory, which induced the captain of the former to say to the admiral, on giving up his sword, "Sir, you have conquered the Invincible, and Glory follows you." For these and other services, he was created a peer, and afterwards made vice-admiral of England. In 1751 he was appointed first lord of the Admiralty, which post he held, except for a short interval, until his death. In 1758, he again commanded the Channel fleet, and was appointed admiral, and commander-in-chief of his majesty's fleets, for the purpose of conveying her majesty, queen Charlotte, from Cuxhaven to England.

ANSON, PETER HUBERT, a miscellaneous writer, born at Paris, 1741; died, 1810.

ANSPACH, Her Serene Highness ELIZABETH, Margravine of, was the youngest daughter of Augustus, earl of Berkeley. To a good and highly cultivated understanding, this lady joined the most prepossessing manners, and a large portion of feminine beauty. When little more than sixteen, lady Elizabeth married Mr. (afterwards earl of) Craven, by whom she had seven children; but after living together thirteen years, they separated from mutual feelings of dissatisfaction. Lady Craven made a tour, and took up her residence in the court of Anspach, where she established a theatre, wrote plays, directed the performance, and became a principal personage with the margrave: the margrave was generally confined to her chamber by ill health, and shortly after died. Lady Craven remained a visitor at Anspach, and accompanied the margrave in his excursions to other courts. Six weeks after the death of Lord Craven, his widow married the margrave, and both came to England. The margrave disposed of his principality to the king of Prussia, and having purchased Brandenburg House, Hammersmith, it became the scene of fashionable dissipation; the queen, however, refused to receive the margravine at her drawing-room, and no other influence could obtain her admission to the British court. In 1806 the margrave died, and after that event the margravine resided generally abroad. At Naples the king gave her two acres of ground, on which she erected a handsome villa, and there continued to reside until her death, which took place in 1828.

ANSTEX, CHRISTOPHER, a poet, was born in 1724; studied at Eton and Cambridge; and on succeeding to some patrimonial property, resided principally at Bath. He blended the avocations of a country gentleman with literary pursuits, and, among many other things, produced that humorous poem, "The New Bath Guide," which obtained a rapid and deserved popularity. Died, 1805.

ANSTIS, JOHN, an antiquary, and the author of various heraldic works, was born at St. Neots, Cornwall, in 1669, and educated at Oxford. He was member for St. Germans, and in 1713 appointed garter king at arms. Died, 1744.

ANTAR, an Arabian chief and distinguished poet, who lived in the 6th century. His works, which form a portion of the famous Moallakah, arc devoted to the description of his warlike deeds, and his love for the fair Abia. The celebrated Arabian romance, entitled "Antar," by Asmai, affords a perfect idea of the manners, opinions, and superstitions of the early Arabians; and of this there is an English version, entitled "Antar, a Bedouen Romance, translated from the Arabic by Terrick Hamilton," in 4 vols. 12mo.

ANTHEMIUS, a Lydian, eminent as an architect, sculptor, and mathematician. He was employed by the emperor Justinian; and died in 534.

ANTHING, FREDERICK, the companion in arms and biographer of the famous Marshal Suwarrow, was born at Gottha, in Saxony, and died at St. Petersburg, in 1805.

ANTHONY, ST., THE GREAT, the founder of monastic institutions, was born A. D. 251, at Coma, in Hieraclea, a town of Upper Egypt. In 305, having sold all his property and given the proceeds to the poor, he withdrew into the desert, whither a number of disciples were attracted by his reputation for sanctity; and thus was formed the first community of monks. He afterwards went to Alexandria, to seek the honour of martyrdom, amid the persecutions then raging against the Christians; but as his life was spared, he again retired to the desert; and died at the great age of 105.

ANTHONY, of Burgundy, an illegitimate son of Philip, duke of Burgundy. He served with great credit in Switzerland, and against the Moors in Africa; and was high in the favour of Louis XI. and Charles VIII. of France. Born, 1421; died, 1504.

ANTIGNAC, A., born in 1770; a favourite French chansonnier, charged with celebrating both Bonaparte and the Bourbons.

ANTIGONUS, SOCHEUS, a Jew, founder of the sect of the Sadducees, about 300 years B. C.

ANTIGONUS, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and universally supposed to be the illegitimate son of Philip, Alexander's father. In the division of the provinces after the king's death, he received Pamphylia, Lycia, and Phrygia; to which Lycæonia was afterwards added. He was the most powerful of those who shared the Grecian empire, and was the first of them who assumed the title of king, which he did 23 years after the death of Alexander. His power at length became so very formidable that a conspiracy was formed against him by Cassander, Lysimachus, and Seleucus; by whom he was ultimately defeated, and slain at the battle of Ipsus, B. C. 301.

ANTIMACO, MARK ANTHONY, a learned Italian author of several Latin poems, and a teacher of Greek at Mantua and Ferrara. He translated much from the Greek, and was a zealous promoter of classical learning. Born, 1472; died, 1552.

ANTINE, MAUR FRANCOIS, a French Benedictine monk; author of an essay on the Art of verifying Dates, &c. Born, 1688; died, 1748.

ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT, king of Syria and Asia. He conquered the greatest part of Greece, of which some cities implored the aid of Rome; and Hannibal, who had taken refuge at his court, encouraged him to make war against Italy; but his measures were not agreeable to the advice of Hannibal, and he was conquered and obliged to retire beyond Mount Taurus, and pay a yearly fine of 2000 talents to the Romans. His revenues being unable to pay the fine, he attempted to plunder the temple of Belus in Susiana, which so incensed the inhabitants, that they killed him with his followers, B. C. 187.

ANTIOCHUS, of Ascalon, a philosopher, and disciple of Philo, the Platonist. He was highly esteemed by Cicero for his mode of education, and considered the best public teacher of the Platonic philosophy.

ANTIOCHUS, a monk of Seba, Palestine, who wrote in the 7th century 190 homilies on the Scriptures, still extant.

ANTIPATER, a native of Macedon, pupil of Aristotle, and the faithful minister of Philip and Alexander. While Alexander was abroad, he left Antipater in the government of Macedon; and by his prudent management he kept all Greece in order. On the death of his master, in the distribution of his territories, Antipater obtained the European provinces. Not long after the confederate states of Greece attacked him, but he subdued them, and subverted their democratic forms of government, on which he was called the father of Greece. He died B. C. 318.

ANTIPATER, LÆTIUS CÆTIUS, a Roman historian, who lived in the time of Gracchus, and wrote an account of the Second Punic War.

ANTIPATER, of Sidon, a stoic philosopher and poet, much praised by Cicero and Seneca. He lived about 140 B. C.

ANTIPANES, a Greek comic poet, in the time of Alexander, who gained three prizes at the Olympic games.

ANTIPHILUS, a painter, rival of Apelles; celebrated for a fine drawing representing a youth blowing a spark of fire.

ANTIPHON, the Rhamnusian, an Athenian orator, who flourished B. C. 430. He was the first who laid down the rules of oratory, and assisted in establishing the tyranny of the four hundred; for which he was put to death, B. C. 411.

ANTIQUARIUS, JAMES, a learned Italian scholar of Campanus; he became chief minister to the dukes of Milan, and died, 1512.

ANTISTHENES, founder of the sect of the Cynics, by whose means Melitus was put to death, and Anytus banished, for their persecution of Socrates. He was born at Athens, B. C. 423.

ANTOINETTE, MARIE, of Lorraine, archduchess of Austria and queen of France, born at Vienna, in 1755, was the daughter of the emperor Francis I. and Maria Theresa. To a beautiful person, and a highly cultivated mind, she added the charms of gentleness and feminine grace; and when she left Vienna for Versailles, to give her hand to the son of Louis XV., king of France, afterwards Louis of unhappy memory, the capital of her native land was filled with sorrow. In 1770, when only 15 years of age, she was married; and when her husband ascended the throne she gained the affections of the people by repeated acts of generosity. It was, however, soon observed that her natural liveliness brought upon her the scandal of her enemies about the court, who attributed the undisguised frankness and cheerfulness of her nature to levity and indiscretion. An extraordinary occurrence added fuel to the flame of calumny, while it subjected the name of the queen to a disgraceful lawsuit. Two jewellers demanded the payment of an immense price for a necklace, which had been purchased in the name of the queen. In the examination which she demanded, it was proved that she had never ordered the purchase. A lady of her size and complexion had impudently passed herself off for the queen, and at midnight had a meeting with a cardinal in the park of Versailles. Notwithstanding this, the enemies of the queen succeeded in casting a stigma on her; and the credulous and infatuated people laid every public disaster to her charge. On the 5th of October the Parisians rushed to Versailles, and breaking into the castle on the following morning, they murdered several of the body-guards, and uttered against the queen the most furious threats. In the middle of the night, a clergyman wrote to her, "Take measures for your preservation; early in the morning, at 6 o'clock, you are to be murdered." She remained tranquil, and concealed the letter. The infuriated mob rushed into her chamber; she fled to the king. To put a stop to the scene of outrage, the king and queen showed themselves with both their children, in the balcony. This spectacle made a momentary impression on the enraged people; but soon the cry resounded from every mouth, "No children! the queen—the queen alone!" She instantly put her son and daughter into the arms of the king and returned to the balcony. This unexpected courage disarmed the mob; and their threats were followed by shouts of approbation. But the regicidal mania was now arriving at a fearful height, and those events which in the sequel deluged France with blood, were thickening around the royal family with all the fervid gloom of an approaching tempest. At length came the fatal 10th of August, 1792. Prepared for the worst, she exerted all her power to excite the king to meet death sword in hand; but he thought resistance was in vain, and was led, with his consort, before the legislative assembly, where she heard his deposition announced, and then accompanied him to the Temple. There, deprived of every semblance of royalty, and bereft of every comfort, she displayed the magnanimity of a heroine and the patient endurance of a martyr. At length the Convention ordered her to be brought before the revolutionary tribunal. She was charged with having dissipated the finances, exhausted the public treasury, corresponded with the foreign enemies of France, and favoured its domestic foes. To all these charges, and others still more infamous, she replied with firmness and decision, and a just indignation; and she heard her sentence pronounced with perfect calmness. On the following morning, when she ascended the cart which conveyed her to the scaffold, it was observed that grief had distorted her features, and in the damp, unwholesome prison, she had almost lost one of her eyes. A deep silence reigned, and the people, before so furious, seemed to be filled with shame and awe. When she reached the top of the scaffold, she threw herself on her knees, exclaiming, "O God, enlighten and affect my executioner! Farewell, my children, for ever; I go to your father!" Thus perished the lovely Marie Antoinette, in the 38th year of her age, Oct. 16. 1793.

ANTON, C. GOTTLIEB, a learned German noble and magistrate, born in 1751; author of a variety of curious philological, historical, and critical works; among others, a "History of the Ancient Germans;" "On the Origin of the Slavonians;" of the "Order of Templars," &c. &c.

ANTONELLI, NICHOLAS MARIA, count of Pergola, who rose through various ecclesiastical promotions to that of cardinal, was born, 1697, and died, 1767.

ANTONI, SEBASTIANO DEGLI, a Vicenzan noble author, born in 1665; author of "The Conspiracy of Brutus," a tragedy.

ANTONIANO, SYLVIO, an Italian poet, made a cardinal by Clement VIII., born at Rome, 1540; died, 1603.

ANTONIDES, or VANDER GOES, JOHN, a Dutch poet, born in Zealand, 1647; died, 1684. He is principally known by his poem in honour of the river Y, which flows through Amsterdam; in which city his works were collected and published, 1714.

ANTONINE, DE FORCIGLIONI, a Romish prelate and saint, born at Florence, 1389; died, 1459, and canonised 1523. He highly distinguished himself at the Council of Florence, where he disputed with the Greeks.

ANTONINI, ANNIBAL and JOSEPH, two brothers, natives of Italy, in the 17th and 18th centuries; they wrote in conjunction the history of Lucania; and Annibal was the compiler of an Italian grammar and dictionary.

ANTONINUS PIUS, TITUS AURELIUS FULVIUS, emperor of Rome, was born at Lanuvium, 86; succeeded Adrian, 138; and died, 161. His reign was distinguished by tranquillity and by such excellent management, as procured him the title of Pius.

ANTONINUS, MARCUS ANNIUS AURELIUS, surnamed the Philosopher, born, 121; adopted by Pius Antoninus, whom he succeeded, in conjunction with Lucius Verus, as emperor of Rome; and died, 180. His death occasioned universal mourning throughout the empire; the Roman senate and people voted him a god, and his image was long afterwards regarded with peculiar veneration. This emperor's book of meditations in Greek and Latin has been often printed, and universally admired for the excellence of its morality.

ANTONINUS, a geographical author, the writer of a valuable Itinerarium, whose age is unknown. Burton published an excellent commentary on it, as far as relates to Britain.

ANTONIO or ANTONELLO, born at Messina, Sicily, 1426; died, 1475. He is said to have been the first artist who introduced oil painting into Italy.

ANTONIO, NICHOLAS, a Spanish historian, born at Seville, 1617; died, 1684.

ANTONIUS, GODEFROY, a celebrated German lawyer, born in Westphalia, and died chancellor of the university of Giessen, where also he was a professor of law, 1618.

ANTONIUS, MARCUS, a brave and eloquent Roman consul, who was afterwards appointed governor of Cilicia, and subsequently censor. He was one of the greatest orators among the Romans; and, according to Cicero, it was owing to him that Rome became a rival in eloquence to Greece. He was slain during the disturbances raised by Marius and Cinna, B. C. 67.

ANTONIUS, MARCUS, the celebrated triumvir, born, B. C. 86, was son of Marcus Cretius, by Julia, a lady of the Cæsarian family, of distinguished merit. Anthony, on the death of his father, soon wasted his whole patrimony, then went into Syria, and assisted in the restoration of Ptolemy to the throne of Egypt; thence he proceeded to join Cæsar in Gaul, and on his return to Rome was made questor. When Cæsar made himself master of that city, he appointed Anthony to the government of Italy, and afterwards master of the horse. Anthony was also the colleague of Cæsar in the consulship; and, at the death of the latter, strove to get possession of the sovereign power, by ingratiating himself with the people and the army. In order to check his ambition, the patriots took the part of Octavius, the heir of Cæsar; and Anthony, being defeated in his endeavours to gain Macedonia and Syria, and also in an attempt upon Cisalpine Gaul, fled to the Alps, and afterwards formed with Lepidus and Octavius the second triumvirate; to which combination Cicero fell a sacrifice. Anthony was greatly instrumental to the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi; he then went into Asia, where he bowed to the all-conquering charms and blandishments of Cleopatra; and, after his defeat at Actium, put an end to his own existence, B. C. 30, aged 56.

ANTONIUS, ÆLIUS NEBRISSENSIS, a Spanish writer, born at Lebrisa, 1442; died, 1522. He was an eminent professor at the university of Salamanca, and wrote the History of New Spain, and other works.

ANTONY, of Bourbon, son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendome, born 1527; married Joan d'Albrat, queen of Navarre, 1548, who brought him in dowry the principality of Bearn, and the title of king of Navarre; and died from a wound received in the shoulder at the siege of Rouen, 1562.

ANTONY, St., of Padua, a learned Franciscan monk, was born at Lisbon, 1195; died at Padua, 1231; and was canonised. His works were printed at the Hague, 1641.

ANTONY, of Pratovecchio, Tuscany, an eminent Italian lawyer, in the 15th century.

ANVARI, a Persian poet, born at Chorasán. He was well versed in astrology, and composed several books on that science; but having failed in a prediction, he retired from the court of the sultan Sangier, and died at Balke in 1206.

ANYSIUS, or ANISO, GIOVANNI, an Italian poet of some celebrity, born at Naples, about 1472; died 1540.

ANYTA, an ancient Greek poetess, some of whose compositions are preserved in a collection of eminent female poets, published at Hamburg, 1734.

ANYTUS, an Athenian rhetorician, who prevailed on Aristophanes to ridicule Socrates in a comedy, and finally, in conjunction with Melitus, procured his condemnation. When the people discovered their error, Anytus was banished, and stoned to death at Heraclea.

APACZAI, JOHN, a native of Apatza, Transylvania, who studied the oriental languages at Utrecht, and afterwards taught mathematics and natural philosophy in the university of Weissenburg. Died, 1659.

APEL, or APELLES, JOHN, a German lawyer, and one of the earliest preachers of the Reformation; born at Nuremberg, 1486, and died there, 1536.

APELBOOM, a Dutch poet of some celebrity, who died about 1780.

APELLES, the most celebrated among the painters of antiquity, was born, as Pliny affirms, in the isle of Cos, though other writers name Ephesus as his native place. He lived in the time of Alexander the Great, who would suffer no other artist to paint his picture.

APELLES, a native of Syria, in the second century; the founder of an heretical sect, who denied the prophets, the law of Moses, and the resurrection.

APELLICON, a peripatetic philosopher, to whom the world is indebted for the works of Aristotle, which he collected and bought at a vast expense, about 90 years B. C. They were afterwards seized by the dictator Sylla, and carried by him to Rome.

APER, MARCUS, a Gaul by birth, and one of the finest orators of the first century; he died about 85.

APHITHONIUS, of Antioch, a rhetorician of the third century, who wrote a treatise entitled "Progymnasmata Rhetorica;" the best edition of which was published at Amsterdam, 1645.

APIAN, PETER, a German mathematician and astronomer, born in Misnia, 1495; died, 1589. Apian was the first who discovered that the tails of comets are always projected in a direction from the sun, and records his observations upon five which appeared in the years 1531, 1532, 1533, 1538, and 1539.

APICIUS, a noted epicure in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. It is recorded of him that he spent 2,500,000*l.* sterling in providing for the luxuries of his table; but finding his finances reduced to 250,000 crowns, he poisoned himself for fear of starving. There were, however, two other epicures of the same name; one who lived in the time of Sylla; and the other, whose extravagance and gluttonous propensities were less enormous, contemporary with Trajan.

APION, a learned grammarian and historian, born at Oasis, Egypt, in the first century, and was a professor at Rome in the reign of Tiberius. In his "Antiquities of Egypt," he attacked the Jews, and was answered by Josephus.

APOLLINARIS, CAIUS SULPITIUS, a native of Carthage, was professor of grammar at Rome in the 2nd century.

APOLLINARIUS, CLAUDIUS, bishop of Hierapolis, Phrygia, about 177, who wrote an apology for the Christian religion, addressed to Marcus Aurelius.

APOLLINARIUS, a presbyter of Alexandria in the 4th century, who wrote a history of the Hebrews in Greek heroic verse. He had a son who became bishop of Laodicea, and wrote a treatise against paganism, which he sent to Julian. He died about 382.

APOLLODORUS, a grammarian of Athens, flourished B.C. 104. Three books of his on the origin of the gods are extant.

APOLLODORUS, a famous painter at Athens, B.C. 403. Pliny mentions two pictures by him, one of a priest of Apollo at the altar, and the other of the shipwreck of Ajax.

APOLLODORUS, a celebrated architect, was born at Damascus, and lived under Trajan and Adrian. He was employed by the former in building the great stone bridge over the Danube and other structures; but, falling into disgrace with Adrian, he lost his life through that emperor's caprice.

APOLLONIA, a female Christian martyr, who, at a very advanced age, fell a sacrifice to intolerance at Alexandria, 248.

APOLLONIUS COLLATIUS, a monk and poet of Navarre in the 15th century, who published an epic on the siege of Jerusalem, and other pieces.

APOLLONIUS, DYSCOLUS, a grammarian of Alexandria in the 2nd century, who wrote a work on syntax: a collection of historical curiosities is also ascribed to him. There was another grammarian of this name, who lived in the reign of Augustus Cæsar, and compiled a Lexicon Homericum, printed at Paris, 1773.

APOLLONIUS, of Perga, a mathematician of Alexandria, about 240 years, B.C. He composed several curious geometrical works, of which his book on conic sections alone exists.

APOLLONIUS, RHODIUS, so called from the city of Rhodes, in which he presided over a school of rhetoric, was a native of Alexandria, and afterwards became keeper of the celebrated library there, in which situation he remained until his death, B.C. 240. He wrote a poem, in four books, on the expedition of the Argonauts.

APOLLONIUS, TYANEUS, a philosophic empiric of Tyana, in Cappadocia; born about the Christian era. He visited Rome, where Vespasian became his dupe; but Domitian sent him to prison. He soon obtained his release, and died about the end of the 1st century.

APOLLONIUS, a Roman senator and Christian martyr, who lived in the reign of Commodus, and probably suffered death about 186.

APONO, or ABANO, PETER OF, an astrologer and physician, born at Abano, near Padua, 1250; died, 1316. He made himself celebrated by a work, entitled "Conciliator Differentiorum Philosophorum et precipue Medicorum."

APOSTOLIUS, MICHAEL, a learned Greek of the 15th century, who compiled a collection of the sayings of wise men, and another of proverbs.

APPIAN, an ancient historian, born at Alexandria, whence he went to Rome, in the reign of Trajan, and became an eminent pleader. He wrote the history of Rome in Greek.

APPIANI, ANDRÉ, a celebrated Milanese painter, born in 1750. His pieces are found in most of the palaces of Milan; but his masterpiece, in fresco, adorns the cupola of Santa Maria de S. Celso. Died, 1818.

APREECE, or RHESE, JOHN, a learned antiquary, born in Wales in the early part of the 16th century, and died in the reign of queen Mary. One of his works, entitled "Fides Historiæ Britannicæ," is preserved in manuscript in the Cottonian collection.

APROSIO, ANGELICO, an Augustine monk, born at Genoa, 1607; died, 1681. He wrote a number of books, but is best known by a work, entitled "Bibliotheca Aprosiana."

APTHORP, EAST, a learned divine, born in New England, 1732, and died at Canterbury, 1816. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts sent him out as one of their missionaries to Cambridge, Massachusetts, in which state he resided for a short time, and then returned to England, and obtained the living of Croydon, Surrey, about 1765. In 1778 he took the degree of D. D., and was appointed to the rectory of St. Mary-le-Bow, London; but, in 1793, he resigned his living on obtaining the valuable stall of Finsbury, in St. Paul's Cathedral.

APULEIUS, LUCIUS, a Platonic philosopher in the 2nd century, born at Madaura, Africa. He composed several books, the chief of which is a romance, entitled "The Golden Ass," which has been translated into almost all the modern European languages.

AQUAVIVA, ANDREW MATTHEW, duke of Atri, Naples, born about 1450, was celebrated both as a scholar and a soldier, and died, 1528.

AQUAVIVA, CLAUDE, born at Naples, 1542, became general of the order of Jesuits, and died, 1615.

AQUAVIVA, OCTAVIO, a prelate of great reputed piety and learning, died archbishop of Naples, 1612.

AQUILA, of Sinope, Pontus, an architect and mathematician in the time of Adrian, by whom he was employed in the rebuilding of Jerusalem, where he embraced the Christian religion, but was afterwards excommunicated for practising astrology, and turned Jew.

AQUILANO, SERAFINO, an admired Italian poet, born at Aquila, Abruzzo, 1466, and died, 1500.

AQUILANUS, SEBASTIANUS, a Neapolitan physician of Padua; died, 1543.

AQUINAS, ST. THOMAS, called the Angelic Doctor, descended from the counts of Aquino, in Calabria, Naples, was born 1224; died, 1274; and canonised 1323, by John XXII. His writings, which were held in the highest estimation, gave rise to a sect called, after him, Thomists.

AQUINO, CHARLES OF, a Neapolitan Jesuit, born, 1634; died, 1740. He was an eminent teacher of rhetoric at Rome.

AQUINO, or AQUIN, LOUIS CLAUDE OF, a distinguished musician, born at Paris, 1694; died, 1772. At the age of six he performed on the harpsichord before Louis XIV.; at eight, the celebrated Bernier declared he could teach him no more; and at twelve, he became organist of a church at Paris.

AQUINO, PHILIP, a learned Jew of the 17th century, born at Avignon, converted to the Christian faith, and received baptism at Aquino, Naples, whence he derived his name. He was celebrated for his skill in the Hebrew language; and was entrusted by Le Jay with the care of printing and correcting the Hebrew and Chaldee text of his Polyglot Bible.

ARABSCHAH, a Mahometan historian, who wrote a History of Tamerlane, and a treatise on the divine unity. He was a native of Damascus, where he died, 1450.

ARABELLA STUART, commonly called the Lady Arabella, was the only child of Charles Stuart, earl of Lennox, the brother of Henry lord Darnley, father to James VI., of Scotland, by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Cavendish. This innocent victim of jealousy and state policy, while an infant, lost her father, and thus became heiress to a large estate. Several matches were projected for her at home and abroad; and her cousin, king James, was inclined to marry her to Lord Esme Stuart, whom he had created duke of Lennox, and whom, before his marriage, he considered as his heir; but this union was prevented by queen Elizabeth, who held the Lady Arabella under restraint, and regarded her with a jealous eye. On the death of that queen, an abortive conspiracy was formed for setting up Arabella Stuart in opposition to her cousin James. In 1610, she was privately married to Mr. William Seymour, grandson of the Earl of Hertford; by which union she fell under the royal displeasure, was placed in confinement at Lambeth, and her husband sent to the Tower. Shortly afterwards they separately made their escape; Mr. Seymour got safe to the Continent, but the Lady Arabella was overtaken, shut up in the Tower, and passed the remainder of her life in close and melancholy confinement, which finally deprived her of her reason; and she died September 27. 1615, aged 38.

ARAGON, TULLIA OF, a poetess of the 16th century; descended from an illegitimate branch of the royal family of Spain; and highly celebrated for her wit, beauty, and various accomplishments.

ARAJA, FRANCISCO, a Neapolitan musician and composer in the 18th century, who entered the service of the empress Catherine of Russia, and produced at St. Petersburg "Cephalo et Procris," the first opera written in the Russian language.

ARAM, EUGENE, a man no less notorious for his studious habits and great attainments, than for the crime which brought him to an untimely end, was the son of a gardener, and a native of Ramskill, in Netherdale, Yorkshire. Though destitute of the advantages of education, and working at his father's humble trade, such was his desire to obtain knowledge, that he soon made considerable progress in the mathematics; then applied so sedulously to the Latin tongue, as to read the Roman classics; and afterwards studied Greek with great success. Thus qualified, in 1734 he became usher in a school at Knaresborough, where he married. In 1744 we find that he taught Latin and writing in London, and transmitted the acts of parliament to be registered in Chancery; and, in 1757, he assisted in the free-school at Lynn. During this period he studied history, antiquity, heraldry, and botany, wrote poetry, and became proficient in the Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee languages. In the following year he was apprehended at Lynn for the murder of one Daniel Clarke, a shoemaker, of Knaresborough, which took place thirteen years before, and for which he was tried at York, Aug. 8. 1759. He made a most skilful, argumentative, and eloquent defence, but was found guilty. The next morning he confessed the crime, attributing it to his suspicion of Clarke's having a criminal intercourse with his wife. Having ineffectually endeavoured to commit suicide in the night, by wounding himself in the arm, he was conveyed in a state of stupor to the gallows, and afterwards hung in chains in Knaresborough Forest. The singular discovery of Clarke's mysterious murder, and its commission by a man of Aram's otherwise irreproachable character, learned acquirements, and scholastic habits, together with his remarkable defence, were of course calculated to excite a high degree of interest — an interest, indeed, not likely to subside, when we recollect that the melancholy tale has served as a basis for the enchanting fictions of a novelist and the exquisite paths of a poet.

ARATOR, a Latin poet of the fifth century, born in Liguria, and patronised by Pope Vigilius, to whom he presented the Acts of the Apostles in Latin verse.

ARATUS, a Sicilian poet and astronomer, born about 300 B.C. His poem, entitled "Phænomena," was translated by Cicero into Latin; and St. Paul quotes a passage from it in his speech to the Athenians.

ARATUS, of Sicily, son of Clinias, born B.C. 273. His father fell in a tumult excited by Abantidas; and the escape of young Aratus, then only seven years of age, arose from his taking refuge in the house of the tyrant's sister, who humanely preserved him, and caused him to be brought up privately at Argos. On arriving at maturity, he determined to restore the liberty of his country, which he did without bloodshed. By his activity, he also brought about the Achæan league, and recovered Corinth from Antigonus of Macedon. He wrote Commentaries of his own transactions and times; and died, B.C. 216.

ARBOGAST, LOUIS FR. ANT., a French geometrician, professor of mathematics at Strasburg, associate of the Institute, deputy to the National Convention, and member of many learned societies. Died, 1803.

ARBOGASTES, a Frank by birth, and a soldier of fortune, who raised himself by his merit to the title of count, under Gratian, after whose death he entered into the service of Valentinian the Younger and Theodosius; by the latter of whom he was sent into Gaul to oppose Victor, son of Maximus, whom he defeated and killed. Arbogastes then ingratiated himself with the army, who raised him to the post of general, without consulting the court; but, after the departure of Theodosius for Constantinople, he filled every post with his creatures, and reduced Valentinian to dependence upon his will. The young emperor was shortly afterwards found dead; and Arbogastes, not choosing to assume the purple himself, being a barbarian by origin, set up the rhetorician Eugenius, whom he had raised to the rank of master of the offices. Theodosius immediately prepared for war against the usurper, whom he totally defeated. Arbogastes escaped to the mountains, where he wandered for some time, and at length put an end to his life, about 395.

ARBRISSEL, ROBERT OF, founder of the abbey of Fontevraud, was born in the village of Arbrissel, Brittany, about 1047; died, 1117; and was buried in his own abbey.

ARBUCKLE, JAMES, a Scotch poet, born at Glasgow, and died in the north of Ireland, where he had settled as a schoolmaster, 1734.

ARBUTHNOT, ALEXANDER, a Scottish divine, and a zealous reformer, was born in 1538, and died in 1583. He edited Buchanan's History of Scotland, and was a strenuous champion for the Reformation.

ARBUTHNOT, JOHN, a celebrated writer and physician in the reign of queen Anne, was born at Arbutnot, near Montrose, and educated at Aberdeen. He was appointed physician in ordinary to the queen, and admitted a fellow of the college. He engaged with Pope and Swift in many of their literary schemes, particularly in the satire under the title of "Martinus Scriblers." In 1727, Dr. Arbuthnot published "Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures," which valuable work was followed by an "Essay concerning Aliments," &c., and another on the "Effects of Air on Human Bodies." So excellent a character did he bear with his contemporaries, that Swift thus pithily describes him: "He has more wit than all our race, and his humanity is equal to his wit." He died in 1735.

ARCERE, ANTHONY, a learned Frenchman, who applied to the study of the oriental languages, made a tour into the East, and returned richly furnished with manuscripts; but died of a fever, 1699, aged 35.

ARCERE, LOUIS STEPHEN, a French ecclesiastic, poet, and historian of the 18th century; chiefly known by his works on Rochelle and Amiens.

ARCESILAUS, a Greek philosopher, the founder of the second or middle academy, was born at Pitane, in Æolia, B.C. 316. He maintained that "man knows nothing," and rejected as false and delusive the testimony of the senses.

ARCHELAUS, king of Macedon, natural son of Perdiccas II., whom he succeeded, after murdering his brother Alceas. He liberally encouraged literature and the arts, entertained and patronised Euripides and Zeuxis. He died about B.C. 398.

ARCHELAUS, a Greek philosopher, the disciple and successor of Anaxagoras at Lampsacus, but removed afterwards to Athens, where he had Socrates for a pupil.

ARCHELAUS, a geographer; author of a treatise on all the countries conquered by Alexander, in whose time he lived.

ARCHELAUS, a Christian divine, bishop of Mesopotamia, who flourished under Probus, about 278, and was a zealous champion for the Catholic faith against the Manichæans.

ARCHIAS, AULUS LICINIUS, a native of Antioch, chiefly known from the eloquent orations made by Cicero, to defend his right to the citizenship of Rome.

ARCHIDAMUS III., king of Sparta, son of Agesilaus, whom he succeeded, B.C. 361, and, in the sacred war, gave assistance to the Phocians. He was slain in a battle with the Messapians, after a reign of fifteen years.

ARCHIGENES, a Greek physician of the pneumatic sect, who flourished in the times of Domitian and Trajan. His works are frequently referred to by Galen.

ARCHILOCHUS, a Greek satirist, born in the isle of Paros, B.C. 660. The invention of the Iambic metre is attributed to him; and so virulent were his poems, that they were prohibited by the Spartan government.

ARCHIMEDES, the most celebrated mathematician among the ancients, was a native of Syracuse, and related to king Hiero. He was equally skilled in the sciences of astronomy, geometry, mechanics, hydrostatics, and optics; his aptness in solving problems had become proverbial in Cicero's days, and his singular ingenuity in the invention and construction of warlike engines, is much dwelt upon by Livy. The combination of pulleys for raising immense weights, the endless screw, &c., were invented by him; but his genius for invention was never more signally displayed than in the defence of Syracuse, when it was besieged by Marcellus; for among other astonishing novelties, he produced a burning glass, composed of reflecting mirrors, by which he fired the enemy's fleet. At length, however, the city was taken by storm, and Archimedes, then in his 74th year, was among the slain, B. C. 212.

ARCHINTO, OCTAVIUS, a Milanese nobleman, born about the end of the 16th century, and died, 1636; he was employed in several political offices, and received from Philip III. of Spain the title of count de Barata.

ARCHINTO, CHARLES, a learned Milanese of noble family, born in 1669, founded an academy for the sciences and mechanics in his native city, which he enriched with an extensive library, &c.

ARCHON, LOUIS, an antiquary, chaplain to Louis XIV., born at Auvergne, 1645; died, 1717; author of a "History of the Royal Chapel of France."

ARCHYTAS, a Pythagorean philosopher and mathematician of Tarentum, flourished about 400 B. C. He was one of the first who applied the theory of mathematics to practical purposes.

ARCHENHOLZ, JOHN, a Swedish historian, born at Helsingfors, 1695; died, 1777; he published various works, principally relating to the history of his own country.

ARCHENHOLZ, JOHN WILLIAM VON, a very voluminous German author; born, 1743; died, 1812. His two most important works are "Annals of British History," 20 vols., and a "History of the Seven Years' War."

ARCO, NICHOLAS, Count, a Latin poet, born at Arco, in the Tyrol, 1479; died, 1546.

ARCON, J. C. ELÉONORE LEMICEAUD, a French officer, born at Pontarlier, 1733; died, 1800. He became general of a division, inspector of fortifications, member of the Institute, and senator; and was the inventor of the famous floating batteries used at the siege of Gibraltar in 1782.

ARCONS, CÆSAR OF, born in Gascony, and died, 1681; was advocate in the Parliament of Bordeaux, and published several treatises on philosophy and theology.

ARCUDIUS, PETER, a Greek priest, born in the isle of Corfu, and died, 1635; he wrote several pieces in defence of the Romish Church, and was sent by Clement VIII. to Russia, to settle some religious differences.

ARCUDI, ALEXANDER THOMAS OF, a Dominican of Venice, who wrote several works, chiefly biographical, of which the "Galatana Letterata" is the principal: he died, 1720.

ARCULPHIUS, a French divine of the seventh century, who visited the Holy Land, and wrote an account of his travels.

ARCY, PATRICK, a military writer of the 18th century, was born at Galway. He entered into the military service of France in 1739, and served with distinction in Germany and Flanders. Died, 1779.

ARDERN, JOHN, an English surgeon of Newark-upon-Trent, to whom the credit of being the reviver of surgery in this country in the 14th century has been given.

ARDENE, ESPRIT JEAN DE ROME, a French author, born at Marseilles, 1684; where he died, in 1748.

ARDENE, JOHN PAUL, brother of the preceding, was a priest at Marseilles, and superior of a college; but more celebrated as a florist than as an ecclesiastic. On that pleasing subject he wrote some esteemed works; and also, "Letters on Physic," for the practice of ecclesiastics. Died, 1769.

ARDENE, JAMES, an English divine, made dean of Chester by Charles II., and died, 1691.

ARDINGHELLI, MARIA, a Neapolitan author, of noble origin, born in 1730. He was distinguished in algebra and the physical sciences.

AREAGATHUS, a Greek physician, who lived B. C. 269, and practised with repute at Rome; but having introduced the use of caustics and the knife, he was banished.

ARENA, ANTHONY, a French writer of the 16th century, chiefly known by his poem on the war of Provence, carried on by Charles V.; died, 1544.

ARENA, JAMES OF, a learned civilian and writer in the 13th century. He was professor of law at Padua and Bologna, and wrote Commentaries on the Digest and the Code.

ARENA, JOSEPH, an officer in the French service, born in Corsica: arrested at the opera, Aug. 10. 1801, and executed Jan. 31. following, for an attempt on the life of Buonaparte, then first consul.

ARENDT, MARTIN FREDERIC, a celebrated traveller, whose object was the cultivation of science, was born at Altona, in 1769. He commenced his travels in 1798, visiting the northern parts of Europe, and making researches into the antiquities of the countries through which he passed. He afterwards travelled through Spain, Italy, and Hungary; and it was his practice to carry all his papers with him, live on the charity of others, and sleep in the open air. Died, 1824.

ARESI, PAUL, bishop of Tortona, Milan, born, 1574; died, 1644. He taught theology, philosophy, and rhetoric, at Rome and Naples, and wrote some philosophical and religious pieces.

ARETÆUS, a Greek physician in the time of Vespasian: his works are held in great esteem.

ARETIN, A. and J. G., brothers, born in 1769 and 1771; authors of several German works on the fine arts, "Magazin des Arts du Dessin," &c.

ARETIN, J. C., Baron, born in 1773; a laborious German bibliographer, curator of the Royal Library at Munich, and member of the most famous German academies. Among his works are, "Historical and Literary Memoirs;" "History of the Jews of Bavaria;" "On the Effects of Printing;" and many curious treatises on mnemonics, a universal language, the divining rod, &c. He edited the "Aurora" in 1806, and published the "Nouvel Indicateur Littéraire," at Tubingen, in 1808. Died, 1824.

ARETINO, CHARLES, born in Tuscany, in the 15th century. He was secretary to the republic of Florence; and eminent both as a Greek scholar and a Latin poet. Died in 1470.

ARETINO, FRANCIS, a learned civilian of Italy in the 15th century.

ARETINO, GUIDO, a native of Arezzo, Tuscany, who lived in the 11th century, and is celebrated for having invented the musical gamut.

ARETINO, LEONARD, an Italian historian, born at Arezzo, 1370; died, 1443. He was secretary to several popes, and afterwards to the republic of Florence; added a Supplement to Livy on the Punic War, and wrote the History of Italy, &c.

ARETINO, PETER, an Italian satirical writer of great celebrity, was born at Arezzo, in Tuscany, in 1492; and who, though occasionally as just as he was severe, may fairly be considered one of the most universal and reckless libellers that ever lived. Yet although he was so licentious a writer, that his very name is expressive of indecency and profligacy, he wrote many works of devotion, and gave the preference to the latter, whenever they accorded with his interest. His "Ragionamenti," a bitter satire on the scandalous lives of the nuns, married women, and mistresses of the cardinals, &c. was every where read with disgusting avidity. A multitude of satires on all the European sovereigns, earned him the title of "Scourge of Princes." By some he was bribed to silence; by others, punished. Licentiousness stains the wit of all his works, comedies, satires, sonnets, &c. &c. He died in 1557.

ARICI, CÆSAR, an Italian poet, born in 1785; author of an admired didactic poem, called "La Coltivazione degli Olivi."

ARION, a Lesbian poet of the 7th century, B. C.; the inventor of Dithyrambs; of whom numerous fables have been written. Of his writings, all that remains is a "Hymn to Neptune."

ARETIUS, BENEDICT, an ecclesiastic of Berne, Switzerland; eminent as a botanist and theologian. Died, 1574.

ARGAIZ, or ARGAEZ, GREGORY, a Spanish Benedictine, in the 17th century, who published at Madrid an ecclesiastical history of Spain, which he attributed to St. Gregory, bishop of Granada, but which was afterwards proved to be a forgery.

ARGALL, RICHARD, an English poet in the reign of James I., patronised by Dr. John King, bishop of London.

ARGELLATI, PHILIP, a printer of Bologna, of which city he became a magistrate, was born in 1685. From Bologna he removed to Milan, to superintend the printing of Muratori's "Scriptores Italicarum Rerum," under the auspices of the emperor Charles VI., who granted him a pension, and made him one of his secretaries.

ARGELLATI, FRANCIS, son of the above, author of a work entitled "Decamerone," written in imitation of Boccaccio. Died in 1754.

ARGENS, JOHN BAPTISTE DE BOYER, Marquis of, a French miscellaneous writer, son to the solicitor-general of the Parliament of Aix, in which city he was born, in 1704. He at first chose the profession of arms, and was wounded at the siege of Kell, 1734, but afterwards turned his attention to literary pursuits; went to Holland, and was invited by Frederic William, king of Prussia, to his court, who made him one of his chamberlains. Died, 1771.

ARGENTERO, G., a celebrated Piedmontese physician, born in 1553; he translated Galen.

ARGENTIER, JOHN, an Italian physician, born at Quiers, Piedmont, 1513; died at Turin, 1572.

ARGOLI, ANDREW, a mathematician, born at Tagliacozzo, Naples, 1570; died, 1653. He was professor of mathematics at Padua, with the title of Chevalier of St. Mark.

ARGOLI, JOHN, son of the above, was a poet of some celebrity, and also an archaological writer. He was professor of jurisprudence at Bologna; and died about 1690.

ARGUELLADA, RAYMOND, born in 1768: a liberal deputy of the Spanish Cortes. He was the chief framer of the Spanish Constitution, published at Cadiz in 1812.

ARGUELLES, AUGUSTUS, a Spanish patriot, born in 1775; joined the constitutional revolution which broke out at Cadiz in 1812, and drew up the official report of that event. He was suddenly arrested by Ferdinand VII., and sent to the galleys for ten years, by the king's arbitrary authority. He refused subscriptions from the English, on the ground that they had deserted or betrayed Spanish liberty.

ARGUSTIN, ANTONIO, a Spanish antiquarian, born at Saragossa, in 1517; author of "Dialogos de las Medallas."

ARGYROPYLUS, JOHN, one of the learned men who, in the 15th century, under the patronage of the Medici, contributed to the revival of Greek learning. In addition to his exertions as a teacher and lecturer, he published translations from Aristotle, and a commentary on the Ethics of that philosopher.

ARI FRODE, an Icelandic scholar of the 11th century, and the earliest of the Northern historians. Of his numerous writings only the Schedæ and Landnamalok remain.

ARIOSTI, ATTILIO, a Bolognese composer, who gave lessons to Handel, with whom and Bononcini, he composed the well-known opera of Muzio Scevola.

ARIOSTO, LUDOVICO, one of the most celebrated of the Italian poets, was born at Reggio, in Lombardy, and even in his childhood evinced his poetic genius. At Ferrara, where he was educated, he greatly distinguished himself; but his studies were directed less towards the law, for which profession he was intended, than towards literature. The cardinal Ippolito d' Este became his patron, but seems to have valued him rather as a scholar and man of business than as a poet; for when Ariosto presented a copy of his immortal Orlando, the cardinal inquired, "Where did you pick up this trumpery, master Ludovico?" Ariosto's writings were very numerous and various, but the "Orlando Furioso" is the basis of his fame. Born, 1474; died, 1533.

ARIOSTO, GABRIEL, brother of the above; very inferior to him in genius, but a respectable Latin poet. His works were published at Ferrara, in 1582.

ARIOSTO, HORACE, son of the last named; author of a poem entitled Alphæus, several comedies, and a defence of the Orlando against the criticism of Pellegrini.

ARISI, FRANCIS, an eminent advocate of Cremona; author of various works, of which the most valuable is his "Cremona Literata." Born, 1657; died, 1743.

ARISTENATUS, a Greek writer of the 4th century. He is praised by Ammianus Marcellinus; but is only known now by two books of Amatory Epistles, of some elegance.

ARISTARCHUS, a critic and grammarian, a native of Samothrace, who flourished about a century and a half B.C. Having settled at Alexandria, he was made tutor to the son of Ptolemy Philomater. His criticisms were so severe that his name has become proverbial. He died at Cyprus in his 72d year; as some assert, by voluntary starvation.

ARISTARCHUS, the Samian, a Greek philosopher, supposed to have flourished about four centuries B.C. He is said to be the first who knew of the earth's rotatory motion on its own axis; and a work of his, of which an edition in Greek and Latin was published by Dr. Wallis, in 1688, treats of the magnitude and distance of the sun and moon.

ARISTEAS, a Jew, in the employment of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He is said to have assisted in the Septuagint translation of the Bible; and a history of it is attributed to him, but on no satisfactory grounds.

ARISTIDES, an Athenian patriot, whose unbending integrity procured him the name of "The Just." He was a great admirer of the laws of Lycurgus, and opposed to the headlong democracy of the party headed by Themistocles. At the battle of Marathon he was next in command to Miltiades, and bore himself with great intrepidity. This caused him to be made archon in the following year; but his rigid integrity in this station led to so strong an opposition by the popular party, that he was ostracised. He was recalled from banishment to oppose the Persians under Xerxes, and, both at Salamis and Platæa, exerted himself to the utmost to serve and save his country. A still higher proof was given of his love of justice by his efforts, though ineffectual, to save his rival, Themistocles, from banishment; and by the fact, that though he had borne all the highest offices of the state, he was very poor at his death, which took place in 467 B. C.

ARISTIDES, ÆLIUS, a native of Adriani, in Mysia; an orator of great practice and ability during the reigns of Antoninus, Aurelius, and Commodus. An edition of his works was published in two 4to. volumes, Oxford, 1722.

ARISTIDES, a Christian philosopher, of Athens, in the 2nd century. Jerome praises his "Apology for the Christian Faith," but none of his writings are known to be extant.

ARISTIDES, a painter of Thebes in the 3rd century B. C., famous for his power of representing the passions.

ARISTIDES, QUINTILIAN, a Greek musician, who, about the year 130, wrote a treatise on the music of his country.

ARISTIDES, of Miletus, an historian often mentioned by Plutarch; but his works were replete with licentious tales.

ARISTIPPUS, founder of the Cyrenaic sect of philosophers, was born at Cyrene about four centuries B. C. He became a pupil of Socrates, but his mode of life was so effeminate as to induce that great man to compose the lecture on pleasures, which is preserved in the Memorabilia of Xenophon. Excellent as that lecture is, it had little effect on Aristippus; who, both in lecturing and living, made pleasure the chief good. At Corinth he was the companion of the courtesan Lais; and, at Syracuse, he was favoured by the tyrant Dionysius, to whom, in common with many other philosophers, he paid his court. He established a school of philosophy at Cyrene, which continued for about a century, when it was merged into the sect of Epicurus.

ARISTO, of Chios, a stoic philosopher, B. C. 260, who held logic to be useless and physics incomprehensible.

ARISTO, an Aristotelian philosopher, of Ceos, B. C. 230. A work of his, entitled "Amatory Similies," is cited by Athenæus.

ARISTOGITON, a citizen of Athens, B. C. 516, who was executed, after being horribly treated, for conspiring with his friend Harmodius to slay the tyrants Hippias and Hipparchus. Hipparchus they succeeded in slaying; and Hippias, who put Aristogiton to death, was expelled the state about three years afterwards, when the statues of Aristogiton and Harmodius were placed in the forum, and it was decreed that no slave should ever bear the name of either.

ARISTOMENES, a Greek, son of Nicomedes, a descendant of the regal family of Messene, whose exertions caused the Messenians, in conjunction with the Arcadians and Argives, to commence the second Messenian war, B. C. 685, in order to shake off the yoke of Sparta. The Messenians, however, were unsuccessful, and went over to Sicily, where they founded the city of Messina.

ARISTOPHANES, a dramatic poet of Athens, contemporary with Socrates, Plato, &c. in the 5th century, B. C. His comedies were marked by a severity of satire which made him at once feared and popular; and his description of Athenian manners was so exact, that when Dionysius, of Syracuse, wished to study the language and manners of Athens, Plato sent him the comedies of Aristophanes as the readiest means of doing so. Like most satirists, Aristophanes was unjustly personal, and his comedy of "The Clouds" was written in obvious desire to ridicule Socrates. He is said to have written fifty-four comedies, but of these only eleven remain, of which the critics deem "Plutus" the most perfect. Though his wit was debased by licentiousness, and his satire by personality, his style was beautiful. The time of his death is unknown.

ARISTOTLE, the great founder of the peripatetic sect of philosophers, was born at Stagira, in Thrace, B. C. 384. At the age of 17, he became a pupil of Plato, who called him the "mind" of his school. The fame of his abilities having reached Philip of Macedon, that prince made him tutor to his son, Alexander the Great; and he so carefully attended the young prince, that Philip rebuilt the town of Stagira, which he had razed, and restored the expelled inhabitants to their town and privileges. When Alexander set out on his expedition to Asia, Aristotle returned to Athens, and obtained leave to occupy the Lyceum as a school of philosophy, where he established the sect called, from his habit of walking as he lectured, the peripatetic. Envy of his abilities caused him to be accused of impiety, and he retired to Chalcis, remarking, in allusion to the judicial murder of Socrates, that he did not wish to see the Athenians a second time guilty of crime against philosophy. He remained at Chalcis till his death, in the 63d year of his age, B. C. 323. His writings are numerous and various; and of the art of logic, especially of the syllogism, he may almost be called the inventor. Both in physics and metaphysics he had many erroneous opinions, but that was the fault of his age rather than of his individual intellect; and looking at the extent of his writings, and the value of by far the greater portion of them, we must hold him to rank very high indeed among the most intellectual of mankind.

ARISTOXENUS, a philosopher and musician, pupil of Aristotle. His works are said to have been very numerous, but none have come down to us except his Harmonic Elements, which is considered to be the oldest musical treatise existing.

ARIUS, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria in the 4th century. Having maintained that the Son and the Father were essentially distinct, and that the Son was created out of nothing by the will of the Father, Alexander the bishop, in opposition to whose preaching he broached this doctrine, called a council, in which the doctrine was condemned, and Arius, and those who sided with him, excommunicated. He was, after much discussion, recalled from banishment by the emperor Constantine, and was just about to be received again into the pale of the church, when he died suddenly. Of his writings, only two epistles are extant; and though there is a sect called "Arians," its doctrines are far more modified and less startling than those held by Arius.

ARK WRIGHT, SIR RICHARD, the inventor of machinery, by which our cotton manufactures have been increased to an almost incredible extent, was born at Preston, Lancashire, in 1732; and his first employment was that of a barber. Notwithstanding the obstacles thrown in his way at first by poverty and want of mechanical skill to reduce his inventions to practice, and afterwards by the unprincipled invasion of his rights by rival manufacturers, he realised a very large fortune; and his machines, but little improved upon, have been the cause of almost innumerable fortunes to be made by others. Mr. Arkwright was not knighted, as many suppose on account of his inventions, but on the occasion of presenting an address as high sheriff of the county of Derby, congratulating George III. on the failure of the attempt made on his life by Margaret Nicholson. Died, 1792.

ARLAND, JAMES ANTHONY, a Genevese painter of great merit. His last work was the "Amour of Jupiter with Leda," which, from some whim unexplained, he destroyed by cutting it to pieces. A copy of it was sold in the artist's lifetime for 600 guineas. Born, 1668; died, 1743.

ARLOTTO, MARNARDO, a facetious Florentine of the 15th century, and of whose witticisms a collection has been frequently printed, was a parish minister in the bishopric of Fiesole; who, though regarded as a religious buffoon by some, was as benevolent as he was jocose and witty. Born, 1395; died, 1483.

ARMELLINI, MARIAUD, a learned Dominican, born at Ancona, was the author of "Bibliotheca Benedictino Casinensis," and other works. Died, 1737.

ARMFELDT, GUSTAVUS MAURICE, Count, a Swedish statesman of some note. He was frequently involved in difficulties, but he surmounted them all, and at his death held several important offices in Russia. Died, 1814.

ARMINIUS, or HERMANN, who by his intrepidity and success acquired the title of "the Deliverer of Germany," was the son of Segimer, a chief of the Catti. Having been sent to Rome as a hostage, he was there educated, served in the Roman army, and for his valour was raised to citizenship and knighted. But his attachment to his native country induced him to revolt, and he became one of the most powerful leaders of the discontented German nations. He drew Varus, the Roman commander on the Rhine, into that ambuscade in which he and nearly all his troops were slain, and completely baffled Germanicus; but after having for years withstood the vast power of Rome, Arminius was assassinated by one of his own countrymen, in the 37th year of his age, A.D. 21.

ARMINIUS, JAMES, or HARMENSEN, a Dutch divine, was the founder of the sect of Christians called Arminians, whose distinguishing tenets are, that the merits of Christ extend to all mankind, and that the grace necessary to salvation is attainable by all. This striking opposition to the doctrines of Calvin, caused Arminius and his followers, who in Holland are called Remonstrants, to be much persecuted. He was learned, pious, eloquent, and the advocate of toleration. Born at Oudewater, in Holland, 1560; died, 1690.

ARMSTRONG, JOHN, a poet and physician, was born at Castleton, in Roxburghshire, in 1709. In 1760 he was appointed physician to the army in Germany; in 1771 he made the tour of Italy, with Fuseli the painter; and died in 1779. His chief work is the poem on "The Art of Preserving Health," which was very deservedly popular, and is, in fact, one of the best didactic poems in our language. His medical works and short poems had but limited success even in his own time. He lived on terms of intimacy with the wits and poets of the day, and contributed to Thomson's Castle of Indolence the beautiful stanzas descriptive of the diseases resulting from indolence.

ARMSTRONG, JOHN, a physician and medical writer, celebrated for his researches concerning the causes and phenomena of febrile diseases, was born at Bishopswearmouth, Durham, in 1784. He took his degree of M.D. at Edinburgh, in 1807, and was chosen physician to the Sutherland Dispensary in 1811; but finding that his professional works had blazoned his fame in the metropolis, he resigned his situation in 1818, and commenced practice in London. In 1821 he engaged with Mr. E. Grainger in the formation of a medical school in Webb Street, Borough, where he delivered lectures on the practice of physic. In 1826 he joined Dr. Boot and Mr. E. Bennett in establishing a new school of medicine in Dean Street, Soho, but shortly after relinquished his connection with it. He died in 1829, of phthisis pulmonalis. Few men were ever more anxiously devoted to the duties of their profession than Dr. Armstrong, and few have been so successful in their elucidation of medical science. His works are numerous, and highly valuable.

ARNALD, RICHARD, an English divine, author of "A Commentary on the Apocryphal Books." Died, 1756.

ARNALL, WILLIAM, a political writer during the ministry of Sir Robert Walpole. His chief work was the "Free Briton," in which the measures of Walpole were indiscriminately defended. He was a man of much talent, but great imprudence; for though he is said to have received 11,000*l.* in less than 5 years, he died in great poverty at the early age of 26, in 1741.

ARNAUD, DE MEREUIL, a Provençal poet of the 13th century. His chief productions were amatory songs and sonnets. Died, 1220.

ARNAUD, FRANCIS, a French divine and man of letters. He chiefly wrote for journals. Died, 1784.

ARNAULD, ANTHONY, a French lawyer, attorney-general to Catherine de Medici; author of "Avis au Roi Louis XIII. pour bien regner," and other works. Born, 1550; died, 1619.

ARNAULD, ROBERT, eldest son of the preceding, author of "Memoirs of his own time," and translator of the "Confessions of Saint Augustin." Born, 1589; died, 1674.

ARNAULD, ANTHONY, doctor of the Sorbonne, was brother of the preceding, and the 20th child of their parents. He deeply engaged in controversy with both Jesuits and Jansenists; and in addition to his numerous controversial and theological works, he wrote much in the belles lettres and philosophy. Born, 1612; died, 1694.

ARNDT, CHRISTIAN, logical professor at Rostock, in Germany; author of "Observations on the right use of Logic in Divinity," &c. Born, 1623; died, 1683.

ARNDT, JOSIUA, brother of the above, and his successor in the chair at Rostock; author of a "Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Antiquities," and other valuable works. Born, 1626; died, 1685.

ARNDT, C. GOTTLIEB VON, imperial Russian councillor, assistant to the empress Catherine II. in her literary employment, and author of a learned work on "The Origin of European Dialects," published in 1318. He died at Heidelberg in 1829.

ARNDT, CHARLES, son of the last-named, Hebrew professor at Rostock; author of Philological Discourses, Bibliotheca Politico-Heraldica, &c. Born, 1673; died, 1781.

ARNDT, JOHN, a native of Anhalt; author of a treatise on true Christianity. Born, 1555; died, 1621.

ARNE, Dr. THOMAS AUGUSTINE, a celebrated composer of music. At the early age of 18, he produced an opera entitled "Rosamond," and shortly afterwards composed the music for a masque, entitled "Alfred," written by Thompson and Mallet. On the masque of Comus being adapted to the stage, Arne's music for it obtained him so high a reputation, and such constant employment, that a mere catalogue of the various works he was subsequently the author of, would demand a far larger space than we can afford. His sister was the celebrated Mrs. Cibber. Born, 1704; died, 1778.

ARNE, MICHAEL, son of the preceding, and, like him, a musical composer; author of the music of Alemena and of Cymon.

ARNIGIO, BARTHOLOMEW, an Italian poet, was originally a blacksmith, but at 18 years of age he devoted himself to literature, and distinguished himself so much, that the University of Padua gave him the degree of doctor. As a physician, which profession he followed, he was far less distinguished than as a poet. His works are numerous. Born, 1523; died, 1577.

ARNIM, LUDWIG ACHIN VON, a German poet, and writer of romances, was born at Berlin, studied at Gottingen, and passed his life in literary leisure and independence, at Heidelberg, Berlin, and his country seat. His chief works are "Ariel's Offenbarungen," "Der Knabe Wunderhorn," "Der Wintergarten," "Grafin Dolores," "Die Kronenwächter," "Die Gleichen." Died, 1831. His wife, Bettina Brentano, is still more celebrated than himself, both from her own writings, and the interesting relation in which, when a child, she stood to the illustrious Goethe.

ARNOBIUS, an African rhetorician at Sicca, in the 3rd century. He embraced the Christian religion, and published a defence of it, which has been frequently reprinted.

ARNOLD, BENEDICT, an American general, who during the early part of his career, devoted his best energies to promote the cause he had espoused, and who afterwards disgraced himself by treacherously betraying it, was bred a surgeon; but on the commencement of hostilities between Great Britain and the colonies, he entered into the service of the latter, and was chosen captain of a company of volunteers at Newhaven. He soon rose to the rank of colonel, and commanded an expedition to Canada. He afterwards distinguished himself by his bravery, when commanding a flotilla on Lake Champlain, and on other occasions, and was promoted to the rank of general. He subsequently entered into negotiations with General Clinton, to whom he proposed to surrender a post of great consequence, with which Washington had entrusted him. But the capture of the officer [see ANDRÉ] sent by General Clinton, caused the plot to be discovered, and Arnold hastily escaped to the royalist quarters. He was employed under General Clinton against his former comrades, and had the rank of brigadier-general, when he retired to England, where he died, in 1801.

ARNOLD, CHRISTOPHER, a German peasant, whose energy and natural genius enabled him to become one of the most accomplished astronomers of his age. The only work he left was entitled "Signs of Divine Grace, exhibited in a Solar Miracle." Born, 1648; died, 1695.

ARNOLD, JOHN, an English watchmaker, and author of many inventions towards the accurate mensuration of time. Born, 1744; died, 1799.

ARNOLD, JOHN, a miller, celebrated in consequence of the interference on his behalf of Frederic the Great of Prussia. Believing that Arnold had been wronged of territorial land, by the decision against him of a lawsuit, Frederic reversed the sentence, and imprisoned the judges.

ARNOLD, Dr. SAMUEL, a musical composer of eminence. He edited the works of Handel, and composed the "Prodigal Son," and other excellent oratorios. His opera of the "Maid of the Mill" still keeps the stage. Born, 1739; died, 1802.

ARNOLD, THOMAS, an English physician, eminent for his skill in the treatment of mental insanity. He was the author of "Observations on the Management of the Insane," "A Case of Hydrophobia successfully treated," &c. Born, 1742; died, 1816.

ARNOLD, Rev. THOMAS, D.D., head-master of Rugby School, and professor of modern history in the university of Oxford, was born at Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, and educated at Winchester and Corpus Christi College, Oxford. Dr. Arnold was a most accomplished scholar, a successful instructor of youth, and an author of sterling value. In proof of the latter it is necessary only to mention his admirable History of Rome, his edition of Thucydides, and his various pamphlets on political and ecclesiastical subjects. From the time of his appointment to the head-mastership at Rugby, in 1828, the school, which had previously been at a low ebb, rose rapidly in public estimation, and at his death contained about 370 boys, including those on the foundation. Died, June, 1842, in the 47th year of his age.

ARNOLDE, RICHARD, a citizen of London in the 16th century, and author of a work entitled "Arnolde's Chronicle," containing much valuable information.

ARNOT, HUGO, an eminent Scottish writer. He was educated for the bar, but illness rendering him unfit for so laborious a profession, he devoted himself to literature. His "History of Edinburgh," and collection of celebrated criminal trials, show him to have possessed very considerable abilities. Born, 1749; died, 1786.

ARNOUL, an eminent French prelate of the 12th century; author of various works in prose and verse, to be found in the Spicilegium of D'Acheri and the Bibliotheca Patrum.

ARNOULT, an eminent Parisian actress and wit. She was admired by D'Alembert, Rousseau, and other literati of her time. Born, 1740; died, 1802.

ARNOULT, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French Jesuit and author. The most valuable of his works is "Le Précepteur," which was the model of Dodsley's Preceptor. Born, 1689; died, 1753.

ARNULPH, or ERNULPHUS, bishop of Rochester in the reign of Henry I.; author of "Textus Roffensis," an account of the charters, &c., of his cathedral. Died, 1124.

AROMATRI, JOSEPH, an Italian physician; author of "Riposte alle Considerazioni di Alessandro Tassoni sopra le Rime del Petrarca." Born, 1686; died, 1690.

ARPINO, JOSEPHINO, an Italian painter, patronised by pope Gregory XIII. Born, 1560; died, 1640.

ARRIA, a Roman lady, who, when her husband, Cæcina Pætus, was ordered to put himself to death, for rebellion against the emperor Claudius, perceiving him hesitate, plunged a dagger into her bosom, exclaiming, "My Pætus! it is not painful."

ARRIAN, a Greek historian, who took up his residence at Rome in the 2nd century. He was patronised by the emperor Adrian; and the younger Pliny admired him so much as to address to him no fewer than seven of his epistles. The historical writings of Arrian were numerous, but two of them only remain entire, viz. seven books on the expedition of Alexander, and a book on the affairs of India; the latter being a sequel to the former. There are some historical fragments of Arrian in Photius. In addition to the above, we have, of Arrian's writings, "Enchiridion," a moral treatise, an epistle to Adrian, &c.

ARRIBAVENE, JOHN FRANCIS, an Italian poet of the 16th century; author of "Maritime Eclogues," &c.

ARRIGHETTI, PHILIP, an ecclesiastic of Florence; author of a life of St. Francis, and translator of the Rhetoric and Poetics of Aristotle into Italian. Born, 1582; died, 1662.

ARRIGHETTO, or ARIGGO, HENRY, a Florentine poet and ecclesiastic of the 12th century. His poems are still popular for their pathos and elegance of style.

ARROWSMITH, AARON, an eminent geographer and hydrographer. His maps and charts are very numerous, and held in high estimation; and his tract, entitled "A Companion to the Map of the World," contains much valuable information. Born, 1750; died, 1823.

ARSACES I., the founder of the Parthian monarchy, and of the dynasty of the Arsacides, flourished in the 3rd century B.C. In revenge for an ungrateful insult offered to his brother by the governor of a province, he raised the standard of revolt in Parthia against Seleucus; and, having succeeded in emancipating his countrymen, they elected him their king. He reigned prosperously for 38 years.

ARSENIUS, a Roman deacon of the 4th century, and tutor to Arcadius, son of Theodosius. The emperor coming into his study, and seeing the pupil sitting and the master standing, ordered his son to rise, and receive his lessons in a becoming posture, which so irritated the prince, that he directed an officer to dispatch Arsenius; but the officer gave him information of the prince's baseness; on which he fled into Egypt, where he died at the age of 95.

ARSILLI, FRANCESCO, an Italian physician of the 16th century; author of a poem "De Poetis Urbanis." Died, 1540.

ARTALIS, JOSEPH, a Sicilian gentleman, who distinguished himself for courage at the memorable siege of Candia; author of "La Pasife," an opera, and numerous poems. Born, 1628; died, 1679.

ARTAXERXES I. surnamed Longimanus, was the third son of Xerxes, king of Persia. He slew his brother Darius on suspicion of his being guilty of the murder of his father. Artaxerxes then ascended the throne B.C. 465, and in his time peace was restored between Persia and Athens, after a war of 51 years. He died B.C. 424.

ARTAXERXES II., surnamed Mnemon, was the eldest son of Darius Nothus, and began his reign B.C. 404. He died at the age of 94, after reigning 62 years.

ARTAXERXES III., succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, B.C. 359. He murdered two of his brothers, and afterwards put to death all the remaining branches of the family. In Egypt he slew the sacred bull Apis, and gave the flesh to his soldiers; for which his eunuch, Bagoas, an Egyptian, caused him to be poisoned, and after giving the carcase to the cats, made knife handles of his bones. This happened B.C. 338.

ARTAXERXES BEBEGAN, or ARD-SHIR, the first king of Persia, of the race of Sassanides, was the son of a shepherd. On the death of his grandfather he solicited the government, but being refused, he retired to Persia Proper, where he excited the people to revolt. He defeated and slew Ardavan and his son. He married the daughter of Ardavan, who attempted to poison him, for which she was sentenced to death. The officer, however, to whom the execution was committed, concealed the queen, who was in a state of pregnancy, and she was afterwards delivered of a son. The secret being discovered to the king, he applauded the conduct of the officer, and acknowledged the child as his heir. He died, A. D. 240.

ARTEAGA, STEPHEN, a Spanish Jesuit of the 18th century; author of a treatise on Ideal Beauty; a history of Italian theatrical music, &c. Died, 1799.

ARTEDI, PETER, a Swedish physician and naturalist. After his death, his "Bibliotheca Ichthyologica" and "Philosophia Ichthyologica" were edited by Linnæus. Born, 1705; accidentally drowned, 1735.

ARTEMIDORUS, DALDIANUS, an Ephesian; author of a Treatise on Dreams. He lived in the reign of Antoninus Pius.

ARTEMIDORUS, also an Ephesian; author of a geographical work, of which only some fragments remain. He flourished in the 1st century B. C.

ARTEMISIA, queen of Caira, and one of the allies of Xerxes at the famous battle of Salamis.

ARTEMISIA another queen of Caira, whose splendid monument to her husband, Mausolus, was the origin of the word mausoleum. Died, 351 B. C.

ARTEMON, the inventor of the battering ram and the testudo, was a native of Clazomene, and cotemporary with Pericles.

ARTEVELLE, JAMES, a rich brewer, of Ghent, who by his wealth, eloquence, and talents, acquired unbounded influence over his countrymen. Having compelled the Count of Flanders to take refuge in France, he formed an alliance with Edward III. of England, and strove to transfer the Flemish sovereignty to the Black Prince. Killed, in a popular tumult, at Ghent, in 1345.

ARTEVELLE, PHILIP, son of the preceding, was chosen by the Flemings as their leader when they revolted against their count in 1382; but after having made himself master of Bruges, he was defeated and killed at the battle of Rosbecq in the same year.

ARTHUR, a British prince, whose history is so interwoven with romance, that it is difficult to separate the one from the other. He is stated to have succeeded to the rule of Britain, A. D. 516; and to have been slain in combat with his nephew, Mordred, in 542.

ARTIGAS, DON JOHN, born at Monte Video, in 1760; first entered the Spanish service; quitted it, and was foremost among those who fought for independence. He subsequently, however, became an object of suspicion to the government of Buenos Ayres; and, being declared a traitor, took up arms, and possessed himself for some years of the territory called the Banda Oriental; but having sustained a defeat he was compelled to seek refuge in Paraguay, where he died in 1826.

ARTIZENIUS, HENRY, professor of rhetoric and history at Nimeguen; author of a treatise "De Nuptiis inter Fratrem et Sororem," &c. Born, 1702; died, 1759.

ARTIZENIUS, JOHN HENRY, son of the above, professor of law at Utrecht; author of a work "On the Jurisprudence of the Netherlands," and editor of the works of Arator, &c. Born, 1734; died, 1797.

ARTIZENIUS, OTHO, paternal uncle of the last named, professor of the Belles Lettres at Amsterdam; author of a dissertation "De Milliaro Aureo," &c. Born, 1703; died, 1763.

ARTUSI, GIOVANNI MARIA, an ecclesiastic of Bologna; author of "The Art of Counterpoint," and other musical works.

ARUNDEL, MARY, Countess of, a learned lady of the 16th century. She translated the apophthegms of the seven wise philosophers from the Greek into Latin.

ARUNDEL, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury in the reigns of Richard II. and Henry IV. and V., a persecutor of the Lollards and Wickliffites, and a chief party in procuring the horrible act De Heretico Comburendo. Born, 1353; died, 1418.

ARUNDEL, THOMAS HOWARD, Earl of, lived in the reigns of James I. and Charles I.; but he left England at the beginning of the civil wars, and died at Padua, in 1646. The celebrated Arundelian marbles, presented to the university of Oxford by his grandson, were, with many other valuable relics of antiquity, brought from the Levant at his expense.

ARUNDEL, BLANCHE, daughter of the Earl of Worcester, and wife of Lord Arundel; is memorable for having defended Wardour Castle against the parliamentary army under Sir Edward Hungerford. Born, 1583; died, 1649.

ASAPH, St., a British monk of the 5th century, author of the Life of Vortigern, &c. It is from this saint that the Welsh see has its name.

ASCHAM, ROGER, a learned Englishman of the 16th century, who had the honour of directing the studies of queen Elizabeth. Of his writings, the most valuable is his treatise, entitled "The Schoolmaster." Died, 1568.

ASCIAM, ANTHONY, sent by Cromwell, in 1650, as envoy to Spain, where he and his interpreter were assassinated by some royalist exiles. He was author of a "Discourse on the Revolutions and Confusions of Governments."

ASCLEPIADES, a Greek physician; author of "Commentaries on Hippocrates," &c. Died, B. C. 63.

ASCOLI, LECCO DI, a Bolognese mathematician of the 14th century; burned to death at Florence, on an accusation of heresy, in 1358.

ASDRUBAL, the son-in-law and successor of Amilcar, the father of Hannibal, in the command of the Carthaginian army in Spain. He extended their conquests in that country, and built New Carthage, now Carthage. After governing there for eight years, he died by assassination, B. C. 220.

ASELLI, CASPAR, an Italian anatomist of the 17th century. He first discovered the system of vessels called lacteals.

ASGILL, Sir CHARLES, a military officer, who was to have suffered death by order of Washington, in retaliation for the death of the American captain Hardy, but was spared at the intercession of the queen of France. Died, 1823.

ASGILL, JOHN, an English barrister, expelled from parliament on account of his blasphemous writings. He fell into poverty, and, for about 30 years, remained a prisoner for debt in the King's Bench. Died, 1783.

ASH, JOHN, LL.D., an Anabaptist divine; author of a well known English dictionary. Born, 1724; died, 1779.

ASHBURTON, ALEXANDER BARING, Lord, the second son of Sir Francis Baring, bart., and for many years the head of the great mercantile house, Baring Brothers and Co., was born in 1774. After due initiation into business in London, he proceeded to the United States to conduct the Transatlantic department of the concern, where he acquired all that special information and general knowledge which he afterwards turned to account in the consolidation of his fortune, and ultimately in the political service of his country. His political life commenced in 1812 as member for Taunton, which he continued to represent till 1820; after which he sat for Callington in successive parliaments till 1831, and in 1832 he was returned for North Essex. Lord Ashburton commenced life as a Whig. In the House of Commons he spoke frequently on all subjects directly or indirectly connected with commerce; and, as might have been expected, his position procured him a deferential hearing even from those who were most opposed to his views. On the formation of the Peel ministry in 1834, he became president of the Board of Trade; and in 1835 he was raised to the peerage. In 1842 he was appointed by Sir Robert Peel as a special commissioner to settle the disputes about the Oregon territory, which then threatened to involve this country in a war with America; and it is but fair to admit that the success of his mission was eminently owing to his personal influence. Lord Ashburton continued to support the policy of Sir Robert Peel, until the final measure of free trade in corn was proposed in 1846. His position as a peer and a great landowner probably induced him to view with a different eye the consequences of a measure, to which as a mere merchant he would have lent his support; but whatever might be his motives, certain it is that he became strenuously opposed to a free trade in corn, which a great part of his life had been spent in promoting. During a long life devoted to activity, both mercantile and senatorial, he found leisure to cultivate the fine arts, of which he was a most liberal patron; and his collection of ancient pictures was unsurpassed by that of any private individual in the empire. Lord Ashburton married, in 1798, the daughter of William Bingham, esq., of Philadelphia, and by that lady, who survived him, he left a numerous family. Died, May 13, 1848.

ASHMOLE, ELIAS, a celebrated English antiquary of the 17th century. Misled by the notorious Dr. Dee, he dabbled for a time in alchemy; but fortunately for both his fame and fortune he abandoned that delusive pursuit, and began to collect materials for the admirable "History of the Order of the Garter," which he afterwards published. Having obtained, by deed of gift, the curiosities of Tradescant, the famous gardener, he presented them, and subsequently his books and MSS., to the university of Oxford; and thus laid the foundation of the valuable Ashmolean Museum. Born, 1617; died, 1692.

ASHWELL, GEORGE, an English divine of the 17th century; author of several religious works. Born, 1612; died, 1693.

ASKEW, ANNE, one of the victims of the horrible persecutions in the time of Henry VIII. She was burned to death, having previously undergone the torture of the rack, in 1646.

ASKEW, ANTHONY, a physician and scholar of the 18th century; author of an appendix to the Greek Lexicon of Scapula, &c. Born at Kendal, 1722; died, 1784.

ASPASIA, a celebrated Greek lady, a native of Miletus, frequently but erroneously designated as a courtesan, whose beauty and accomplishments had so powerful an influence, that she numbered even the grave and moral Socrates among her acquaintance; and to marry her the great Pericles divorced his wife.

ASPINWALL, WILLIAM, an American physician, was born in 1743, in Massachusetts, and took his degree at Harvard College, where he was educated. In the war of independence he was appointed a surgeon in the army; and at the battle of Lexington he fought as a volunteer. He was greatly instrumental in promoting inoculation for the small-pox; yet when vaccine inoculation was introduced, he warmly adopted the practice, although it greatly reduced his professional emoluments. Died, 1823.

ASSELYN, JOHN, a Dutch painter: who chiefly excelled in battle-pieces and historical paintings. Born, 1610; died, 1650.

ASSEMANI, STEPHEN, nephew of the preceding; keeper of the Vatican library, and author of "Acta Sanctorum Martyrum."

ASSER, a rabbi of the 5th century; one of the compilers of the Babylonian Talmud. Died, 427.

ASSERIUS MENEVENSIS, a learned ecclesiastic, the tutor, friend, and biographer of Alfred the Great, by whom he was made bishop of Sherborne. His "Annals" contain, at once, the fullest and most authentic account of the life of his august sovereign and friend. Died, 909.

ASTELL, MARY, the daughter of a merchant at Newcastle, and a woman of very considerable talent as a polemical disputant. She obtained great popularity among the high church party as one of the most strenuous impugnors of the principles of Locke. Born, 1668; died, 1731.

ASTLE, THOMAS, an eminent archæological writer; author of a treatise "On the Origin and Progress of Writing," &c. &c. Died, 1803.

ASTLEY, PHILIP, author of "Remarks on the Profession and Duty of a Soldier," "A System of Equestrian Education," &c.; but better known as the founder, and for many years the manager, of the Amphitheatre, near Westminster Bridge. Born, 1742; died, 1814.

ASTON, SIR ARTHUR, a brave commander of the royalist troops in the reign of Charles I., who greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Edge-hill, &c. He was governor of Drogheda in 1649, when it was taken by Cromwell, and is said to have had his brains beaten out with his own wooden leg.

ASTON, Sir THOMAS, a brave and loyal subject, who, in the civil wars, raised a troop of horse for the king's service; and was high sheriff of Cheshire, in 1635. He was killed while attempting to escape after being captured by the republicans, in 1645.

ASTORGA, Marquis, a Spanish grandee, declared a traitor by Napoleon in 1808.

ASTORI, JOHN ANTHONY, a Venetian scholar of the 17th century; author of numerous dissertations on Greek and Roman literature.

ASTORINI, ELIAS, a Neapolitan professor of mathematics; author of a translation of Euclid, and a Dissertation on the Life of the Fœtus, &c. Died, 1702.

ASTRUC, JOHN, an eminent French physician of the 17th century; author of the Natural History of Languedoc, some medical treatises, &c. Born, 1684; died, 1766.

ATAHUALPA, sometimes written ATABALIPA, the last inca of Peru, who was barbarously put to death by the Spaniards, in 1553.

ATAIDE, DOM LOUIS OF, a Portuguese noble and military officer, who was appointed viceroy of India in 1569, at a period when all the native powers were combined to expel the Portuguese. His efforts to quell the revolt were successful, and he returned; but on being sent out a second time, he died at Goa, 1580.

ATANAGI, DENIS, an Italian author and editor, of the 16th century. Among his works are a "Treatise on the Excellence of History;" an edition of the Rhetoric of Aristotle, &c.

ATHANASIUS, St., one of the fathers of the Christian Church, was a native of Egypt, and successor of Alexander in the bishopric of Alexandria. His defence of the doctrine of the Trinity against Arius and his followers involved him in much difficulty and suffering, which he bore with extraordinary patience and fortitude. Of his numerous writings the most valuable are "The Abridgment of the Scriptures," and "The Life of St. Anthony." The creed called by his name is supposed by many to have been written long after his death. Born, 296; died, 373.

ATHELSTAN, an illegitimate son of Edward the Elder, and his successor on the throne of England, in 925.

ATHENAGORAS, an Athenian philosopher of the 2nd century. He became a convert to Christianity, and Clement of Alexandria was among his pupils. He wrote an "Apology for the Christians," and a treatise "On the Resurrection of the Dead."

ATHENÆUS, a learned grammarian, born at Naucratis, in Egypt, in the 3rd century. The only work of his now extant is "The Deipnosophists, or the Table Talk of the Sophists."

ATHENÆUS, of Byzantium, an engineer in the time of the emperor Gallienus; author of a treatise on the Machines of War.

ATHENAS, empress of the West, the daughter of an Athenian sophist, but whose learning and beauty induced Theodosius the Younger to marry her, and she took the name of Eudoxia. The emperor, however, became jealous of her, and she was banished to Jerusalem, where she died, in 430. Among her writings was a poetical translation of part of the Old Testament.

ATHIAS, JOSEPH, a Jewish printer of Amsterdam in the 17th century; editor of the Bible in Hebrew, English, Spanish, and German.

ATHOL, JOHN MURRAY, Duke of, is chiefly remarkable for the events which rose out of his hereditary connection with the Isle of Man. In 1781 he petitioned parliament, complaining of his father's transfer of the sovereignty of that island to the English crown in 1765, for the sum of 70,000*l.*, and an annuity of 2,000*l.* during the lives of him and his duchess, and praying for a bill to amend it. The question was lost in consequence of a counter-petition from the island; but the duke was named captain-general and governor-in-chief of the Isle of Man, from Feb. 4, 1793. In 1805 he presented another petition, which met with great opposition on the part of the inhabitants of the island. However, a grant of one-fourth of the customs was made to the duke, in hereditary succession, with an increase of the annuity. He died in 1830, aged 75.

ATKINSON, THOMAS, a miscellaneous writer of some note, was born at Glasgow 1801. Among other works, he published (in two senses, for he was a bookseller as well as an author) the Chameleon and the Ant, a weekly periodical, and was an extensive contributor to many of the local publications. Died on his way to Barbadoes, 1833.

ATKINS, Sir ROBERT, a distinguished lawyer and patriot, who aided in the defence of Lord William Russell, and conducted that of Sir W. Williams, speaker of the House of Commons, when prosecuted for signing the orders to print Dangerfield's narrative of the Popish Plot. He also distinguished himself by his opposition to the arbitrary measures of James II., and at the Revolution was made chief baron of the Exchequer. He subsequently was made speaker, which office he held till 1693. Born, 1621; died, 1709.

ATKINS, Sir ROBERT, son of the above, author of "The ancient and present State of Gloucester." Born, 1646; died, 1711.

ATKINS, RICHARD, of the same family with the above; author of the "Origin and Growth of Printing." Died, 1677.

ATRATUS, HUGO, an English cardinal of the 13th century; a skilful mathematician and natural philosopher; author of "Canones Medicinales," &c.

ATTARDI, BOXAVENTURE, provincial of the Augustines in Sicily and Malta, in the 18th century; author of "Bilancia della Verita," &c.

ATTENDOLO, DARIUS, a military officer of the 16th century; author of a "History of Duelling," Poems, &c.

ATTENDOLO, JOHN BAPTIST, a secular priest and poet of Naples; author of "Observations on the Poetical Works of Petrarch," &c. Died, 1592.

ATTERBURY, FRANCIS, an English prelate, and a preacher of consummate abilities, was born in 1662, at Milton Keynes, near Newport Pagnell, and was educated at Westminster School, whence he was sent to Christ Church, Oxford. In 1691 he took holy orders, and in 1693 was made chaplain in ordinary to the king, and lecturer at St. Bride's. In these situations, and as preacher at Bridewell, he attracted much notice by the eloquence of his discourses; but his constant advocacy of high church principles exposed him to the attacks of Hoadley, and often of others of less repute. In 1700 he began a controversy on the powers and rights of convocations, in which he acquitted himself so much to the satisfaction of the party with which he sided, that he received the degree of D. D., and the thanks of the lower house of convocation. On the accession of queen Anne, he was made her chaplain in ordinary, and shortly afterwards he received the deanery of Carlisle. His rise henceforth was rapid: he was successively made preacher at the Rolls Chapel, a canon of Exeter, dean of Christ Church, bishop of Rochester, and dean of Westminster, which last preferment he owed to the recommendation of Lord Oxford. Hitherto his course had been invariably prosperous; but the death of queen Anne altered the whole complexion of his circumstances. His high church principles were sufficiently well known; and it is asserted that he was imprudent enough to boast, that if a sufficient guard could be obtained, he would proclaim the Pretender, and that too in full canonicals. Be this true or false, it is certain that he took several occasions to render himself obnoxious to George I., and was sufficiently active in correspondence with the friends of the Pretender to involve himself in a "Bill of Pains and Penalties." He died an exile, at Paris, in 1731.

ATTERBURY, LEWIS, LL. D., elder brother of the above; author of some sermons, tracts against Popery, &c. Born, 1656; died, 1731.

ATTICUS, son of Julius Atticus, and a descendant from the family of Miltiades, acquired so much reputation as a teacher of eloquence at Athens, that he was invited by Titus Antoninus to superintend the education of his adopted sons Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. He subsequently became consul, prefect of the free cities of Asia, &c. He employed his great wealth in public works; but at the close of his life he retired to Marathon, his native place, where he died, A. D. 185.

ATTICUS, TITUS POMPONIUS, a Roman knight, whose vast wealth enabled him to aid men of all parties, while his prudence prevented him from siding with any of them in their public measures. He thus escaped injury amid the contentions of Cinna and Marius, Cæsar and Pompey, and in the horrible times of the Triumvirate. Of the ability and influence of Atticus, we may form some opinion from the correspondence between him and Cicero. He is said to have written "Annals" of great value; but it is for his prudence, his wealth, and, above all, his friendship with Cicero, that he is now remembered. Died, B. C. 33, aged 77.

ATTILA, king of the Huns, surnamed the Scourge of God. His ruling passion was war; and the Romans learned to tremble at his name, so terrible were the injuries he inflicted on them. On the last occasion of his invading Italy, he spread terror and desolation over all Lombardy, and the fugitives thence founded the afterwards mighty city of Venice. Died, 453.

ATTIRET, JOHN FRANCIS, a French Jesuit and painter. Being appointed missionary to Pekin, he acquired great favour with the emperor Kien Long, of whose gardens he wrote a very amusing account. Born, 1702; died, 1768.

ATWOOD, GEORGE, F. R. S., an eminent mathematician; author of a "Dissertation on the Construction and Properties of Arches," and many other valuable works on mechanical and mathematical science. Born, 1745; died, 1807.

ATWOOD, THOMAS, an eminent musician and composer, born in London, in 1767; commenced his musical education under Dr. Nares, in the choir of the chapel royal, where he early attracted the notice, and gained the patronage of the royal family. In 1783 he set out for Naples, and after studying for a time with Filippo Cinque and Latilla, he proceeded to Vienna, where he reaped great advantages from the celebrated Mozart. In 1796 he was appointed organist of St. Paul's cathedral, and composer to the chapel royal; he also held the situation of organist at the chapel of the Pavilion, Brighton. His compositions consist of several dramatic pieces, numerous services and anthems, songs, glees, sonatas, and other pieces for the pianoforte. He died March 24, 1838, and was buried in St. Paul's.

AUBAT, ABRE, censeur royal in 1784; a sarcastic French fabulist, whom Voltaire pronounces first after La Fontaine.

AUBLET, J. B. C. F., an able French botanist; author of "Histoires des Plantes de la Guienne Française." Born, 1720; died, 1778. It was in honour of him that Linnæus gave the name of Verbena Aubletia to a species of vervain.

AUBREY, JOHN, an eminent English topographer and antiquary of the 17th century. He left a vast number of MSS., evincing great research; but he only published one work, entitled "Miscellanies," a collection of popular superstitions. Many of his MSS. are in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. Died, about 1700.

AUBRIET, CLAUDE, a French painter of natural history subjects. Died, 1740.

AUBRIOT, HUGH, a French merchant, mayor of Paris, and superintendent of finance to Charles V. He was imprisoned for heresy, but the populace, who had risen against the taxes termed Maillotins, released him, and he escaped to Burgundy. It was from him that the French reformers had the name of Huguenots.

AUBRY DE MONTDIDIER, a French knight of the time of Charles V., who, according to tradition, was basely murdered, in 1371, by his companion in arms, Richard de Macaire. The murder was discovered by means of a dog of the deceased, who showed the most hostile disposition to the murderer. The king compelled Macaire to fight with his accuser, the dog, in order to decide the case; and the murderer was conquered. From this story the drama of "The Dog of Montargis" has been taken.

AUBRY, JOHN BAPTIST, a French prior, who was deprived of his situation at the revolution; author of "Questions Philosophiques sur la Religion Naturelle," &c. Born, 1735; died, 1809.

AUBRY, MDLLE., a figurante of the French opera, who, in 1793, publicly personated the "Goddess of Reason" at Paris.

AUBRY, C. L., a Parisian librarian, and profound mathematician, born in 1746; author of a work addressed to the legislative body in 1790, "On Weights and Measures;" and another "On the Decimal System."

AUBRY, JOHN FRANCIS, a French physician of the 18th century; author of "Les Oracles de Cos," a review of the practice of Hippocrates, and other ancient physicians.

AUBRY DUBONCHET, N., a deputy of the Tiers Etat in 1789; and author of several works on political economy.

AUBRY, F., one of the French Committee of Public Safety in 1794, who aimed at counter-revolution. He deprived Buonaparte, after the siege of Toulon, of military employments, and reduced him to great distress; the latter revenged himself afterwards, by preventing his re-entry into France, after his deportation to Cayenne, on the return of some of his fellow-victims.

AUBRY DE GOUGES, MARIE-OLYMPIE, a female republican, celebrated for her beauty and talents, born in 1755. She founded the popular female societies called Tricoteuses, and was a perfect enthusiast in her political opinions. At length she was put to death by Robespierre's party, in consequence of their licentious and cruel profligacy having urged her to denounce them in a pamphlet called the "Trois Urnes." She died with heroic spirit. She is the author of the "Mémolres of Madame de Valmont;" of "L'Esclavage des Nègres," a melodrame; "Le Mariage de Chérublin," a comedy; and "Molière chez Ninon," an episodic piece, &c.

AUCHMUTY, SIR SAMUEL, a distinguished English general. He served with great zeal and ability in North and South America, and when commanding in India, reduced to the dominion of Great Britain the rich settlements of Java and Batavia. On his return to Europe, he was appointed to the command in Ireland, where he died in 1822.

AUCKLAND, WILLIAM EDEN, Lord, an able negotiator, was the third son of Sir Robert Eden, bart., of West Auckland, Durham. He was appointed under-secretary of state in 1772; went to Ireland in 1780 with Lord Carlisle, as chief secretary; in 1788 was ambassador to Spain; and in the year following was ambassador to Holland. He wrote "The Principles of Penal Law," "The History of New Holland," and numerous other valuable works. Born, 1744; died, 1814.

AUDE, JOSEPH, knight of Malta, born in 1755; secretary to the Neapolitan philosophical minister, Carraccioli, and subsequently to the French Pliny, Buffon, whose life he published in 1788. He is the author of several dramas; "Le Héline Angloise," "Le Retour de Camille," "Le Nouveau Ricco," and some melodrames; "The Exiles of Siberia," &c.

AUDEBERT, GERMAIN, a French lawyer of the 16th century; author of "Roma," "Venetia," and other Latin poems. Died, 1598.

AUDEBERT, JOHN BAPTIST, a celebrated French engraver of natural history, born in 1739. The spirit of his engravings of monkeys, snakes, birds, &c. is inimitable. Died, 1800.

AUDIFREDI, JOHN BAPTIST, a famous Italian astronomer, born in 1714; author of "Demonstrazione delle Stazioni della Cometa, 1769," &c.

AUDIFREDDY, THERESE, born in Guineca, in 1757. When returning thither, at 18, from Bordeaux, she was subjected, through the effect of her youthful beauty, to the rejected love of the captain of the vessel, but was relieved from his offered violence by Sonnini and the chevalier Audiffredy, the latter of whom she married; and becoming one of the richest proprietors in Cayenne, she saved Pichegru, and the numerous deported victims of the 18th Fructidor, from being starved to death.

AUDINOT, founder of the Théâtre Audinot, and the inventor of melodrames, was born at Nancy, about 1750. He was a favourite actor in, as well as author of, many of the latter. He died at Paris, in 1801.

AUDLEY, THOMAS, chancellor of England during part of the reign of Henry VIII., and disgracefully subservient to the evil will of that king. Died, 1544.

AUDRAN, the name of a family of French artists, of whom the following are the most eminent—CHARLES AUDRAN, the elder, was born at Paris, in 1594; and died in 1673. His works are numerous and excellent.

CLAUDE, a nephew of the preceding, was born, at Lyons, in 1639, and studied under his uncle. He was employed by Le Brun in painting part of the pictures of Alexander's battles at Versailles, and became professor of painting in the royal academy of Paris, where he died in 1684.—GIRARD, the brother of the last-mentioned, and the most celebrated of the family, was born, at Lyons, in 1640; studied under Le Brun at Paris; and engraved that artist's pictures in a masterly style. He died in 1703.—CLAUDE, nephew of Girard, was born, at Lyons, in 1685. He was celebrated for ornamental designs; appointed king's painter; and died in 1734.—JOHN, brother of Claude, was born in 1667; studied engraving under his uncle; and died, at Paris, in 1756.

AUDRAN, P. G., was born in Dauphiny, about 1770; and made professor of Hebrew at the College de France, in 1799. This scholar taught himself Hebrew by the synoptical and analytical method first applied by Dumarsais and De Gebelin to grammatical science; and was the author of a "Grammaire Hébraïque."

AUDRIEN, YVES M., a French ecclesiastic, who joined Robespierre, declared for the revolution, and proposed his "Plan d'Education," to withdraw the education of youth from the priesthood. In 1800, while proceeding to his bishopric, he was dragged out of his carriage by the Chouans, and assassinated.

AUGE, DANIEL AUGENTIUS, a French author of the 16th century. He translated portions of St. Macarius and Synesius from the Greek, and wrote numerous dialogues on oratory, &c.

AUGER, ATHANASIU, a learned abbé, and professor of rhetoric at the college of St. Ronen, was born at Paris, in 1734. He published several political works (among others, "Catéchisme du Citoyen François," &c.) in favour of the revolution. His learned publications are numerous: "Constitution des Romains;" "De la Tragédie Grecque;" the complete works of Isocrates, Lysias, Xenophon, &c. Died, 1792.

AUGER, LOUIS SIMON, born at Paris in 1772, was a man of extensive learning, being the conductor of several journals, and one of the principal authors of the Universal Biography. He committed suicide in 1829.

AUGEREAU, PIERRE FRANCOIS CHARLES, duke of Castiglione, and a marshal of France, was born at Paris, in 1757. Having entered the army early in life, he distinguished himself, and rose to the rank of brigadier-general in 1794. At the battles of Castiglione and Arcole, in 1796, his personal bravery was eminently conspicuous; and, in short, through all the campaigns of Napoleon from that time till the memorable retreat from Russia in 1813, he displayed great skill, and filled the most important stations; receiving as a reward for his services the baton of a field marshal and a dukedom. On the abdication of the emperor, he was among the first to offer his allegiance to the Bourbons, for which he was amply rewarded; yet, it is said, he was equally ready on Napoleon's return from Elba to serve his old master, who, however, rejected his services, and declared him a traitor. He died in 1816.

AUGURELLO, GIOVANNI AURELIO, an Italian poet and professor of the belles lettres; author of "Chrysopeia," and other poems, Latin and Italian. Born, 1440; died, 1524.

AUGUSTIN, ST., bishop of Hippo, and one of the fathers of the Christian Church, was born at Tagaste, in Africa, A. D. 354. He was in his youth attached to the Manichean doctrines, and of very loose morals; but his conversion from his errors was complete and permanent; and he wrote with great zeal, and very voluminously, against all the sects which the Church held to be heretical. He died in 430.

AUGUSTIN, or AUSTIN, ST., styled the Apostle of the English, was sent by pope Gregory I. at the head of 40 monks to preach the gospel in England. He landed in 595; and so rapid was his success, that the pope made him archbishop of Canterbury, Kent being the first scene of his invaluable labour. Elated by the success of his mission, he endeavoured to bring the Welsh bishops, who were descendants of the British converts of the second century, under the jurisdiction of the Church of Rome, to which they had never submitted; but they asserted their independence, and 1200 monks of Bangor were soon after put to the sword by Ethelfrid, king of Northumberland, at the instigation, it is said, of the offended prelate. He died early in the 7th century, but the year of his death is variously given.

AUGUSTIN, ANTHONY, a Spanish prelate of the 16th century; author of some treatises on law and on medals. Died, 1586.

AUGUSTULUS, ROMULUS, the last emperor of the West, was raised to the throne by his father, the patrician Orcestes, who deposed Julius Nepos, in 476; but his reign was little more than nominal, and of very short duration; being soon after conquered and dethroned by Odoacer, king of the Heruli, who spared his life, and allowed him a pension.

AUGUSTUS, CAIUS JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS, a Roman emperor, was the son of Caius Octavius and Accia, niece of Julius Cæsar, who, on the death of his father, which happened when he was only four years old, adopted him as his son. When Cæsar was assassinated, Octavius (for by that name he was called before his accession to the throne), was in Epirus, whence he immediately returned to secure his inheritance, and entered into an alliance with Anthony and Lepidus, though he at first was inimical to the former. The triumvirate thus formed shed the best blood of Rome; and Octavius was fully as guilty as either of his associates. At length Lepidus was deposed, Antony hurried to ruin and death, and Octavius, then 36 years of age, became emperor, with the title of Augustus. As emperor, his course was wise and beneficent; literature and the arts flourished under his auspices; good laws were enacted; and he was in many respects deserving of the lavish praise heaped upon him by the writers of that time. Born, B. C. 63; died, A. D. 14.

AULISIO, DOMINIC, a Neapolitan professor of civil law, but more celebrated as a linguist, and for his great proficiency in general science and the belles lettres. He was author of "Commentaries on Civil Law," a "History of the Rise and Progress of Medicine," &c. Born, 1639; died, 1717.

AULNAGE, F. H. S. DE, a Spanish writer, born in 1739; author of a work on ancient pantomime, and of "Histoire Générale des Religions," &c.

AULUS GELLIUS, a grammarian in the reigns of Trajan and Marcus Aurelius; chiefly remembered for his "Noctes Atticæ."

AUNGERVILLE, RICHARD, or RICHARD DE BURY, was the tutor of Edward III., by whom he was made bishop of London, lord high chancellor, lord high treasurer, &c. He was a munificent patron of learning, and the author of a learned work, entitled "Philobiblion." Born, 1281; died, 1345.

AUNOX, Countess of, a lively French authoress of the 17th century. Died, 1705.

AURELIAN, LUCIUS DOMITIUS, a Roman emperor, was the son of a peasant, and born in Pannonia, about the year 220. Having throughout an active life greatly distinguished himself as a skillful, valiant, and successful general, he was chosen emperor on the death of Claudius II. in 270. He drove the Barbarians from Italy, conquered Tetricus, who had assumed the purple in Gaul, and vanquished the celebrated Zenobia, of Palmyra, and carried her a prisoner to Rome; but while on his march towards Persia, in 275, he was assassinated by his mutinous troops.

AURELIO, LOUIS, an Italian monk of the 17th century; author of an account of the Bohemian rebellion. He also abridged the Universal History of Tursellinus, and other works. Died, 1637.

AURIA, VINCENTIO, a Sicilian author of the 17th century. His principal work is a history of eminent Sicilians. Born, 1625; died, 1710.

AURIGNI, GILES, a French lawyer and poet of the 16th century; author of a poem, entitled "Tuteur d'Amour," and some other works of no great value.

AURUNGZEBE, the Great Mogul, or emperor of Hindostan, was the third son of Shah Jehan. His early life was marked by gravity and seeming devotion, but these were merely the disguise of an ambitious and crafty spirit. He deposed his father, put to death two of his brothers, and the son of the elder of them, and assumed the sovereign authority. Ill, however, as he obtained his power, he used it with skill and courage. He subdued Golconda, the Carnatic, Visapour, and Bengal, and routed the pirates who had infested the mouth of the Ganges. His achievements obtained him the respect of European as well as Asiatic powers. But the close of his life was embittered by the rebellious conduct of his sons, who aimed at deposing him, as he had deposed his father. Born, 1618; died, 1707. After the death of Aurungzebe, the might and splendour of the Mogul empire rapidly declined.

AUSEGIUS, a French abbot of the 9th century, who made a collection of the capitularies of Charlemagne and his son Louis, which has been several times reprinted. Died, 834.

AUSONIUS, DECIVS MAGNUS, a Roman poet of the 4th century; son of Julius Ausonius, a physician of Bordeaux. He early gave proof of genius, and was appointed tutor to Gratian, son of the emperor Valentinian; and when his pupil came to the throne, he made him praetorian prefect of Gaul, and subsequently raised him to the consulship. His poems are various both as to subject and merit: but though they contain much that is beautiful, they are but too frequently deformed by licentiousness.

AUSTEN, JANE, the celebrated authoress of "Pride and Prejudice," "Sense and Sensibility," and other prose fictions, was the daughter of a clergyman in Hampshshire. Born, 1775; died, unmarried, 1817.

AUSTREA, D. JUAN, a Spanish admiral, born in 1545; remembered as the conqueror of the Turks at Lepanto.

AUVERGNE, ANTHONY, a French musician and composer of the 18th century, who composed the first comic opera ever performed in France. Died, 1797.

AVALOS, FERDINAND, marquis of Pescara, a brave Neapolitan soldier, and the author of a "Dialogue on Love," which he wrote while a prisoner of war, and dedicated to his wife, the beautiful Vittoria Colonna. Born, 1489; died, 1525.

AVALOS, ALPHONSUS, marquis del Vasto, nephew of the preceding, was born at Naples, in 1502, and obtained the command of the imperial army at his uncle's death, for the brilliant valour he displayed at the siege of Pavia. Died, 1546.

AVAUUX, CLAUDE DE MESNE, Count of, a celebrated French diplomatist, and an accomplished scholar. Died, 1650.

AVELLANEDA, ALPHONSUS FERNANDEZ DE, a Spanish writer, who, to the great annoyance of Cervantes, wrote a continuation of the first part of Don Quixote.

AVELLONE, F., an Italian dramatic writer, born in 1756, whose pieces are numerous, and many of them successful; "Lanterne Magique," "Jules Willenvel," &c.

AVERANI, BENEDICT, a Florentine, was a learned and voluminous prose writer and poet. Born, 1645; died, 1707.

AVERANI, JOSEPH, brother of the above; author of various scientific treatises, and of a defence of Galileo.

AVENTINE, JOHN, a native of Bavaria; author of the "Annals of Bavaria," and of a curious work, entitled "Numerandi per Digits," &c. Born, 1466; died, 1534.

AVENZOAR, or EBN ZOAR, an Arabian physician of the 12th century, born at Seville; author of a medical compendium, entitled "Al Theiser."

AVERDY, CLEMENT CHARLES DE L', comptroller-general of France in the 18th century; author of "Code Penal," and other useful works. He was guillotined in 1794, on a charge of having caused the scarcity of wheat which then afflicted France.

AVERROES, or AVEN ROSCH, an Arabian philosopher and physician of the 12th century. His talents caused him to be made chief ruler of Morocco by the caliph, Jacob Almanzor, but being accused of heresy by the Mahometan priests, he was imprisoned and otherwise persecuted. Again, however, he acquired both the royal favour and the popular confidence, and died at Morocco, in 1198, in possession of the highest honours below the sovereignty. He was author of a paraphrase of Plato's Republic, and several other works.

AVESBURY, ROBERT OF, an English writer of the 14th century; author of a history of Edward III.

AVIANO, JEROME, an Italian poet of the 16th century.

AVICENNA, otherwise EBN-SINA, an Arabian philosopher and physician of the 11th century. Of his numerous works the most valuable are his "Commentaries on Aristotle." He died in great poverty, 1037.

AVIENUS, RUFUS FESTUS, a Latin poet of the 4th century.

AVIGNY, C. J. L., a national French poet, born at Martinique, in 1760; author of "Jeanne d'Arc," "Le Départ de la Pérouse;" and some successful dramas, "Les Lettres," "Les Deux Jockeys," "Doria," &c. His best prose production is on the progress of the British power in India, inserted in Michard's "Histoire de Mysore."

AVILA, JOHN D', a Spanish priest, who for the space of 40 years journeyed through the Andalusian mountains and forests, enforcing by his precepts and example the doctrines of the gospel; on which account he acquired the appellation of the Apostle of Andalusia. Died, 1569.

AVILA Y ZUNIGA, LOUIS D', a distin-gushed diplomatist, warrior, and historian, under Charles V. He wrote "Commentaries" on the wars of his sovereign, who so much admired them, that he deemed himself more fortunate than Alexander, in having such an historian.

AVIRON, JAMES LE BATHELIER, a French lawyer of the 16th century; author of "Commentaries on the Provincial Laws of Normandy."

AVISON, CHARLES, a composer and musician; author of "Essays on Musical Expression," &c. Died, 1770.

AVITUS, MARCUS MECILIUS, raised to the empire of the West on the death of Maximus, in 455, but deposed after a reign of only 14 months.

AVOGADRO, LUCIA, an Italian poetess, whose early talents won the praise of Tasso. Died, 1598.

AYALA, PETER LOPEZ D', a learned, brave, and eloquent Spanish statesman, was born in Murcia, in 1332. After serving under four Castilian monarchs, both in the council and the field, and distinguishing himself also as a man of erudition, he died in 1407.

AYALA, a Dutch physician who practised at Antwerp in the 16th century; author of a "Treatise on the Plague," "Carmen pro vera Medicina," &c.

AYESHA, daughter of Abubeker, and favourite wife of Mahomet. On the death of her husband she resorted to arms to oppose the succession of Ali; but though conquered by him she was dismissed in safety, and died in retirement at Mecca, in 677. The Mussulmans venerate her memory, and designate her the prophetess.

AYLMER, JOHN, bishop of London in the reign of queen Elizabeth. He was a ready, but not very rigidly principled writer; and was more disposed to intolerance than is consistent with the character of a true Christian. Born, 1521; died, 1594.

AYLOFFE, Sir JOSEPH, an able antiquary of the 18th century. He was keeper of the state papers, and author of "The Universal Librarian," besides numerous other works. Born, 1708; died, 1781.

AYMON, JOHN, a Piedmontese priest of the 17th century. He abjured Papacy for the doctrines of Calvin, but returned to his original faith, and had a pension from the Cardinal de Noailles. Availing himself of his intimacy with the librarian of the royal collection at Paris, he stole some MSS., one of which, an account of the synod of Jerusalem in 1672, he published in Holland. He wrote a "Picture of the Court of Rome," and some other works.

AYRAULT, PIERRE, a French lawyer of the 16th century; author of a treatise "De Patris Jure," occasioned by the seduction of his son by the Jesuits, and other works. Born, 1536; died, 1601.

AYRTON, EDMUND, a composer of cathedral music, and one of the directors of the Commemoration of Handel. Born, 1734; died, 1808.

AYSCOUGH, GEORGE EDWARD, son of the Dean of Bristol, by a sister of the first Lord Lyttleton. He was the author of a volume of travels on the continent, and the tragedy of Semiramis. Died, 1779.

AYSCOUGH, SAMUEL, an industrious literary character of the last century. He contributed largely to the British Critic and other periodicals; and compiled a variety of laborious indexes, of which his index to Shakspeare is the principal. He was curate of St. Giles's, and lecturer at Shoreditch. Born, 1745; died, 1804.

AYSCUE, Sir GEORGE, a distinguished admiral in the time of Cromwell, and one of the coadjutors of Blake in his famous action with the Dutch admiral, Van Tromp. At the restoration he was made rear-admiral of the Blue; and being captured in Albermarle's action off Dunkirk, remained many years a prisoner.

AYTON, Sir ROBERT, a native of Fifeshire, in Scotland, a poet of considerable merit, was born in 1570. He wrote in Greek, Latin, and French, as well as English. Died, 1638.

AZARA, DON JOSEPH NICHOLAS D', a Spanish grandee, born in Arragon, 1721; ambassador, first to Rome, and next to France; a good writer in Spanish, Italian, and French; a ripe antiquarian, and a great patron of the fine arts. His "Suite de Pierres Gravées," published in Spain, is much esteemed. He translated into Spanish "Middleton's Life of Cicero," "Bowles's Natural History of Spain," "Seneca," and "Bondoni's Horace." He died suddenly, by his fire, in 1804.

AZARA, FELIX D', a Spanish naturalist and traveller of the 18th century; author of a "Natural History of Paraguay," and other valuable works. Born, 1746; the time of his death is uncertain.

AZNAR, count of Gaseony, distinguished for quelling an insurrection of the Navarrese Gascons in 824; but being discontented with Pepin, king of Aquitaine, for whom he put down the insurgents, he subsequently, in 831, seized on a part of Navarre, and became the founder of the kingdom of that name. Died, 836.

AZUNI, DOMINIC ALBERT, a Sardinian, born in 1760. He was the author of "Système Universel du Droit Maritime de l'Europe, &c.," a work of the highest merit, written in the purest French. Made president of the Genoese board of trade by Napoleon, he fell with his patron, and retired to private life. Died, 1827.

AZZO, PORTIUS, an Italian jurist of the 13th century; author of "A Summary of the Codes or Institutes." He is said to have been executed for killing a man in a personal conflict.

B.

BAAIDIN, MAHOMET GEBET AMALI, a Persian doctor; author of "A Summary of Canon and Civil Law," which he wrote by order of Abbas the Great, and in his name.

BAAN, JOHN D', a Dutch portrait painter, who was employed in England under the patronage of Charles II. Died, 1702.

BAAN, JAMES, son of the above, and of the same profession. Died, 1700.

BAARSDORP, CORNELIUS, physician to the emperor Charles V.; author of "Methodus Universæ Artis Medicæ." Died, 1565.

BAART, PETER, a Fleming of the 18th century; author of "Flemish Georgies," &c.

BABA, a Turkish impostor of the 13th century, who affected to have a mission from Heaven. He had many followers in Natolia, which country he overran; but his success was only temporary, and his sect sunk into obscurity.

BABACOUSCHI, a mufti of the city of Caffa, in Mauris, who died in the year of the Hegira, 783. His real name was Abdurahman Mosthafa; and he was author of a work, entitled "The Friend of Princes."

BABEK, KIROKEMI, a Persian impostor, surnamed the Impious, who, in the early part of the 9th century, appeared as the apostle of a new religion. For 20 years he baffled all the attempts that were made to put him down; but at length he was taken prisoner, and suffered a cruel death, in 837.

BABIN, FRANCIS, a French divine and professor of divinity at Angers; editor of "The Conferences of the Diocese of Angers." Died, 1734.

BABINGTON, ANTHONY, a gentleman of good family and fortune in Derbyshire, who was detected in a conspiracy to assassinate queen Elizabeth, for which he was executed in 1586.

BABINGTON, GERVASE, a bishop of Worcester, at the end of the 16th and beginning of the 17th centuries. He was a learned and pious man, and a considerable benefactor to the library of Worcester cathedral. He successively held the bishoprics of Llandaff, Exeter, and Worcester.

BABINGTON, DR. WILLIAM, an eminent physician, and lecturer on medicine and chemistry at Guy's Hospital, was born in 1757; and after a long life of usefulness in his profession, of which he was a distinguished ornament, died in April, 1833, aged 76. He was the author of "A New System of Mineralogy," besides some other scientific treatises.

BABEUF, FRANCIS NOEL, a violent partizan of the French revolution. He conducted a journal called "The Tribune of the People," the object of which was to overthrow society as at present constituted; and his share in a conspiracy for this purpose being proved, he was condemned to be guillotined, 1797.

BABUR, or BABR, MOHAMMED, a sovereign of the Mogul empire, in Western Tartary and Khorassan, who ascended the throne in 1494, and who, in 1525, invaded and conquered Hindostan. He died in 1530, and his posterity reigned over India for two centuries and a half. Babur was the great grandson of Tamerlane.

BACHELIER, JOHN JAMES, a French painter, born in 1724, was director of the royal porcelain manufactory of Sevres, and the discoverer of an encaustic composition for the preservation of marble statues. He established a school for gratuitously teaching the art of drawing. Died, 1805.

BACHMEISTER, H. L. C., a miscellaneous writer, born at Hernborn, in the principality of Nassau-Dillenburg, in 1736; author of "An Abridgment of the Geography of the Russian Empire," "A Collection of Memoirs relating to Peter I.," "The Russian Library," 11 vols. &c. Died, 1806.

BACICI, JOHN BAPTIST GAULI, an Italian painter, chiefly of scriptural subjects and portraits. Born, 1639; died, 1709.

BACKER, JAMES, a Dutch historical painter of great ability. Born at Antwerp, in 1530; died, 1560.

BACKER, JACOB, a portrait and historical painter. Born at Harlingen, 1609; died, 1651.

BACKHOUSE, WILLIAM, an English astronomer and alchemist; author of "The Complaint of Nature," "The Golden Fleece," &c. Died, 1662.

BACKHUYSEN, RUDOLPH, or LUDOLPH, an eminent painter, whose sea-pieces are worthy of the highest praise. He studied nature attentively in all her forms, and gave to every subject such transparency and lustre, as placed him above all the artists of his time, except the younger Vandervelde. Indeed, it is said to have been his frequent custom, whenever he could procure resolute mariners, to go to sea in a storm, in order to store his mind with images of the angry elements, and to work incessantly on his return, while they were vividly impressed on his memory. Born at Embden, 1631; died, 1709.

BACKLER D'ALBE, Baron AUBERT LOUIS, an eminent French military geographer and engineer; author of a "Chart of the Theatre of War in the first Campaigns of Buonaparte in Italy," &c. Born at St. Pol, 1761; died at Paris, 1824.

BACON, ROBERT, an English friar; divinity lecturer at Oxford; author of "The Life of St. Edmund, archbishop of Canterbury," &c. Died, 1248.

BACON, ROGER, a celebrated English friar and philosopher. He was born at Ilchester, Somersetshire, in 1214, and received his education at Oxford and Paris. He was so ardent in his pursuit of knowledge, that he expended 2000*l.* in the course of 20 years. His attainments caused him to be much persecuted by his ignorant contemporaries, who imputed them to magic. Several of his works remain in MSS., but the chief of them are collected in one folio volume, entitled "Opus Majus." Considering the time at which he lived, he was unquestionably a very great man; for though his natural philosophy is in some particulars erroneous, it is quite clear that he at least approximated to the discovery of the telescope, the camera obscura, and gunpowder; and he not only detected the error of the calendar, but actually suggested the reformation afterwards made in it by pope Gregory XIII. Died, 1292.

BACON, Sir NICHOLAS, keeper of the great seal, and privy councillor to queen Elizabeth. He was the first lord keeper that ranked as lord chancellor. Born, 1510; died, 1579.

BACON, ANNE, second wife of the above; a lady remarkable for her intimate acquaintance with both the ancient and modern languages. She translated "The Sermons of Oclinus" from the Italian, and "Bishop Jewell's Apology for the Church of England" from the Latin. Born, 1528; died, 1600.

BACON, FRANCIS, an eminent statesman, and still more eminent philosopher, son of the lord keeper, Sir Nicholas Bacon, by his second wife. During the reign of Elizabeth he made no great progress, but on the accession of James I. he was knighted, and made one of the king's counsel. In the following year he was made solicitor-general; and during the 14 years following he continued to rise till he became high chancellor of Great Britain, baron Verulam, and viscount St. Alban's. His fall was as sudden as his rise had been great: being accused of corruption in his office, he was dismissed and heavily fined; and though he was subsequently noticed by Charles I., he spent the remainder of his life in obscurity. It is rather as a philosopher than as a statesman that he demands our admiration. His works are invaluable, and too numerous to be mentioned here; but if none of them existed but his "Novum Organum Scientiarum," he would have earned himself a deathless name. Born, 1561; died, 1626.

BACON, ANTHONY, elder brother of the chancellor, a skilful politician, and a friend of the Earl of Essex. As he spent the greater portion of his time abroad, and was much devoted to learned pursuits, he became personally acquainted with most of the foreign literati, and was also honoured with the friendship of Henry IV. of France.

BACON, Sir NATHANIEL, half brother of the chancellor. He possessed great ability as a landscape painter. Died, 1615.

BACON, PHANUEL, an English divine; author of some dramas, and a poem, entitled "The Artificial Kite." Died, 1783.

BACON, JOHN, an eminent English sculptor, and the inventor of a method of making statues in artificial stone. His chief works are a bust of George III., in the hall of Christchurch, Oxford, Lord Chatham's monuments in Guildhall and Westminster Abbey, and those of Dr. Johnson and Mr. Howard in St. Paul's. Born, 1740; died, 1799.

BACON, or BACONTHORPE, JOHN, called the resolute doctor, an English monk; author of a "Compendium of the Law of Christ," &c. Died, 1346.

BACQUET, a French advocate; author of various law treatises, of which an edition, in 2 vols., was published at Lyons, in 1744. Died, 1597.

BADCOCK, SAMUEL, an English divine and author of no mean celebrity, but chiefly known by his critiques in the Monthly Review. Born, 1747; died, 1783.

BADEN, JAMES, professor of Latin and eloquence in the university of Copenhagen; author of a Danish and German Dictionary, a translation of Tacitus, &c. Born, 1735; died, 1805.

BADEN, RICHARD DE, chancellor of Cambridge in 1226, when he founded University Hall. That building being burnt down, a new edifice was erected by the daughter of Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, who gave it the name it still bears of Clare Hall.

BADENS, FRANCIS, a portrait and historical painter, born at Antwerp, 1571; died, 1603.

BADIA, DOMINGO, a Spanish traveller, was born in 1766. Being well skilled in Arabic, he determined on travelling in the East; and having submitted to a well-known Mussulman rite, he was personally qualified for the task, and assumed the name of Ali Bey. Under this disguise he visited Tripoli, Egypt, Mecca, and Syria undiscovered, and was everywhere received with favour, as a true believer. It is now known that he was employed as a political agent by the Prince of Peace, at the instigation of Buonaparte; and on his return to his native country he espoused the French cause there. After the battle of Vittoria, he took refuge in France, and died there in 1824.

BADILE, ANTONIO, an Italian painter, celebrated for the accuracy and colouring of his portraits, but deriving still greater honour from having two such disciples as Paul Veronese and Baptista Zelotti. Born, 1480; died, 1560.

BADUEL, CLAUDE, a French Protestant divine; author of some theological treatises, &c. Died, 1561.

BAERSTRAT, a Dutch painter, chiefly of sea pieces. Died, 1687.

BAFFIN, WILLIAM, an English navigator of the 17th century, famous for his discoveries in the Arctic regions, was born in 1584. He visited West Greenland in 1612, again in 1615, and made a voyage to Spitzbergen in 1614. In 1623 and 1624 he ascertained the limits of that vast inlet of the sea, since distinguished by the appellation of Baffin's Bay.

BAGDEDIN, MAHOMET, an Arabian mathematician of the 10th century; author of a treatise "On the Division of Superficies," of which there is a Latin version by John Dec.

BAGE, ROBERT, an English novelist, was born at Derby, in 1728; and died at Tamworth, in 1801. During the greater part of his life he followed the occupation of a paper maker. "Mount Kenneth," "Barham Downs," "The Fair Syrian," &c. owe their existence to him.

BAGFORD, JOHN, a book collector and antiquary. Several of his letters are in the British Museum. Born, 1651; died, 1716.

BAGGER, JOHN, a very learned Dane, bishop of Copenhagen, and author of several treatises in Latin and Danish. Born, 1646; died, 1693.

BAGGESEN, EMANUEL, a Danish poet. He usually wrote in the German language; and his chief productions are a pastoral epic, entitled "Parthenais, oder die Alpenreise," and a mock epic, called "Adam and Eve," but his songs and short poems are very numerous and popular. Born, 1764; died, 1826.

BAGLIONE, GIOVANNI, an Italian painter of the 17th century, distinguished for his works in fresco; many of which adorn the walls and ceilings of the Roman Church. Died, 1644.

BAGLIONI, JOHN PAUL, an Italian soldier of fortune in the 16th century. He was put to death by Leo X., in 1520.

BAGLIVI, GEORGE, an illustrious Italian physician, born at Apulia, and elected professor of anatomy at Rome; was author of "The Praxis Medica," and several works connected with his profession, all of which were written in Latin. Born, 1667; died, 1705.

BAGNIOLI, JULIUS CÆSAR, an Italian poet; author of "The Judgment of Paris," a poem, &c. Died, 1600.

BAGOAS, a eunuch, at first the favourite, and afterwards the murderer of Artaxerxes Ochus, king of Persia. He was put to death by Darius Codomanus, B.C. 356.

BAGOPHANES, a governor of Babylon, who, when Alexander approached the city, caused all the streets to be strewed, and incense to be burnt on the altars.

BAGOT, LEWIS, an English prelate, and brother to the first Lord Bagot, was born in 1740. He was at first a canon of Christchurch, Oxford, then dean, and successively became the bishop of Bristol, Norwich, and St. Asaph. He was the author of "Sermons on the Prophecies," &c. Died, 1802.

BAGRATION, K. A., a Russian prince and councillor, who especially distinguished himself in the campaigns in Italy under Suwarow, and was mortally wounded at the battle of Moscow in 1812.

BAGSHAW, EDWARD, an English civilian of the 17th century. In the commencement of the rebellion he sided with the Parliament, but subsequently became a royalist. He wrote several works on law and politics.

BAGSHAW, EDWARD, son of the preceding, was a clergyman, and an opponent of Baxter.

BAGSHAW, WILLIAM, an English divine, ejected from his living for non-conformity, in 1662. He was the author of some works on practical divinity. Died in 1703.

BAHIER, JOHN, a French priest, and the author of some Latin poems, which are in the collection of De Brienne. Died, 1707.

BAIRD, CHARLES FREDERIC, a German divine and author. He was born at Bischofswerda, and studied at Leipsic, where a prosecution having been commenced against him at Vienna for the heterodoxy of his writings, he fled to Prussia; and at length he settled at Halle, took a farm and an inn, and openly avowed himself a deist. Died, 1792.

BALAN, or BAION, ANDREW, a native of Gorb, who was converted to Christianity, and ordained a priest at Rome about 1630. He translated the Aeneid into Greek verse, and the Lusid into Latin.

BAIER, JOHN WILLIAM, a German divine; author of a "Compendium of Theology," &c. Born, 1647; died, 1694.

BAIER, JOHN JAMES, a German physician, and director of the botanical garden at Altdorf; author of "De Hortis celeberrimis Germaniæ, et Horti Medici Academiae Altdorfinae Hist." &c. &c. Born, 1677; died, 1735.

BAIF, LAZARUS, a French abbot, and counsellor to the parliament of Paris, in the 16th century; author of treatises "De Re Navali," "De Re Vestiaria," &c.

BAIL, LOUIS, a French divine of the 17th century; author of an Account of celebrated Preachers, a "Summary of Councils," &c.

BAILEY, NATHAN, an English lexicographer, was a schoolmaster at Stepney. Besides several school books, he was the author of "Dictionarium Domesticum;" but his principal work was an Etymological English Dictionary, which may fairly be regarded as the basis of Dr. Johnson's unrivalled work. Died, 1742.

BAILEY, PETER, author of "Sketches from St. George's Fields," "The Queen's Appeal," &c. Died, 1823.

BAILLET, ADRIAN, a learned French writer and critic; author of "Jugemens des Savans sur les principaux Ouvrages des Auteurs," "Lives of the Saints," &c. &c. Born, 1649; died, 1706.

BAILLIE, ROCHE, surnamed La Riviere, physician to Henry IV. of France, and author of "A Summary of the Doctrines of Paracelsus." He pretended to great skill in astrology. Died, 1605.

BAILLIE, ROBERT, a Scotch divine, born at Glasgow in 1599. He was one of the deputation sent to London to exhibit charges against Archbishop Laud; and also one of the commissioners sent from the General Assembly of Scotland to Charles II. at the Hague. His letters, and a journal of his transactions in England, were published in 1775. Died, 1662.

BAILLIE, MATTHEW, M. D., a celebrated anatomist and physician. He succeeded Dr. Hunter as lecturer on anatomy, in conjunction with Mr. Cruickshank, at St. George's Hospital; he was also one of the physicians in ordinary to their majesties George III. and IV., and was held in high esteem among his professional brethren. He was the author of several highly esteemed works, as well as of many important papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c.; and he presented to the College of Physicians a valuable museum of anatomical specimens. Died, 1823.

BAILLIE, Colonel JOHN, an active and able officer of the East India Company, went out to India as a cadet, in 1791. At the commencement of the Mahratta war he was selected to superintend the various important negotiations on which depended the establishment of the British power in the province of Bundelcundy, and in this he was eminently successful, having effected the peaceable transfer to the British dominions of a territory yielding an annual revenue of 225,000*l*. On returning to England, Colonel Baillie was, in 1820, elected M. P. for Hendon; and subsequently represented the burghs of Inverness, &c. Died, 1833.

BAILLY, DAVID, a painter, engraver, and author, of Leyden. Born, 1630.

BAILLY, JOHN SYLVANUS, a learned French astronomer, was born in 1733. At the Revolution, he was made president of the first national assembly; he next became mayor of Paris; but his conduct in repressing tumult, and showing sympathy with the royal family, made him unpopular. He resigned his office, and in 1793 he was denounced by the anarchists of the day, and guillotined.

BAILY, FRANCIS, famous in the annals of astronomical science, was the son of a banker at Newbury, and for many years well known on the Stock Exchange, in which busy arena he realised an ample fortune. The Astronomical Society was organised by him, and throughout life he was the most considerable contributor to its memoirs. Systematic order and steady perseverance were the secrets of his success. Died, Aug. 30. 1844, aged 70.

BAINBRIDGE, Dr. JOHN, an eminent physician and astronomer, born in 1582. He gained considerable reputation by his work entitled a "Description of the late Comet in 1628," and was appointed professor of astronomy at Oxford. Died, 1643.

BAINES, EDWARD, who has secured for himself an honourable place among the friends of civil and religious liberty in the 19th century, was born at Walton-le-Dale, in Lancashire, 1774. At the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to a printer at Preston; but before his term of apprenticeship expired he removed to Leeds, where he found employment on the Leeds Mercury, of which by prudence, diligence, and intelligence he subsequently became the proprietor. The zeal and ability with which for many years he conducted this great member of the Provincial Press marked him out as a fit representative of Leeds; and in 1833, on Mr. Macaulay's resignation of his seat for the borough, he was triumphantly elected, and held that distinguished position till the close of Lord Melbourne's administration in 1840, when his impaired health induced him to retire. Both in parliament and the press, Mr. Baines never ceased to advocate the cause of freedom, good government, charity, and religion. Though decided in his opinions, he was most catholic in his disposition; and he was most ready to co-operate with men of all parties and sects for the objects of which he approved. Besides fulfilling the multifarious duties of a journalist, he found time to devote himself to literature; and his "History of the Reign of George III." and "The County Palatine of Lancaster" are enduring monuments of his patience and research. Died, 1848.

BAIRD, Sir DAVID, a distinguished English general, was of Scottish descent, and entered the army as an ensign in the 2d foot in 1772. He served in the East Indies for many years; and among other brilliant achievements in which he was engaged, was the celebrated taking of Seringapatam, and the siege of Pondicherry. In 1801 he was sent, with a large body of troops, from India, to assist the British army in Egypt, and joined General Hutchinson a few days before the surrender of Alexandria. In 1802 he returned with his troops across the desert to India; and obtaining permission to return to England, arrived in 1804, after having been captured on his passage by a French privateer, and retaken. In 1805 he commanded the expedition which took the Cape of Good Hope from the Dutch; and he was subsequently at the siege of Copenhagen, where he was wounded. On the death of Sir John Moore, at Corunna, the command devolved upon General Baird, who lost his arm. For his gallantry on this occasion he was made a baronet. He subsequently was governor of Kinsale and of Fort St. George; and died in 1829.

BAJAZET I., sultan of the Turks, a renowned warrior, but a tyrant; defeated and made prisoner on the plains of Angora by the famous Tamerlane. Died, 1403.

BAJAZET II., sultan of the Turks. His reign was turbulent; he was much engaged against the Venetians and other Christian powers, and his latter years were embittered by the enmity of his son Selim, by whom, after he had resigned the crown to him, he was poisoned in 1512.

BAKER, DAVID, an English monk of the Benedictine order, originally a Protestant, but being converted to the Romish faith, he came to England as a missionary from Italy, where his conversion took place. He wrote an exposition of Hylton's "Scale of Perfection." Died in 1641.

BAKER, Sir RICHARD, author of a "Chronicle of the Kings of England," &c. Born, 1568; died, 1645.

BAKER, THOMAS, a divine and antiquary; author of "Reflections on Learning," &c. &c. Born, 1656; died, 1740. He lost the living of Long Newton at the accession of king William III., for declining to take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance.

BAKER, HENRY, a diligent and ingenious naturalist. He was originally brought up as a bookseller, and married one of the daughters of the celebrated Daniel De Foe. He obtained the gold medal of the Royal Society, for his microscopical experiments on saline particles; and wrote "The Universe," a poem, "The Microscope made Easy," &c. Born, 1704; died, 1774.

BAKER, DAVID ERSKINE, son of the above, was author of the "Companion to the Playhouse," subsequently enlarged by Stephen Jones, and published under the title of "Biographia Dramatica." Died, 1774.

BAKER, Sir GEORGE, M. D., born in 1722, was a physician of considerable reputation, and a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He was one of the physicians in ordinary to the king, created a baronet in 1776, elected president of the College of Physicians in 1797, and died in 1809.

BAKEWELL, ROBERT, a country gentleman of small fortune, who acquired considerable notoriety as a grazier at Dishley, in Leicestershire. He greatly improved his breeds of cattle and sheep; but it was objected to his stock that they were "too dear for any one to purchase, and too fat for any one to eat." Born, 1726; died, 1795.

BAKKER, PETER HUIZINGA, a Dutch poet; author of a poem on the Inundation of 1740, and of numerous songs and satires on England. Born, 1715; died, 1801.

BALASSI, MAEIO, a Florentine painter. His copy of Raphael's "Transfiguration" was astonishingly exact. Born, 1604; died 1667.

BALBI, ADRIAN, one of the most distinguished geographers of modern times, was born at Venice, 1784. Devoted from his earliest years to geographical and statistical researches, he first gained a prominent place in the literary world by his "Essai Statistique sur le Royaume de Portugal," &c. (1822). This was followed, in 1826, by his "Atlas Ethnographique du Globe," &c. in which he embodied all the recherches of the most celebrated German philologists and geographers; and continuing to prosecute his studies with unabated ardour in Vienna and Paris consecutively, he at last gave to the world, in 1832, the "Abrégé de Géographie," a work which comprises the whole compass of geographic science, and has made his name famous throughout Europe and America. His latest years were passed at Padua, in the pursuit of his favourite science. Died at Venice, 1848.

BALBINUS, DECIMUS CÆLIUS, chosen emperor of Rome, in conjunction with Maximus, in 237; and murdered by the soldiery in the following year.

BALBOA, VASCO NUNEZ DE, a Castilian, one of the first who visited the West Indies. He established a colony on the isthmus of Panama, where he built the first town on the continent of South America, penetrated into the interior, discovered the Pacific Ocean, and obtained information respecting the empire of Peru. Jealous of his talents and success, rival adventurers accused him of disloyalty, and he was put to death in 1517, by Pedrarias Davila, the Spanish governor of Darien.

BALBUENA, BERNARDO DE, a Spanish poet, and bishop of Porto Rico, in America. Died, 1627.

BALBUS, LUCIUS CORNELIUS THEOPHANES, a native of Cadiz, whose military exploits caused Pompey to obtain for him the privileges of a Roman citizen; and he subsequently became consul, being the first foreigner on whom that dignity was conferred.

BALCANQUAL, WALTER, a Scotch divine, who accompanied James I. to England. He was made dean of Rochester and bishop of Durham, but in the civil wars he was a severe sufferer, being driven from place to place for shelter. He wrote the "Declaration of Charles I. concerning the late Tumults in Scotland," &c. Died, 1642.

BALCHEN, JOHN, an English admiral, who was lost, with all his crew, on board his ship the Victory, in a violent storm off Jersey, October 3. 1744.

BALDOCK, RALPH DE, bishop of London, and lord high chancellor in the reign of Edward I.; author of a "History of British Affairs," which was extant in Lelaud's time, but is now lost. Died, 1307.

BALDOCK, ROBERT DE, a divine, who was favoured by Edward II. He shared his royal master's misfortunes, and died in Newgate.

BALDWIN, WILLIAM, an English writer of the 16th century; one of the chief authors of "The Mirror for Magistrates."

BALDWIN, archbishop of Canterbury. This prelate accompanied Richard I. to Palestine, and died there, 1291. His writings were published by Tissier, in 1662.

BALDWIN I., a distinguished leader in the fourth Crusade. On the conquest of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, he was elected emperor of the East; but being taken prisoner by the Greeks, he was never afterwards heard of.

BALDWIN II. succeeded his brother Robert as emperor of the East in 1228. On the taking of Constantinople in 1261, by Michael Palaeologus, Baldwin escaped to Italy, where he died, 1273.

BALDWIN I., king of Jerusalem, succeeded to that dignity in 1100, took Antipatris, Cesarea, and Azotus, in 1101, and Acre in 1104. Died, 1118.

BALDWIN II., king of Jerusalem, succeeded the above in 1118; Eustace, brother of Baldwin I., having renounced his claim to the throne. Baldwin II. was taken prisoner by the Saracens in 1124, and gave them the city of Tyre as his ransom. Died, 1131.

BALDWIN III. succeeded to the throne in 1143. He took Ascalon and other places from the infidels. Died, 1163.

BALDWIN IV., the son of Amaury, succeeded his father on the throne of Jerusalem in 1174. He subsequently resigned in favour of his nephew. Died, 1185.

BALDWIN V., nephew and successor of the last named, was poisoned in 1186.

BALE, JOHN, a Carmelite of Norwich, who embraced the Protestant faith, and became a zealous writer against Popery. In the reign of Edward VI., he was made bishop of Ossory, in Ireland, and endangered his life by his zealous efforts to reform his diocese. During the reign of Mary, he found safety in Switzerland; and on his return to England at the accession of Elizabeth, he obtained a prebend of Canterbury. Of his numerous works, the most important is a Latin account of eminent British writers. Born, 1495; died, 1563.

BALE, ROBERT, prior of the Carmelites of Norwich; author of "Annales Ordinis Carmelitarum," &c. Died, 1503.

BALECHOU, NICHOLAS, a French engraver, whose works are held in high estimation. Born, 1710; died, 1765.

BALEN, HEINDRICH VAN, a Dutch painter, whose "Judgment of Paris" and "Drowning of Pharaoh" are much admired. John van Balen, his son, was a distinguished historical and landscape painter. Born, 1600; died, 1632.

BALES, PETER, a skilful penman, employed by Secretary Walsingham to imitate writings. He published a work called "The Writing Master." Born, 1547; died, 1600.

BALESTRA, ANTONY, a Veronese historical painter. Born, 1666; died, 1720.

BALFOUR, ALEXANDER, a novelist and miscellaneous writer, was a native of Forfarshire, Scotland. He was the author of "Highland Mary," besides other novels and poems, and for many years a contributor to various Scottish periodicals. Born, 1767; died, 1829.

BALFOUR, SIR ANDREW, an eminent botanist and physician, and one to whom medical science in Scotland owes a lasting debt of gratitude for a botanic garden, museum, &c., was born in 1630, at Denmilne, Fife, and died in 1694.

BALGUY, JOHN, an eminent divine of the Church of England, and a theological writer, was born at Sheffield in 1686, and in 1727, became a prebendary of Salisbury. He engaged deeply in the Bangorian controversy; and among his several works may be noticed "An Essay on Redemption," a "Letter to a Deist on the Beauty and Excellence of Moral Virtue," &c. Died, 1748.

BALGUY, THOMAS, son of the above, prebend and archdeacon of Winchester; author of "Divine Benevolence, asserted and vindicated," a sermon on church government, &c. Born, 1716; died, 1795.

BALIOL, SIR JOHN DE, a native of Durham, who, on the marriage of the daughter of Henry III. to Alexander III. of Scotland, was made one of the guardians of the royal pair. He founded Baliol College, Oxford; and having sided with Henry III. against his revolted barons, the latter seized upon his lands. Died, 1269.

BALIOL, JOHN DE, son of the preceding, laid claim to the crown of Scotland on the death of queen Margaret. His claim was disputed by several competitors, one of whom was the famous Robert Bruce. But Edward I., to whom the matter was referred, decided in favour of Baliol. He soon gave offence to Edward; and being defeated by him in a battle near Dunbar, he was sent, together with his son, to the Tower of London. The intercession of the pope having procured his release, he retired to France, where he died in 1314.

BALL, JOHN, a puritan divine, who, while he disapproved of the discipline of the Church, wrote against separation from it on that ground. Born, 1585; died, 1640.

BALLANDEN, JOHN, a Scotch divine of the 16th century; author of various works, both prose and verse, and translator of Hector Boethius's History of Scotland. Died, 1550.

BALLANTYNE, JAMES, a printer of considerable note in Edinburgh, and at whose press the whole of the productions of Sir Walter Scott were printed, was a native of Kelso, where he first opened an office for the "Kelso Mail," of which he was the editor. On removing to Edinburgh he engaged in various important works, the principal of which were those of the great novelist; and for many years he also conducted the "Edinburgh Weekly Journal." He survived his friend and patron but a few months, dying in January, 1833.

BALLANTYNE, JOHN, brother of the preceding, acted during the early career of the mysterious "author of Waverley" as his confidant, and managed all the business of the communication of his works to the public. He is also remembered by his contemporaries as "a fellow of infinite humour," whose anecdotes were as inexhaustible as his mode of telling them was unrivalled. Died, 1821; aged 45.

BALLARD, GEORGE, originally a tailor, was born at Campden, in Gloucestershire, where he acquired so much skill in the Saxon language, that some gentlemen allowed him a pension, and procured him a situation in the university of Oxford. He wrote "Memoirs of learned British Ladies." Died, 1755.

BALLARD, VOLANTE VASION, a rear-admiral of the British navy, was born in 1774. On entering naval life he accompanied Vancouver on his laborious voyage of discovery to the north-west coast of America, in which he was absent from England nearly five years. In 1807, when captain of the Blonde frigate, he captured five French privateers. He afterwards distinguished himself at the taking of Guadaloupe; and eventually attained the rank of rear-admiral, in 1825. Died, 1832.

BALLERINI, PETER and JEROME, two priests and brothers, natives of Verona, who, in the 18th century, conjointly wrote some works, and edited several editions of ecclesiastical authors.

BALLIN, CLAUDE, a skilful French goldsmith. He executed some very fine works after antique vases, &c., for Louis XIV. and Cardinal Richelieu, and was made director of the mint for casts and medals. Born, 1615; died, 1678.

BALMEZ, JAMES LUCIEN, a Spanish ecclesiastic, whose political, theological, and philosophic writings have acquired for him a high reputation both at home and abroad, was born at Vich, in Catalonia, in 1810. From his earliest years he was destined for the priesthood, and having in his 16th year entered the university of Cervera, he soon attracted notice by his amiable demeanour, the fertility of his mind, and the universality of his acquirements. Quitting the university in 1833, laden with honours and matured in learning, he retired to his native town, and in 1837 was there nominated to the chair of mathematics, which he filled with equal zeal and ability. In 1840 he published a brochure on the property of the clergy, which made a great sensation at Madrid; and from this time forward his labours in behalf of the cause to which he had devoted himself were indefatigable. He published papers on the condition of Spain, written in periodicals, conducted a review at Barcelona, and finally edited at Madrid the ablest journal in Spain, entitled "El Pensamiento de la Nacion," wherein his object was to restore the Roman Catholic Church to her former dignity and influence; to reconcile and unite all the friends of monarchy, whether belonging to the Carlist or Christina parties; and to found the institutions of the country on an enlarged and permanent basis. But valuable to his country as were all these and other emanations from his pen, they are far eclipsed by his "Protestantism and Catholicism compared in their Effects on the Civilisation of Europe," which has been translated into French, German, and English, and may be safely pronounced to be one of the most elaborate works of modern theological literature. Died at Vich, 1848.

BALSHAM, or BELESIALE, HUGH DE, bishop of Ely, and founder of Peterhouse College at Cambridge. Died, 1286.

BALTHASAR, CHRISTOPHER, a French advocate of the 17th century, who renounced his profession to embrace and advocate the Protestant faith, which he defended with great ability against Baronius and others.

BALTHASAR, J. A. FELIX DE, president of the municipal council of Lucerne; author of "A Defence of William Tell," &c. Died, 1810.

BALTHAZARINI, an Italian musician, greatly caressed at the court of Henry III. of France. His ballet of "Ceres and her Nymphs" is supposed to be the origin of the French ballet héroïque.

BAITUS, JOHN FRANCIS, a French Jesuit, librarian of Rheims; author of "A Reply to Fontenelle's History of Oracles," &c. Born, 1667; died, 1743.

BALUE, JOHN, a native of France, made a cardinal by pope Paul II., and imprisoned for 11 years in an iron cage by Louis XI. for having engaged in treasonable correspondence with the Duke of Burgundy. Died, 1491.

BALUZE, STEPHEN, a French writer; author of "Lives of the Popes of Avignon," &c. Born, 1631; died 1718.

BALZAC, JOHN LOUIS GUEZ DE, a French writer of great reputation, which he chiefly owed to the elegance of his style; author of "Letters," "The Prince," "The Christian Socrates," &c. Born, 1594; died, 1654.

BALZAC, HONORÉ DE, one of the most distinguished as well as prolific novel writers of modern times, was born at Tours, 1790. Having completed his studies at Vendôme, he published, between 1821 and 1829, twenty or thirty volumes under various pseudonyms, with very equivocal success; but after this trying apprenticeship, he put forth all his powers under his own name, with what result those who have read "La Peau de Chagrin," "Les Chouans," "La Physiologie de Mariage," "Le Père Goriot," "La Femme de Trente Ans," &c., can best testify. Since that period his productions succeeded one another with wonderful rapidity; and it may be truly said that his literary strength grew with his years, for his "Médecin de Campagne," and his "Parents Pauvres," his last work, bear the impress of genius in every page. In addition to his romances, Balzac wrote some theatrical pieces, and for some time edited and contributed to the Revue Parisienne; but it is only his romances that exhibit unquestionable evidence of his great genius. His design was to make all his productions form one grand work, under the title of the "Comédie Humaine," the whole being a minute dissection of the different classes of society; and for this task he was eminently qualified, possessing, as he did, the secret of probing the human heart to its profoundest depths, and of laying bare with a masterly hand all its mysteries and all its passions. Since the revolution of 1848, Balzac was engaged in visiting the battle-fields of Germany and Russia, and in collecting materials for a series of volumes, to be entitled "Scènes de la Vie Militaire." Next to his celebrity as an author, the most remarkable feature in his career was the deep passion which he formed for a Russian princess, who finally compensated him for long years of untiring devotion by the gift of her hand in 1848. Died, Aug. 19. 1850.

BAMBRIDE, CHRISTOPHER, archbishop of York, was sent ambassador from Henry VIII. to pope Julius II., who made him a cardinal. Died of poison administered by his servant, 1514.

BAMFIELD, FRANCIS, a nonconformist divine; author of a work on the observance of the Sabbath. He was committed to Newgate for holding a conventicle, and died there, 1684.

BAMPFYLDE, SIR CHARLES WARWICK, bart., a descendant of one of the oldest and most distinguished families in Devonshire, and during 7 successive parliaments one of the members for Exeter. In 1823, when he was 71 years of age, he was assassinated close to his own house, in Montague Square, by a man named Moorland, who blew his own brains out immediately after.

BANCHI, SERAPHIN, a priest of the Dominican order at Florence, to whom a fanatic, named Berriere, disclosed his intention to assassinate Henry IV. Banchi's information saved the king, who rewarded him with the archbishopric of Angoulême.

BANCROFT, RICHARD, archbishop of Canterbury; a distinguished opponent of the Puritans and a supporter of the English Church. Born at Farnworth in Lancashire, 1544; died, 1610.

BANCROFT, JOHN, nephew of the above, bishop of Oxford, and builder of the palace of Cuddesden for the bishops of that see. Died, 1640.

BANDELLO, MATTHEW, a Dominican monk of the Milanese. He wrote tales in the manner of Boeccaccio, and proceeding to France obtained the bishopric of Agen. Died, 1561.

BANDINELLI, BACCIO, a Florentine sculptor and painter. His copy of the Laocoon is highly esteemed. Born, 1487; died, 1559.

BANDINI, ANGELO MARIA, an Italian antiquary and bibliographer; author of "De Florentini Juntarum Typographia," &c. Died, 1800.

BANDURI, ANSELM, a Benedictine, born in Dalmatia, but studied and wrote in France; author of "Antiquities of Constantinople," &c. Died, 1743.

BANIER, ANTONY, a French writer; author of an "Explanation of the Fables of Antiquity," &c. Born, 1673; died, 1741.

BANISTER, JOHN, the first performer of any celebrity upon the violin; composer of the music of Davenant's opera of "Circe." Died, 1679.

BANISTER, JOHN, an English physician of the 16th century; author of various surgical treatises. Died, 1624.

BANKES, SIR JOHN, chief justice of the Common Pleas in the reign of Charles I. His lady, with the family, being at their seat at Corfe Castle, were summoned to surrender it, but she successfully defended it against the parliamentary troops, till relieved by the arrival of Lord Carnarvon, with a body of horse. Sir John died in 1644.

BANKS, JOHN, a bookseller, and author of a "Critical Review of the Life of Cromwell," &c. Born, 1709; died, 1751.

BANKS, JOHN, an English dramatist of the 18th century; author of the "Earl of Essex," a tragedy, &c.

BANKS, SIR JOSEPH, an eminent English naturalist, and for many years president of the Royal Society, was the son of W. Banks, esq., of Revesby Abbey, Lincolnshire, where he was born in 1743. His enthusiasm in the study of natural history may be judged of from the fact, that it led him to accompany Cook in his first circumnavigation of the world. Sir Joseph wrote but little, and, excepting papers in scientific periodicals, published only one small work, a treatise on the "Blight, Mildew, or Rust in Corn." Died 1820.

BANKS, THOMAS, an eminent English sculptor. Among the best of his works are "Caractacus taken Prisoner to Rome," and "Achilles mourning the Loss of Briseis." He also executed the admirable monument in Westminster Abbey, to the memory of Sir Eyre Cooté. Born, 1735; died, 1805.

BANNIER, JOHN, a Swedish general. He served under Gustavus Adolphus; and at the death of that prince became commander-in-chief. Born, 1601; died, 1641.

BANNISTER, JOHN, an admirable comic actor, the son of Charles Bannister, well known as a singer and a wit, was born in London, in 1760. Having been favourably noticed by Garrick, he made his debut at Drury Lane Theatre, as "Master J. Bannister," when twelve years of age; he then quitted the boards for a time, but obtained a permanent engagement in 1779. At first he aspired to tragedy, and gave it a decided preference; but his talents so clearly lay in the opposite direction, that on the death of Edwin he at once supplied his place, giving proofs of first-rate powers, and establishing himself as a public favourite. To name all the various parts in which he excelled his contemporaries, would occupy too much of our space; but we have a vivid recollection of him in Sylvester Daggerwood, Lingo, Trudge, the Three Singles, Bobadil, Dr. Panglos, Job Thornberry, Colonel Feignwell, Walter in "The Children in the Wood," and many others; and we do not hesitate to pronounce, without disparagement to the living, that he never has had his equal. Being much afflicted with the gout, he retired from the stage in 1815, having had the good fortune to earn a competence by his profession, and the prudence to keep it. He died Nov. 8. 1836, aged 76, respected and beloved by all who knew him. Nature had done much for Bannister, physically as well as mentally: his face, figure, and voice were excellent; his spirits exuberant; and an open manly countenance was a faithful index to the heart of "Gentleman Jack."

BANTI, SIGNORA, a celebrated Italian singer, who enjoyed great popularity both in Germany and England. Died, 1806.

BAPTIST, a portrait painter of Antwerp, who was much employed in this country. Died, 1691.

BAPTISTE, JOHN, surnamed MONNOYER, a Flemish painter, employed by William III. to decorate Kensington Palace. Born, 1635; died 1699.

BARBEYRAC, CHARLES, a French physician, whom Locke compared to our own Sydenham; author of "Questiones Medicæ Duodecim" &c. Born, 1629; died, 1699.

BARBEYRAC, JOHN, nephew of the above; professor of law at Berne, and subsequently at Groningen. To the performance of his duty as a lecturer, he added most laborious exertions as an author. He translated the most valuable portions of Grotius, Puffendorf, and other able civilians into French, and wrote a "History of Ancient Treatises," &c. Born, 1674; died, 1747.

BARBIERI, JOHN FRANCIS, also called GUERCINI, an eminent historical painter. Born, 1590; died, 1666.

BARBIERI, PAUL ANTHONY, brother of the above, an eminent painter of still life subjects. Died, 1640.

BARBOSA, ARIAS, a learned Portuguese professor of Greek at Salamanca; author of a treatise "On Prosody," and some Latin poems. Died, 1540.

BARBOSA, PETER, chancellor of Portugal; author of treatises "On the Digests." Died, 1596.

BARBOSA, AUGUSTIN, son of the last named, bishop of Ugento; author of a treatise "De Officio Episcopi," &c. Died, 1648.

BARBOUR, JOHN, a Scotch poet and divine, chaplain to David Bruce, of whose life and actions he wrote a history. Born, 1320; died, 1378.

BARCLAY, ALEXANDER, a writer of the 16th century, whose place of nativity is disputed by England and Scotland; the translator into English of the "Navis Stultifera, or Ship of Fools." Died, 1532.

BARCLAY, ROBERT, a Quaker, and one of the most eminent writers of that sect; author of "An Apology for the Quakers," &c. Uniting all the advantages of a learned education to great natural abilities, he became the redoubted champion of his religious principles; and as he travelled with the famous William Penn through England, Holland, and Germany, he was extensively known and everywhere highly respected. His writings, indeed, not only tended to propagate the doctrines of the Society of Friends, but tended materially to rectify public opinion concerning them, and to procure for them greater indulgence from the government. Born at Gordonstown, in Scotland, 1648; died, 1690.

BARCLAY, WILLIAM, a native of Scotland, who emigrated to France, and became professor of law at Angers, where he was considered one of the most eminent civilians of his time. He was the author of various treatises on the rights of popes and kings. Died, 1695.

BARCLAY, JOHN, son of the last named; author of "Euphormion," a Latin satire; "Argenis," a romance, &c. &c. Born in France, 1582; died at Rome, 1621.

BARCLAY, JOHN, an eccentric divine of the Church of Scotland, was born at Turriff, in the county of Aberdeen, in 1645. He completed his education at King's College, Aberdeen, and was appointed minister of the parish of Cruden, in Aberdeenshire, in 1675. He was the author of a rare and curious work in verse, now very scarce, called "A Description of the Roman Catholic Church." Died at Cruden, in 1710.

BARCLAY DE TOLLY, a Russian general, who, in the German and Polish campaigns of 1806 and 1807, bore a distinguished share, and was made a field-marshal. He succeeded Kutusof as commander-in-chief, headed the Russians at the battle of Leipsic, and led them into France in 1815. He was at one time minister of war, and ultimately was honoured with the title of prince. Died, 1818.

BARCOCHAB, or BARCHOCHEBAS, a Jewish impostor, who, under the pretence of being the real Messiah, obtained many followers, overrunning Judæa, and putting many Romans to the sword; but he was at length defeated and slain by Julius Severus in 134.

BARDAS, uncle and guardian to the emperor Michael III., put to death for endeavouring to seat himself on his nephew's throne, by Basilus, the Macedonian, in 866.

BARDAS, surnamed SCELERUS, a general of the emperor, John Zimiscea. After many vicissitudes, consequent on his aiming at the purple, he was taken into favour by the emperor Basil.

BARDIN, PIERRE, a French writer; author of "Le Grand Chambellan de France," &c. He lost his life while attempting to rescue a drowning man, 1657.

BAREBONE, PRAISE GOD, an M.P., and one of the most furious and notorious fanatics of Cromwell's time, from whom the Barebone's parliament derived its name.

BARENT, DIETRICH, a Dutch historical and portrait painter. Born, 1534; died, 1582.

BARERE, BERTRAND, one of the most notorious if not conspicuous actors in the first French revolution, was born in 1755 at Tarbes in Gascony, where his father possessed the small estate of Vieuzac. He was educated for the bar at Toulouse, practised as an advocate with considerable success, and besides occupying himself with literary pursuits of a trivial character, wrote a dissertation which procured him a seat in the Toulouse Academy of Sciences. In 1785 he married a young lady of good fortune. Three years later he paid his first visit to Paris; and the states-general having just then been summoned, he went back to his own province, and was there elected one of the representatives of the third estate. Among the crowd of legislators which at this conjuncture poured from all the provinces of France into Paris, Barère made no contemptible figure. His opinions, though popular, were not extreme; and his learning, his manners, his conversation, and his powers of eloquence were all calculated to gain him favour and esteem. But as the monarchical party became weaker and weaker, he gradually estranged himself more and more from it, and drew closer and closer to the Republicans. On the termination of the labours of the national assembly, he became a member of the high court of appeal; and when, in 1792, the legislative assembly invited the nation to elect an extraordinary convention, Barère was chosen one of its members by his own department. He voted for the death of the king, "sans appel et sans sursis," in words that have been oft repeated, "L'arbre de la liberté ne croit qu'arrosé par le sang des tyrans." After the fall of the monarchy, he acted with the Girondists, to whom he made himself useful by the ease and fluency with which he could draw up reports. But ready to side with the strongest on all occasions, he soon made common cause with the Mountain, whose bloodthirsty designs he remorselessly carried out; and he bore a large share in the infamous schemes subsequently planned during the "Reign of Terror," earning for the levity with which he discharged his disgusting office the nicknames of the Witling of Terror and the Anacron of the Guillotine. He fawned on Robespierre up to the 8th of Thermidor, and on the 9th he moved that Robespierre should be beheaded without a trial. On the fall of the convention he was sent a prisoner to the isle of Oleron; but he made his escape to Bordeaux, where he remained four years in obscurity; and on the establishment of Napoleon's government he enlisted in its service, and for some years officiated in the double capacity of a hireling writer and a spy. On the fall of Napoleon, in 1814, he again became a royalist. During the hundred days he was chosen by his native district a member of the chamber of representatives; but on the final return of the Bourbons, in 1815, he was compelled to retire into Belgium, where he resided till 1830. The revolution which then called Louis Philippe to the throne enabled him to return to France; but he was reduced to extreme indigence, and a small pension from the king and the government alone saved him from the necessity of begging his bread. Died, 1841. [Those who wish to see an instance of the literary tomahawk skillfully applied will find it in an article devoted to Barère's life and character in the Edinburgh Review, vol. lxxix.]

BARÉTTI, JOSEPH, a native of Turin, who resided many years in this country, and wrote the English language with ease and purity. Dr. Johnson procured him the situation of Italian teacher in Mr. Thralls's family. His works are very numerous, but the most valuable is his Italian and English Dictionary. Born, 1716; died, 1789.

BARHAM, Rev. RICHARD HARRIS (better known by his literary name of Thomas Ingoldsby), was a native of Canterbury, in which city he received his early education, and completed it at Brazenose College, Oxford. Although he adopted the clerical profession, and performed the duties of his sacred calling with strict propriety, he was by nature a humourist, and attempted not to restrain the flow of wit and fancy with which his mind was surcharged. He was a minor canon of St. Paul's, and occupied the house attached to the canonry of the Rev. Sydney Smith, with whom he was on terms of the most cordial friendship, and whom in many respects he much resembled. His other church preferment was the rectory of St. Augustine and St. Faith, London. "As an author he contributed much, and during many years, to several popular periodicals, the Edinburgh Review, Blackwood's Magazine, and the Literary Gazette among the number, but his most popular series of papers were given to Bentley's Miscellany, under the title of 'The Ingoldsby Legends,' since collected and published in 2 vols. 8vo. His popular novel, 'My Cousin Nicholas,' was also published in 3 vols. Of his poetical pieces it is not too much to say, that for originality of design and diction, for quaint illustration and musical verse, they are not surpassed in the English language." Died, aged 56, June 17, 1845.

BARKEK, EDMUND HENRY, an eminent classical scholar, and one of the most industrious of modern writers. He was a leading supporter of the Classical Journal, the British Critic, and Monthly Magazine; and his articles, chiefly on recondite points of philology and antiquities, were his mere nugæ delicæ, with which he amused the intervals of his more serious labour of editing Stephens's "Thesaurus Lingue Græcæ," a gigantic performance. Besides his greater work, he edited Prolegomena to Homer, Lemprière, and other school books. Born, 1788; died, 1839.

BARKEK, GEORGE, F. R. S., of Springfield, Birmingham, a gentleman of the legal profession, whose memory is entitled to respect and gratitude, for the success of many of the excellent institutions which do honour to his native town, and from his zeal in the promotion of the arts, manufactures, and sciences. He was mainly instrumental in obtaining acts for making what was then called 'that gigantic absurdity, the Birmingham Railroad,' and its now confederate line, the Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham. He was the bosom friend of Mr. Watt and of Mr. Boulton, and their confidential adviser in the vast projects which have been so productive of honour and wealth to themselves and to this country." He died, Dec. 6, 1845, aged 69.

BARKEK, MATTHEW HENRY (better known to the public under his assumed name of The Old Sailor), was the author of several naval novels and sketches; among which are "Tough Yarns," "Jem Bunt," "The Victory," "Land and Sea Tales," &c., besides "The Life of Nelson," and numberless communications in prose and verse, to various highly respectable periodicals. He went to sea at the age of 16, but never arrived at higher promotion than the command of a hired armed schooner; and finding himself unemployed at the end of the war, he tried his hand at authorship. His delineation of nautical scenes is allowed to be replete with humour and characteristic truth. Died, June, 1846, aged 56.

BARKEK, ROBERT, known as inventor of the panorama, was born in Kells, in Ireland, 1740. While viewing the scenery round Edinburgh, whither he had removed as a portrait painter, he was struck with the idea of representing similar views in a circular painting, in which he ultimately succeeded, and thereby eventually realised a considerable fortune. Died, 1806.

BARKEK, JOHN, an English antiquary, said to be the real author of the "Display of Heraldry," published under the name of Gwillim. Born, 1572; died, 1642.

BARLAAM, a learned divine of Calabria in the 14th century. He wrote alternately for the Greek and Latin Church; his advocacy of the latter being purchased by the bishopric of Gieraci, in Italy. Died, 1348.

BARLAUD, ADRIAN, a Dutch critic, and professor of eloquence at Louvain; author of a "Chronicle on the Dukes of Brabant," "Notes on Terence, Menander," &c. &c. Died, 1542.

BARLOW, THOMAS, bishop of Lincoln in the reign of Charles II., James II., and William III. He was a man of the most versatile and accommodating principles, if we may judge by his acts. Under the first-named king he wrote against popery; under the second he wrote in favour of the royal power to dispense with the penal laws against it; and under the third he was among the most active in punishing non-juring clergymen. He wrote "Cases of Conscience," &c. Born, 1607; died, 1691.

BARLOW, FRANCIS, an English artist; an excellent painter of animals. Died, 1702.

BARLOW, JOEL, a native of the United States of America, and one of the deputies sent by the Constitutional Society to address the French Convention. He was also, in 1811, appointed ambassador to Napoleon; and being invited by the Duke of Bassano to a conference with the emperor at Wilna, he proceeded thither, but the privations he was compelled to endure on his journey, and the fatigue of travelling night and day, caused his death. He was a political writer and a poet, his principal work being "The Columbiad."

BARLOWE, WILLIAM, bishop of Bath and Wells, deprived by queen Mary for having married, but made bishop of Winchester on the accession of queen Elizabeth. Died, 1658.

BARLOWE, WILLIAM, son of the above, archdeacon of Sarum; he was well skilled in natural philosophy, and was the first English writer on the properties of the loadstone. Died, 1625.

BARNARD, JOHN, D.D., prebendary of Lincoln in the reign of Charles II.; author of a "Life of Dr. Heylyn," &c. Died, 1683.

BARNARD, Sir JOHN, lord mayor of London, and one of its representatives in parliament for 40 years. He was an able speaker, and a remarkably conscientious and religious man; and so greatly was he respected by his fellow citizens, that they erected a statue to his memory in the Royal Exchange. Born at Reading, 1685; died, 1764.

BARNARD, THEODORE, a Dutch painter who settled in England; said to have painted the kings and bishops in Chichester cathedral.

BARNAVE, ANTHONY PETER JOSEPH, an eloquent and popular member of the French national assembly. He was charged with the conveyance of the king from Varennes to Paris; on which occasion he conducted himself with great delicacy. Though he had retired to private life, he was arrested by the faction then in power, and guillotined in 1794.

BARNES, JOSHUA, a learned divine, educated at Christ's Hospital, London, and Emanuel College, Cambridge; author of the "Life of Edward III.," and a poem "On the History of Esther," and editor of the works of Euripides, Anacreon, and Homer. Born, 1654; died, 1712.

BARNES, ROBERT, D. D., chaplain to Henry VIII.; burned to death in Smithfield for Lutheranism, in 1540; author of a treatise on Justification, &c.

BARNES, THOMAS, a gentleman of first-rate literary ability, and principal editor of "The Times," which journal owes much of its celebrity and influence to the powerful political leaders that came from his pen, as well as to the rare skill and discrimination he evinced in the general control and adaptation of the articles furnished by his coadjutors, &c. Notwithstanding the share he necessarily took in the strife of politics, it is recorded to his honour that he retained the friendship of all who had once intimately known him, how much soever they might chance to differ on questions of public interest. Mr. Barnes was educated at Christ's Hospital and Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he took his B. A. and M. A. degrees. Died, 1841, aged 55.

BARNEVELDT, JOHN D'OLDEN, a Dutch statesman, put to death by Maurice, prince of Orange, on an ill-sustained charge of having plotted to betray his country to Spain. Beheaded, 1619.

BARNEY, JOSHUA, a distinguished naval commander, was born at Baltimore, in 1759. When a boy he made several voyages to Europe; and in 1776, when not 17, he was presented with a lieutenant's commission on account of his bravery. During the struggle for American independence, Barney took several vessels, and performed numerous acts of gallantry; and after numerous adventures arrived in Philadelphia in 1782, when he again entered on active duty, and continued a successful career till the end of the war. In 1795 he received the commission of captain in the French service, and commanded a French squadron, but resigned his command in 1800, and returned to America. In 1813 he was appointed to command the flotilla for defence of the Chesapeake. During the summer of 1814 he kept up an active warfare with the British; but he was made prisoner. Died, at Pittsburg, 1818.

BARO, PIERRE, a French Protestant divine, who came to England in the 16th century, and was chosen Lady Margaret's professor of divinity at Cambridge; author of some polemical works in Latin.

BAROCCIO, FEDERIGO, an Italian painter, chiefly of scriptural subjects. Born at Urbino, 1528; died, 1612.

BARON, BONADVENTURE, the assumed name of Fitzgerald, a native of Ireland, who became a Franciscan monk; author of Latin poems, and a body of divinity. Died, 1696.

BARONIUS, CÆSAR, confessor to Clement VIII., who made him cardinal and librarian of the Vatican; author of "Ecclesiastical Annals." Born at Sora, 1588; died, 1607.

BAROZZI, JAMES, a celebrated architect, successor to Michael Angelo as architect of St. Peter's; author of "Rules for the Five Orders of Architecture," &c. Born, 1507; died, 1577.

BARRAL, PETER, a French abbé; author of a "Dictionary of Roman Antiquities," &c. Died, 1772.

BARRAL, LOUIS MATTHIAS DE, bishop of Troyes, was a native of Grenoble. He emigrated at the Revolution; but returning to France in 1801, Buonaparte made him bishop of Meaux, and afterwards archbishop of Tours, and almoner to the Empress Josephine. Died, 1816.

BARRAS, PAUL FRANCIS JOHN NICHOLAS, Count de, was originally a sub-lieutenant in the regiment of Languedoc, and served for some time in India. Embracing revolutionary principles, he assisted at the attack on the Bastille, and voted in the National Convention for the death of the unfortunate Louis XVI. He subsequently became one of the chiefs of the government, but retired from public life when Buonaparte assumed the direction of affairs. For some years he resided at Rome, but returned to France in 1814, and remained there till his death in 1829.

BARRE', WILLIAM VINCENT, a native of France, who, after serving in the Russian navy with credit in his youth, returned to his own country on the breaking out of the French revolution, joined his countrymen in arms, and was eventually appointed interpreter to the French government; but having indulged his vein of sarcasm on the legitimacy of the First Consul, he was put under arrest. He escaped the vigilance of his enemies, and got to London, where he published a "History of the First Consulate." He translated into French Sir Sydney Smith's pamphlet on the expedition into Egypt; for which the English government rewarded him. While at Dublin, in 1829, he committed suicide.

BARRET, GEORGE, a landscape painter, of considerable eminence. He was born in Dublin, but passed most of his life in England, and was a chief founder of the Royal Academy. Born, 1730; died, 1784.

BARRETT, WILLIAM, an English topographer; author of a "History of Bristol." Died, 1789.

BARRINGTON, JOHN SHUTE, the first Viscount Barrington; author of "An Essay on the several Dispensations of God to Mankind," "The Rights of Protestant Dissenters," &c. Born 1678; died, 1734.

BARRINGTON, DAINES, fourth son of Viscount Barrington, was bred to the law, and rose to the office of second justice of Chester. He was author of "Observations on the Statutes," &c. Born, 1727; died, 1800.

BARRINGTON, SAMUEL, youngest brother of the last-named, entered early into the navy, and became rear-admiral of the white. He took St. Lucia, in the face of a superior force; and was conspicuous for his zeal and courage at the memorable relief of Gibraltar, by Lord Howe. Died, 1800.

BARRINGTON, SHUTE, bishop of Durham, was the sixth son of the first Viscount Barrington, and born in 1734. He engaged in some controversial disputes both with the Calvinists and Romanists; but though hostile to the doctrines of the latter, he was a liberal benefactor of the French clergy who took refuge in England during the Revolution. Died, 1826.

BARROS, JOHN DE, a learned Portuguese, treasurer of the Indies, and author of a "History of Asia and the Indies." Died, 1870.

BARROW, ISAAC, D.D., a learned divine and mathematician; author of numerous mathematical and theological works; and one who, for versatility of knowledge, had few rivals. King Charles II. used to say of him, that he was an unfair preacher, for he exhausted every subject upon which he discoursed. Born in London, 1630; chosen vice-chancellor of Cambridge, 1657; died, 1677.

BARROW, Sir JOHN, Bart., F. R. S., for many years secretary to the Admiralty, a great traveller, and a voluminous writer of travels, biographies, &c.; was born near Ulverston, in Lancashire, June 19th, 1764. At an early age he displayed a decided inclination for mathematical pursuits, and after passing some years as superintending clerk of an iron foundry in Liverpool, he became mathematical teacher at an academy in Greenwich, whence he was appointed, through the interest of Sir George Staunton, secretary to the embassy destined for China, under Lord Macartney, in 1792. In this capacity his talents and acquirements were duly appreciated; and when Lord Macartney was, in 1797, appointed to the government of the Cape of Good Hope, he secured Mr. Barrow's services as private secretary, and subsequently appointed him auditor-general of public accounts, an office which he held till the Cape was evacuated by the English in 1803. In 1804 he was appointed, by Lord Melville, secretary to the Admiralty; and with the exception of a few months, during the Whig administration, in 1806-7, he continued to fill this office, down to his retirement, in 1845. He was created a baronet during the short administration of Sir Robert Peel, in 1835. Besides contributing numerous articles on miscellaneous subjects to the Quarterly Review and the Encyclopædia Britannica, he published the Lives of Lord Macartney, Lord Anson, Lord Howe, and Peter the Great; Travels in China, Voyage to Cochin China, the Mutiny of the Bounty, his own autobiography, &c. The general aim of his writings was to convey information, to promote the arts and sciences, and to stimulate research and enquiry; and he had the great privilege to live to see the most beneficial effects produced by his honest and faithful labours. We should not omit to state that Sir John was the constant and successful advocate at the Admiralty of those voyages of discovery which have enlarged the bounds of science, and conferred so much honour on the British name and nation. Died, Nov. 23. 1848.

BARRUEL, AUGUSTIN, a French ecclesiastic, and of some note as a man of letters during the French Revolution, was born in 1741. He was for some years editor of "Le Journal Ecclesiastique;" but as the principles he there advocated were opposed to the revolution, he was obliged to fly to England, where, in 1794, he published his "History of the French Clergy," &c.; but his best known work is entitled "Memoirs for a History of Jacobinism, Impiety, and Anarchy," in 5 vols. 8vo.; a production in which fact and fiction are so closely interwoven as to destroy its authenticity. He returned to France in 1802, and died there in 1820, aged 79.

BARRUEL DE BEAUVERT, ANTHONY JOSEPH, Count de, was born at the castle of Beauvert, near Marseilles, in 1756. In 1790 he belonged to the national guard at Bagnols; and on the flight of the royal family to Varennes he offered himself as a hostage for Louis XVI. In 1795 he was editor of the journal entitled "Les Actes des Apôtres;" for which he was sentenced to deportation, but escaped. For a time during the consulate he was under the surveillance of the police; but at length obtaining the protection of the Empress Josephine, he was appointed to an office in the department of Jura; where he died in 1817. He wrote the Life of Rousseau, and various works relative to the Bourbons during their exile.

BARRY, GERALD, better known as Geraldus Cambrensis; author of "Topographia Hibernica," "Itinerarium Cambrie," &c. He flourished in the 12th century, but the date of his death is not known.

BARRY, JAMES T., a painter of considerable genius, and a skilful writer on his art, was born at Cork, in 1741. The celebrated Edmund Burke was his friend and patron; by whose means he was enabled to travel, and study the great masterpieces of art in Italy. Died, 1806.

BARRY, SPEANGER, a celebrated actor; and, for a time, the rival of Garrick, who, however, in the higher walks of the drama, greatly excelled him. Born, 1719; died, 1777.

BARTAS, WILLIAM DE SALLUST DU, a French poet, warrior, and statesman; confidentially employed by Henry IV.; author of "The Week of the Creation," &c. Died, 1590.

BARTII, JOHN, a French naval officer, remarkable for his skill and daring as a privateer. Born at Dunkirk, 1651; died, 1702.

BARTHELEMI, NICHIOLAS, a monk of the 15th century; author of a treatise "On the Active and Contemplative Life," &c.

BARTHELEMON, FRANCIS HIPPOLITE, a musical composer and violinist, was born at Bordeaux, in 1741, but resided chiefly in London, and was for many years leader of the Opera-house. As a composer he was remarkable for rapidity; and as a performer for taste and execution. Died, 1808.

BARTHELEMY, JOHN JAMES, the learned author of "The Voyage of the Younger Anacharsis in Greece;" was born at Cassis, in Provence, 1716; died, 1795.

BARTHEZ, PAUL JOSEPH, an eminent French physician, was born at Montpellier, in 1734, where he founded a medical school, which acquired great reputation throughout Europe. For many years he practised in Paris, and was consulted upon the most important cases: he also wrote in the Journal des Savans, the Encyclopédie, &c.; and was a member of almost every learned society. During the revolution he suffered greatly in his fortune; but Napoleon, who knew his great merits, restored him, in his old age, to wealth and honours. Died, 1806.

BARTHOLDY, JACOB SOLOMON, a Prussian diplomatist, born a Jew, but after travelling in Greece he abjured Judaism, and became a Protestant. In 1807 he served against the French as an officer in the Landwehr of Vienna, and wrote a tract called "The War of the Tyrol," which produced a great sensation. Died, 1836.

BARTOLI, or BARTOLUS, a learned civilian, who flourished in the 14th century, and is said to have contributed more than any of his predecessors to the elucidation of legal science. Born, 1312; died, 1356.

BARTOLI, DANIEL, a learned Jesuit; author of a "History of the Jesuits," &c. Born at Ferrara, 1608; died, 1685.

BARTOLI, COSMO, an Italian writer of the 16th century; author of a "Life of Frederic Barbarossa," &c.

BARTOLO, an Italian lawyer of the 14th century; professor of law at Pisa, and author of numerous works on law and other subjects.

BARTOLOZZI, FRANCIS, an engraver of first-rate merit, was born at Florence in 1728; came to England in 1764; admitted a member of the Royal Academy in 1769; went to Lisbon, at the invitation of the prince-regent of Portugal, in 1802; and there died in 1815. The productions of his graver are numerous, highly esteemed, and eagerly sought after.

BARTON, BERNARD, the celebrated "Quaker poet," was born near London, 1734. In 1810 he became a clerk in Alexander's bank, at Woodbridge, where he officiated almost to the day of his death. His first volume of poetry was published in 1811, and this was succeeded by numerous others, most of them devoted to homely subjects, but all of them animated by the purest feeling and the most glowing fancy. But it was not only for his merits as a poet that Bernard Barton deserves to be held in remembrance. He was endowed with every quality which endears a man to all that come within his influence. His genial good humour and vast stores of information made him a welcome guest wherever he appeared; and the native sincerity of his character, which was set forth in every act of his life, was enhanced by a benignity, liberality, and charity, in entire accordance with the precepts of his faith. Died, Feb. 19. 1849.

BARTON, ELIZABETH, a religious impostor, called the Holy Maid of Kent, was a poor country girl, born at Allington in that county, who, instructed by priests, declared she was divinely inspired, denounced the heresies of the reformed religion, and pretended to the gift of prophecy; but having included the king (Henry VIII.) in her predictions and denunciations, she and her associates were tried and executed for high treason, 1584.

BARTRAM, JOHN, an eminent American botanist, was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, in 1701. He formed a botanic garden near Philadelphia, said to have been the first establishment of the kind in America; and so intimate an acquaintance had he with the vegetable kingdom, that Linneus pronounced him "the greatest natural botanist in the world." Died, 1777.

BARTRAM, WILLIAM, a son of the preceding, was also a distinguished naturalist. At the request of Dr. Fothergill, he travelled through the Floridas, Carolina, and Georgia, for the purposes of making researches in natural history, and transmitted to his employer in London the valuable collections and drawings which he had made. His "American Ornithology" may be considered the precursor of Wilson's invaluable work. Died, 1823.

BARWICK, JOHN, an English divine, who exerted himself with considerable zeal and ability on the royal side in the civil wars. Born 1612; died, 1664.

BARWICK, PETER, brother of the above, an eminent physician; author of a "Defence of Harvey's Doctrine of the Circulation of the Blood," &c. Died, 1705.

BASEDOW, JOHN BERNARD, a German writer, and professor of moral philosophy and belles lettres. His novel plans of education excited great attention in Germany; and in the seminary he established at Dessau, called "The Philanthropinum," many excellent teachers were formed, and great good effected. Born, 1723; died, 1790.

BASEVI, GEORGE, a distinguished architect, was born 1795. Among the edifices built or restored by him are the churches in the early English style at Twickenham and Brompton, the Norman church at Hove, near Brighton, and St. Mary's Hall, at Brighton, in the Elizabethan style. Belgrave Square, in the metropolis, was erected from his designs; and he was joint architect with Mr. Smirke of the Conservative Club, in St. James's Street. Having gone to inspect the West Bell Tower of Ely Cathedral, then under repair, he accidentally fell through an aperture, and was killed on the spot, Oct. 16. 1845.

BASIL, Sr., surnamed the Great, to distinguish him from other patriarchs of the same name, was born, in 326, in Cæsarea, in Cappadocia; and is honoured by the Greek Church as one of its most illustrious patrons. He is chiefly remembered for his ascetic doctrines, and his zeal to promote monastic discipline. Died, 379.

BASILIUS I., the Macedonian, emperor of the East; killed by a stag while hunting, in 836.

BASILIUS II., succeeded John Zimisces, in 976. He was guilty of abominable cruelty in his war with the Bulgarians. Died, 1025.

BASILIUS, an impostor, who excited a revolt in the eastern empire, in 934, and was burnt to death at Constantinople.

BASLOWITZ, JOHN, emperor of Russia; he added Astracan to his empire, and was the first who assumed the style and title of Czar. Died, 1534.

BASIRE, ISAAC, a learned divine, prebend of Durham. On the breaking out of the civil war he lost all his preferments; on which he made a journey to the Morea, where he preached with great success among the Greek Christians; and on his return wrote an account of his travels. Born, 1607; died, 1676.

BASKERVILLE, JOHN, a celebrated letter-founder and printer; and one to whom the typographical art is much indebted. It has been remarked, however, that his books are far more elegantly than correctly printed. Born at Wolverley, in Worcestershire, in 1706; died, 1775.

BASKERVILLE, Sir SIMON, an English physician of great eminence and wealth; knighted by Charles I. Died, 1641.

BASNAGE, BENJAMIN, a French Protestant divine; author of "A Treatise on the Church." Born, 1580; died, 1652.

BASNAGE, ANTHONY, son of the above; imprisoned at Havre de Grace on account of his religion. Born, 1610; died, 1691.

BASNET, EDWARD, dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, who exchanged his clerical for a military habit, and served under the lord deputy against O'Neil, the rebel. He died during the brief reign of Edward VI.

BASSANI, GIAMATTISTA, a musical composer of the 17th century.

BASSANO, or BASSAN, JAMES, an Italian painter, chiefly of landscapes. Born, 1510; died, 1592.

BASSANO, HUGHES BERNARD MARET. Duke of, a celebrated French political writer and statesman, was the son of an eminent physician at Dijon. On the first outburst of the French revolution he enthusiastically embraced its extremest principles, and published a paper under the title of the Bulletin de l'Assemblée, which he continued until a bookseller started the Moniteur, of which Maret was appointed editor, and which speedily became the official organ of the government. He became acquainted with Buonaparte just as that extraordinary man began to rise into celebrity and influence, and was placed by him in the important office of chef de division in the foreign office. In 1792 he was sent to England, ostensibly to secure the neutrality of the British government, but in reality to hoodwink that government until the moment should arrive at which it could be securely, as well as efficiently assailed. But the English minister of that day was too clear-sighted even for French diplomacy. Both Maret and the French ambassador, Chauvelin, were peremptorily ordered out of England; and the former, soon after his return home, was sent as ambassador to Naples, but was captured on his way thither by the Austrians, and detained as a prisoner until 1795, when he and the Marquis de Lemonville were exchanged with the French government for a daughter of the ill-fated Louis XVI. Being decidedly attached to Buonaparte, both by feeling and by policy, Maret took a bold and active part in the long and complicated intrigues which were set on foot for the overthrow of the directory and the introduction of the consulate; and when the establishment of the latter crowned the success of those intrigues, he was made secretary to the consular council of state. Subsequently he was for some time private secretary to Buonaparte, to whose dictation, it is said, not a few of his articles in the Moniteur were actually written. In 1811 he was made Duc de Bassano and minister of foreign affairs; and in 1812 he conducted and signed the well-known treaties between France, Austria, and Prussia, preparatory to the fatal expedition to Russia. When the emperor was sent to Elba, in 1814, the Duc de Bassano retired from public life; but immediately after the return of the emperor, he joined him, and was very nearly being taken prisoner at Waterloo. On the utter ruin of Napoleon, the duke was banished from France, but at the revolution of July, 1830, he was recalled, and restored to all the honours of which he had been deprived. In 1838 he was made minister of the Interior, and president of the council, but the ministry of which he formed a part, survived only three days. Born, 1758; died, 1839.

BASSËT, PETER, chamberlain to Henry V. of England; author of a history of that king, which is still extant in MS.

BASSI, LAURA MARIA CATHARINE, a learned Italian lady, whose singular accomplishments procured her the professor's chair at Bologna, and the title of doctor of philosophy. Born, 1711; died, 1778.

BASSOMPIERRE, FRANCIS DE, a marshal of France, distinguished both as a soldier and a statesman, and remarkable for his personal attractions; who after being patronized by Henry IV. and Louis XIII., was imprisoned for 12 years for giving some offence to Cardinal Richelieu. He was author of his own memoirs and several other works. Born, 1575; died, 1646.

BASSUET, PIERRE, an eminent French surgeon; author of numerous dissertations on subjects connected with his profession. Born, 1706; died, 1757.

BASTA, GEORGE, an Italian general of the 16th century; author of two treatises on military discipline.

BASTIDE, JOHN FRANCIS DE LA, an industrious French miscellaneous writer, was born at Marseilles in 1724. He settled in Paris, where he engaged in various literary enterprises; of which the most voluminous were the "Bibliothèque Universelle des Romains," in 112 vols., and the "Choix des Anciens Mercurcs," in 103 vols.

BASTWICK, JOHN, an English physician, and a furious writer against the Church in the time of Charles I. Born at Writtle, in Essex, 1593; died, 1650.

BATE, GEORGE, physician to Charles I., Oliver Cromwell, and Charles II., and one of the first members of the Royal Society. He was the author of a Latin history of the civil wars, and some medical works. Born, 1593; died, 1669.

BATE, JOHN, an English divine, and prior of the Carmelite monastery at York, in the 15th century; author of a "Compendium of Logic," &c.

BATECUMBE, WILLIAM, an English mathematician of the 15th century; author of a treatise, "De Sphæra Solida," &c.

BATEMAN, WILLIAM, bishop of Norwich, a learned prelate, and the founder of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. Died, 1354.

BATES, JOHN, an eminent musician, born at Halifax, Yorkshire, in 1740. He was unanimously chosen conductor of the commemoration of Handel at Westminster Abbey; and till the year 1793 he conducted the choral performances of ancient music, when he retired, and was succeeded by Mr. Greatorex. He died in 1799.

BATES, WILLIAM, a nonconformist divine; author of "Lives of Learned and Pious Men," &c. Born, 1625; died, 1699.

BATHE, WILLIAM, an Irish Jesuit, governor of the Irish seminary at Salamanca. Died, 1641.

BATHURST, ALLEN, Earl, a zealous opposer of the measures of Sir Robert Walpole, and the intimate friend of Bolingbroke, Pope, Addison, and the other eminent writers of his time. Born, 1684; died, 1775.

BATHURST, HENRY, Earl, son of the above, and lord chancellor of England; author of the "Theory of Evidence," &c. Born, 1714; died, 1794.

BATHURST, Right Rev. HENRY, bishop of Norwich, was born at Brackley, in Northamptonshire, in 1744; and educated at Winchester, and New College, Oxford. He was presented to the rectory of Witchingham, in Norfolk, in 1770; subsequently became dean of Durham; and, in 1805, was consecrated bishop of Norwich. In the House of Lords, Dr. Bathurst was a strenuous supporter of the Catholic claims: in his diocese, an exemplary prelate. He died, April 5, 1837.—The bishop's eldest son, Dr. HENRY BATHURST, archdeacon of Norwich, and rector of the valuable livings of North Creake, Norfolk, and of Hollisley, Suffolk, was the author of "Memoirs" of his right reverend father; a work overflowing with spleen and expressions of disappointment, that one so faithful to his old friends, the Whigs, should have never been preferred to a richer diocese! Alas, poor human nature! Died, Sept. 1844.

BATHURST, RALPH, dean of Wells; author of some elegant Latin poems, and one of the founders of the Royal Society. Born, 1620; died, 1704.

BATHYLLUS, the cotemporary of Pylades, and one of the most celebrated pantomimists of antiquity, was born at Alexandria, and became the slave of Mæcenas, who enfranchised him. The art of these celebrated mimes consisted in expressing the passions by gestures, attitudes, &c., not by the modern fooleries of harlequin, clown, and scenic changes. Bathyllus excelled in representing comedy; Pylades in tragedy.

BATONI, POMPEO GIROLAMO, an eminent Italian painter, esteemed as the restorer of the Roman school. His most admired work is the "Contention of St. Peter and Simon the Magician," in St. Peter's, at Rome. Born at Lucca, 1708; died at Rome, 1787.

BATOU KHAN, grandson of Zenghis Khan, and his successor in the northern part of his vast empire. He died after a long reign and numerous conquests, in 1276.

BATSCH, AUGUSTUS JOHN GEORGE CHARLES, an eminent German naturalist; author of "Elenchus Fungorum," &c. Born, 1761; died, 1801.

BATTELY, JOHN, archdeacon of Canterbury, and chaplain to Archbishop Sancroft; author of "Antiquitates Rutupinae," &c. Died, 1708.

BATTEUX, CHARLES, a French writer; editor and commentator on the poetics of Horace, Vida, &c. Born, 1713; died, 1780.

BATTHYANI, Count LOUIS, a scion of one of the noblest and most ancient Hungarian families, was born in 1809. For many years he was the leader of the Liberal Opposition in the upper house of the Hungarian parliament; and had long been distinguished for his devotion to the cause of Hungary, which he longed to see reinstated in its ancient administrative independence. Summoned in March 1848, by the emperor-king Ferdinand, to form the first independent and responsible cabinet of Hungary, he strictly adhered, while in office, to the constitution of the country; repeatedly repairing to the emperor-king's court at Innsbruck, to negotiate between the sovereign and the people, and labouring to heal the ruptures that daily threatened to plunge the nation into civil war. Animated by the same views, he left Pesth for Vienna, in September of the same year; but when he saw that all his efforts were likely to be fruitless, he resigned his office and retired to his estates in Eisenberg. On the invasion of Hungary by Jellachich, the ban of Croatia, Batthyani entered the ranks of the National Guard; but a fall from his horse compelled him to give up all thought of aiding the cause of Hungary in the field. In December he returned to Pesth, and took part in the proceedings of the parliament, labouring as before, despite of calumny and intrigue, to negotiate between the king and the country, and to impress all parties with his own moderate and practicable views. Meanwhile the revolutionary party in the Hungarian parliament having proposed to transfer the seat of government from Pesth to Debreczin, Batthyani strenuously opposed this measure on the ground of its illegality; and all that he could effect was, that a deputation, of which he formed one, should be sent to Prince Windischgrätz, once more to attempt a compromise between the king and the people. But the deputation failed in its object. This was Batthyani's last public act. On the 8th of January, he was arrested in the drawing-room of his sister-in-law, at Pesth, transferred successively to Oedenburg, Laybach, and Pesth, and, after nine months' imprisonment, was tried by court-martial, declared guilty of high-treason, and sentenced to die on the gallows, Oct. 6, 1849. He heard the sentence with tranquillity and composure. Having taken leave of his wife, he endeavoured, in the course of the night, to open the veins of his neck by means of a blunt paper-knife, and thus to escape the last indignity of what the Austrians called the "law." But his attempt was discovered, and though he lost much blood, the surgeons succeeded in preserving his life. Still it was the opinion of the medical men, that the sentence, as pronounced by the court-martial, could not be executed; and it was commuted to a soldier's death. He died as he lived, calm, majestic, and conscious of innocence. His possessions were confiscated; and his wife (a member of the noble family of Zichy) and children left the country of their fathers for a foreign land, there to weep, and if possible to forgive. The news of the execution of Batthyani caused astonishment and horror throughout the civilised world. It was universally felt that his case differed in all respects from that of men who had taken up arms against Austria in the spirit of rebellion, and with the avowed object of overthrowing her authority. On the contrary, Batthyani had never aimed at the complete separation of Hungary from Austria; he had all along been decidedly opposed to the establishment of an Hungarian republic; and though far from approving the principles of the Austrian government, he had, through good and evil report, supported the union between the two countries, on the basis of the constitution of March 1848, voluntarily conceded by the emperor-king. Why then was he sacrificed? The time has not arrived when this question can be satisfactorily answered. But neither the nature nor the manner of his trial, nor the language of the verdict, has been able to justify the "deep damnation of his taking-off." In the absence of an adequate motive to such a deed, conjecture must be vain. But thus much may be said, that his devotion to the cause of constitutional government had procured him much ill-will at the court of Vienna, from those who were bent on the restoration of the despotic system, overthrown in 1848; and it is not improbable that, buoyed up by the success that had followed the Russian invasion in 1849, they took occasion to strike, in the person of Batthyani, at all who might be inclined to tread in his footsteps; for despotic governments hold in especial abhorrence the moderate reformer.

BATTIE, WILLIAM, a physician, very skilful in the cure of mental aberrations; author of a "Treatise on Mental Madness," &c. Born, 1708; died, 1776.

BATTISILL, JONATHAN, a musical composer of some note; and the author of many deservedly admired anthems, songs, glees, &c. Born, 1738; died, 1801.

BAUDELOQUE, JOHN LOUIS, an eminent French surgeon and accoucheur, whose skill induced Napoleon to appoint him principal midwife to the empress Maria Louisa. His works on midwifery are much esteemed. Born, 1746; died, 1810.

BAUDIN, PETER CHARLES, a member of the French National Assembly and Convention; author of "Anecdotes sur la Constitution," &c. Born, 1751; died, 1799.

BAUDIUS, DOMINIC, professor of eloquence at Leyden, and historiographer to the states; author of Latin poems, &c. &c. Born, 1561; died, 1613.

BAUDOT DE JULLI, NICHOLAS, a French historian; author of the "History of Catharine of France, queen of England," &c. Born, 1678; died, 1759.

BAUDOUIN, BENEDICT, a French divine of the 17th century; author of a dissertation "De la Chansure des Anciens."

BAUDRAND, MICHAEL ANTHONY, a French geographer; author of a "Geographical Dictionary." Born, 1633; died, 1700.

BAUER, FERDINAND, a German artist, highly distinguished as a botanical painter. He came to England, and made drawings of the exotic plants in the royal gardens of Kew; and was engaged as draughtsman to accompany Mr. Robert Brown, in Captain Flinders' expedition to the coast of New Holland, between 1802 and 1805, for the purpose of making drawings there from the living plants, which were afterwards published. Died, at Vienna, 1826.

BAUHINUS, or BAUHIN, JOHN, a French physician and celebrated botanist; author of "Historia Plantarum," &c. Born at Basle, 1541; died, 1613.

BAUHINUS, or BAUHIN, GASPARD, brother of the above; an excellent botanist, author of "Institutiones Anatomicae," "Phytopinax," "Pinax," and numerous other works. Born, 1560; died, 1624.

BAULDRI, PAUL, professor of sacred history at Utrecht; author of "Chronological Tables," &c. Born, 1639; died, 1706.

BAUME, ANTHONY, a French chemist; author of a "Treatise on Theoretical and Experimental Chemistry," "A Manual of Pharmacy," &c. Died, 1805.

BAUME, JAMES FRANCIS DE LA, a French divine; author of "The Christiade," &c. Died, 1757.

BAUME, NICHOLAS AUGUSTUS DE LA, marquis of Montrevel, and a marshal of France, was born 1636. From his earliest youth he had been distinguished by his daring valour, and had frequently braved death in the field of battle; but such was his ridiculous superstition, that on the contents of a salt-cellar having been accidentally thrown on him, he instantly exclaimed that he was a dead man, and actually expired from the terror with which it inspired him. Died, 1716.

BAUMER, JOHN WILLIAM, a German physician; author of a "Natural History of the Mineral Kingdom," &c. Born, 1719; died, 1788.

BAUMGARTEN, ALEXANDER GOTTLIEB, professor of philosophy at Frankfort-on-the-Oder; author of "Metaphysica," "Ethica Philosophica," &c. Born, 1714; died, 1762.

BAUR, FREDERIC WILLIAM VON, a Russian general, in the service of the empress, Catharine II.; author of "Memoires Historiques et Géographiques sur la Valachie," &c. Died, 1783.

BAUR, JOHN WILLIAM, a painter of Strasburg; chiefly noted for his architectural subjects. Born, 1610; died, 1640.

BAWDWEEN, WILLIAM, an English divine and antiquary; editor of two volumes of Doomsday Book. Died in 1816.

BAXTER, RICHARD, an eminent nonconformist divine and most voluminous writer. Foremost among his most popular works is the "Saint's Everlasting Rest." In 1685 he was tried before the brutal judge Jefferies, grossly insulted by him, and sentenced to fine and imprisonment; but the punishment was shortly after remitted by the king. Born, 1615; died, 1691.

BAXTER, ANDREW, an eminent metaphysician, and author of an "Enquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul," &c. Born at Aberdeen, 1687; died, 1750.

BAYARD, PIERRE DU TERRAIL, Chevalier de, a noble Frenchman by birth, and one of the bravest military leaders of the 16th century. So admirable, indeed, was his character, that he universally obtained the appellation of "the Fearless and Irreproachable Knight." Born, 1476; killed at the siege of Rebec, 1521.

BAYER, JOHN, a German astronomer of the 17th century; author of "Uranometria," a celestial atlas.

BAYER, THEOPHILUS SIEGFRED, a German philologist; author of a very curious and able work, entitled "Museum Sini-cum." Born, 1694; died, 1738.

BAYEUX, N., an advocate of Caen; author of "Reflections on the Reign of Trajan," &c. Put to death in the prison of Orleans, 1792.

BAYLE, PETER, a celebrated French writer, philosopher, and critic; author of the well-known "Biographical, Historical, and Critical Dictionary," and of several other literary, philosophical, and theological works. Born, 1647; died, 1706.

BAYLEY, ANSELM, an English divine; author of "A Grammar of the Hebrew Language," &c. &c. Died, 1791.

BAYLEY, the Right Hon. Sir JOHN, a learned and upright judge, was called to the bar in 1792, and appointed a serjeant-at-law in 1799. In 1808 he was made one of the justices of the King's Bench, and received the honour of knighthood. He was a man of liberal education and enlarged notions; to a most benevolent heart, he added the dignified manners of the gentleman, and a degree of professional erudition that placed him in the first rank among his judicial compeers. His work "on the Law of Bills of Exchange" has long been a standard book in the profession, and its value in the commercial world is universally acknowledged. On his retirement from the bench, in 1834, he was sworn a member of the privy council and created a baronet. Died, 1841, aged 78.

BAYLEY, RICHARD, an eminent American physician, was born in Connecticut, in 1745. After studying at home, he completed his professional education in London, and settled at New York. In 1792 he was appointed professor of anatomy in the college of Columbia, where he acquired great celebrity. In 1799 he published his work on yellow fever, wherein he proved it to be a local malady. Died, 1801.

BAYLY, THOMAS HAYNES, a lyrical poet of some merit, and the author of several dramatic pieces, and one or two novels. Though very popular in his own day, he was far too light and merely amusing a writer to have a hold upon posterity; and the majority of his writings are already rapidly passing into oblivion. Born, 1797; died, 1839.

BAYLY, LEWIS, bishop of Bangor; author of "Practice of Piety." Died, 1632.

BAYLY, WILLIAM, an astronomer, who went out with Capt. Cook in the last two voyages of that celebrated circumnavigator. Died, 1810.

BEACON, THOMAS, prebendary of Canterbury in the reign of queen Elizabeth; author of numerous works against popery.

BEARD, JOHN, an eminent actor, and the successor of Rich, as manager of Covent Garden Theatre. He died in 1768, aged 74.

BEATON or BETHUNE, a cardinal, and archbishop of St. Andrews, in Scotland; whose infamous persecutions of his Protestant countrymen caused him to be assassinated in his castle, in 1546.

BEATON, JAMES, nephew of the above, and bishop of Glasgow; author of "A History of Scotland." Born, 1530; died, 1603.

BEATTIE, JAMES, LL.D., a celebrated Scotch writer; author of "The Minstrel," a poem; "Elements of Moral Science," "Essay on Truth," and various other works of merit. Born at Laurencekirk, 1735; died, 1803.

BEATTY, Sir WILLIAM, M.D., F.R.S., physician to Her Majesty's fleet, and also to Greenwich Hospital. This gentleman had the melancholy duty of being officially present during the last moments of the hero of Trafalgar, an "Authentic Narrative" of whose death he published. He was knighted in 1831. Died March, 1842.

BEAUCHAMP, JOSEPH, a French astronomer and Bernardine monk, born at Vesoul, in 1752. During the revolution he was employed on a secret mission by Napoleon, but falling into the hands of the English, they delivered him up to the Turks, by whom he was imprisoned as a spy. He was subsequently released, and died at Nice, 1802.

BEAUCHAMP, RICHARD, an English prelate, admirably skilled in architecture. He was surveyor of the works at Windsor, and rebuilt the chapel there in the reign of Edward IV. The great hall in the episcopal palace of Salisbury, and the sepulchral chapel in the cathedral, are also monuments of his taste and science. Died, 1481.

BEAUCHATEAU, FRANCIS MATTHIAS CHATELET DE, a French poet, remarkable for his precocious talents; author of "La Lyre du jeune Apollon," published when he was only twelve years old. Born, 1645; visited England in 1660, and went to Persia, where he died.

BEAUCLERK, TOPHAM, a gentleman of great literary talents, and a friend of Dr. Johnson, who said that "Beauclerk's talents were those which he had felt himself more inclined to envy than those of any one else he had ever known." Born, 1739; died, 1780.

BEAUFORT, HENRY, the half-brother of Henry IV. of England, was a cardinal, bishop of Winchester, and chancellor of the kingdom. He was proud, ambitious, and immensely rich; but the hospital of St. Cross, at Winchester, which he founded, and numerous charitable bequests, prove that his riches were ultimately well applied. Died, 1447.

BEAUFORT, MARGARET, countess of Richmond and Derby, mother of Henry VII. She founded St. John's College and Christ's College, Cambridge, and distinguished herself likewise as an author. Born, 1441; died, 1509.

BEAUFORT, FRANCIS DE VENDOME, Duke of, son of Cæsar, duke of Vendome, was imprisoned by Cardinal Mazarin. On his escape, he broke out into open violence, but soon succeeded in making his peace, and was appointed admiral of France. Killed at the siege of Candia, 1669.

BEAUFORT, LOUIS DE, author of "Dissertations upon the Uncertainty of the First Five Ages of the Roman Republic," and other learned works. Died, 1735.

BEAUHARNOIS, ALEXANDER DE, a French nobleman, born in 1760. He took part in the revolution, and after having been at one time president of the national assembly, and served in the armies of France with distinction, was put to death by the revolutionary tribunal just previous to the fall of Robespierre, in 1794. His widow, JOSEPHINE, was afterwards wife of Buonaparte.

BEAUHARNOIS, FRANCIS, Marquis de, elder brother of Alexander, was born in 1756. He was appointed major-general in the army of the Prince of Condé, in 1792; protested against the unlawful treatment of the king, in a letter to the president of the national assembly; and when Buonaparte became first consul, he exhorted him to restore the sceptre to the house of Bourbon. He was afterwards appointed ambassador to the court of Spain, but fell into disgrace with Napoleon, and was banished. He returned to Paris after the restoration, and died in 1819.

BEAUHARNOIS, EUGENE DE, son of Francis above-mentioned, was born in 1780; entered the army early, and became one of Napoleon's generals, and his viceroy in Italy, which office he filled with credit and distinction, from 1805 to 1814; when on his patron's reverses he retired to Bavaria, married the king's daughter, was made duke of Leuchtenberg, and died at Munich, 1824.

BEAUHARNOIS, HORTENSE EUGENIE, ex-queen of Holland, and duchess of St. Leu, was born at Paris, in 1763, being the daughter of Viscount Beauharnois (who perished by the guillotine in 1794) by his wife Josephine, afterwards the consort of Napoleon. Hortense was married to Louis Buonaparte in 1802, but it was an ill-starred union, and they separated in 1807, after she had given birth to three sons; the eldest of whom (Napoleon Charles) died in childhood; the second (Napoleon Louis) was killed in an insurrection at Romagna, in 1832; and the youngest (Louis Napoleon) is the first president of the French republic, established in 1848. She died Oct. 5, 1837.

BEAULIEU, SEBASTIAN DE PONTAULT DE, a celebrated French engineer and field-marshal under Louis XIV.; author of "Views and Plans of the Battles and Sieges of Louis XIV." Died, 1674.

BEAUMARCHAIS, PETER AUGUSTIN, BARON DE, a man of singular versatility of talent; a politician, an artist, a merchant, and a dramatist. He was author of the comedies of "The Barber of Seville," "The Marriage of Figaro," &c.; but it was to a lawsuit that he was first indebted for his popularity as an author; the memorials and pleadings which he drew up being so full of wit, satire, and sound reasoning, as to attract public attention in an extraordinary degree. Born, 1732; died, 1799.

BEAUMELLE, LAURENCE, a French writer and critic; author of "Letters to Voltaire," of whom he was a decided opponent; "Commentary on the Henriade," &c. Born, 1727; died, 1773.

BEAUMONT, SIR JOHN, a judge of the Common Pleas, knighted by Charles I.; author of "Bosworth Field," a poem, &c. Born, 1582; died, 1628.

BEAUMONT, FRANCIS, the celebrated English dramatic poet, was a younger brother of the above; and, in conjunction with his friend Fletcher, the author of a number of excellent plays. They were both admirable delineators of human nature, and their contemporaries preferred their dramas even to those of Shakspeare, whom they evidently made their model; but impartial posterity has reversed this decision, and adjudged the palm to the bard of Avon. Born, 1585; died, 1615.

BEAUMONT, JOSEPH, an English divine, regius professor of divinity at Cambridge; author of "Psychic, or Love's Mystery," &c. Died, 1689.

BEAUMONT DE PEREFIX, HARDOUIN, tutor to Louis XIII., and subsequently archbishop of Paris; author of a "History of Henry IV." Died, 1670.

BEAUMONT, ELIE DE, a French advocate, distinguished for his memoir in favour of the unfortunate family of Calas. Born, 1732; died, 1785.

BEAUMONT, Madame LE PRINCE DE, a French lady, who devoted her talents to the instruction of youth, and wrote many pleasing moral works; among others, "Magazin des Adolescentes," "Magazin des Jeunes Dames," some novels, &c. Born, 1711; died, 1780.

BEAUMONT, SIR GEORGE, bart., a distinguished amateur artist, and a great patron of art and artists, was born at Dunmow, Essex, in 1753; died, 1827.

BEAUMONT, JOHN THOMAS BARBER, well known as the founder, and many years managing director, of the County Fire Office, &c., was born in London, in 1774, his paternal name being Barber. In his youth he manifested a strong desire to obtain eminence as a painter. He afterwards became an author, and published a "Tour in Wales," besides several tracts upon the best mode of arming the population, so as most effectually to repel the threatened French invasion; and he at length put in practice what he had so strenuously recommended to others, by organising a matchless rifle corps, known by the name of the "Duke of Cumberland's Sharpshooters," of which corps he was appointed, in 1803, captain commandant. In 1806 he established the Provident Institution, which gave rise to the various similar establishments, now better known as "savings banks," throughout the kingdom. He died in May, 1841, having bequeathed the bulk of his property to his children, except the sum of 10,000*l.* to establish a philosophical institution in Beaumont Square, Mile-end.

BEAUNE, FLORIMET DE, a French mathematician; discoverer of a method to determine the nature of curves by the properties of their triangles. Died, 1652.

BEAURAIN, JOHN DE, geographer to Louis XV.; author of a "Description of the Campaigns of Luxembourg, from 1690 to 1694." Born, 1697; died, 1771.

BEAURIEU, GASPARD GUILLARD DE, a French writer; author of "L'Elève de la Nature," &c. Born, 1727; died, 1795.

BEAUSOBRE, ISAAC DE, a French Protestant divine, who settled at Berlin, and became chaplain to the king of Prussia; author of "Défense de la Doctrine des Réformés," and many other valuable works upon theology. Born, 1659; died, 1738.

BEAUVAIS, WILLIAM, author of a work on the medals of the Roman empire. Born, 1698; died, 1773.

BEAUVAIS, CHARLES NICHOLAS, a French physician, member of the Convention at the revolution; author of "Essais Historiques sur Orléans," &c. Born, 1745; d. 1794.

BEAUVILLIERS, FRANCIS DE, duke de St. Aignan, a soldier, a courtier, and poet, in the reign of Louis XIV. Born, 1607; died, 1687.

BEAUVILLIERS, PAUL DE, eldest son of the preceding, was highly distinguished for talents and probity. He held high offices in the state, and shared with the virtuous Archbishop of Cambrai in the education of the Duke of Burgundy. Died, 1714.

BEAUZEE, NICHOLAS, an eminent French critic and grammarian; the author of several works, and a contributor to the Encyclopédie. Born, 1717; died, 1789.

BEAVER, JOHN, a monk of Westminster in the 14th century; author of a "Chronicle of the Affairs of Britain," &c.

BECCADELLI, LOUIS, an Italian ecclesiastic; preceptor to Prince Ferdinand of Tuscany, and author of the Lives of Cardinals Pole and Bembo. Died, 1572.

BECCADELLI, ANTONIO, of Palermo; author of a "History of Alphonso, king of Arragon," &c. Born, 1374; died, 1471.

BECCARI, AUGUSTINE, the first Italian pastoral poet. Died, 1520.

BECCARI, JAMES BARTOLOMEO, a Bolognese physician; author of a "Treatise on the Motion of Fluids," &c. Born, 1682; died, 1766.

BECCARIA, GIOVANNI BATISTA, an ingenious practical philosopher, whose whole life was devoted to the study of physics. He was professor of philosophy at Palermo and Rome, and published several works of great merit, particularly on the nature of the electric fluid. Born, 1716; died, 1781.

BECCARIA, CESAR BONESANA, Marquis, an eminent Italian; author of the celebrated "Treatise on Crimes and Punishments," &c. Born at Milan, 1735; died, 1794.

BECCUTI, FRANCIS, surnamed Il Cappita, an Italian poet. Died, 1553.

BECERRA, GASPARD, a Spanish painter and sculptor, pupil of Raphael. His chef d'œuvre is a statue of the Virgin. Died, 1570.

BECKET, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury, was born in London in 1117. He was raised to the very highest offices by Henry II., but the latter having attempted to encroach on the privileges of the Church, Becket resisted; and after a long period of mutual contention, during part of which Becket lived in exile, the king apparently gave way; but having uttered some hasty expressions respecting him, four of his courtiers caught them up, and gave effect to them by assassinating Becket at the altar of Canterbury Cathedral, in 1170. After his death he was canonised.

BECKFORD, WILLIAM, one of the most remarkable, and during many years one of the most remarked, men of modern times, was the son of the well-known Alderman Beckford, of London, who bequeathed him West Indian and other property, said to amount to upwards of 100,000*l.* per annum. Mr. Beckford had a strong passion for building; and in erecting the much-talked-of Fonthill Abbey, he himself confessed to have spent in a very few years the enormous sum of 273,000*l.* Building, however, did not alone occupy Mr. Beckford. An excellent scholar, and possessed of a fine taste in almost every branch of art, he collected in the fantastic but costly "Abbey" one of the finest and most extensive libraries in England, and his pictures and curiosities were almost unequalled. His vast expenses, and the loss in Chancery of a large portion of his West Indian property, rendered it necessary for him to sell the abbey, and, with a few exceptions, all its rich and rare contents, in 1822. When the sale was announced, public curiosity was so generally excited, that the enormous number of 7200 catalogues were sold at one guinea each! Though his eccentric and more than princely lavishness of outlay caused Mr. Beckford to be much talked of both here and in Portugal, where he built a residence, his true claim to any notice here rests upon his undoubted talents as an author in many walks of literature, and his genius as displayed in the wild and singular tale of "Vathek," which is so splendid in description, so true to eastern costume, and so wild and vivid in imagination, that Lord Byron considered it difficult to credit that it was written by a European, and said, "Even Rasselas must bow before it; the Happy Valley will not bear a comparison with the Hall of Eblis." In addition to this work, upon which his fame securely rests, Mr. Beckford wrote a satirical work, entitled "Memoirs of Extraordinary Painters;" "Italy, with Sketches of Portugal and Spain;" and "Recollections of an Excursion to the Monasteries of Alcoaça and Batalha." Died, May 1844, aged 84.

BECKINGHAM, CHARLES, an English dramatist; author of "Scipio Africanus," a tragedy, &c. Died, 1730.

BECKMANN, JOHN ANTHONY, a native of Hanover, and a professor at Gottingen, where he lectured for many years on subjects connected with rural and political economy, &c. He was the author of several works, of which his "History of Discoveries and Inventions" is the best known. Born 1739; died, 1811.

BECLARD, PETER AUGUSTUS, an eminent French anatomist, was born at Angers, in 1785; became professor of anatomy and physiology at Paris, where he attained the highest reputation as a lecturer and man of science. He wrote "Anatomical Memoirs," &c., and died in 1825.

BEDE, or BEDA, surnamed "the Venerable," an ancient English monk, and the most eminent writer of his time; author of an "Ecclesiastical History of England," and other valuable works. Born, 673; died, 735.

BEDELL, WILLIAM, bishop of Kilmore and Armagh; greatly revered in Ireland for his learning, piety, and benevolence. Born, 1570; died, 1641.

BEDFORD, HILKIAH, an English divine, who was heavily fined as the author of "The Hereditary Right of the Crown of England asserted," a Jacobite work, which was in reality written by George Harbin. Died, 1724.

BEDFORD, JOHN, Duke of, third son of king Henry IV. of England; and one of the most successful commanders ever opposed to the French. He was appointed regent of France by the will of Henry V., and well sustained the glory of his country during the arduous struggle there. Died at Rouen, 1435.

BEDFORD, JOHN RUSSELL, 6th duke of Bedford, K. G., an English nobleman, distinguished even among his own distinguished race for practical patriotism, and a truly princely patronage of the fine arts, and every branch of industry which tends to the improvement of the social condition. A member of several learned societies, and eminent versed in science and fond of literature, he was no less attached to agriculture, to the improvement of which he devoted many years and large sums of money. Of his liberality, when any useful object was in view, some opinion may be formed from the fact, that he expended upwards of 40,000*l.* in rebuilding Covent Garden Market, in such a style as to render it one of the greatest ornaments of that part of the metropolis. In politics his grace was a Whig; but his whole course and character were such as to procure him the esteem of men of all parties, and to obtain for him emphatically the really honourable title of "a good old English gentleman." Born, 1766; died, 1839.

BEDLOE, WILLIAM, captain, an infamous informer, noted for his perjuries, and rewarded with 500*l.* for pretended information respecting a popish plot, and the death of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey. Died, 1680.

BEECHLEY, Sir WILLIAM, R. A., an eminent English portrait-painter. But he did not wholly confine himself to that branch of the art, having painted some historical compositions of more than common merit, especially his "Iris bearing to Somnus the command of Juno to warn Aleyone by a dream of the fate of her husband Ceyx." His chief excellence, however, lay in portrait-painting, to which, indeed, he chiefly confined himself, and in which he greatly surpassed most of his contemporary artists in number. Died, aged 80 years, in 1839.

BEEHIOVEN, LOUIS VAN, one of the greatest composers in modern times, was born at Bonn on the Rhine, in 1770. At the age of four years (such was his precocity), he could play admirably on the piano, and in his ninth year he displayed a talent for improvisation which has never been surpassed. Having gained the friendship of Haydn, he set out for Vienna, where he resided the greater part of his life. His principal works are the oratorio of the Mount of Olives and the opera of Fidelio; but the grandeur of his conceptions and his skill in their development are equally set forth in his orchestral works, in his overtures, and more especially in his symphonies. For nearly the last twenty years of his life he was afflicted with incurable deafness; a severe infirmity to all, but doubly so to a musician. Died, 1827.

BEDOS DE CELLES, FRANCIS, a French Benedictine monk; author of a "Treatise on Dialling," &c. Born, 1726; died, 1779.

BEGA, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, chiefly of cattle and landscapes. Born, 1620; died, 1664.

BEGEYN, ABRAMAM, a Dutch landscape painter; some fine pictures by whom are at the Hague.

BEHAIM, or BEHEM, MARTIN, a geographer and navigator of the 15th century; said to have discovered the Brazils and the Isle of Fayal, and to have sailed as far as the Straits of Magellan.

BEHN, APHRA, a female writer in the reign of Charles II., of considerable ability, but whose works were remarkable for their disregard of decency and morals: her productions were chiefly poems, novels, and plays. Died, 1689.

BEICH, JOACHIM FRANCIS, a native of Suabia, eminent as a painter of cattle pieces and landscapes. Born, 1665; died, 1748.

BEINASCHI, JOHN BAPTIST, a native of Piedmont, an eminent historical painter. Born, 1634; died, 1688.

BEK, or BEAK, ANTHONY DE, bishop of Durham, a bold and spirited prelate, who united the skill and courage of a soldier to the austerity of a divine. He led the van of the English army under Edward I. in an expedition against the Scots; built Barnard Castle and other fortresses, and performed many gallant exploits; but at length broke his heart at being excommunicated by the Archbishop of York, in 1310.

BEK, DAVID, a Dutch painter, pupil of Vandyke, and portrait painter to Christina, queen of Sweden. Born, 1621; died, 1656.

BEKKHER, BALTHASAR, a divine of Amsterdam; suspended from his functions for publishing "The World Bewitched," a refutation of the popular errors in witchcraft, &c. Born, 1634; died, 1698.

BEKKER, ELIZABETH, a Dutch lady of considerable merit as the writer of works of fiction inculcating the purest morals. Born, 1738; died, 1804.

BEL, JOHN JAMES a counsellor of Bordeaux; compiler of the "Dictionnaire Nécologique," and author of "Lettres on Voltaire's Marianne," &c. Died, 1788.

BEL, MATTHIAS, an Hungarian divine, historiographer to the emperor Charles VI.; author of "Apparatus ad Historiam Hungaricam," &c. Born, 1684; died, 1749.

BEI, CHARLES ANDREW, son of the above, librarian and professor of poetry to the university of Leipsic. Born, 1717; died by his own hand, 1782.

BELESIS, a Chaldean, who raised Arbaces to the throne of Media, and was rewarded with the government of Babylon.

BELGRADO, JAMES, an Italian Jesuit, eminent as a poet, antiquary, and mathematician; author of a treatise, entitled "The Existence of God demonstrated Geometrically," &c. Born, 1704; died, 1789.

BELGRANO, MANUEL, an active partisan and commander in the cause of South American independence, whose disinterested conduct proved highly favourable to Buenos Ayres and the neighbouring states. Died, 1820.

BELIDOR, BERNARD FOREST DE, an eminent French engineer and mathematician; author of "Dictionnaire portatif de l'Ingénieur," &c. Born, 1695; died 1761.

BELING, RICHARD, an Irish gentleman, who took part in the rebellion of 1641, but recovered his estates at the Restoration; author of "Vindiciæ Catholicorum Hiberniæ." Born, 1613; died, 1677.

BELISARIUS, a celebrated Roman general, to whom the emperor Justinian chiefly owed the splendour of his reign; and by whose skill and bravery the Persians, Vandals, Goths, and Bulgarians were successively conquered. Much has been said of the emperor's ingratitude to his faithful general, as well as of his blindness and of his being reduced to beggary; but as these stories were never related till the 12th century, there is every reason to believe them to be mere fictions. Died, 565.

BELL, ANDREW, D.D. and LL.D., an English divine, the projector and founder of those excellent establishments called National Schools; author of "An Experiment in Education at the Male Asylum, Madras," "Instructions for conducting Schools on the Madras System," &c. &c. Dr. Bell had acquired considerable property in the East Indies, and had some lucrative preferments in this country; and he bequeathed nearly all that he possessed to institutions connected with education and literature. Born, at St. Andrew's, Scotland, 1753; died, 1832.

BELL, BEAUPRE, a learned English antiquary of the 18th cent. He bequeathed his library and medals to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he had received his education.

BELL, BENJAMIN, an eminent surgeon, and writer on surgery; author of a "Treatise on the Management of Ulcers," &c. &c. Born, at Dumfries, 1749; died, 1806.

BELL, SIR CHARLES, an eminent anatomist and professor of surgery in the university of Edinburgh, where he was born in 1774. In 1806 he came to London, and was soon distinguished as a popular lecturer on anatomy and surgery, at the academy founded by the celebrated Hunters in Windmill Street, where, as subsequently, when appointed a professor at the Royal College of Surgeons, the benches were crowded with attentive auditors. He was the author of many professional works of high repute, on anatomy and surgical operations; but he is chiefly esteemed for his discoveries in connection with the nervous system, which have gained for him an European name. On the accession of William IV. he received the honour of knighthood. As in his professional career Sir Charles was respected for his great talents, so in private life was he admired for the bland simplicity of his manners. He died, 1842.

BELL, HENRY, the first successful applier of steam to the purposes of navigation in Europe, was born in Linnithgowshire, in 1767. After serving an apprenticeship to his uncle, who was a millwright, he went to London, and was in the employ of Mr. Rennie, the celebrated engineer; but it was not till the year 1812 that he produced a vessel calculated to establish the practicability and important uses of steam navigation. Mr. Fulton, an American engineer, had launched a boat upon the same principle five years before, which had performed long voyages upon the Hudson river, but Bell must be at least allowed the praise of having done, in his own country, what all other men had failed in doing. He died, at Helensburgh, in 1830.

BELL, JAMES, an eminent geographical writer, was born at Jedburgh, in 1769. He was brought up as a weaver, and became a manufacturer of cotton goods at Glasgow; but left that business, and, being an indefatigable student, became a teacher of the classics to young men preparing for the university. He was the author of "A System of Popular and Scientific Geography," in 6 vols.; "A Gazetteer of England and Wales," &c. Died, 1833.

BELL, JOHN, of Antermony, Scotland, author of "Travels from St. Petersburg to various Parts of Asia;" was attached as surgeon to an embassy, first from Russia to Persia, and afterwards to another from Russia to China, through Siberia; of which his "Travels" furnish an interesting account. Born, 1691; died, 1780.

BELL, JOHN, a distinguished surgeon in Edinburgh, and the author of numerous professional works of high merit, was born in 1702; died, at Rome, in 1820.

BELL, JOHN, an active and intelligent London tradesman; the publisher of an embellished edition of "The British Poets," in 109 vols., and the projector and original proprietor of "The Weekly Messenger." Born, 1746; died, 1831.

BELLAMY, JAMES, a Dutch poet, whose patriotic songs and other lyrics are highly and deservedly esteemed. Born, 1752; died, 1621.

BELLARMIN, ROBERT, a learned cardinal; author of numerous controversial works, remarkable for their zealous opposition to the reformed religion. Born, 1542; died, 1621.

BELLAY, JOACHIM DU, often called the French Ovid and Catullus; author of Latin and French poems. Born, 1524; died, 1560.

BELLAY, JOHN DU, archbishop of Paris, and subsequently a cardinal; author of an "Apology for Francis I.;" "Epigrams," &c. Born, 1492; died, 1560.

BELLE, STEPHEN DE LA, a Florentine engraver, whose works are highly esteemed. Born, 1610; died, 1664.

BELLEGARDE, JOHN BAPTIST MORVAN DE, a French Jesuit, expelled from the society for Cartesianism; translator of St. Chrysostom, Thomas à Kempis, &c. Died, 1734.

BELLEISLE, CHARLES LOUIS AUGUSTUS FOUQUET, Count de, a French marshal, whose talents and eminent successes were rewarded by his sovereign, Louis XV., with the highest dignities. Born, 1684; died, 1761.

BELLENDEN, WILLIAM, a Scottish writer of the 17th century, distinguished for the purity of his Latin compositions.

BELLIARD, AUGUSTIN DANIEL, Count de, a distinguished French general and diplomatist, was born in 1773, in La Vendée. He entered the military service early, and was soon made an officer of Dumourier's staff: he afterwards served with Buonaparte in Italy and Egypt; and, returning from the latter country, he participated in the victories of Ulm and Austerlitz, and fought in all the great battles in the war with Prussia. He next went to Spain; but in 1812 joined the army destined for the invasion of Russia, and particularly distinguished himself in the battle of Moskwa. At Leipsic, a cannon-ball carried away his arm. After Napoleon's abdication, he was made a peer of France, and major-general of the army under the Duke de Berri. When the Emperor returned from Elba, he dispatched Belliard to king Joachim at Naples, but the vessel was intercepted by a British ship, and driven back to France. On the return of the Bourbons, he was for a short time imprisoned, but soon taken into favour again. When Louis Philippe ascended the throne, he sent Belliard to Berlin, to treat respecting the acknowledgment of the new dynasty; and during his embassy to Brussels, he contributed more than any other diplomatist to the formation of the new Belgian government. He died in 1832.

BELLEVRE, POMPONIUS DE, a French statesman, chancellor to Henry IV. Born, 1529; died, 1607.

BELLIN, JAMES NICHOLAS, a French geographer; author of "Hydrographie Française," &c. Died, 1772.

BELLINI, GENTILE, an eminent Venetian painter, employed to adorn the council hall of that republic. Died, 1501.

BELLINI, JOHN, brother and assistant of the above; and the instructor of Titian and Giorgione. Died, 1512.

BELLINI, LAURENCE, an Italian physician; author of several anatomical and medical works in Latin. Born, 1643; died, 1702.

BELLINI, VINCENZO, a celebrated musical composer, was born at Catania in Sicily, in 1806. He was educated at Naples under Zingarelli, and before he had completed his 20th year he had produced "Bianco e Fernando" at the theatre San Carlo. This was succeeded by various others, of which "Il Pirati," "La Sonnambula," "Norma," and "I Puritani," are the best, and have gained for him an undying celebrity. His moral character stood high, and his manners and compositions were in harmonious accordance: agreeable, tender, and elegant. Died, near Paris, September 23d, 1835.

BELLMAN, CHARLES MICHAEL, a Swedish poet, patronised by Gustavus Adolphus; and the most original, while strictly national, poet of Sweden. Born, 1741; died, 1795.

BELLONI, JEROME, a celebrated Roman banker, created a marquis by pope Benedict XIV.; author of an "Essay on Commerce." Died, 1700.

BELLOHI, JOHN PETER, a celebrated Italian antiquary and connoisseur in the polite arts; author of "Lives of Modern Painters, Architects, and Sculptors," &c. Died, 1693.

BELLOTTI, PETER, an Italian painter, chiefly of portraits. Born, 1625; died, 1700.

BELOSIELSKY, Prince, a Russian noble; author of "Poesies Françaises d'un Prince Etranger," &c. Died, 1809.

BELON, PETER, a French physician and traveller; author of some able works on natural history, and of a "Description of Palestine, Greece, and Arabia." Assassinated in France, 1564.

BELSHAM, THOMAS, an eminent Unitarian divine; author of a discourse "On the Importance of Faith, and the Duty of making Open Professions of it," &c. Died, in his 80th year, 1829.

BELSHAM, WILLIAM, brother of the preceding, an eminent writer; author of "Essays, Political and Literary," "History of Great Britain, from the Revolution to the Treaty of Amiens," in 12 vols. 8vo., &c. Died, aged 75, in 1827.

BELSUNCE, HENRY FRANCIS XAVIER DE, a French prelate, celebrated for the courage and benevolence displayed by him when the plague ravaged Marseilles in 1720; author of "L'Histoire des Evêques de Marseilles," &c. Born, 1671; died, 1755.

BELUS, celebrated in profane history as the founder of the Babylonian empire. He was deified after his death, and a temple was erected to him at Babylon. He is, probably, the Baal of Phœnicia and the Nimrod of Scripture. Flourished in 1822, n.c.

BELYN, a British prince and commander under Caracacua.

BELZONI, JOHN BATTIST, an enterprising traveller, whose researches in Egypt exhibit praiseworthy industry, and have been of great service to those engaged in the study of its antiquities, was born at Padua. He came to England in 1803; and becoming involved in pecuniary difficulties while residing in London, he obtained a livelihood by the display of feats of strength and activity at Astley's Amphitheatre; for which his colossal stature and extraordinary muscular powers eminently qualified him. At length he left this country, and entered on his travels through Egypt, in 1815. In 1816 he sent the busts of Jupiter Memnon, &c. to the British Museum; published a narrative of his operations in 1820; and in the following year exhibited a model of a splendid tomb which he had discovered near Thebes. But, while making preparations for passing from Benin to Houssa and Timbuctoo, he was attacked with dysentery, and died at Gato, in 1823.

BEMBO, PETER, a noble Venetian and poet; secretary to Leo X., and promoted to be bishop of Bergamo and a cardinal by Paul III.; author of a History of Venice, &c. Born, 1470; died, 1547.

BENBOW, JOHN, a brave English admiral, born at Shrewsbury, in 1650. His skill and valour in an action with a Barbary pirate of superior force, gained him the confidence of the nation, and he was soon entrusted with a fleet. In 1702, during an engagement with the French admiral, Du Casse, in the West Indies, he had his leg carried away by a chain shot; and at this critical instant several of his captains having signed a paper declaring that "nothing was to be done," the enemy effected his escape. Benbow brought the delinquents to a court-martial, and two were shot; but the effects of his wound, and the vexation he suffered, caused his death.

BENCIO, FRANCIS, an Italian Jesuit; author of Latin poems, &c. Died, 1594.

BENEDETTO, CASTIGLIONE, an Italian painter, chiefly of pastoral scenes. Born, 1616; died, 1670.

BENEDICT, ST., the founder of the first religious order in the West, was born in Spoleto, in 430; and, retiring to a cavern when only 14 years of age, his fame for pious austerities brought him numerous followers; the monastery of Monte Cassino, near Naples, was founded by him; and the order of St. Benedict thenceforward established.

BENEDICT XIV., PROSPER LAMBERTINI, the successor of pope Clement XII., was a great patron of the arts and sciences, an enactor of good laws, and one who strove to maintain purity of doctrine and of manners by setting a worthy example in his own person. Born, at Bologna, in 1675; died, 1758.

BENEDICT, an English abbot of a noble family in Northumberland. He introduced chanting in choirs. Died, 1703.

BENEVUTI, CHARLES, a Jesuit; author of "Reflections on Jesuitism," &c. Born, 1716; died, 1789.

BENEZET, ANTHONY, an American philanthropist; author of "A Caution to Great Britain and her Colonies," "Historical Account of Guinea," &c. Died, 1784.

BENGER, ELIZABETH OOLIVY, a lady of strong intuitive genius; author of "Biographical Memoirs;" historical accounts of "Anne Boleyn," "Mary, Queen of Scots," and of the "Queen of Bohemia." Died, 1827.

BENI, PAUL, an eminent Italian philologist; author of "Remarks on Ariosto and Tasso," &c. Died, 1627.

BENJAMIN OF TUDELA, one of the earliest travellers of the middle ages who visited the central regions of Asia; author of a Hebrew work of travels, which, though interesting and romantic, is remarkable chiefly for its misrepresentations. Died, 1173.

BENINI, VINCENT, a learned Italian physician; author of "Notes on Celsus," &c. Born, 1713; died, 1764.

BENNET, CHRISTOPHER, an English physician; author of "Tabidorum Theatrum, seu Phthisios," &c. Died, 1685.

BENNET, HENRY, earl of Arlington, one of the cabinet council of Charles II., known in history by the name of the Cabal. Born, 1618; died, 1685.

BENNET, THOMAS, an English divine; author of a Hebrew Grammar, an Essay on the Thirty-nine Articles, &c. Born, 1673; died, 1720.

BENNINGSSEN, LEVIN AUGUSTUS, Baron, an eminent Russian general, was born in Hanover, in 1745; entered the service of Catharine II., and distinguished himself by great gallantry in the war against Poland. He was commander-in-chief at the murderous battle of Eylau. In 1813, he led a Russian army into Saxony, took part in the battle of Leipzig, and blockaded Hamburg. Died in 1826.

BENNITSKI, ALEXANDER PETROVITSCH, a Russian poet; author of "Komala," a poem; a translation of Ossian, &c. Born, 1780; died, 1808.

BENOIT, ELIAS, a learned Protestant divine; pastor of the church of Delft; author of a "History of the Edict of Nantes." Born, 1640; died, 1723.

BENSERADE, ISAAC DE, a poet at the court of Louis XIV., born in 1612, was patronised by Richelieu, Mazarin, and the king. His madrigals, sonnets, and songs, as well as his wit and general conversational powers, rendered him a great favourite; and he was called, by way of eminence, "le poète de la cour." Died, 1691.

BENSON, GEORGE, a dissenting minister; author of a "Defence of the Reasonableness of Prayer," and various other religious and controversial tracts. Born, 1669; died, 1762.

BENT, JOHN VAN DER, a Dutch landscape painter, pupil of Vanderveelde and Wouvermans. Born, 1650; died, 1690.

BENTHAM, THOMAS, bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, in the reign of queen Elizabeth; author of an "Exposition of the Acts of the Apostles," &c. Died, 1578.

BENTHAM, EDWARD, an English divine, prebend and treasurer of Hereford; author of some religious tracts and sermons. Born, 1707; died, 1776.

BENTHAM, JAMES, an English divine and antiquary, brother of the last named; author of the "History and Antiquities of the Church of Ely." Died, 1794.

BENTHAM, JEREMY, a distinguished jurist and political writer, and the father of that class of political economists styled Utilitarians, whose doctrine it is to view every thing according as it is affected by the principle of "the greatest happiness of the greatest number." His published works are numerous, and those which remain in MS. or unpublished, though printed, still more so. But a very difficult and prolix style has rendered him rather the instructor of writers than of the reading public in general; and his works, which have been translated into many languages, are better known and appreciated on the continent than in England. He was a man of primitive manners, unblemished character, and zealously alive to what he considered the interest of the people at large. Born, 1749; died, 1832.

BENTINCK, WILLIAM, first earl of Portland, was the son of noble Dutch parents, and the intimate friend of William III., whom he accompanied to England. He was employed on various diplomatic missions, and rewarded with an earldom. Died, 1709.

BENTINCK, WILLIAM HENRY CAVENTISH, third duke of Portland, was born in 1738. During the American war he acted with the Opposition, and was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1782, but continued in that office only three months, owing to the breaking up of the administration by the death of the Marquis of Rockingham. In 1792 he was appointed chancellor of Oxford, and soon after joined Mr. Pitt's party. He held the office of home secretary from 1794 to 1801, and succeeded Lord Grenville as first lord of the Treasury in 1807, but shortly after resigned it, and died in 1808.

BENTINCK, LORD GEORGE, a statesman of great ability and still greater promise, which his untimely death unhappily deprived of fulfilment, was the second son of the fourth Duke of Portland by Henrietta, daughter and co-heiress of Major-General Scott of Balcomie, and the sister of Viscountess Caning, and was born on the 27th of Feb. 1802. Lord George was for some time at Eton, and completed his education at Christchurch, Oxford. After leaving the University, he obtained a commission in the Guards, and in this corps he rose to the rank of captain, retiring from the army with the rank of major. In 1828 he was elected for King's Lynn; and continued to represent that constituency for 20 years. He had previously acted as private secretary to his uncle by marriage, George Canning, when prime minister; and in that capacity he exhibited abilities which gave high satisfaction to his distinguished kinsman. Lord George, from his youth, took a great interest in field sports, and for a long time was known as one of the principal patrons of the turf in the kingdom. In all racing matters, indeed, he was a leading authority, and, under his superintendence, some excellent regulations were established at the principal racing meetings in England. On first entering parliament he may be considered to have been one of the moderate Whig school. One of his first votes was for Catholic Emancipation; and he voted for the principle of the Reform Bill, but opposed some of the principal details in committee.

Soon after he joined the ranks of the Conservative party, voting with them on important questions, but seldom addressing the House. It was the events of the year 1846, when Sir Robert Peel gave in his adhesion to free trade in corn, that first brought Lord George Bentinck prominently forward in the House of Commons, and developed the latent energies of his mind and character. The Protectionist party thus suddenly deprived of its head staggered beneath the blow; but the dauntless earnestness, indomitable perseverance, and unflinching courage, which Lord George suddenly displayed in this emergency, joined to the mass of well-digested statistics which he brought to bear on the subject in debate, readily obtained for him the unconditional leadership of his party, which under his guidance once more started into life. From that period he abandoned his sporting pursuits, and sold off his stud, devoting himself entirely to politics. The change was great and unexpected, but it was complete and permanent. His dislike of Sir Robert Peel was decided and undisguised. He accused him of tergiversation, and of being one of those, who "had hounded to the death his illustrious relative," Mr. Canning. But his hostility was principally shown in his opposition to the free-trade policy of the Peel ministry. On other questions Lord George pursued an independent course. He differed from the majority of his party on the question of civil and religious liberty; he supported the Jewish Relief Bill, his vote on which was followed by his withdrawal from the nominal leadership of the Protectionist party, though he remained its acknowledged head; and he was favourable to the payment of the Roman Catholic clergy by the landowners in Ireland. Few public events occasioned more general surprise than the short period of time in which Lord George Bentinck built up his parliamentary character. What he might have been in power no man can tell; but the industry, straight-forwardness, and intelligence which he displayed during the brief period of his leadership, warrant the belief that, had his life been spared, he would have gained a distinguished place among the highest and most disinterested of England's statesmen. Died suddenly of disease of the heart, Sept. 21. 1848.

BENTIVOGLIO, CORNELIO, a cardinal, poet, and patron of the fine arts, was born at Ferrara, 1688; and died at Rome, 1707.

BENTIVOGLIO, GUIDO, a celebrated cardinal, and legate at the court of France. He was an able politician and historian. Among other works he wrote "A History of the Civil Wars of Flanders," "Memoirs," &c. Born, 1579; died, 1641.

BENTIVOGLIO, HERCULES, a poet and diplomatist, was born at Bologna, in 1506, and died in 1573.

BENTLEY, RICHARD, a celebrated English divine, and highly accomplished classical scholar; master of Trinity College, Cambridge, and archdeacon of Ely. His editions of Horace, Terence, and Phædrus; and his part in the controversy on the genuineness of the Epistles of Phalaris, display vast erudition and sagacity. Born, 1661; died, 1742.

BENTLEY, RICHARD, son of the above, a dramatic writer; author of "The Wishes," and other dramas, &c. Died, 1782.

BENYOWSKY, MAURICE AUGUSTUS, Count, a native of Hungary, who, after serving in the imperial armies, joined the Polish nobility, and fought against Russia for their independence, but was taken prisoner and exiled to Kamtschatka. From that remote region, however, he escaped; and after various fortunes, he was sent out by the French to Madagascar, the sovereignty of which island he afterwards attempted to assume. He was slain in an action with the French, 1786.

BERCHTOLD, LEOPOLD, Count, a distinguished philanthropist, was born in 1758. He spent 13 years of his life in travelling through Europe, and 4 in travelling through Asia and Africa, for the express purpose of assuaging human misery in its direst forms, and leaving no method unattempted that humanity or patriotism could suggest. He at length fell a victim to a contagious fever, at his palace of Buchwitz, in Moravia, which he had fitted up as an hospital for the reception of the sick and wounded Austrian soldiers. Died, 1809.

BERENGARIUS, or BERENGER, a French divine of the 11th century, born at Tours, whose denial of transubstantiation was condemned at Rome. He underwent much persecution, recanted, and again returned to his opinions. Died, 1088.

BERENGER I., king of Italy, who assumed the sovereignty on the death of Charles I., in 888. He was defeated by Rodolph of Burgundy, in 922, and shortly afterwards assassinated.

BERENGER II., became king of Italy in 950; but was subsequently deposed for his tyranny, and died in confinement in Germany.

BERENGER, JAMES, a celebrated anatomist and physician of the 16th century, born at Carpi, in Italy, and died at Ferrara, 1550. He made several important anatomical discoveries, and is said to be the first who used mercury in syphilitic diseases.

BERENGER, LAURENCE PETER, a native of Provence, professor of rhetoric at Orleans previous to the revolution; and, after the restoration of the Bourbons, professor at the Lyceum of Lyons, and inspector of academies; author of "Les Soirées Provençales," &c. Died, 1822.

BERENGER, PETER, a pupil of Abelard, and author of an apology for that celebrated and unfortunate person.

BERENICE, daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and wife of Antiochus, king of Syria. She was deserted by her husband in favour of his former wife Laodice, by whose orders she was strangled in her retirement at Antioch, B.C. 248.

BERENICE, daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt. She usurped her father's throne, and put her first husband to death; but the Romans replaced Ptolemy on his throne; and he caused his rebellious daughter to be executed.

BERENICE, daughter of Agrippa, king of Judaea, and wife of her father's brother, Herod, who was made king of Chalcis by the emperor Claudius. Becoming a widow, she gave her hand to Polemon, king of Cilicia, but she soon deserted him, and became the mistress of Titus, who, it was thought, would have made her his wife but for the murmurs of the Romans.

BERESFORD, Rev. JAMES, rector of Kibworth, Leicestershire, was born at Upham, in Hampshire, in 1764, and received his education at the Charter-house, and Merton College, Oxford. He was the author of a variety of separate works, besides several excellent papers in the "Looker-on," a periodical of considerable interest, published in 1792-3; but the work which obtained for him the greatest celebrity, was the well-known humorous satire entitled "The Miseries of Human Life," &c. 2 vols. 8vo. Died, Sept. 1840.

BERETTINI, PETER, an Italian architect and painter of great merit. Born, 1596; died, 1669.

BERG, MATTHIAS VAN DER, a Flemish painter, pupil of Rubens. Born, 1615; died, 1687.

BERGEN, DIRK VAN DER, a celebrated landscape and portrait painter. Died, 1689.

BERGHEM, NICHOLAS, an excellent and indefatigable Dutch landscape painter. Born, 1624; died, 1683.

BERGIER, NICHOLAS SYLVESTER, canon of the cathedral of Paris; author of "Deism Self-confuted," &c. Died, 1790.

BERGMANN, TORBERN OLOF, an eminent Swedish chemist, and a member of nearly all the learned societies in Europe; to whom the world is indebted for many valuable additions to scientific knowledge. Born, 1735; died, 1784.

BERIGARD, CLAUDE, professor of philosophy at Padua; author of "Circulus Pisanus," &c. Born, 1573; died, 1663.

BERINGTON, JOSEPH, a Roman Catholic clergyman; author of a "History of the Lives of Héloïse and Abelard," a "Literary History of the Middle Ages," &c. Died, 1827.

BERKELEY, GEORGE, Earl of, one of the privy council of Charles II.; author of "Historical Applications and Occasional Meditations." Died, 1698.

BERKELEY, Sir WILLIAM, of the same family as the above; vice-admiral of the white. He was killed in an action with the Dutch, 1666.

BERKELEY, GEORGE, bishop of Cloyne, a metaphysical writer of great celebrity, but whose virtues, however manifest, have been somewhat poetically exaggerated by Pope. Besides other works, he is the author of "Principles of Human Knowledge," "Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous," &c. His hypothesis of the non-existence of material objects in nature otherwise than in the mind, made much noise in his time. Born, 1757; died, 1753.

BERKENHOUT, JOHN, an English physician and miscellaneous writer; author of "Biographia Literaria," "Outlines of the Natural History of Great Britain and Ireland," &c. Born, 1731; died, 1791.

BERKLEY, JOHN LE FRANG VAN, a Dutch physician, naturalist, and poet; author of "Poems," "Natural History of Holland," &c. Born, 1729; died, 1812.

BERKLEY, Sir WILLIAM, governor of Virginia; author of "The Description and Laws of Virginia," &c. Died, 1677.

BERNADOTTE — CHARLES JOHN XIV., king of Sweden and Norway, whose original name was JOHN BAPTISTE JULIUS BERNADOTTE, was the son of a lawyer at Pau in Bearne, and was born in 1764. He received a good education, and was designed for the bar; but he suddenly abandoned his studies, and enlisted as a private in the marines. For nine years from his enlistment, that is, up to the year 1780, the utmost rank that Bernadotte had attained was that of sergeant; but the French revolution, by sweeping away the arbitrary barrier which till then had rendered plebeian merit of little avail in the French service, gave Bernadotte an advantage which he improved so well, that in 1792 he was a colonel in the army of Custine. In 1793 he so distinguished himself under the command of Kleber, as to be raised to the rank of general of brigade, and, shortly afterwards, of division. On the Rhine and in Italy he more and more distinguished himself; and he showed that his talents were not those of a mere soldier, by his conduct in a somewhat difficult embassy to Austria. Between him and Napoleon there seems to have been a constant distrust, if not actual hatred; nevertheless, Bernadotte had a marshal's staff on the establishment of the consulate, and was created prince of Ponte Corvo in 1806. In all his campaigns Bernadotte was distinguished from the great majority of the French commanders, by the clemency and generosity of his conduct from the moment that the battle was at an end; and it was this conduct, even more than his brilliant reputation as a soldier, that caused him to be put in nomination as a successor of Charles XIII. of Sweden. Napoleon, then emperor, could but with difficulty be induced to consent to Bernadotte becoming crown-prince and heir to the throne. "What!" said Bernadotte, "will you make me greater than yourself by making me refuse a crown?" The sarcasm told, and Napoleon merely replied, "Go! our fates must be accomplished!" From the instant that he became crown-prince of Sweden, the fortunate soldier showed a determination to give all his energies to his adopted country: he formed a secret alliance with Russia in 1812, and in 1818 he took command of the combined armies of Northern Germany against France. Never during half a century before his accession had Sweden known the peace or the prosperity in which he left her in the hands of his son Oscar. Died, 1844, aged 79.

BERNARD, St., an illustrious abbot of the monastery of Clairvaux in the 12th century. Died, 1153.

BERNARD, CLAUDE, surnamed "the poor priest," was a native of Dijon, whose active benevolence towards the poor and sick was unremitting during the whole course of his life, and for whose support he expended his whole inheritance, 20,000*l.* Born, 1588; died, 1641.

BERNARD, EDWARD, an English philosopher and critic; author of "Etymologicum Britannicum," a "Treatise on Ancient Weights and Measures," &c. Born, 1638; died, 1697.

BERNARD, JAMES, a French Protestant divine; author of an "Historical and Political Account of Europe," &c. Born, 1658; died, 1718.

BERNARD, JOHN, an actor; author of "Retrospections of the Stage." Died, 1828.

BERNARD, of MENTHON, an ecclesiastic of the 10th century; founder of the well-known and invaluable monasteries of the Great and Little St. Bernard, in the passage of the Alps. Died, 1008.

BERNARD, PETER JOSEPH, a French amatory poet, styled by Voltaire, le gentil Bernard, an epithet by which he is still distinguished. Born at Grenoble, 1710; died, 1775.

BERNARD, of THURINGIA, an enthusiast of the 10th century, who predicted that the end of the world was at hand, and caused much terror to his ignorant and superstitious believers.

BERNARD, duke of Weimar, the fourth son of Duke John of Saxe-Weimar, was a general whose magnanimity, skill, and valour were frequently displayed while commanding the Swedish army after the death of Gustavus; and who afterwards did great service to the Protestant cause. He died by poison, administered, as his cotemporaries asserted, at the instigation of the Duke of Richelieu, who had become jealous of his power: but of this there is no substantial proof. Born, 1604; died, 1639.

BERNARD, SIMON, general of engineers of France, was born at Dole in 1779. The kindness of the parish priest supplied him with sufficient of the rudiments of learning to allow his entering the Polytechnic School at fifteen years of age. La Place, Haty, and other great men were then at the head of the Polytechnic School, and so well did Bernard avail himself of their lessons, that he not only became one of the most distinguished engineer officers and aides-de-camp of Napoleon, but, subsequently to the emperor's fall, executed works in the United States, which are most undoubtedly unequalled elsewhere; the most distant places being united by canals, actual navigable rivers, and upwards of four thousand five hundred miles of frontier rendered secure against invasion by forts and works. Since July, 1830, he returned to France, and was for some time minister of war. Died, 1839.

BERNARDEZ, DIEGO, called by his countrymen the Portuguese Theocritus, was not more eminent as a pastoral poet than as a brave warrior; and, after numerous deeds of heroism, was taken prisoner by the Moors at the battle of Alcazarquivir. Died, 1596.

BERNARDI, AUGUSTUS FREDERIC, a German philologist, whose great aim was to invent a universal grammar common to all languages, and who, in his endeavours to effect that object, displayed great ingenuity and learning. Born at Berlin, 1768; died, 1820.

BERNARDI, JOHN, a celebrated engraver and architect. Died, 1555.

BERNARDIN DE ST. PIERRE, JAMES HENRY, a philosopher and moralist; author of "Paul and Virginia," "Studies of Nature," "Harmonies of Nature," &c. During the reign of terror he narrowly escaped the guillotine; but on Napoleon's exaltation to power he received a pension, which cheered the gloom of poverty and distress that had surrounded him. Born, 1737; died, 1813.

BERNARDINE, a Romish saint; canonised for his zeal in causing more than 300 monasteries to be founded. Born at Massa, in Tuscany, 1380; died, 1444.

BERNI, FRANCESCO, an eminent Italian poet, of the 16th century. He remodelled Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato, and was the author of "Rime Burlesche," and various Latin poems. Died, 1536.

BERNIA, or BERNI, FRANCIS, a Tuscan poet, called the Italian Scarron. Died, 1543.

BERNIER, FRANCIS, a French physician and traveller, who resided at the court of Aurunzebe for twelve years as his physician. He afterwards published his travels, which, as a work of interest and authenticity, are greatly esteemed. Died, 1688.

BERNINI, GIOVANNI LORENZO, called Il cavaliere Bernini, was born in Naples, 1598, and obtained among his contemporaries the reputation of being the Michael Angelo of modern times, on account of his success as a painter, a statuary, and an architect. At the age of 18 he produced the Apollo and Daphne, in marble, a masterpiece of grace and execution; and he continued in the indefatigable pursuit of the arts, as a sculptor and an architect, till the period of his death, in 1680.

BERNIS, Cardinal FRANCIS JOACHIM DE PIERRES DE, a French poet, patronised by Madame de Pompadour, who obtained for him a pension; he subsequently filled important offices in the state, was sent as ambassador to Rome, and at length arrived at the dignity of a cardinal. The French revolution deprived him of his fortune, and reduced him to poverty in his old age, from which he was relieved by a pension from the Spanish court. Born, 1715; died, 1794.

BERNOULLI, JAMES, a celebrated mathematician, born at Basle in 1654; died, 1705.

BERNOULLI, JOHN, brother of the above, and like him an eminent mathematician. He was regarded as the worthy rival of Newton and Leibnitz. Born, 1667; died, 1748.

BERNOULLI, DANIEL, son of the last named; professor of philosophy at Basle; and, like his father and uncle, highly skilled in the mathematics. Born, 1700; died, 1782. [Several other members of this family were also distinguished for their mathematical attainments.]

BERNSTORFF, JOHN HARTWIG ERNEST, Count, a celebrated statesman in the employment of the king of Denmark; and founder of the Danish Society of Language and the Fine Arts, and the Economical and Agricultural Society. Born at Hanover, 1712; died, 1772.

BERNSTORFF, ANDREW PETER, Count, nephew of the above, a Danish minister of state. During the American war he effected the armed neutrality of Russia, Prussia, Denmark, and Sweden, for the protection of the trade of those powers against the belligerents; and it was chiefly owing to his skillful policy that Denmark was prevented from being drawn into collision with either Sweden or Russia, when the war broke out between those powers in 1788. Born, 1735; died, 1797.

BEROALDUS, PHILIP, an Italian professor of eloquence. Born, 1453; died, 1505.

BEROALDUS, PHILIP, nephew of the above, an Italian poet; librarian of the Vatican under pope Leo X. Died, 1518.

BEROSUS, priest of the temple of Belus, at Babylon, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He wrote a history of Chaldaea, some fragments of which are preserved by Josephus.

BERQUIN, ARNAULD, an elegant French writer; author of "Idyls," "L'Amides Enfants," and other interesting works for youth. Born, 1749; died, 1791.

BERRETINI, NICHOLAS, an eminent historical painter, pupil of Carlo Muratti. Born, 1617; died, 1682.

BERRI, CHARLES FERDINAND DE BOURBON, Duke de, second son of the Count d'Artois, afterwards Charles X. of France; assassinated by one Louvel, who attacked him just as he had left the opera-house, and was on the point of stepping into his carriage, Feb. 13. 1820. He shared in common with the Bourbons all the reverses they were doomed to suffer; and he deserved a better fate, if it were only for the benevolence of his character. His son Henri, born posthumously, commonly called the Duc de Bordeaux, or the Comte de Chambord, is the legitimate heir to the throne of France.

BERRIMAN, WILLIAM, an English divine; author of five volumes of sermons, &c. Born, 1638; died, 1750.

BERRUYER, JOSEPH ISAAC, a French Jesuit, whose writings were condemned at Rome for their too great liberality; author of a "History of the People of God," &c. Died, 1758.

BERRY, Sir JOHN, an English naval commander, knighted for his distinguished bravery at the battle of Southwold Bay. He died of poison, administered to him on board his ship, 1691.

BERRY, Rear-admiral Sir EDWARD, bart., K.C.B. This officer was the only one in the royal navy who had received three medals for his services, having commanded a line-of-battle ship in the memorable battles of the Nile, Trafalgar, and St. Domingo. Died, 1831.

BERSMANN, GEORGE, a learned German; author of Notes on some of the Classics, and of a Latin version of the Psalms of David. Born, 1533; died, 1611.

BERTAUT, JOHN, a French prelate and poet; chaplain to Catherine de Medici, and secretary of the cabinet to Henry III. Born, 1562; died, 1611.

BERTHIER, ALEXANDER, prince of Neufchatel and Wagram, a marshal and vicc-constable of France, was born at Versailles, in 1753, and served with Lafayette in the war of American independence. At the commencement of the French revolution he was made a general officer, fought gallantly in La Vendée, and was at the head of Buonaparte's staff in Italy, Egypt, and Germany. He was, in fact, the companion of Napoleon in all his expeditions, dining and travelling in the same carriage; and his skill in drawing up despatches, joined to his unwearied application and methodical habits, proved of incalculable value to the emperor in the vast pressure of his affairs. On the restoration of Louis, however, in 1814, he recognised his authority, and was created a peer; but when his former master returned from Elba, he retired to his family at Bussang, where, as soon as the music of the Russian troops, on their march to the French borders, was heard at the gates of the city, he put an end to his life in a fit of frenzy or remorse, by throwing himself from a window of his palace, June 1. 1815.

BERTHIER, JOSEPH STEPHEN, a French philosopher of the Society of the Oratory; author of "Physique des Comètes," &c. Born, 1710; died, 1783.

BERTHIER, WILLIAM FRANCIS, a learned Jesuit; one of the editors of the Dictionnaire de Trevous, and translator of the Psalms into French. Born, 1704; died, 1782.

BERTHOLLET, CLAUDE LOUIS, Count, one of the most eminent chemists of his age, was born at Talloire, Savoy, in 1748, and studied medicine at Turin. He afterwards settled in Paris, where he became intimate with Lavoisier, was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and made professor of the normal school. He accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt; and, during the emperor's reign, was made a senator and an officer of the legion of honour; but he was one of the first to desert his patron when his fortunes were on the decline; for which he received the title of count from Louis XVIII. His principal work is "Essai de Statique Chimique;" but he wrote many other valuable essays, and had also a large share in the reformation of the chemical nomenclature. Died, 1822.

BERTHOLON, N. DE ST. LAZARE, a French chemist and philosopher of the 18th century, whose works on acrostation, electricity, and other scientific subjects, evince much learning and ability. Born at Lyons, and died in 1799.

BERTHOUD, FERDINAND, a skilful Swiss clock and chronometer maker; author of "Traité des Horloges Marines," &c. Born at Neufchatel, 1727; died, 1807. His nephew, Louis, inherited his talents, and was not less celebrated than his uncle. The accuracy of their chronometers is proverbial.

BERTI, ALEXANDER POMPEY, a native of Lucca; author of "La Caduta de' Decemviri della Romana Republica," &c. Born, 1686; died, 1752.

BERTI, JOHN LAURENCE, an Italian monk, and general of the order of the Augustines; author of some Italian poetry, a work "De Disciplinis Theologicis," &c. Born, 1696; died, 1766.

BERTIE, WILLOUGHBY, earl of Abingdon; a nobleman distinguished equally by his talent and his eccentricity. He was author of several political and satirical pamphlets; for one of which — the report of a speech he had delivered in parliament — he was prosecuted, and imprisoned in the King's Bench. Died, 1791.

BERTIN, ANTHONY, a French military officer and an elegant poet; author of a "Collection of Elegies" and other poems, which were greatly esteemed. Born in the isle of Bourbon, 1752; died at St. Domingo, 1790.

BERTIN, JOSEPH, a French physician and anatomist; author of a treatise on Osteology, and other valuable works on anatomy. Born, 1712; died, 1781.

BERTINAZZI, CHARLES ANTHONY, a celebrated comedian, and an accomplished wit, was born at Turin, in 1713, and for more than forty years was one of the most distinguished comic actors at Paris. Died, 1783.

BERTOLI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, born in 1676, obtained the name of the patriarch of Aquileia, from his having first directed attention to the antiquities of that place, and for his successful endeavours to prevent the inhabitants from mutilating or destroying them. Died, 1758.

BERTIUS, PETER, professor of mathematics, and cosmographer to the king of France; author of "Theatrum Geographia Veteris," &c. Born, 1565; died, 1629.

BERTRAM, CORNELIUS BONAVENTURE, Hebrew professor at Geneva and Lausanne; author of a "Dissertation on the Republic of the Hebrews," &c. Born, 1531; died, 1594.

BERTRAND, HENRY, Count, a distinguished French general, and the companion in exile of Napoleon Buonaparte, would have earned a bright name on the page of history merely by his military achievements during the wars of the empire, were not those achievements cast, comparatively, into the shade by the steadfast fidelity with which he clung to Napoleon. Aiding that great soldier to gain some of his most splendid victories; covering him when in retreat and peril, as after the murderous affair of Hanau; following him to his free exile to Elba; returning with him to share all the perils of "blood-stained Waterloo;" he, the brave and steadfast Bertrand, feared not the imprisonment of St. Helena, but voluntarily abode there until he had seen the first obsequies of his sincerely worshipped human idol. Honour to fidelity! Born, 1770; died, 1844.

BERTRAND, JOHN BAPTIST, a French physician; author of an "Historical Account of the Plague at Marseilles," &c. Born, 1670; died, 1752.

BERTRANDI, JOHN AMBROSE MARIA, an eminent surgeon and anatomist of Turin; author of a treatise on surgical operations, and various other professional works. Born, 1723; died, 1765.

BERULLE, PIERRE DE, Cardinal, founder of the congregation of the Oratory. He was employed in many affairs of state in France; and accompanied Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I., to England. Died, 1629.

BERWICK, JAMES FITZJAMES, Duke of, natural son of James II. and Arabella Churchill, sister of the Duke of Marlborough; a distinguished and gallant soldier, and author of a valuable volume of Memoirs. Killed at the siege of Philipsburgh, in 1734.

BERYLLUS, an Arabian bishop, of the third century; converted by Origen from his heterodox opinion, that Christ had no existence prior to his incarnation.

BERZELIUS, Baron, one of the great chemists of modern times, was born in 1779, in Ostgothland, a province of Sweden, where his father kept a village school. After graduating at Upsala in 1804, he repaired to Stockholm, where he became an assistant to Sparwman, who had accompanied Captain Cook in one of his voyages round the world; and at his death, in 1806, he succeeded him in the chair of chemistry, which he continued to fill for forty-two years. It would be impossible within our limits to give even a summary of his labours during this period; suffice it to say, that in a century which has produced a greater number of distinguished chemists than perhaps of any other class of men of science, Berzelius stood out as a star of the first magnitude. His patient labours, and ingenious investigations, have done more to lay the foundations of organic chemistry, than those of any other chemist. To him pre-eminently belongs the honour of applying the great principles which had been established by Dalton, Davy, Gay-Lussac, and himself, in inorganic chemistry, to unfolding the laws which regulate the combinations forming the structures of the animal and vegetable kingdoms; and in thus opening the way for the discoveries of Mulder, Liebig, Dumas, and others. To him chemistry is indebted for the discovery of several new elementary bodies, more especially selenium, morium, and cerium; and to his skill as a manipulator, may be traced many of the analytical processes at present in use. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that all the scientific societies of the world contended for the honour of enrolling his name among their members; and the various minor honours which he received from his own sovereign from time to time, were finally crowned by his being made a Knight Grand Cross of the Order of Vasa in 1829, and his elevation to the rank of a baron in 1835. Died, 1848.

BESOLDE, CHRISTOPHER, a counsellor of Vienna; author of a "Synopsis of Politics," a "History of the Ottoman Empire," &c. Born, 1577; died, 1638.

BESSARION, JOHN, a Greek priest, one of the most eminent revivers of learning in the 15th century, and founder of the noble library of St. Mark, at Venice. He translated from Aristotle, Xenophon, &c.; and zealously defended Plato against the attacks of George of Trebizond. He was made a cardinal by pope Eugene, and had the title of patriarch of Constantinople given him by Pius II. Born, 1395; died, 1472.

BESSEL, Dr. FREDERICK WILLIAM, a distinguished Prussian astronomer, born 1784. He was professor of astronomy in the university of Berlin; and such was the skill and assiduity with which he prosecuted his favourite study, that he was twice presented with a gold medal from the Royal Astronomical Society of London, for the number and accuracy of his observations. Died, 1846.

BESSIERES, JOHN BAPTIST, duke of Istria, and a French marshal, was born at Poitou, in 1769. He distinguished himself in many memorable battles, and was highly esteemed by Napoleon for his honour, skill, and bravery. He fell in the combat that preceded the battle of Lutzen, 1813.

BETHENCOURT, JOHN DE, a Norman baron, and a military adventurer, who conquered the Canary islands, and afterwards held them as a vic of the crown of Castile. Died, 1425.

BETHLEM-GABOR, a native of Transylvania, whose courage and wily policy made him ruler of that country, and enabled him to die in peaceable possession of it, in spite of the utmost efforts of the emperor of Germany. Died, 1629.

BETIS, governor of Gaza, who for his brave defence of it was put to death by Alexander the Great, and dragged at his chariot wheels when dead, B.C. 332.

BETTERTON, THOMAS, a celebrated actor; he excelled in the representation of Shakspeare's principal tragic characters. Born, 1635; died, 1700.

BETTINELLI, XAVIER, a Jesuit of Mantua, and, on the suppression of his order, teacher of eloquence at Modena. He was an elegant and accomplished writer, epistolary, dramatic, and poetical; his principal work is the "Lettere dieci di Virgilio agli Arcadi." Born, 1718; died, 1808.

BETTS, JOHN, an English physician of the time of Charles II.; author of a treatise "De Ortu et Natura Sanguinis," &c.

BETUSSE, JOSEPH, an Italian poet of the 16th century; he translated into Italian the Latin works of Boccaccio, and wrote a life of him.

BEUERNONVILLE, PETER RIEL, Count of, a French marshal; minister of war in 1793; ambassador at Berlin and Madrid during the consulate, and under the empire grand officer of the legion of honour. He voted for the deposition of Napoleon, and attached himself to Louis, by whom he was rewarded with the title of marshal. Died, 1821.

BEUF, JOHN LE, a French antiquary; author of "Memoirs of the History of Auxerre," &c. Born, 1607; died, 1670.

BEVER, Dr. THOMAS, an English civilian; a judge of the Cinque Ports, and author of a treatise on "The Legal Polity of the Romans," &c. Died, 1791.

BEVERIDGE, WILLIAM, bishop of St. Asaph; an eminent orientalist, critic, and theologian, and one of the most distinguished scholars that ever adorned the prelate, was born at Barrow, Lincolnshire, in 1638, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He was the author of numerous works; among which are 12 volumes of "Sermons," "Private Thoughts on Religion," "Institutionum Chronologicarum Libri duo," &c. He bequeathed the principal part of his property to charitable uses. Died, 1707.

BEVERLY, JOHN OF, tutor to the venerable Bede, and subsequently archbishop of York. He was one of the most learned men of his time, and several of his devotional treatises are still extant. Died, 721.

BEVERINCK, JEROME VAN, a Dutch statesman; greatly instrumental in promoting the treaty of Nimeguen, which produced a general peace. Born, 1614; died, 1690.

BEVERWICK, JOHN DE, a Dutch physician; author of some valuable works on professional subjects. Born, 1594; died, 1647.

BEWICK, JOHN, an English artist residing at Newcastle, whose "History of Quadrupeds," by the beauty and spirit of its illustrations, gave the first impulse to that improvement in the art of wood engraving which has at length been carried to such exquisite perfection. Died, 1795. His brother THOMAS, who followed the same profession, died in 1828.

BEWLY, WILLIAM, an English chemist and natural philosopher, whose researches and experiments did much for the improvement of chemistry. He published some valuable papers in the Monthly Review, but left no separate treatise. Died, 1783.

BEYER, or BEGER, AUGUSTUS, a German divine; author of historical and critical remarks on scarce books, &c. Died, 1741.

BEZA, THEODORE, a native of France, and, for some time, a Catholic and prior of Longjumeau. The tutor under whom he studied imbued his mind with Protestant principles, and an attachment which he formed for a young lady whom he afterwards married, added force to his scruples of conscience. Abandoning the preference he already enjoyed, and the still higher ones to which he doubtless might have attained, he fled to Geneva. Thence he went to Lausanne, where he became professor of Greek, but finally settled at Geneva, and became Calvin's colleague in both the church and the university. He greatly aided in diffusing and upholding the principles of the Reformers, and was a very versatile writer. His Latin poems are elegant, and his controversial prose very subtle and vigorous. His Latin version of the New Testament, with notes, is still considered an authority. Born, 1519; died 1605.

BIERING, VITUS, a captain in the Russian navy, and a celebrated navigator of the northern seas, who, being cast on a desolate island, perished there, in 1741. This is now called Bhering's Island, and the straits between Asia and America have also received his name.

BIANCHI, ANTONIO, a Venetian gondolier of the 18th century, who obtained great note by his poetical talents; author of "Il Tempio ovvero di Solomone," "A Treatise on Italian Comedy," &c.

BIANCHI, FRANCIS, a musical composer, born at Cremona; author of "Disertor Francheze," "Semiramide," &c. He came to England, wrote "Castore e Polluce" for Madame Storce, and "Inez de Castro" for Mrs. Billington; and died early in the present century.

BIANCHI, JOHN, known also by the Latin name of JANUS PLANCUS, a celebrated Italian physician, anatomist, and naturalist, and the reviver of the Academy of the Leincei. Born at Rimini, 1693; died, 1775.

BIANCHINI, FRANCIS, a philosopher and mathematician of Verona; author of "Istoria Universale," &c., and a vast number of scientific and literary treatises. Born, 1662; died, 1729.

BIAS, one of the seven sages of Greece, and a native of Priene, in Ionia; celebrated for his knowledge and strict regard to justice. He flourished in the sixth and seventh centuries, B.C., and died at a very advanced age.

BIBIENA, BERNARDO DA, a Roman cardinal, raised from a low origin by Leo X.; author of a comedy entitled "La Calandria," greatly admired in Italy. Born, 1470; died, by poison, as is supposed, 1520.

BIBIENA, FERDINAND GALLI, an eminent painter and architect. Born at Bologna, 1657; died, 1743.

BICHAT, MARIE FRANCIS XAVIER, a celebrated French physician; author of "Physiological Researches respecting Life and Death," "Anatomy as applied to Physiology and Medicine," &c. Born, 1771; died, 1802.

BICKERSTAFF, ISAAC, a dramatic writer of the 18th century; author of "Love in a Village," "Lionel and Clarissa," &c.

BICKERSTETH, Rev. EDWARD, an able and prolific writer on religious topics, was born in 1786. His original destination was the law; but after practising for some years as an attorney at Norwich, he was seized with a desire to enter the ministry, and obtained ordination from Bishop Bathurst in 1815. Soon afterwards he was appointed secretary to the Church Missionary Society in London, and at the same time became assistant minister to an episcopal chapel in Spitalfields. In 1830 he was presented to the living of Wotton, in Hertfordshire, where he laboured with great zeal and efficiency down to the period of his death, 28th February, 1850. Mr. Bickersteth's first work was his "Help to the Study of the Scriptures;" and this was followed by many other useful works on divinity; and on all occasions he exhibited himself as a most uncompromising opponent to Popery and Tractarianism.

BIDDLE, JOHN, a Socinian writer of considerable note in the time of Charles I. and during the Commonwealth, and now regarded as the founder of Unitarian doctrines; author of "Confessions of Faith concerning the Holy Trinity," and other works in defence of his principles. He was more than once prosecuted and imprisoned, and died of a fever caught in gaol in 1622.

BIDLAKE, JOHN, Dr., a divine of the Church of England; author of "The Country Parson," and other poems, "An Introduction to Geography," &c. Born, 1755; died, 1814.

BIDLÖÖ, GODFREY, a Dutch anatomist; author of "Anatomia Corporis Humani," &c. Born, 1649; died, 1713.

BIEL, JOHN CHRISTIAN, a German Protestant divine, pastor at Brunswick; author of a valuable Lexicon of the Septuagint version of the Old Testament. Died, 1745.

BIELFELD, JAMES FREDERIC, Baron de, a celebrated modern writer; author of "Political Institutions," &c. Born, at Hamburg, 1717; died, 1770.

BIEVRE, MARECHAL, Marquis de, a life-guard of the king of France, not unknown as an author, but far more for his puns and repartees. The following anecdote shows the inveteracy of his habit, while it proves "the ruling passion strong in death." He went to Spa to recruit his health, but died there; and, when at the point of death, said to those around him, "Mes amis, je m'en vais de ce pas" (de Spa). Born, 1747; died, 1789.

BIGLAND, JOHN, a voluminous writer, whose first publication did not appear till he was fifty years of age; author of "A System of Geography and History," "Histories of Spain and England," "Letters on English and French History," &c. Died, 1832, aged 82.

BIGNE, MARQUERIN DE LA, a doctor of the Sorbonne; compiler of the first edition of the "Bibliotheca Patrum." He was born in 1546, and died at Paris about the close of the 16th century.

BIGNICOURT, SIMON DE, a counsellor of Rheims; author of "Pensées et Réflexions Philosophiques." Born, 1709; died, 1775.

BIGNON, JEROME, a learned French writer; author of treatises "On Rome and its Antiquities," "On the Election of the Popes," &c.; and editor of the "Formulæ" of Marculphus. Born, 1589; died, 1656.

BIGNON, JOHN PAUL, grandson of the above; librarian to the king of France; author of "Les Aventures d' Abdalla Fils d' Haniff," &c. Died, 1743.

BIGNON, L. P. EDOUARD, was born at Melleiraye, of a highly respectable family, and early entered on the diplomatic career as secretary of legation in Switzerland, and subsequently in Savoy and Prussia, of which last he had the administration of the finances subsequent to the battle of Jena. Ambassador in Poland, both before and after the retreat from Moscow, he rendered the most important services to the French army. He subsequently held many important offices, was a member of the chamber of deputies under the restoration, and was made peer of France in 1839. He wrote, at the express desire of Napoleon, a "History of French Diplomacy." Born, 1771; died, 1810.

BIGOT AMERIC, an eminent French scholar. He assisted in the publication of several works; and having discovered Palladius's Life of Chrysostom in the ducal library at Florence, he published both the Greek text and his own Latin translation of it. Born, 1626; died, 1689.

BILDERDYK, G., a modern Dutch poet, born in 1760, and one of the first of his country; author of the "Death of Ædipus," "The Fairy Urgate," "Winter Flowers and Autumn Leaves," and several meritorious translations from the Greek poets and tragedians, from Pope's Essay on Man, &c.

BILFINGER, GEORGE BERNARD, a German writer and professor of philosophy and theology. He was a man of most extensive learning, and the author of "Dilucidationes Philosophicæ," &c. Born, 1693; died, 1750.

BILGUER, JOHN ELRIC, a Swiss surgeon; author of several professional treatises, in one of which he maintains the inutility of amputation in cases of gunshot wounds. Died, 1796.

BILLAUD, VARENNES DE, the son of a French advocate at Rochelle, was educated at the same college as Fouché, and proved himself one of the most violent and sanguinary characters of the French revolution. He bore a principal part in the murders and horrid massacres which followed the destruction of the Bastille; voted immediate death to the unfortunate Louis XVI; and officiated as president of the Convention on the 18th of Oct. 1793. He was afterwards deported to Cayenne, and subsisted on a small pension allowed him by Pethion. Died at St. Domingo, in 1819.

BILLING, SIGSMOND, a patriotic and consistent French liberal, born at Calmar, in Alsace, in 1773. He entered the army at the very commencement of the revolution, and distinguished himself at the battle of Genappe and on other occasions; was commissary of war to the armies of the North, the Rhine, &c. in 1792, and to the army of Germany at the time of General Moreau's retreat, and was present in many celebrated battles and sieges. In consequence of certain changes in the government, he for a time retired to private life, and devoted his time and talents to the formation of Bible Societies and the education of Protestant youth. But he did not wholly abandon the military profession; and, when the reverses of Napoleon had endangered the safety of France, Billing, as the commander of a legion of the national guard, surrounded and defended the chamber of representatives while it was in the act of pronouncing the emperor's forfeiture, and was otherwise active in bringing about his abdication. He was also, in concert with General la Fayette, greatly instrumental in effecting the revolution of 1830, which seated Louis Philippe on the throne; preserving throughout his character a love of rational liberty, and a sincere regard for the happiness and morals of the people. He died in 1832.

BILLINGTON, ELIZABETH, the most celebrated English female singer of her time. She was of German extraction, though born in England. Her popularity was equally great in England and on the Continent, and remained undiminished to the very close of her public career in 1809. Died, 1817.

BILLINGSLEY, Sir HENRY, was a native of Canterbury, who, as a London tradesman, acquired great wealth, and became its chief magistrate. He was taught mathematics by an expelled friar, to whom he had generously given shelter and support, and was the first who published Euclid's Elements in English. Died, 1616.

BILSON, THOMAS, bishop of Winchester, in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and James I.; author of a treatise on Christ's Descent into Hell, and one of the translators of the Bible. Born, 1536; died, 1616.

BINGHAM, JOSEPH, an eminent English divine; author of "Origines Ecclesiasticæ," "Scholastic History of Lay Baptism," &c. Born, 1668; died, 1723.

BINGHAM, Sir GEORGE RIDOUT, a major-general in the British army, was born in 1777. He entered the service in 1793, as an ensign in the 69th foot; and progressively advanced in different regiments, till he became lieutenant-colonel of the 53d, being present at the most important transactions in the Peninsula, for which services he was rewarded by knighthood. He afterwards had the charge of Buonaparte from England to St. Helena, where he remained several years, and was promoted to the rank of major-general and colonel-commandant of the 2d rifle brigade. Died, January, 1833.

BINGLEY (descended from English parents, and considered as the Garrick of the Dutch stage), was born at Rotterdam, in 1755, and died in 1818.

BINGLEY, WILLIAM, a clergyman; author of "Animal Biography," "Memoirs of British Quadrupeds," &c. Died, 1823.

BION, a Greek philosopher, in the reign of Antigonus Gonatus, king of Macedon, in the 3d century, B.C. Some few fragments of his writings remain.

BION, a Greek pastoral poet: his poems, published with those of his friend and disciple, Moschus, are remarkable for simplicity and sweetness. By some he is said to have lived in the 2d, and by others in the 3d century, B.C.

BION, NICHOLAS, a French mathematician; author of a "Treatise on the Use of the Globes," &c. Died, 1733.

BIRAGUE, CLEMENT, an engraver on gems, said to have been the first discoverer of the art of engraving on diamonds. He was born at Milan, and flourished during the middle of the 16th century.

BIRAGUE, RENÉ DE, a Milanese of noble family, who sought shelter in France from the vengeance of Louis Sforza, and became a cardinal and chancellor of France. He is infamously memorable as one of the authors of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Born, 1509; died, 1583.

BIRCH, SAMUEL, who for many years played a distinguished part as a member of the corporation of London, was born in that city, in 1757, and succeeded his father in his well-established business of a pastry-cook, in Cornhill. He was the first to propose the measure of arming and training the inhabitants as volunteers; and he had the honour, successively, to become lieutenant, major, and lieutenant-colonel commandant of the first regiment of Loyal London Volunteers. Yet, although never unmindful of his position as a party man in politics, he found leisure to employ his pen in various walks of literature. Mr. Birch was also among the earliest and most active supporters of the Literary Fund Society, to which he continued attached till his decease, and had long been the senior member of its council. In 1814 he filled the civic chair. Died, Dec. 10, 1841, aged 84.

BIRCH, THOMAS, originally a Quaker, but subsequently a divine of the Church of England. He was an industrious historian and biographer; and author, among many other works, of a "History of the Royal Society," "Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth," &c. Born, 1705; died, 1766.

BIRD, EDWARD (R.A.), a painter, chiefly of comic subjects, but who also executed many religious and historical pieces, and was made historical painter to the Princess Charlotte of Wales. Born, 1772; died, 1819.

BIRD, JOHN, an eminent mathematical instrument maker; author of "The Method of constructing Mural Quadrants," &c. Died, 1763.

BIRD, WILLIAM, an eminent musician in the reign of Elizabeth. He chiefly composed sacred music; and to him "Non nobis Domine" is attributed. Born, 1543; died, 1623.

BIREN, JOHN ERNEST DE, duke of Courland, who, though the son of a peasant, by his handsome person and address, obtained such influence over Anne, daughter of Peter I. and duchess of Courland, that when she ascended the throne of Russia, she committed the reigns of government to Biren, made him duke of Courland, and at her death, in 1740, left him regent of the empire. He was subsequently banished to Siberia, recalled by Peter III., and his duchy restored to him by Catharine, in 1763, but which, 6 years afterwards, he relinquished in favour of his eldest son. Born, 1687; died, 1772.

BIRKBECK, GEORGE, M. D., president of the London Mechanics' Institute, was the son of a merchant and banker at Settle, in Yorkshire, where he was born in 1776. In his boyhood he displayed a strong inclination for those mechanical pursuits to which he afterwards became so devoted; but his friends having determined that he should embrace the medical profession, he first studied for this object at Leeds, then removed to London to become a pupil of Dr. Baillie, and subsequently went to Edinburgh to complete his education. At the age of twenty-one he was appointed professor of natural history in the Andersonian Institution of Glasgow; and having while there successfully established a mechanics' class, he was induced, in 1822, to found the London Mechanics' Institution in Chancery Lane; to which society he generously lent 3000*l.* for erecting a museum, lecture-room, &c. Of this institution Dr. Birkbeck was elected president; and from it nearly all the various mechanics' institutes throughout Great Britain have been established. As a physician, he enjoyed a considerable share of reputation; as the promoter of mechanic arts, and as the warm friend of the industrious artisan, no man could possibly be more generally or more justly esteemed. He also numbered among his circle of friends the most eminent scientific and literary men of the day. Died, Dec. 1, 1841.

BIRKBECK, MORRIS, an English gentleman who emigrated to America, where he purchased so vast a tract of land as to acquire the title of "Emperor of the Prairies;" author of "Letters from Illinois," "Notes of a Journey in America," &c. He was accidentally drowned in 1825.

BIRKENHEAD, SIR JOHN, a political writer of the 17th century; several times imprisoned during the Commonwealth for writing in favour of the exiled king. Born, 1615; died, 1679.

BIRKHEAD, HENRY, a modern Latin poet, born in 1617; author of "Otium Literarium," &c. He died at the latter end of the 17th century.

BIRON, ARMAND DE GONTAUT, Baron de, a celebrated French general, honoured with the friendship of Henry IV. He was slain at the siege of Epernay, in Champagne, in 1592.

BIRON, CHARLES DE GONTAUT, Duke de, son of the above; admiral and marshal of France, and a favourite of Henry IV., who appointed him his ambassador to England, &c., and raised him to the dukedom. He was, however, seduced by the intrigues of the court of Spain to join in a conspiracy against his royal and truly generous friend; for which crime he was tried, condemned, and beheaded, in 1602.

BIRON, duke de Lauzun, born about 1760; one of the most celebrated men of the French revolution, remarkable at once for his amours, his attachment to liberty, and his military exploits. He served with La Fayette in America, and attached himself to the party of the Duke of Orleans, on his return. In 1792 he was joined with Talleyrand in a mission to this country; on his return, served under Rochambeau, in Flanders; and perished by the guillotine at the end of 1793, on a charge of counter-revolution. He died stoically, ordering oysters, and drinking wine with the executioner.

BISCHOP, JOHN DE, a Dutch historical and landscape painter. Born, 1646; died, 1686.

BISCOE, RICHARD, an English divine; author of "The History of the Acts of the Apostles, confirmed by other Authors." Died, 1748.

BISSET, CHARLES, an able physician, and a writer on fortification, which art he studied while in the 42nd regiment, and received promotion for his skill in it at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, by the Duke of Cumberland. Born, 1716; died, 1791.

BISSET, JAMES, an ingenious artist and amusing writer, was born at Perth, in 1762, but settled early in life at Birmingham, where he established a museum and shop for curiosities, which he afterwards removed to Leamington. He had a remarkable facility in writing rhymes; and being ever ready to make his muse subserve the cause of loyalty, or aid the progress of art, his various works present a motley appearance, and are often singularly droll and epigrammatic. "Guides," "Directories," and "Poetic Surveys" of the towns in which he lived, look oddly enough when placed in juxtaposition with "Patriotic Clarions," "Critical Essays," and "Comic Strictures on the Fine Arts;" yet such were among his numerous productions, all of which are more or less indebted for their notoriety to the jingle of rhyme. Died, 1832.

BISI, BONAVENTURE, an esteemed Bolognese miniature and historical painter. Died, 1662.

BISSON, P. T. J. G., born in 1767; a French general, who fought in most of Napoleon's campaigns, till his death, in 1811. He was of prodigious size, strength, and appetite.

BITAUPE, PAUL JEREMIAH, the son of French refugee parents at Konigsberg, where he was born, in 1732, but in after life settled in Paris. He was an author of considerable repute, and patronised by Frederick II. of Prussia and by Napoleon. He translated Homer, and wrote "Joseph" and other poems. Died, 1808.

BIVAR, DON RODRIGO DIAS DE, or the Cid, a hero of Spain, whose valour in various encounters with the Moors, and his unjust banishment, afforded rich materials both for history and romance. Born at Burgos, 1040; died at Valencia, 1099.

BIZOT, PIERRE, a French writer; author of a curious work, entitled "Histoire Médallique de la République de Hollande." Born, 1636; died, 1696.

BLACK, JOSEPH, an eminent chemist, born at Bordeaux in France, but of Scottish parents; author of "Lectures on Chemistry," besides other valuable works embodying important discoveries. Born, 1728; died, 1799.

BLACKBURNE, FRANCIS, an English divine, eminent as a theological writer, and remarkable for the publication of works favouring dissent from the church to which he belonged. He was archdeacon of Cleveland and a prebend of York; but so little of a churchman in his writings, that he was invited to succeed Dr. Chandler as minister of the chapel in the Old Jewry. Born, 1705; died, 1787.

BLACKLOCK, THOMAS, a Scotch divine and poet; author of "The Gralam," an heroic ballad; "Remarks on Civil Liberty," &c. Born, 1721; died, 1791.

BLACKMORE, SIR RICHARD, a physician and poet, and the author of many works both in prose and verse, the principal of which is his poem, entitled "Creation." Living as he did in the time of Dryden, Pope, and other wits and satirists, to whom he was opposed in politics, he met with unmerited ridicule; for though as a poet he was inferior to many, he was by no means destitute of talent, and, what is better, he sustained the reputation of a pious and conscientious man. Died, 1729.

BLACKSTONE, SIR WILLIAM, an eminent English judge; author of the well known "Commentaries," and other valuable works on law, &c. Born, 1723; died, 1780.

BLACKWELL, ALEXANDER, a Scottish physician, who settled in Sweden, and was beheaded there, for supposed participation in a conspiracy, 1748.

BLACKWELL, ALEXANDER AND ELIZABETH, husband and wife: the latter, a woman of talent, in order to procure subsistence for her husband while in prison for debt, published a "Herbal" in 2 volumes, folio, with 500 plates, drawn, engraved, and coloured by herself, all in the space of four years. The work succeeded, and her husband was liberated; but he seemed doomed to be the sport of fortune; for after having been invited to Stockholm, and pensioned by the king of Sweden, in consequence of his being the author of a work on agriculture which attracted the notice of that monarch, he was charged with being concerned in a plot with Count Tessin for overturning the kingdom, tried, and beheaded, in 1747.

BLACKWELL, THOMAS, Greek professor of Aberdeen; author of "An Inquiry into the Life and Writings of Homer;" "Memoirs of the Court of Augustus," &c. Born, 1701; died, 1757.

BLACKWOOD, ADAM, a Scotch writer; author of "The Martyrdom of Mary Stuart," written in French, &c. Born, 1539; died, 1613.

BLACKWOOD, SIR HENRY, a meritorious British admiral, was the sixth son of Sir John Blackwood, bart., and born in 1770. Having entered the naval service at the early age of 11 years, he was present at the action off the Dogger Bank; and on the commencement of hostilities with the French, in 1793, he became first lieutenant of the Invincible man-of-war, in which capacity he acted on the "glorious 1st of June," 1794, with distinguished bravery, and was in consequence promoted to the rank of commander. In 1793, when captain of the Brilliant, of 28 guns, he gallantly maintained a most unequal combat, off the island of Teneriffe, with two large French frigates, each of which was nearly double his own force, and beat them off. After this he was engaged in various services, as captain of the Penelope, of 36 guns, under Lords Keith and Nelson, Sir Sydney Smith, and other eminent men; and it was owing chiefly to his skill and bravery that the Guillaume Tell, of 80 guns, which escaped from Lord Nelson at Aboukir, was captured. The next scene of his naval glory was the ever-memorable battle of Trafalgar, where he performed the most essential service, as captain of the Euryalus, and witnessed the death of his friend and heroic commander, whose last words to him were "God bless you, Blackwood—I shall never see you more." In 1806 he was appointed to the command of the Ajax, of 80 guns, and joined Lord Collingwood's fleet on the anniversary of the battle of Trafalgar. This, however, was a melancholy event, as the sequel proved; for, during the night of the 14th of February, 1807, the Ajax was found to be on fire, and in a short time went down with half her crew; Sir Henry, like many others, being saved with the greatest difficulty. After this he commanded the Warspite, and was present at the blockades of Brest and Rochfort, and engaged in various enterprises. In 1814, His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence made him captain of the fleet, and he was appointed to bring over the crowned heads from France to this country: on which occasion he was created a baronet, and promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. In 1819, Sir Henry was appointed commander-in-chief of the naval forces in the East Indies, from which station he speedily returned; and in 1827 the lord high admiral raised him to the command at Chatham. He died in December, 1832; leaving behind him the character of a brave, skilful officer, and an amiable man.

BLADEN, MARTIN, a military officer under the Duke of Marlborough; author of "Orpheus and Eurydice," a masque; "A Translation of Cæsar's Commentaries," &c. Died, 1746.

BLAINVILLE, M. DE, professor of comparative anatomy in the Paris Museum of Natural History, and a worthy successor to Cuvier, was born in 1773. He was found dead on May 1. 1850, in one of the night railway trains between Rouen and Caen.

BLAIR, HUGH, an eminent Scotch divine; author of a "Dissertation on the Poems of Ossian," "Lectures on Rhetoric," "Belles Lettres," and "Sermons," in five volumes, which have ever been greatly esteemed. Born at Edinburgh, 1718; died, 1800.

BLAIR, JOHN, a prebend of Westminster; author of "Chronological Tables" and "Lectures on the Canon of the Old Testament." Died, 1782.

BLAIR, ROBERT, a Scotch divine; author of the well known and admirable poem "The Grave." Born, 1700; died, 1746.

BLAKE, ROBERT, a celebrated English admiral during the Commonwealth, whose skill and courage were equalled only by his disinterested patriotism and love of justice; and whose brilliant achievements proudly sustained the honour of his country, and greatly enhanced its naval character. Among his numerous gallant exploits, the most noted are the four desperate engagements he fought with the Dutch fleet under Admiral Van Tromp; by which he not only gained a decided superiority over our mightiest naval opponent, but, by the bold tactics he introduced, infused that intrepidity and spirit of enterprise, by which the British navy has been ever since so highly distinguished. Born, at Bridgewater, 1509; died, 1658.

BLAKE, WILLIAM, a highly gifted but very eccentric artist and writer; author of "Europe," a prophecy; "America," a prophecy; "Songs of Experience;" and an infinity of admirable engravings. Born, 1759; died, 1827.

BLAMPINI, THOMAS, a Benedictine monk; editor of a splendid edition of the works of St. Augustin. Died, 1710.

BLANCHARD, FRANCIS, a celebrated French aeronaut, born in 1738, was distinguished from his youth by his mechanical inventions. After making his first aerostatic voyage in 1784, he crossed the Channel from Dover to Calais, 1785; for which exploit he was rewarded by the king of France with 12,000 francs, and a pension of 1200 fr. He first made use of a parachute in London, in 1785; went through various countries on the Continent, exhibiting his aeronautic skill; visited America with the same object; and, returning in 1798, ascended in Rouen with 16 persons in a large balloon, and descended at a place 15 miles distant. He died in 1809. — His wife, MADAME BLANCHARD, continued to make aerial voyages; but in June, 1819, having ascended from Tivoli, in Paris, her balloon took fire, at a considerable height, owing to some fireworks which she carried with her, the car fell, and the hapless aeronaut was dashed to pieces.

BLANCHARD, JAMES, an eminent and indefatigable painter, denominated the French Titian. Born, 1600; died, 1638.

BLANCHIARD, JOHN BAPTIST, a French Jesuit, and professor of rhetoric; author of "The Temple of the Muses," &c. Born, 1731; died, 1797.

BLANCHIARD, LAMAN, a graceful periodical writer, was born at Great Yarmouth in 1803. His father having removed to London when he was 5 years of age, he received his education at St. Olave's School, Lambeth; and here was laid the groundwork of those literary tastes and habits which distinguished him through life. His first occupation was that of reader at Cox and Baylis' printing office in Great Queen Street; in 1827 he became secretary to the Zoological Society; and in 1831 editor of the Monthly Magazine. He subsequently became connected with the True Sun, the Constitutional, the Courier, the Court Journal, and the Examiner; and was a constant contributor to the lighter periodicals of the day. Never was there a writer with a reader pen; but though radiant with wit, it was never dipped in gall; and though his political opinions were strongly marked and maintained through good and evil report, his entire freedom from party bigotry and prejudice gained him the respect even of his most decided opponents. But a series of domestic calamities crushed his buoyant spirit to the earth, and in a fit of temporary insanity he committed suicide, Feb. 15. 1845. A collected edition of his writings, with a memoir of the author by Sir Bulwer Lytton, was published in 1846.

BLANCHIARD, WILLIAM, a comedian of sterling talent at Covent Garden Theatre, whose faithful representation of many of Shakspeare's most difficult characters obtained for him the suffrages of such as were real judges of the histrionic art; but, though a general favourite, he won not the "million" by monstrosities, nor the just reward of his talents from theatrical managers. Died, 1835, in the 66th year of his age, having retired from the stage a short time before.

BLANCHE, of Castile, queen of Louis VIII. of France. She died of grief, on account of the defeat and imprisonment of her son, Louis IX., in Palestine, in 1252.

BLANCHELANDE, P. F., born in 1735; governor of St. Domingo when the decree of instant emancipation for the slaves caused a universal tumult. He urged the suspension of the decree, and, being arrested as a counter-revolutionist, was conducted to Paris, and perished by the guillotine in 1793.

BLAND, ELIZABETH, an English lady, eminent for her knowledge of Hebrew. A phylactery of her writings is preserved by the Royal Society. Died, 1720.

BLANDRATA, GEORGE, an Italian physician; privy counsellor to Stephen Barotti, king of Poland. He was strangled by his nephew, whom he had made his heir, 1593.

BLANE, SIR GILBERT, bart., M. D., of Ayr, was born in 1749, and, after practising in his profession with much success, became physician in ordinary to George III., and was, in 1812, created a baronet. He died in June, 1834.

BLANKEN, JOHN, an eminent Dutch engineer, born in 1755; distinguished for his double-power steam-engines; and for his docks, dikes, drains, and batteries, on almost all the coasts of Holland.

BLANKOFF, JOHN TEUNIZ, a Dutch marine painter, of the 17th century; particularly skilful in storm pieces.

BLANTYRE, LORD, was born in Edinburgh in 1775, and entered the army in his 19th year. He served in the Peninsular war, at the conclusion of which he received public thanks for his services, and afterwards became lord-lieutenant of Renfrewshire. He was residing with his family at Brussels, during the struggle of the Belgians for a separate government; when looking out from a window, to see the Dutch troops who were advancing into the park, he was struck in the neck by a musket ball, and the effusion of blood was so great that he died a few moments after, Sept. 1830.

BLAYNEY, DR. BENJAMIN, an English divine and biblical critic; author of a "Dissertation on the Seventy Weeks of Daniel," &c. Died, 1801.

BLEDRI, bishop of Llandaff in 1023; surnamed the wise on account of his great learning.

BLEISWICK, PETER VAN, born in 1724; grand pensionary of the Dutch states-general at the revolution, by which he was divested of his office. He was the author of a valuable work, "De Aggeribus."

BLESSINGTON, MARGARET POWER, Countess of, celebrated for her beauty, accomplishments, and literary productions, was born in the county of Waterford in 1789. At the early age of 15 she contracted an ill-fated marriage with Captain Farmer, and soon after his death the Earl of Blessington sought and obtained her hand in 1818. After her marriage she passed several years abroad, but they are chiefly remarkable for having led to her acquaintance with Lord Byron, which soon ripened into intimacy, and enabled her subsequently to publish one of the most interesting works, her "Conversations with Lord Byron." Soon after her husband's death in 1829, she fixed her residence in London, where she soon gained a distinguished place in literary and so-called fashionable society. Her house became the centre-point of every variety of talent; and there were few literary celebrities, native or foreign, who did not share in the "feast of reason and the flow of soul," for which Gore House will be long remembered. Lady Blessington's contributions to literature were at once numerous and diversified. Besides the "Conversations" above mentioned, she published many novels, of which "Grace Cassady, or the Repealers," "The Two Friends," "Meredith," "Strathorne," "The Lottery of Life," "The Victims of Society," &c. are the chief; and several works full of personal anecdote, epigram, sentiment, and description, such as "The Idler in Italy," "The Idler in France," "Memoirs of a Femme de Chambre," "The Belle of the Season," &c. For many years she edited the far-famed annuals, "The Book of Beauty" and the "Keepsake." Died at Paris, where she had a short time previously permanently fixed her residence, Aug. 1849.

BLIGH, GEORGE MILLER, was the son of Admiral Sir R. R. Bligh. He entered the navy, in 1794, on board the Alexander, commanded by his father, in which ship he was taken by the French in the same year; but from whom he contrived to escape six months afterwards. He was made a lieutenant in 1801, and fought under Nelson in the battle of Trafalgar, in which he was severely wounded. He was made a commander in 1806; and, having taken a French privateer, he was posted, and appointed to the Glutton two years afterwards. He died in 1835.

BLIZZARD, SIR WILLIAM, a surgeon and anatomist of considerable eminence, was born in 1742. During a long life of professional activity and experience he maintained a high reputation; and was for many years professor of anatomy to the Royal College of Surgeons, and a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He was also the author of several valuable works, viz. "Suggestions for the Improvements of Hospitals," "Reflections on Police," "Lecture on the Large Bloodvessels," &c. Died, at the great age of 92, in Sept. 1835.

BLOCH, MARCUS ELIEZER, an ingenious naturalist and physician, and a Jew by birth, was born at Anspach, of mean parentage; but entering into the service of a physician, he studied medicine, anatomy, and natural history with great success, and became particularly eminent in the last-named science. His "Ichthyology," produced at Berlin in 1785, at the expense of the wealthiest princes of Germany, is a magnificent national work. His treatise "On Intestinal Worms" is also in high estimation. Born, 1723; died, 1790.

BLOCK, JOANNA KOERTEN, a Dutch female, whose singular talents in cutting landscapes, flowers, portraits, &c. out of paper, entitle her to rank as an artist of no mean skill, so true were her works to nature. Born, 1650; died, 1715.

BLOEMART, ABRAHAM, a Dutch painter of considerable merit, whose brilliant colouring and inventive powers atone for various minor faults. Born, 1565; died, 1647.

BLOEMART, CORNELIUS, a son of the preceding, who, as an engraver, became eminent, and may be regarded as the founder of a new school, remarkable for the purity and softness of the burin. Born, 1603; died, 1680.

BLOMEFIELD, FRANCIS, an English topographer and divine; author of "Collectanea Cantabrigiensia," &c. Died, 1755.

BLOMFIELD, EDWARD VALENTINE, a distinguished classical scholar, was the brother of Dr. Blomfield, bishop of London, and born in 1788. He received his education at Caius College, Cambridge, where, besides other prizes, he gained, in 1809, a medal for writing his beautiful ode, "In Desiderium Porsoni." In 1812 a fellowship in Emanuel College was conferred on him. In the following year he visited Germany, and acquired an intimate knowledge of the German language. On his return to England he published in the "Museum Criticum, or Cambridge Classical Researches," remarks on German literature. He translated "Matthias's Greek Grammar," and began "Schneider's Greek and German Lexicon." Died, 1816.

BLOND, JAMES CHRISTOPHER LE, a miniature painter, and author of a treatise on a method of engraving in colours. Born, 1670; died, 1741.

BLONDEL, a minstrel and favourite of Richard Cœur de Lion; whom he is said to have discovered in his Norman dungeon, by singing beneath its walls the first part of a song of their joint composition.

BLONDEL, DAVID, a French Protestant divine, and the successor of Vossius as professor of history at Amsterdam; author of "Explications on the Eucharist," &c. Born, 1591; died, 1635.

BLONDEL, FRANCIS, a French architect and diplomatist; author of "The Art of Throwing Bombs," various treatises on architecture, &c. Born, 1617; died, 1690.

BLONDEL, JOHN FRANCIS, of the same family as the above, and also an architect. He was professor of architecture in the academy of Paris; and the author of a "Course of Civil Architecture," and other works belonging to the art. Born, 1705; died, 1774.

BLONDUS, FLAVIUS, otherwise called Flavio Blondi, an Italian writer of the 15th century; author of "Roma Illustrata," &c.

BLOOD, THOMAS, Colonel, a bold and desperate Irishman, originally an officer in Cromwell's army, and notorious in English history for his daring attempt on the life of the Duke of Ormond, and for his theft of the crown and regalia from the Tower. For some reason, never yet explained, this desperado was not only pardoned by Charles II., but received from him a pension of 500*l.* per annum. Died, 1680.

BLOOMFIELD, ROBERT, an English poet, was the son of a poor tailor at Honington, Suffolk, and himself a shoemaker. His principal work is a poem, entitled "The Farmer's Boy," which pleasingly describes the scenes the author witnessed while in that humble station, and displays very considerable genius; but his subsequent publications, though possessing the merit of simplicity, were not equal to the first. Although brought forward and patronised by the exertions of Capel Lofft and the Duke of Grafton, the modest bard had a large share of the ills which flesh is heir to, and his latter years were clouded by penury and dejection. Born, 1706; died, 1823.

BLOUNT, CHARLES, earl of Devonshire. He succeeded to his family title of Lord Mountjoy in 1504, and was much favoured and employed by queen Elizabeth. In the year 1603 he returned from Ireland, where he had been employed in suppressing the rebellion, and brought with him the head of the celebrated rebel Tyrone. James I. made him master of the ordnance and earl of Devonshire; but having married the divorced Lady Rich, daughter of the Earl of Essex, he fell into disgrace. Born, 1563; died, 1606.

BLOUNT, THOMAS, an English writer; author of "Bocobel; or the History of the King's Escape after the Battle of Worcester," "Fragmenta Antiquitatis," &c. Born, 1619; died, 1679.

BLOUNT, Sir HENRY, a traveller through Turkey, Syria, and Egypt; author of a "Voyage to the Levant." He was knighted by Charles II., but sided with the parliament, and was rewarded with a commissionership of trade. Born, 1602; died, 1682.

BLOUNT, Sir THOMAS POPE, bart., eldest son of the above; member of several parliaments, and appointed commissioner of accounts at the revolution; author of "Censura celeberrimum Auctorum," &c. Born, 1649; died, 1697.

BLOUNT, CHARLES, youngest brother of the last named; author of some deistical writings. He died, by his own hands, 1693.

BLOW, JOHN (Mus. Doc.), an English musician and composer of great ability; author of anthems, services, &c., and of some secular compositions, which are published collectively under the title of "Amphion Anglicus." Died, 1708.

BLUCHER, Field-marshal LEBRECHT VON, a distinguished Prussian general, whose impetuous intrepidity and eagerness to attack the enemy gained him the familiar appellation of "Marshal Forward." He entered the Swedish service when quite a youth, and in the first campaign was made prisoner by the Prussians, whom he afterwards joined, and rose to the rank of captain; but being discontented with the promotion of other officers over his head, he obtained his discharge from the Great Frederic, who dismissed him with the pithy remark, that "he might go to the devil if he pleased;" and he afterwards lived many years in retirement. Being recalled by his successor, king William, he was made major-general after the battle of Leystadt, in 1794; and commanded the cavalry at the battle of Jena, which decided for a time the fate of the Prussian monarchy. When Prussia entered into the coalition against Napoleon, in 1813, our hero, then 70 years old, was made general of the centre of the allied army; distinguished himself at Lutten and Leipsic, pursued the flying French across the Rhine, and, after a year of obstinate conflict in France, headed the right wing of the allied army under the walls of Paris, at the time of Napoleon's abdication in 1814. In England, which he visited with the allied sovereigns, he was received with enthusiasm, and was eminently popular. Being re-invested with the command of the Prussian army during the Hundred Days, he was defeated by Napoleon at Ligny, on June 16. 1815; on which occasion he was unhorsed, and charged over by both the French and Prussian cavalry. Marshal Grouchy was commissioned by Napoleon to push Blucher's retreat, and check his junction with the British army, which Wellington required. But having deceived Grouchy, by leaving a body of his troops to mask the operation, he retrograded unmolested, by a skilful and dangerous flank movement; and his advanced division, under Bulow, arrived at Waterloo at 5 o'clock, just as the whole reserved élite of the French army was advancing in dense column to make their last desperate effort to break through the British squares. This fresh flank attack on the advancing column contributed greatly to decide the victory, and Blucher arrived in time to participate in the pursuit. Blucher's conduct afterwards was generally pronounced by the liberals at Paris, especially as regarded the bridge of Jena and the spoliation of the Museum, vindictive and illiberal; but it could not be expected that he should have had any regard for the glories of the French capital. He was a rough and fearless soldier; brave, honest, and free; beloved by his comrades, and a sworn foe to the enemies of his country. Born at Rostock, 1742; died, at his estate in Silesia, 1819, aged 77.

BLUM, JOACHIM CHRISTIAN, a German; author of "Lyrical Poems," "The Promenades," "Dictionary of Proverbs," "The Deliverance of Rathenau," &c. Born, 1739; died, 1790.

BLUM, ROBERT, whose commanding eloquence during his brief political career gained for him the name of the "German O'Connell," was born at Cologne in 1807. Cradled in poverty, and compelled almost from infancy to assist in eking out his parents' scanty livelihood, his education was completely neglected; but from his earliest years he manifested a thirst for learning, and what he wanted in opportunity was amply made up in the avidity with which he gleaned such knowledge as came within his reach. At the age of 14 he was apprenticed to a goldsmith; he afterwards worked as a journeyman in different parts of Germany, especially at Berlin; but on his return to Cologne in 1830, he was obliged to accept the humble office of box-opener in the theatre of that city. Amid all the difficulties with which he had to struggle, he had never ceased to cultivate his mind; and when, in 1832, he removed to Leipzig as cashier of the theatre in that city, such were his attainments, that he undertook with success the management of various literary and political journals, which, besides adding to his scanty income, gained him great ascendancy in the growing agitation of the day, and marked him out as a political leader in any crisis that might ensue. In 1844 he took an active part in stemming the torrent of superstition with which the so-called miracle of the Holy Coat at Treves threatened to overwhelm Germany; and, in 1845, when the Romanist tendencies of Prince John of Saxony had well nigh exasperated the people to rebellion, Blum hastened to the spot, and, by his eloquence, good sense, and persuasive powers, induced his excited fellow-citizens to refrain from violence, and keep strictly within the law. In 1847 he resigned his cashiership at the theatre, and became a bookseller. The events of March, 1848, first brought him before the world as a politician. Elected by the town of Zwickau as its representative in the "vorparlament" at Frankfort, he became a member of the committee of fifty, and at the opening of the national assembly he took his seat as representative of Leipzig. There he became the leader of "the left" party; but the good sense for which he had hitherto been remarkable failed him at this crisis of his career, and he was led to expend the vast powers of his eloquence on schemes which both then and since have been found to be impracticable. On the breaking out of the second revolution at Vienna, in October, 1848, he repaired thither with some other members of his party, to offer a congratulatory address to the Viennese. Here he harangued the people with great power and effect; but after the suppression of the rebellion, he was arrested, tried by court-martial, and condemned to be shot, Nov. 9, 1848. The news of his arrest and execution caused great consternation throughout Germany. It was at first supposed that the national assembly would resent his death as an insult offered to itself, but, after a few feeble protests, it remained quiescent; and the Austrian government enjoyed full immunity in this its first open manifestation of hostility to the Frankfort parliament, so soon afterwards doomed to fall.

BLUMAUER, LEWIS, a German satirical poet; author of a "Travesty of the Æneid," &c. Born, 1755; died, 1798.

BLUMENBACH, JOHANN FRIEDERICH, one of the greatest naturalists of modern times, was born at Gotha in 1752. He early displayed a great aptitude for scientific pursuits, and before he had completed his 24th year, his fame as an inquirer into nature had spread throughout the civilised world. In 1776, he was appointed professor of medicine in the university of Gottingen, where he had been educated; and here, for the long period of 61 years, he continued, by his lectures and his works, to extend the science of comparative anatomy, which has been so successfully cultivated in more recent times, and of which he may be truly said to have been the founder. Died, 1837.

BLUTEAU, DOM RAMIAEL, a Roman Catholic priest, born in Linden, of French parents; author of a valuable Portuguese and Latin Dictionary. Died, 1734.

BOABDIL, or ABOUABOULA, the last Moorish king of Granada: he was expelled for the last time from Granada by Ferdinand of Castile and Arragon, in 1491; and afterwards resided in Africa, where he was killed in battle in the service of the king of Fez.

BOADEN, JAMES, a dramatic author and critic. His plays are numerous, but we believe there is not one of them that now keeps possession of the stage. Far more important are his dramatic memoirs. In them he has left, probably, the very best record that the world can now ever hope to have of John Kemble, Mrs. Siddons, Mrs. Jordan, and Mrs. Inchbald. His "Inquiry into the Authenticity of the various Pictures and Prints of Shakspeare," and a tract on "the Sonnets of Shakspeare," are also very valuable works. Born, 1762; died, 1839.

BOADICEA, or BONDUCA, a British heroine, the widow of Prasatagus, and queen of the Iceni. Having been ignominiously treated by the Romans, she headed an insurrection against them, attacked their settlements, and reduced London to ashes; but being at length utterly defeated by Suetonius Paulinus, she put an end to her life by poison, A.D. 61.

BOCCACCIO, GIOVANNI, a celebrated Italian writer, possessing the most lively imagination, united with tenderness of expression and warmth of feeling. He was the friend of Petrarch, and author of "The Decameron," &c. Boccaccio was the son of a Florentine merchant, but born in Paris, 1313; died, 1375.

BOCCAGE, MARIA ANNE LE PAGE, a French poetess; author of "Paradis Terrestre," &c. Born, 1710; died, 1802.

BOCCALINI, TRAJAN, an Italian satirist; author of the "Political Touchstone," a "Satire on the Spaniards," &c. His writings gave so much offence to the Spanish court, that it caused him to be murdered at Venice, 1613.

BOCCHERINI, LUIGI, a celebrated composer of instrumental music, pensioned for his merit by the king of Prussia, and warmly patronised by the king of Spain. Born, 1740; died, 1805.

BOCCHI, ACHILLES, a Bolognese, of a noble family, who distinguished himself in the 16th century by his attachment to literature; author of "Apologia in Plautum," and numerous other works.

BOCCOLD, JOHN, or JOHN OF LEYDEN, a fanatic of that city in the 16th century, who headed some revolvers, and made themselves masters of Munster, where he assumed the characters of king and prophet. The city was at length taken by the bishop, and Boccold was hanged.

BOCCONE, PAUL, an Italian naturalist; author of "Musea di Plante rare." Born, 1633; died, 1704.

BOCHART, SAMUEL, a French Protestant divine; author of "Geographia Sacra," a treatise on the "Terrestrial Paradise," &c. Born, 1599; died, 1607.

BOCH, or BOCHIUS, JOHN, a Flemish writer of the 16th century; author of various Latin works, and styled, from his skill in Latin poetry, the Belgic Virgil. Born, 1555; died, 1609.

BOCCUCI, JOSEPH, a Spanish author, born in 1775. He served at first in the army, in the campaigns of 1793 and 1794, against republican France, but afterwards devoted himself to letters. He is the author of several comedies played at the Madrid theatre.

BOCQUILLOT, LAZARUS ANDREW, a French divine; author of a "Treatise on the Liturgy," "Life of the Chevalier Bayard," &c. Died, 1728.

BODARD DE TEZAZ, N.M.F., born in 1753; a French poet and diplomatist; ambassador to Naples for the republic in 1799; author of "Le Ballon," a comedy; "Alonsko," a melodrame; "Minette et Marine," an opera, &c.

BODE, CHRISTOPHER AUGUSTUS, a learned German linguist and critic; who edited the New Testament in Ethiopic, all the Evangelists in Persian, St. Matthew in Arabic, &c. Born, 1723; died, 1796.

BODE, JOHN EHLERT, a celebrated German astronomer; author of an "Atlas of Celestial Maps," &c. Born, 1747; died, 1826.

BODE, JOHN JOACHIM CHRISTOPHER, a German writer. He was originally a musician in a Hanoverian regiment; he then became a bookseller, and finally rose to be privy councillor to the Landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt. He translated some of the best French and English authors into German with considerable taste and judgment. Died, 1793.

BODIN, JOHN, a French lawyer; author of a treatise "De Republica," &c. Born, 1530; died, 1596.

BODIN, P. J. F., a French surgeon, born in 1760; was a member of the Convention, voted against the death of Louis XVI., and was afterwards judge of Poitiers; he was author of a work on "Accouchemens," &c.

BODLEY, Sir THOMAS, a native of Exeter, but educated partly at Geneva and partly at Oxford. He was on several occasions employed on embassies by queen Elizabeth; but he is chiefly remarkable for having rebuilt the University Library of Oxford, and bequeathed his fortune to its support and augmentation; whence it is called the Bodleian Library. Born, 1544; died, 1612.

BODMANN, T. J., a German, born in 1754; professor of political and legislative science at Mayence; author of many esteemed works in this department, and co-editor of the "Magazin pour la Jurisprudence."

BODMER, JOHN JACOB, a German poet; translator of Milton's Paradise Lost, and of the Iliad and Odyssey, &c.; and author of an epic, entitled "Noah," &c. Born, 1695; died, 1783.

BODONI, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent Italian printer, born in 1740, died in 1813; considered as one of the most skilful of modern typographers.

BODSON, JOSEPH, a French engraver, born in 1768. He took an active part in the revolution; was a most influential member of the Electoral Club of the Parisian Commune, in 1794; and was denounced for taking off his hat before the royal family in the Temple, while in charge of them. He was repeatedly arrested, imprisoned, and narrowly escaped the guillotine, in consequence of charges by his democratical colleagues.

BOECE, or BOETHIUS, HECTOR, a Scotch writer of the 16th century, remarkable alike for his great learning and too easy credulity; author of the "History of Scotland," &c. Born, 1465; died, 1536.

BOEHM, or BEHMEN, JACOB, a German visionary, whose works on religious subjects had many admirers, and caused much disputation. Born, 1575; died, 1624.

BOEHM, WILLIAM ANTHONY, a learned German divine, and chaplain to prince George of Denmark. Born, 1673; died, 1732.

BOEHMER, G. G., a professor at Gottingen, born in 1761. Always a liberal, and attached to the French party, he edited an independent journal in 1791. He congratulated the French republic on its union with Belgium in 1796, and was complimented with a seat in the convention. He was subsequently persecuted by the anti-French party, and imprisoned at Ehrenbreitstein and Erfurt. He was author of a "Memoir to demonstrate the Rhine as the Natural Boundary of France," &c., and many political German works.

BOERHAAVE, HERMAN, one of the most eminent physicians of modern times, born at Woorout, near Leyden. His knowledge as an anatomist, chemist, and botanist, as well as in the causes, nature, and treatment of diseases, was unrivalled; and his fame was spread over the world. Peter the Great visited him on his travels; and a Chinese mandarin wrote to him with this address, "To Boerhaave, the celebrated physician of Europe." His writings are numerous, and are regarded as text-books to the profession. Born, 1668; died, 1738.

BOETHIUS, ANICIUS MANLIUS TORQUATUS SEVERINUS, a Roman philosopher, whose virtues, services, honours, and tragical end, all combine to render his name memorable, was born, A.D. 470; studied at Rome and Athens; was profoundly learned; and filled the highest offices under the government of Theodoric the Goth. He was long the oracle of his sovereign and the idol of the people; but his strict integrity and inflexible justice raised up enemies in those who loved extortion and oppression, and he at last fell a victim to their machinations. He was accused of a treasonable correspondence with the court of Constantinople, and executed in 524. His "Consolations of Philosophy," written in prison, are replete with the loftiest sentiments, clothed in the most fascinating language.

BOETTCHER, JOHN FREDERIC, an alchemist, who, in making vain alchemical attempts, was fortunate enough to discover the mode of making the famed and valued Dresden porcelain.

BOFFNAUD, GERMAIN, a French architect; author of a "Treatise on the Principles of Architecture." Born, 1667; died, 1755.

BOGAN, ZACHARY, an English divine; author of "A Help to Prayer," additions to Rous's "Archæologia Attice," &c. Born, 1625; died, 1659.

BOGDANOVITSCH, HIPPOLYTUS THEODOROVITSCH, a Russian of distinguished literary talents; the editor of the St. Petersburg Courier, and author of "Douschenka," a romantic poem; "Historical Picture of Russia," &c. He filled various official situations under the government of Catharine, and was also employed as a diplomatist. Born, 1743; died, 1803.

BOGORIS, the first Christian king of Bulgaria; converted by his sister, who had been taken prisoner by the troops of Theodora, and was restored to him by that empress.

BOGUE, DAVID, a dissenting minister of very considerable acquirements; pastor of a congregation at Gosport, Hants, where he also kept an establishment for the education of young men destined for the Christian ministry, in connection with the Independents. He is considered as the father of the London Missionary Society, and he also contributed greatly to the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He wrote an "Essay on the Divine Authority of the New Testament," a "History of the Dissenters," &c. Born, 1749; died, 1825.

BOHEMOND, the first prince of Antioch. He took Antioch in 1098, and subsequently took Laodicea. Died, 1111.

BOHN, JOHN, a German physician; author of a "Treatise on the Duties of a Physician," &c. Born, 1640; died, 1719.

BOHUN, EMUND, a political writer of note in the reigns of James II. and William II.; author of a "Defence of King Charles II.'s Declaration," a "Geographical Dictionary," "Life of Bishop Jewell," &c. He was living at the accession of queen Anne; but the exact date of his death is uncertain.

BOIARDO, MATTEO MARIA, count of Scandiano and governor of Reggio; author of "Orlando Innamorato," of which Ariosto's Orlando Furioso is a sequel; and other poems. Born, 1434; died, 1494.

BOICHOT, JEAN, a distinguished French sculptor; born in 1788, died in 1814. The "Colossal Group of Saint Michael" and the "Sitting Hercules" are among his best works. The bas-reliefs of the rivers on the Triumphal Arch of the Carousal are his.

BOIELDIEU, ADRIEN, a celebrated French musical composer, born in 1775; author of numerous well-known operas; "Le Calife de Bagdad," "Jean de Paris," &c. "Télémaque" is thought his chef-d'œuvre. His style is characterised by a sweet and natural melody, much imaginative gaiety, and simple but pleasing accompaniments.

BOIGNE, COUNT, a French soldier of fortune, was born at Chamberry, in 1751. When 17 years old, he entered the French army, which he quitted for the Russian service in about 5 years, and was taken prisoner at the siege of Tenedos. After being released he left Russia, and in 1778 went into the service of the East India Company; but fancying himself neglected, he offered himself to the notice of Mahajee Scindiah, the celebrated prince of the Mahrattas, to whom he was of the greatest use during his campaigns, and who loaded him with honours and riches. Having remitted his vast fortune to England, and wishing to return to Europe for the sake of his health, he left India in 1795, and settled at Chambery, where he did much good with his money in applying it to benevolent and patriotic purposes. Died in 1830.

BOILLEAU, GILES, a French writer; author of a translation of Epictetus, &c. Born, 1631; died, 1669.

BOILLEAU, JAMES, brother of the above, doctor of the Sorbonne; author of some learned works on ecclesiastical history. Born, 1635; died, 1716.

BOILLEAU, JOHN JAMES, a French divine; author of "Letters on Morality and Devotion," &c. Died, 1735.

BOILLEAU, NICHOLAS, sieur des Preaux, a celebrated French poet, satirist, and critic; enjoying a reputation in France very similar to that of Pope in England. Born, 1636; died, 1711.

BOILLY, N., an agreeable and productive French painter, born in 1768. His most celebrated pieces are "The Arrival of the Diligence," "The Departure of the Conscripts," and "Interior of M. Isabeau's Atelier."

BOINVILLE, DE, was born of a noble family, at Strasburg, in 1770. He quitted a lucrative office, and joined the French republican party in 1791. He then came to England with La Fayette, as aide-de-camp. He married an English lady of great talent and beauty, accepted a command under Napoleon, and perished in the retreat from Moscow.

BOIS, JOHN DU, a French monk, who served in the army of Henry III. On the death of Henry IV. he accused the Jesuits of having caused the assassination of that prince. For this accusation he was confined in the castle of St. Angelo, at Rome, where he died, 1626.

BOISROBERT, FRANCIS LE METEL DE, a French abbot, celebrated for his wit, and patronised by Richelieu. His poems, plays, tales, &c. are numerous. Died, 1662.

BOISSARD, JOHN JAMES, a French antiquary; author of "Theatrum Vitæ Humanæ," &c. Died, 1602.

BOISSAT, PETER DE, an eccentric Frenchman; at first a priest, then a soldier, and at last a pilgrim; author of "L'Histoire Négroptique, ou les Amours d'Alexandre Castriot." Died, 1662.

BOISSY D'ANGLAS, FRANCIS ANTHONY, Count de, a distinguished French senator and literary character, and a man who throughout the revolutionary frenzy constantly displayed great firmness and a disinterested love of liberty. By Napoleon he was made a senator and commander of the Legion of Honour; and in 1814 Louis XVIII. created him a peer; but he was, for a time only, deprived of his title, in consequence of his recognition of the emperor on his return from Elba. His writings are on various subjects: among them are "The Literary and Political Studies of an Old Man," an "Essay on the Life of Malcherbes," &c. Born, 1756; died, 1826.

BOISTE, P. C. V., a French lexicographer, born in 1763; author of several valuable dictionaries. The name Buonaparte following the article "Spoliateur," in his "Dictionnaire Universel," he was compelled by the police to substitute Frederic the Great for the former.

BOIZOT, LOUIS SIMON, born in 1743; a French painter and sculptor, but more distinguished as the latter. The "Victory of the Fountain of the Place du Chatelet" is his chef d'œuvre.

BOL, FERDINAND, a Dutch historical and portrait painter, pupil of Rembrandt. Born, 1611; died, 1681.

BOLANGER, JOHN, an historical painter, pupil of Guido. Died, 1660.

BOLD, SAMUEL, an English divine and controversial writer; author of a "Plea for Moderation towards Dissenters," &c. Died, 1737.

BOLDONIC, C., an Italian writer, born in 1768; author of "La Costituzione Francese" (published in 1792), which contributed to diffuse the renovated seeds of freedom over Italy at that epoch.

BOLESLAUS I., became duke of Poland in 988; had his dukedom raised to a kingdom by the emperor Otho III., and made Moravia tributary to his kingdom. Died, 1028.

BOLESLAUS II., king of Poland, son and successor of Casimir I. The severity with which he treated his subjects on occasion of a revolt, chiefly caused by his long absence in Russia, and the consequent infidelity of the wives of his soldiers, he was abandoned by his subjects, and died in Hungary about 1080.

BOLEYN, ANNE, the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, and one of the maids of honour to queen Catharine, whom Henry VIII. divorced. She then became the wife of Henry, and mother of queen Elizabeth; but was put to death by her husband for alleged infidelity to his bed. Born, 1507; beheaded, 1536.

BOLINGBROKE, HENRY ST. JOHN, Viscount, a distinguished statesman and political writer, was born at Battersea, in 1672, and completed his studies at Oxford. He entered parliament in 1700, became secretary at war in 1704; resigned his office in 1707; again formed part of the ministry in 1710, and concluded the peace of Utrecht. Two years after this he was created Viscount Bolingbroke; but, being dissatisfied that he had not been raised to an earldom, he quarrelled with his colleagues, became a prey to the impetuosity of his passions, and exhibited a versatility of conduct that has rendered his patriotism and political honesty open to suspicion. The Whigs having gained the ascendancy on the accession of George I., preparations were made for the impeachment of Bolingbroke, who accordingly fled to France, and being invited to Lorraine by Charles Stuart, the Pretender, he became his secretary of state. For this he was impeached and attainted; and it was not till 1723 that he was allowed to return to England. His estates were restored to him in 1725, but his seat in the House of Lords was still denied him: this raised his indignation; and he exerted all his talents against the ministry, till at length the overthrow of Sir Robert Walpole was effected. In 1735 he again withdrew to France, where he remained till the death of his father; after which event he settled at Battersea, and died in 1751, after a long and painful disease, in his 80th year. He was the intimate friend of Pope, and furnished him with many useful hints; while his own writings rank among the most eloquent and vigorous in the English language; but it is to be deplored that he made them the vehicle of many revolting attacks on Christianity. He was ambitious, proud, and passionate; yet capable of inspiring the warmest friendship, or becoming a most implacable enemy.

BOLIVAR, SIMON, the celebrated Liberator of South America, and the most distinguished military commander that has yet appeared there, was born of noble parents in the city of Caracas, in 1783. Having acquired the elements of a liberal education at home, he was sent to Madrid to complete his studies; and afterwards visited Paris, where he formed an acquaintance with several distinguished men. He then made the tour of Southern Europe, again visited the Spanish capital, and married the young and beautiful daughter of the Marquis de Ustariz del Cro; but soon after his return to his native land, whither she accompanied him, his youthful bride fell a victim to the yellow fever; and he once more visited Europe as a relief to his sorrow for one so fervently beloved. On returning to South America, in 1810, he pledged himself to the cause of independence, and commenced his military career at Venezuela, as a colonel in the service of the newly founded republic. Soon after this he was associated with Don Louis Lopez Mendez, for the purpose of communicating intelligence of the change of government to Great Britain. In 1811 he served under Miranda, and had the command of Puerto Cabello; but the Spanish prisoners having risen and seized the fort, he was obliged to quit the town and proceed to Caracas. At length Miranda was compelled to submit to Monteverde, the royalist general; and Bolivar, entering the service of the patriots of New Grenada, soon had another opportunity of assisting his old friends the Venezuelans. For a while he was successful, but reverses followed; and when, in 1815, the Spanish forces under Morillo arrived, he threw himself into Carthagena, and subsequently retreated to St. Domingo. The spirit of resistance was, however, by no means extinguished; he found new means to lead his countrymen to victory; and after many desperate conflicts the independence of Columbia was sealed, and Bolivar was chosen president of the republic, in 1821. His renown was now at its height, and every act of his government showed how zealously alive he was to the improvement of the national institutions and the moral elevation of the people over whom he ruled. In 1823 he went to the assistance of the Peruvians, and having succeeded in settling their internal divisions, and establishing their independence, he was proclaimed Liberator of Peru, and invested with supreme authority. In 1825 he visited Upper Peru, which detached itself from the government of Buenos Ayres, and was formed into a new republic, named Bolivia, in honour of the liberator; but domestic factions sprung up, the purity of his motives was called in question, and he was charged with aiming at a perpetual dictatorship; he accordingly declared his determination to resign his power as soon as his numerous enemies were overcome, and to repel the imputations of ambition cast upon him, by retiring to seclusion upon his patrimonial estate. The vice-president, Santander, urged him, in reply, to resume his station as constitutional president; and though he was beset by the jealousy and distrust of rival factions, he continued to exercise the chief authority in Columbia till May, 1830, when, dissatisfied with the aspect of internal affairs, he resigned the presidency, and expressed a determination to leave the country. The people ere long became sensible of their injustice to his merit, and were soliciting him to resume the government, when his death, which happened in December, 1830, prevented the accomplishment of their wishes. In person he was thin, and somewhat below the middle size, but capable of great endurance; his complexion sallow, and his eyes dark and penetrating. His intellect was of the highest order, and his general character of that ardent, lofty cast, which is so well calculated to take the lead among a people emerging from the yoke of tyranny.

BOLLAND, Sir WILLIAM, one of the barons of the Exchequer, was born in 1773, and received his education at Reading school, under Dr. Valpy, and at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was called to the bar in 1801; admitted one of the four common pleaders of the city of London in 1804; and in 1817 he was elected recorder of Reading, which office he held until appointed a baron of the Exchequer in 1829. He was a member and one of the originators of the Roxburgh Club, and is often mentioned by Dr. Dibdin among the most ardent admirers of the literature of the olden times. Benevolence, suavity of manner, and honourable principle, distinguished his career both in public and private life. Died, May 1840.

BOLLANDUS, JOHN, a learned Flemish Jesuit; one of the compilers of the "Acta Sanctorum." Died, 1665.

BOLOGNESE, FRANCISCO, the assumed name of Francis Grimaldi, an excellent landscape painter, pupil of Annibal Caracci. Died, 1680.

BOLSEC, JEROME, a Carmelite friar of Paris. He became for a time a Protestant, but again returned to the Romish faith, and marked his zeal against Protestantism by bitter untruths in his lives of Calvin and Theodore Beza. Died, 1582.

BOLSWERT, SCHELDT, an engraver of the 17th century, a native of Friesland, but who passed most of his life in Antwerp; distinguished for the excellence of his engravings from Rubens and Vandyck.

BOLTON EDMUND, an English antiquary of the 17th century; author of "Elements of Armories," "Nero Caesar, or Monarchie depraved," &c.

BOLTON, ROBERT, a puritan divine; author of a "Treatise on Happiness," &c. Born, 1571; died, 1631.

BOLTON, ROBERT, dean of Carlisle; author of an "Essay on the Employment of Time," &c. Died, 1763.

BOLTS, WILLIAM, an English merchant, of Dutch extraction, born in 1740. He was invested with high employ in the East India Company's service, and realised a large fortune in India; but being accused of a design to subvert the Indian government, he was arrested, sent to England, imprisoned, and subjected to a seven years' process, which dissipated his large fortune. He died at last in a poorhouse. He left a work "On Bengal" and "Considerations on the Affairs of India."

BOLZANI, URBANO VALERIANO, a learned monk, teacher of Greek at Venice, and the first who wrote a grammar of that language in Latin. Died, 1624.

BOMBELLI, RAPHAEL, a celebrated algebraist of the 16th century, and the first who invented a uniform method of working equations.

BOMBELLI, SEBASTIAN, an eminent Bolognese historical and portrait painter. Born, 1635; died, 1685.

BOMBERG, DANIEL, a Dutch printer; whose Bible and Talmud are highly valued. Died, 1549.

BOMPART, J. B., a French vice-admiral, born in 1757; brought into notice by his fighting a British frigate of 44 guns, with his ship, the Ambuscade, 36 guns, off New York. His ship was taken, and himself made prisoner, during the expedition to Ireland in 1798. He always retained his steady republican feelings during Buonaparte's imperial ascendancy, and even during the Hundred Days. Died 1821.

BON, L. A., born in 1770; one of the most distinguished of the French revolutionary generals; first in America, next in Italy, and lastly in Egypt; where he took possession of Suez in 1798. He fell at the siege of Acre in 1799.

BONAMY, General, born in 1764; one of the conquerors of Naples in 1799. In charging the principal redoubt at Moscow, he received twenty bayonet wounds, and was left in the hands of the Russians. He returned to France in 1814.

BONAMY, PETER NICHOLAS, a French ecclesiastic; historiographer of Paris, librarian of St. Victor, and conductor of the journal of Verdun, a clever periodical work. He also contributed largely to the Memoirs of the Academy of Inscriptions. Born, 1694; died, 1770.

BONANNI PHILIP, a learned Jesuit of Rome; author of a "History of the Church of the Vatican," "Collection of the Medals of the Popes," &c. Died, 1725.

BONARELLI, GUY UBALDO, an Italian poet; author of "Filli di Sciro," &c. Born, 1553; died, 1608.

BONASONI, GIULIO, a Bolognese painter and engraver of the 16th century. In the latter capacity he especially excelled; and he engraved many of the chef-d'œuvres of Michael Angelo, Raffaele, &c. in a style of great beauty.

BONAVENTURE, JOHN FIDANZA, general of the order of Franciscans, whose reputation for probity and wisdom caused the cardinals to leave to him the nomination of a successor to Clement IV. He named Theobald, archdeacon of Liege, who became pope, with the title of Gregory X., and made Bonaventure a cardinal. He died 1274; and was canonised, 1482.

BONAVENTURE, of Padua, made cardinal by Urban VI. in 1378; a friend of Petrarch, and author of several religious pieces. Assassinated, 1386.

BONCERF, P. F., born in 1745; author of the famous pamphlet, "Les Inconvéniens des Droits Feodaux," while secretary to Turgot. Condemned to be burnt, it became the basis of the fundamental decrees of the constituent assembly of 1789. Having been in the service of Egalité, he narrowly escaped the guillotine by one vote, on the fall of his patron, and died from the shock he then sustained.

BONCHAMP, ARTHUR DE, a celebrated general of the Vendean royalists, and who had served with distinction as an officer in the American war. In him humanity was not less conspicuous than valour, as the last act of his life amply testified; for it was to his interference that 5000 prisoners, whom the exasperated royalists had taken, were saved from instant death. He was mortally wounded in the battle of Chollet, 1793.

BOND, JOHN, an English physician; author of critical notes on Horace, Persius, and other classics. Died, 1612.

BOND, OLIVER, born in 1720; a famous Irish associate with Napper Tandy and Theodore Wolfe Tone, in the Irish rebellion of 1797-8. He was arrested in 1798; terms were made with government to send him to America; but he was found dead in prison.

BONDI, CLEMENT, the poetical Delille of the Italians; author of the "Conversazione," which resembles Cowper's Task; "The Ænëid," translated in versi sciolti, &c. Died, 1816.

BONE, HENRY, an eminent artist, celebrated for his skill in enamel painting, was born at Truro, in 1755. On coming to London, he was for many years engaged in that branch of the art which consists in painting devices in enamel for jewellery; but he subsequently attained the highest excellence as a miniature portrait painter on ivory and in enamel. Continuing to rise in public estimation, Mr. Bone carried his art to the utmost perfection, increasing the size of his plates beyond anything which had before been attempted, and executing in enamel several copies of pictures by the first masters; one of which, Titian's "Bacchus and Ariadne," he painted on a plate 18 inches by 16, and sold it to the late G. Bowles, esq., of Wanstead, for 2200 guineas. Among his most munificent patrons was the Duke of Bedford, who possesses some of the most exquisite of his works, including a series of portraits of the Russell family from the reign of Henry VIII. to the present time. He closed a long life of persevering industry and integrity, in December, 1834.

BONEFACIO, VENETIANO, an Italian painter of eminence. Died, 1630.

BONER, ULRICH, the most ancient German fabulist, was a Dominican friar of Berne, in the 14th century. He published his fables under the title of "Der Edelstein" (The Gem).

BONIFACE, St., whose name was WILFRID, a saint of the Romish calendar, was a native of England, and made archbishop by Henry III. He travelled through many parts of Germany, of which country he was called the apostle; and after reclaiming many from paganism, he was slain by some peasants in Friesland, in 754.

BONIFACE, the name assumed by nine popes; but the lives of whom present nothing worthy of particular notice.

BONIFACE, count of the Roman empire in the 5th century, and an intimate friend of St. Augustin, at whose desire he devoted himself to public affairs. He was slain in a desperate contest with Aetius, in 432.

BONIFACIO, BALTHAZAR, a learned Venetian, bishop of Capo d'Istria; author of "Historia Ludicia," Latin poems, &c. Died, 1659.

BONJOUR, WILLIAM, a French monk, and missionary to China; author of "Disertations on the Scripture," &c. Died, 1714.

BONNAIRE, J. G., a French general, born in 1771; tried for firing on Col. Gordon; sent by the king to summon Conde, in 1815; and condemned to degradation and exile in 1816, of which sentence he died, broken-hearted.

BONNEFONS, JOHN, a French writer of Latin poems; which are printed with those of Beza, in Barbau's edition of 1757. Born, 1554; died, 1614.

BONNELL, JAMES, accomptant-general of Ireland in the reign of James II.; remarkable for his firmness and integrity in the discharge of his public duty in a troublesome and perilous time. Some "Meditations" of his, printed with his Life, written by Archdeacon Hamilton, show him to have been a man of considerable intellect. Born, 1653; died, 1699.

BONNER, EDMUND, an English prelate, notorious for his persecution of the Protestants during the reign of queen Mary. On the accession of queen Elizabeth, he refused to take the oath of supremacy, and was committed to the Marshalsea, where he remained nearly ten years, and where he died, 1569.

BONNET, CHARLES, a distinguished naturalist of Geneva; author of "Insectology," "Essay on Physiology," "Considerations on Organised Bodies," &c. Born, 1720; died, 1793.

BONNEVAL, CLAUDIUS ALEXANDER, Count of, a French adventurer, son-in-law of Marshal Biron. After serving under Prince Eugene against the Turks, resentment at having been imprisoned for challenging the prince caused him to go over to the Turks, and become a Mussulman. His services were highly valued by the grand seignior, who gave him the title of Achmet Pacha, and raised him from rank to rank, till he became master of the ordnance, in which office he died in 1747.

BONNEVIE, Abbé, born in 1764; a great preacher of funeral orations over the Buonaparte family and Buonapartists; and equally zealous in preaching funeral orations for the Bourbons, after their fall. "Is the abbé as virulent against the tyrant as ever?" asked Napoleon, in passing his curé, on returning from Elba. But the abbé had disappeared.

BONNEVILLE, N., a poet of the French revolution, born in 1760: he was the friend of Condorcet, La Fayette, and Paine; and was with Kosciusko when he fell. Though denounced by Marat, in the National Convention, as an aristocrat, he was so far from being an ultra in his views as to denounce Buonaparte (on his becoming emperor) as the Cromwell of France, when the latter suppressed his periodical, the "Bien Informé." Among his works are, "Théâtre Allemand," "Poesies Républicaines," "Nouveau Code Conjugal," "Esprit des Religions," &c.

BONNIER, A. E., a French republican, born in 1750. He was sent as plenipotentiary to a "conference" with Prince Metternich, in 1799, at Rastadt; but the negotiation was broken off by Austria, and Bonnier was murdered between that town and Strasburg, and his papers taken away. Bonnier's seat in the Council of Ancients was for two years after covered with crape, as a testimony of respect.

BONNINGTON, RICHARD PARKES, a British artist of great merit and of singular precocity. At 3 years old he could sketch most of the objects he saw, and at 15 was admitted to draw in the Louvre at Paris. After visiting Italy he brought back many able specimens of his works, and finished a successful, though brief, career at the age of 27, in 1828.

BONNYCASTLE, JOHN, professor of mathematics at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich; author of "The Scholar's Guide to Arithmetic," "The Elements of Geometry," "A Treatise upon Astronomy," &c. Died, 1821.

BONOMI, JOSEPH, an Italian architect of considerable taste and genius; from whose design the Roman Catholic chapel near Manchester Square was erected. Died, 1808.

BONTEMPI, GIOVANNI ANDREA ANGLINI, an Italian musician of the 17th century; author of "Nova quatuor Vocibus componendi Methodus," &c.

BOOKER, the Rev. LUKE, LL.D., a clergyman of the Church of England, distinguished for his literary acquirements, was born at Nottingham, in 1762; took holy orders in 1785; and eventually became the vicar of Dudley. Dr. Booker was the author of many excellent works, viz. "Poems" on various occasions; "Christian Intrepidity," "Calista, or the Picture of Modern Life," "Euthanasia, the State of Man after Death," "Discourses and Dissertations," 2 vols.; and a variety of others. He was a fearless antagonist of infidelity, and a powerful defender of the Church against Unitarian or Papal aggressors. Died, October, 1835.

BOONE, DANIEL, one of the first adventurers who penetrated into the wilds of Kentucky, was born in Virginia, and from his earliest infancy addicted to hunting in the woods. In 1769 he first set out, in company with a few friends; and after numerous perils and adventures, he founded Boonesborough, the earliest settlement in Kentucky, now a flourishing town, though at that time a wilderness. He was subsequently taken prisoner by the Indians, but escaped; and, being joined by other adventurers, was enabled to repulse them on several occasions, though neither art nor treachery were left unemployed to take him. At length, in 1798, he removed to Upper Louisiana, where he received a grant from the Spanish authorities of 2000 acres of land for himself, and 800 acres for each of his children, friends, and followers. He then settled with them on the Missouri river, at Charette, some distance beyond the inhabited parts of the country, where he followed his usual course of life—hunting and trapping for bears—until Sept. 1822, when he died, aged 84.

BOOTH, BARTON, a celebrated actor in the reigns of queen Anne and George I.; translator of several of the odes of Horace, and author of "Dido and Eneas," a masque, &c. Born, 1681; died, 1733.

BOOTH, Sir FELIX, bart., an eminent London merchant, who, for his munificent donation of 20,000*l.* for promoting the arctic expedition under Sir John Ross, was raised to a baronetcy, and had his name affixed to the country called Boothia Felix. Died, 1850.

BOOTH, GEORGE, baron Delamere, a zealous partizan of Charles II. Being defeated by the parliamentary general, Lambert, he was confined in the Tower until the death of Cromwell. He then obtained his liberty, and was one of the twelve delegates sent to the new king. It was on this occasion that he obtained his title, and a present of 10,000*l.* Died, 1684.

BOOTH, HENRY, earl of Warrington, son of the above. Having been among those who voted for the exclusion of the Duke of York, when that personage became king, he was committed to the Tower, and was tried for high treason, but acquitted, in spite of the efforts of the infamous Jeffreys. On the accession of William III., he was made a privy councillor and chancellor of the exchequer. His efforts to limit the prerogative, however, caused him to fall into disgrace; but he was allowed to retire from office with a pension, and the title of earl of Warrington. Died, 1694.

BORDA, JOHN CHARLES, a French mathematician and astronomer; author of a "Dissertation on the Construction of Hydraulic Machinery," a "Narrative of a Voyage to the South Sea," &c. He invented the reflecting circle, and made several improvements in hydraulics. Born, 1733; died, 1799.

BORDE, ANDREW, an English physician; author of "The Merrie Tales of the Madman of Gotham," and several other quaint works. Died, 1539.

BORDE, JOHN BENJAMIN DE LA, a French miscellaneous writer; author of "Adela de Ponthieu," "Essais sur la Musique, Ancienne et Moderne," "Mémoires de Courcy," &c. He was guillotined in 1794.

BORDEN, THEOPHILUS DE, a French physician; author of "Recherches sur quelques Pointes de l'Histoire de la Médecine," &c. Died, 1776.

BORDELON, LAURENCE, a voluminous French writer; author of "Dialogues for the Living," "Curious Varieties," several dramatic pieces, &c. Born, 1653; died, 1730.

BORELLI, JOHN ALPHONSO, an Italian

philosopher and mathematician; remembered chiefly for being the first who applied mathematical calculation and mechanical principles to account for the action of the muscles. Born, 1608; died, 1679.

BORGHESE, MARIA PAULINE, Princess, the beautiful sister of Napoleon Buonaparte, was born at Ajaccio, in 1780. Her first husband was General Leclerc, with whom she went to St. Domingo, but who dying in 1802, she became, in the following year, the wife of the Prince Camillo Borghese. Napoleon was much attached to her; and that her love for him was equally sincere, was manifest on many striking occasions, though she frequently disputed with him, and refused to follow the caprices of his policy. When Napoleon resigned his crown in 1814, and retired to Elba, Pauline left her palace in Rome, and followed him to his place of exile. She lived afterwards, separated from her husband, at Rome, and her house was the centre of the most splendid society. When she heard of her brother's illness at St. Helena, she repeatedly requested permission to go to him; at length her request was granted, and she was just about to depart, when the news of his death reached her. Died, 1825.

BORGIA, CESAR, son of Cardinal Rodrigo, afterwards pope Alexander VI. He was at first devoted to the Church, and became a cardinal, but more ambitious prospects for him caused his father to secularise him. After serving in the army of Louis XII., he became duke of Romagna, and extended his power and possessions so greatly and remorselessly, that the Italian states became alarmed, and a confederacy was formed against him. After opposing all efforts against him with equal skill and wickedness, he was slain in a skirmish before the castle of Viana, 1507.

BORGIA, Cardinal STEPHEN, was a native of Vellettri. He had an enthusiastic love for art. It was usual with him to change a valuable piece of plate for some rare article to adorn his museum; and on one occasion, to purchase an Egyptian mummy, he even parted with the plate from his table, and the buckles from his shoes. Pius VI. created him cardinal in 1789; and the succeeding pope named him president of the council when the French garrison evacuated Rome. He was the author of some works in support of the papal temporalities. Died, at Lyons, 1804.

BORIE, JEAN, one of the most sanguinary monsters of the French revolution, and inventor of the "Farandoles." He was a lawyer; born about 1770; died in 1805, in exile.

BORLASE, WILLIAM, an eminent English topographer and antiquary; author of "The Antiquities, historical and monumental, of the County of Cornwall;" the "Natural History of Cornwall," &c. Born, 1696; died, 1772.

BORIS, GADENOW, grand-master of the horse to Theodore Ivanowitz, emperor of Russia. He is said to have put to death both the emperor's brother and the emperor himself, whom he succeeded. He governed cruelly and tyrannically, but died suddenly, just as Russia was invaded by a Polish army, which was headed by a young monk, who pretended to be Demetrius, the deceased brother of Theodore, in 1605.

BOROWLASKI, Count, the celebrated Polish dwarf, who, although less than three feet in height, was of perfect symmetry, and attained the great age of 98. He had been prevailed upon by some of the clergy of Durham, who had casually seen him when on his "travels," 40 years before his death, to take up his abode near that city. He spoke several languages, was generally well informed and witty, and his company was accordingly much courted by the gentry of Durham and its vicinity. Died, Sept. 1837.

BORRI, JOSEPH FRANCIS, an adventurer, of the 17th century, who attracted much notice by his fanatical heresies in religion, and by his pretensions as an alchemist and physician. After a long course of bold and impudent imposture, he was imprisoned, at first in the prison of the Inquisition at Rome, and afterwards in the castle of St. Angelo, where he died, 1695.

BORRAMEO, CHARLES, a cardinal; author of a vast number of moral and doctrinal treatises. Died, 1594; and was canonised sixteen years after by Paul V.

BORRAMEO, FREDERIC, a cousin-german of the above, archbishop of Milan, and also a cardinal; author of "Sacri Ragionamenti," "Ragionamenti Spirituali," &c. Died, 1632.

BORRONI, PAUL MICHAEL BENEDICT, a painter, who imitated the style of Correggio, and had much of the taste of Michael Angelo. Pius VI. made him a knight of the golden spur, and the king of Sardinia granted him a pension. He died at Voghera, in 1819.

BORRONIMI, FRANCESCO, an Italian architect; the pupil of Muderno, whom he succeeded as architect of St. Peter's at Rome. His best work is the college of the Propaganda. Died, by his own hand, 1667.

BOS, LAMBERT, professor of Greek at Franeker; author of the well-known and valuable work on the Greek ellipses, an excellent edition of the Septuagint, with prolegomena and various readings, &c. Born, 1670; died, 1717.

BOSC, LOUIS AUGUSTUS WILLIAM, a French naturalist, and the author of several agricultural and other works. He held a responsible situation in the French post-office; but, in 1793, being driven from his place by the Jacobins, he sought a retreat in the forest of Montmorency, where he lived three years in solitude, devoting his time to the study of natural history.

BOSC, PETER DU, an eminent French Calvinist preacher of the 17th century; author of numerous sermons, epistles, poems, &c. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he escaped to Holland, where he died, in 1692.

BOSCAN, JOHN ALMAGAVER, a Spanish poet, who first introduced into Spanish the hendecasyllabic verse. His works are published with those of Garcilasso. Died, 1544.

BOSCAWEN, EDWARD, a brave and highly distinguished English admiral. He served under Anson in the engagement of Cape Finisterre, and received the thanks of parliament and a pension for his exploits while serving in the Atlantic and in the Mediterranean. Born, 1711; died, 1761.

BOSCAWEN, WILLIAM, nephew of the above; author of an "Essay on the Progress of Satire;" a translation of Horace, &c. Born, 1752; died, 1811.

BOSCH, BERNARD, a Dutch poet, born in 1746; author of "Egotism" and "Bosch's Poems," and co-editor of the Janus and Eclair Politique.

BOSCH, JEROME, a famous Dutch bibliomanist; born in 1740, died in 1811. His library catalogue was remarkable for the number of princeps editions it contained.

BOSCH, L. A. G., one of the first French naturalists of the age; born in 1759; patronised by the minister Roland. He had the courage to accompany Madame Roland to the foot of the scaffold. He wrote "Histoire Naturelle des Coquilles," "Dictionnaire d'Agriculture," &c. His brother, (Stephen Bosch) also published some well written works on agriculture and the occupation of the poor.

BOSCOVICH, ROGER JOSEPH, a Jesuit, and professor of mathematics in the Roman college of that order; author of a Latin poem on eclipses, &c. Born, 1711; died, 1787.

BOSSCHA, H., a Dutch poet and miscellaneous writer; born in 1766; author of "Belgica Libertas," and a "History of the Revolution of Holland."

BOSSI, C. A., Baron de, an eminent modern Italian poet, born at Piedmont in 1768. He favoured the French interest on the Republic's invasion of Italy, and was rewarded by posts in France by Napoleon. He is chiefly known by his exertions in this country in favour of the Protestant Vaudois. "Oromasia" is his chief work in poetry.

BOSSU, RENÉ LE, an eminent French critic of the 17th century; author of a "Treatise on Epic Poetry," "Parallel of the Philosophy of Descartes and of Aristotle," &c.

BOSSUET, JACQUES BENIGNE, bishop of Meaux, an eminent French preacher and controversial writer, contemporary with Fenelon; author of a "Discourse on Universal History," of numerous funeral and other orations of splendid excellence, an "Exposition of the Roman Catholic Faith," &c. His clear-sightedness and controversial power gained for him the title of the "Eagle of Meaux." Born, 1627; died, 1704.

BOSSUT, C. A., a celebrated French mathematician, and the friend and associate of Condorcet, D'Alembert, Bailly, and Lavoisier. His "Traité Élémentaire de Méchanique et de Dynamique," is well known. Born, 1730; died, 1814.

BOSTON, JOHN, a monk of St. Edmundsbury, in the 15th century; author of "Speculum Cœnobarum," &c.

BOSWELL, JAMES, the friend and biographer of Johnson, was the eldest son of Lord Auchinleck, a Scotch judge. The good taste of this gentleman led him to seek the friendship of Dr. Johnson, of whose life he has given a most interesting account, forming the best specimen of faithful biography in the language; and which has secured to the biographer an extent and permanency of fame which his talents, though far from inconsiderable, could scarcely have procured him if exerted upon any other subject. Born, 1740; died, 1795.

BOSWELL, Sir ALEXANDER, eldest son of the preceding, was born in 1775, and succeeded his father in the possession of the family estate. He was a literary antiquary of no inconsiderable erudition, and the author of many popular songs and poetical jeux d'esprit. He inherited all the Tory spirit of his father; and some attacks on the character of James Stuart, esq., having appeared in the Beacon and Sentinel newspapers, which were traced to Sir Alexander, a duel took place between these gentlemen, when the latter fell, mortally wounded in the neck, March 26, 1822. Mr. Stuart was tried for this offence, but honourably acquitted.

BOSWELL, JAMES, the second son of the biographer of Johnson, was born in 1779, and educated at Westminster School. He possessed talents of a superior order; and the skill with which he edited the enlarged and amended edition of Malone's Shakespeare in 21 vols., affords ample evidence of his scholarship, judgment, and discrimination. He died in 1822, aged 43.

BOTELLO, Don NUNO ALVAREZ DE, a celebrated viceroy of India when the Portuguese held dominion there; and whose gallantry and skill tended greatly to augment their Hindostan possessions. He gained several victories over the Dutch, and destroyed the fleet and army of the Achenese which were besieging Malacca; but lost his life in 1629, by being crushed between his own vessel and one of the enemy's.

BOTH, JOHN and ANDREW, brothers, two Flemish painters, born at Utrecht, in the early part of the 17th century. John chose for his model the works of Claude Lorraine, while Andrew studied the human figure; but they frequently united in the same works, and their labours harmonised so well, that their pictures could not be suspected of being joint productions.

BOTHWELL, JAMES HEBURN, Earl of, the second husband of the ill-fated Mary of Scotland; and the supposed instigator, at least, of the murder of her first husband, Henry Darnley. Bothwell died, in exile, at Denmark, in 1577.

BOTT, JOHN DE, a French architect. Being a Protestant, he had no chance of obtaining patronage in his own country, and therefore entered into the service of William, prince of Orange, whom he accompanied to England. On the death of that prince, he went into the service of the Elector of Brandenburg, by whom he was made a major-general. The fortifications of Wesel and the arsenal of Berlin are among the numerous proofs of his talents. Died, 1745.

BOTZARIS, MARCO, a brave and patriotic Sullote, appointed stratarch of Western Greece in 1821. He was killed in a night attack on the Turks, 1823.

BOUCHARDON, EDMUND, an eminent French architect; many of whose works adorn Paris. Born, 1698; died, 1762.

BOUCHER, JONATHAN, an English divine; author of "The Cumberland Man," &c. Died, 1804.

BOUCHER, FRANCIS, a French painter of some note, and who, but for the rapidity of his execution, would probably have arrived at great eminence, but the ease with which he executed rendered him careless. Born, 1704; died, 1770.

BOUCHER, LUC, a Jacobin leader of the Faubourg St. Antoine, who, on the 20th May, 1795, forced himself into the National Convention, and seizing Ferrand, one of the members, beheaded him in the lobby with his own hand, and fixed his head on a pike, parading it through the "Salle." He was afterwards guillotined.

BOUCHOTTE, J. B., born in 1754; he was a second lieutenant in 1775, and was war minister to the French republic in 1793, during its most eventful and victorious period. He was denounced by the ultra Jacobins, and narrowly escaped the guillotine, but retired into private life.

BOUCICAULT, Marshal, count of Beaufort, a celebrated French soldier of the 15th century. He served against the Turks, and in the Italian strife between the Guelphs and Ghibellines; and, at the battle of Agincourt, was taken prisoner and brought to England, where he died in 1421.

BOUDINOT, ELIAS, was born at Philadelphia, in 1740; studied the law, and became eminent in that profession; but during the American contest he was chosen a member of congress, made its president in 1782, and after the adoption of the constitution, he entered the house of representatives. On retiring from public life, he devoted himself earnestly to biblical literature, and, being possessed of an ample fortune, made munificent donations to various charitable and theological institutions, foremost among which was the American Bible Society, of which he became president. He died in 1821, aged 82.

BOUFFLERS, LOUIS FRANCIS, Duke of, a distinguished marshal of France. In 1708 he defended Lille for four months against Prince Eugene, who, when he at length took that place, said to the marshal, "I am very proud of having taken Lille, but I should be still more proud of defending it as you have." Died, 1711.

BOUFFLERS, STANISLAUS, Chevalier de, son of the Marchioness of Boufflers, mistress of Stanislaus, king of Poland, born in 1737, was distinguished for the elegance of his manners and conversation. He was destined for the Church, but declared that his love of pleasure would interfere with the duties of this profession, and therefore entered the military service. He emigrated from France in 1792, to Prussia. He left several works of merit, "Le Libre Arbitre," &c. His character has been thus summed up: "A libertine abbé; a military philosopher; a song-making diplomatist; an emigrant republican." Died, 1815.

BOUGAINVILLE, JEAN PIERRE DE, a French writer; author of "Philip of Macedon," a tragedy, &c.; and editor of Freret's great work on Chronology. Born, 1722; died, 1763.

BOUGAINVILLE, LOUIS ANTOINE DE, a French officer, distinguished both in the military and naval service. When serving in Canada, under Montcalm, he displayed so much bravery that he obtained the rank of colonel, and subsequently became a general. Under the empire he was made a senator, and a member of the Institute. Bougainville circumnavigated the world, and enriched the science of geography by a number of new discoveries. Born, 1729; died, 1811.

BOUGEANT, GUILLAUME HYACINTHE, a French Jesuit; author of "Amusement Philosophique sur le Language des Bêtes," &c. Born, 1690; died, 1743.

BOUGUER, PIERRE, a French mathematician and hydrographer; author of treatises on Navigation and Pilotage, and on the Construction of Ships; and numerous other valuable works of science. Died, 1758.

BOUIER, JOHN, an eminent French writer of the 17th century; author of "Letters on the Therapeutæ," "Dissertations on Herodotus," &c. Born, 1673; died, 1746.

BOUHOURS, DOMINIC, a French Jesuit and critic; author of "Les Entretiens d'Ariste et d'Eugène," "Manière de bien Penser sur les Ouvrages de l'Esprit," &c. Born, 1628; died, 1702.

BOUILLARD, J., a celebrated French engraver, born in 1744, died in 1806. His "Boreas et Orythea" is a masterpiece.

BOUILLE, FRANCIS CLAUDE AMOUR, Marquis de, born in 1759; a distinguished French general, celebrated by his exploits up to the era of the French revolution; from which, although he sat on liberal principles in the first Assembly of Notables, he detached himself, and, after making excellent preparations to assist the unfortunate Louis XVI. in escaping from Varennes, which his sovereign refused to avail himself of, he quitted France and served under the allies. He died in London in 1800. His "Memoirs of the French Revolution" rank deservedly high.

BOUILLON, ROSE, born in 1770; a heroine of the French revolution, who entered the army as a volunteer, and fought as a private in the 6th battalion of the Haute Saon, at the battle of Limbach, where her husband was killed by her side. She had a pension from the National Convention.

BOUILLY, J. N., an eminent French diplomatist, born in 1770. In his views of the revolution, he concurred with his friend Mirabeau. Author of "Pierre le Grand," "L'Abbé de l'Épée," "Léonore," "Hélène," "Agnes Sorci," "La Veillesse de Piron," &c.

BOULAINVILLIERS, HENRY DE, comte de St. Saire; author of a "History of Mahomet," a "History of the Arabians," a "History of the Peerage of France," &c. Born, 1658; died, 1722.

BOULANGER, NICHOLAS ANTONY, a French mathematician and engineer; author of "Traité du Despotisme Orientale," &c. Born, 1722; died, 1759.

BOULARD, ANTOINE MARIE HENRI, a distinguished French savant, born in 1754, and member of the Chamber of Deputies in 1815. He is author of numerous translations from English standard writings, and was honoured by the friendship of La Harpe, &c. Died, 1825.

BOULAY DE LA MEURTHE, A. J. C., born in 1761; one of the most distinguished orators in the French revolution, and author of eminent works on political science. He was president of the civil tribunal at Nancy, in 1793, and had great share in confirming the expatriation of the emigrants in 1793, when a member of the Five Hundred. He was subsequently faithful to Buonaparte through all his changes of fortune; and on that account was proscribed, and banished to Frankfort, by the Bourbons, on their last restoration in 1815.

BOULTER, HUGH, archbishop of Armagh, eminent for his benevolent exertions to alleviate the distress of the Irish during the scarcity of 1740, and for the part he took in establishing schools for the instruction of the Irish children. Died, 1742.

BOULTON, MATTHEW, an eminent engineer, whose spirit and talent improved innumerable mechanical processes, and whose name, with that of his partner, Watt, is inseparably connected with that of the wonderful power of which they made such skilful use, the steam engine, was born at Birmingham, in 1728. Among the many great undertakings in which Boulton and Watt were engaged, one of the most useful and important was the improvement of the coinage, the coins struck at the "Soho" manufactory being rarely surpassed in beauty or accuracy. After a long life uninterruptedly devoted to the advancement of the useful arts, and the promotion of the commercial interests of his country, he died in 1809.

BOUQUET, Madame, born about 1773; a victim of affection and hospitality, during the revolution. She concealed Péthion Buzot and her uncle Guadet, during one of the search warrants of the terrorists, and their retreat being discovered, she was sent to the guillotine with them, and died with great fortitude.

BOURBON, CHARLES, Duke de, constable of France, a powerful enemy of Francis I., and his opponent at Pavia when Francis was taken prisoner. His life was chiefly spent in warfare, and he was killed while heading the assault on Rome, in 1527.

BOURBON, Robert the Strong, dnke of Neustria, founder of the family which was so long governed France, Spain, Sicily, &c., lost his life in a battle with the Normans in 866. Historians differ as to his descent, some contending that Pepin, of Heristel, was his ancestor; others trace his genealogy to the kings of Lombardy; and some say he derived his origin from a natural son of Charlemagne.

BOURBON, LOUIS, cardinal and archbishop of Toledo; son of Louis, brother of Charles III. of Spain. After the imprisonment of Ferdinand at Valençay, he joined the cortes, and ultimately became president of the provisional junta before which the king swore, in 1820, to abide by the constitution of the cortes of 1812. Born, 1777; died, 1823.

BOURBON, LOUIS HENRY JOSEPH, Duke de, and prince de Condé, was supposed to have put an end to his existence, Aug. 27, 1830. He fought nobly in the royalist army; and after the campaign in 1800, accompanied his father to England, and was residing with him at Wanstead House in 1804, when his son, the Duke d'Enghien, was murdered. The duke's death is attributed to the excitement of his mind respecting the revolution of July, 1830. His property he left by will to the Duke d'Aumale, third son of Louis Philippe, with the exception of a large bequest to Sophia Dawes, baroness de Feucheres, an English woman, with whom he lived.

BOURBOTTE, a French Jacobin, remarkable for his ferocity and military courage; born about 1765. Being one of the convention in 1794, and aiming at the dictatorship, on the 1st Prarial he and his colleagues were crushed by Legendre; and after poniarding himself before the revolutionary tribunal, but ineffectually, he was guillotined.

BOURCHIER, JOHN, lord Berners, a military commander of great skill and repute in the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII., by the latter of whom he was made governor of Calais; author of a translation of "Froisart," "The Life of Marcus Aurelius," &c. Died, 1532.

BOURCHIER, THOMAS, cardinal, and archbishop of Canterbury. He crowned no fewer than three of our kings, viz. Edward IV., Richard III., and Henry VII. Died, 1486.

BOURDALOUE, LOUIS, a French Jesuit, and one of the most eloquent preachers in France. His sermons even in the perusal, deprived as they are of the eloquent eye, the graceful action, and the melodious voice, bear sufficient evidence of his genius to justify the praises that have been bestowed upon him. Born, 1632; died, 1704.

BOURDELOT, JOHN, a French lawyer, master of requests to Mary de Medic; author of a "Commentary on the Satires of Juvenal," &c.; and editor of the works of Petronius and Heliodorus. Died, 1638.

BOURDELOT, PIERRE MECHON, nephew of the above; a physician, patronised by Christina, queen of Sweden, and other eminent personages; author of an "Account of Mount Ætna," &c. Died, 1685.

BOURDELOT, PIERRE BONNET, nephew of the last named, a physician, and author of some annotations on Colonic's "Bibliothèque Choisie," &c. Died, 1709.

BOURDON, LEONARD, born in 1760; a sanguinary conventionalist, who wished to interdict Louis XVI. from seeing his family. Having quarrelled with his colleague Robespierre, who, in 1794, had resisted his efforts to serve his friends, Vincent and Ronsin, he and Barras headed the National Guards, who dispersed the satellites of that tyrant on his fall, and seized his person. He was sent to the castle at Ham, as one of the insurrectionists of 1794; but was afterwards employed by the directory. He was twice publicly called an assassin; in the convention, in 1794, and in the Cinq Cents, in 1797, the whole assembly applauding. This destroyer of grown men was at the same time founder of "L'Ecole des Elèves de la Patrie," and died a natural death, as director of it. He published a "Memoir on National Education" and a "Sansculotide Drama."

BOURDON, SEBASTIAN, a French painter; his chef d'œuvre is "The Crucifixion of St. Peter," which he executed for the church of Notre Dame. Died, 1671.

BOURDONNAYE, BERNARD FRANCIS MAHE DE LA, a French military and civil officer of great talents. He besieged and captured Madras in 1746; and the wealth he carried home caused him to be prosecuted and imprisoned. Although he was honourably acquitted, this affair ruined his health, and he died in 1754.

BOURGELAT, CLAUDE, a French veterinary surgeon of eminence in his profession; author of "The Elements of Horsemanship," "The Materia Medica of the Veterinary School," &c. Died, 1779.

BOURGOIS, SIR FRANCIS, a native of England, but of Swiss family; painter to the king of Poland, and subsequently to George III. of England. His landscapes and sea pieces are highly esteemed. He left his fine collection to Dulwich College, with 10,000*l.* for building a gallery, and keeping the pictures in preservation. Born 1756; died, 1811.

BOURGOING, JOHN FRANCIS, Baron de, born in 1748; ambassador to Spain on the part of the French republic, and afterwards of Napoleon, who subsequently sent him to Stockholm, and in 1807 to Saxony. He died in 1811. He has left several approved works; "Tableau de l'Espagne Moderne," "Mémoires de Pie VI.," and "Histoire de Charlemagne."

BOURIGNON, ANTOINETTE DE LA PORTE, a Flemish fanatic. Holding religion to consist neither in practice nor in knowledge, but in direct impulses from and communion with the Deity, she made many disciples, and wrote numerous books, remarkable chiefly for their absurdity where they were at all intelligible. Like many other fanatics, she had a large share of worldly wisdom, and was excessively avaricious and penurious. Born, 1616; died, 1680.

BOURMONT, Marshal, a distinguished soldier in almost all the campaigns that have taken place since the French revolution of 1789, was born in 1773. In the early periods of the revolution, while second lieutenant of infantry, he emigrated from France, joined his arms with those of the Bourbon princes on the frontiers against the French republicans, and afterwards served the royal cause in La Vendée, Bretagne, and Maine with great energy and talent. During the consulate of Napoleon he was arrested on a charge of being concerned in the plot of the infernal machine, but after suffering imprisonment successively in the Temple, and at Dijon and Besançon, he made his escape and sought refuge with his family at Lisbon, whence however he returned to France, and appeared to devote himself so zealously to Napoleon's interests, that he was appointed to various high commands in the imperial service, and served with great distinction in the Italian and Russian campaigns. On Napoleon's return from Elba, he commanded a division of the corps of Ney. At the commencement of the campaign of 1815, he was appointed to the command of a brigade of the grand army; but on the eve of the battle of Waterloo he abandoned his colours and repaired to Louis XVIII., who was then at Ghent. This extraordinary coup-de-main—famous or infamous as it is designated by different parties—won for him the signal favour of the restored Bourbons. Ten days after the battle of Waterloo he entered France with the title of commander of the northern frontier, and shortly after the execution of the gallant Ney, to whose condemnation his evidence mainly contributed, was appointed to the command of one of the divisions of the royal guards. In 1823 he took part in the Spanish campaign under the Duke d'Angoulême, on whose return to France he obtained the chief command of the army of occupation. In 1829, Charles X. having nominated him minister of war, he organised the expedition to Algiers, presided over all the preliminary arrangements, and proceeded in person to superintend the plan of operations which he himself had designed, and which finally resulted in the capture of Algiers, for which he was honoured with the baton of a marshal of France. After the revolution of 1830, which placed Louis Philippe on the throne, he was proscribed by the dominant party. He then devoted his services to the cause of foreign absolutism in different countries, especially in Portugal; but he was subsequently permitted to re-enter France, where he continued to live in obscurity till his death, which took place, Nov. 9. 1846.

BOURNE, VINCENT, sub-master of Westminster School; author of Latin poetry of singular elegance and purity. Died, 1747.

BOURSAULT, EDMUND, a French writer, who, though destitute of education, attained a proficiency in authorship, and wrote several dramas and romances. Among his works are "Æsop in Town," "Æsop at Court," and "Letters to Babet." Born, 1638; died, 1701.

BOUTERWEK, FREDERIC, professor of philosophy at Gottingen, was born in 1766, and died in 1828. He was the author of many valuable works, of which his "History of Spanish Literature" may be regarded as the chief.

BOWDICH, THOMAS EDWARD, a writer in the service of the English African Company, was a native of Bristol, born in 1793. He was selected to conduct a mission to the King of Ashantee, of which mission he published a very interesting account. He again set out to explore the interior of Africa, and had already reached the river Gambia, when a fever, produced chiefly by anxiety, terminated his life in 1824. He was an excellent linguist and a pleasing writer; and besides the work already mentioned, the public are indebted to him for a translation of Mollah's Travels to the Sources of the Senegal and Gambia; and other works.

BOWDITCH, Dr. NATHANIEL, F. R. S., president of the American academy of arts and sciences, was a native of Boston, and, though self-educated, arrived at the enviable distinction of being a philosopher of the first class. When 23 years of age he published his "Practical Navigator," a work of great merit; but his admirable translation of the "Mécanique Céleste" of La Place, with an elaborate commentary, was the production that raised him to the pinnacle of fame. Died, 1838.

BOWDLER, THOMAS, an English physician; author of "Letters from Holland," and editor of the "Family Shakspeare," &c. Born, 1754; died, 1825.

BOWDLER, HANNAH, sister of the before-mentioned Thomas Bowdler; author of "Poems and Essays," in 2 vols., and of some popular "Sermons on the Doctrines and Duties of Christianity." She died, at the age of 76, in 1830.

BOWDOIN, an American legislator and man of letters, born at Boston, 1727. He was one of the most determined opponents of the right of colonial taxation, insisted on by England, and was one of the first deputies to Congress. He became governor of Massachusetts, and president of the Philadelphia Academy of Sciences; and died in 1790. His "Discourse on the New Constitution of the United States" is deservedly admired.

BOWER, ARCHIBALD, a Scotch writer of great and versatile ability; but so lax in principle as to change from Catholicism to Protestantism, and then to Catholicism again, and finally to Protestantism, in which faith, according to the declaration of his widow, he died. He wrote a "History of the Popes," conducted the "Historia Litteraria," and contributed largely to the "Universal History." Born, 1676; died, 1766.

BOWLES, Rev. WILLIAM LISLE, whose sonnets exercised no unimportant influence on English literature, was born at King's Sutton, in Northamptonshire, a parish of which his father was vicar, in 1762. He was educated at Winchester and at Trinity College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1792, the contemporary and friend of the late Archbishop Howley, and of several persons not undistinguished afterwards, who adorned the university at that time. On leaving the university he entered into holy orders, and was appointed to a curacy in Wiltshire; from which he was preferred to a living in Gloucestershire, and in 1803 to a canonry in Salisbury Cathedral. His next step was to the rectory of Bremhill in Wiltshire, to which he was presented by Archbishop Moore. Here he remained till his death, unremitting in his professional duties, and manifesting an exemplary, though happily by no means a rare, instance of the union of all Christian graces with the polish of taste and the amenities of literature. His first appearance as a poet was in a small collection of sonnets, which were published in 1789, and may be reckoned among the first-fruits of a new era in poetry. In these sonnets there were observed a grace of expression, a musical versification, and especially an air of melancholy tenderness, so congenial to the poetical temperament, which still, after 60 years of a more propitious period than that which immediately preceded their publication, preserves for their author a highly respectable position among our poets. The subsequent poems of Mr. Bowles did not belie the promise of his youth. The chief of these were his "Hope, an allegorical Sketch," "St. Michael's Mount," "Coombe Ellen," and "Grave of Howard." His "Spirit of Discovery by Sea," the longest of his productions, was published in 1804. Mr. Bowles published also an edition of Pope, which involved him in the famous controversy with Lord Byron, as well as a great variety of small tracts, literary, antiquarian, and theological. He was, in fact, a very frequent, though he cannot be called a voluminous, contributor to the literature of the present century. Mr. Bowles was very playful in his habits and conversation, and many anecdotes are told of his Parson Adams-like forgetfulness. Died, 1850.

BOWYER, WILLIAM, an eminent English printer and classical scholar. He published several learned works; but his chief performance was a Greek edition of the New Testament, with critical and emendatory notes. Born, 1699; died, 1777.

BOXHORN, MARK ZUERIUS, professor of rhetoric, politics, and history in the university of Leyden; author of a treatise on the discovery of printing, and of numerous Latin works, both prose and verse. Born, 1612; died, 1653.

BOYCE, WILLIAM, doctor of music, and an eminent composer, both of sacred and secular pieces. Born, 1710; died, 1779.

BOYD, ZACHARY, a Scotch divine of the 17th century. Among various works which he published is "The Last Battle of the Soul in Death;" and among the numerous MSS. he left, is a collection of quaint poems, entitled "Zion's Flowers," popularly called "Zachary Boyd's Bible." He died in 1653, leaving a considerable legacy to Glasgow College.

BOYDELL, JOHN, originally an English engraver, and afterwards an eminent print-seller. His spirit and liberality enabled him to amass a considerable fortune, and at the same time greatly to elevate our national character as to the art. He was for many years an alderman of London, and served the office of lord mayor in 1790. Born, 1719; died, 1804.

BOYER, ABEL, a French refugee; author of a French Dictionary and Grammar, which have had a very extensive circulation; and of several literary and political publications of merit. Born, 1664; died, 1729.

BOYER, JOHN BAPTIST NICHOLAS, a French physician, eminently skilful in the treatment of infectious diseases; author of a "Pharmacopœia," tracts on contagious disorders, &c. Died, 1768.

BOYLE, RICHARD, earl of Cork, an eminent statesman in the reign of James I., and founder of a family greatly distinguished in the arts, sciences, and literature. Born at Canterbury, 1566; died, 1643.

BOYLE, ROGER, earl of Orrery, fifth son of the above. When only seven years old he was created baron Broghill; and, from an early age, was conspicuous for his zeal in the king's service. But after the king was put to death, the baron transferred his services to Cromwell, by whom he was greatly trusted and employed. At the death of Cromwell he aided in bringing back Charles II., and was created earl of Orrery for his service on that occasion. Born in Ireland, 1621; died, 1679. He was the author of several poems and plays.

BOYLE, ROBERT, brother of the last named, a nightly distinguished philosopher, not unworthy to be ranked with Bacon and Newton. His whole life was devoted to philosophy; and his productions, almost without an exception, are of great value, and very numerous. Born at Lismore, Ireland, 1627; died, 1691.

BOYLE, CHARLES, lord Boyle, second son of Roger, earl of Orrery, a statesman and scholar; editor of the "Epistles of Phalaris," and author of some slight but clever literary papers; born, 1676; died, 1731.

BOYLE, JOHN, earl of Cork and Orrery, only son of the last named; author of a translation, with notes, of the "Epistles of Pliny the Younger," "Remarks on the Life and Writings of Swift," papers in the Connoisseur and the World, &c. Born, 1707; died, 1762.

BOYLE, RICHARD, third earl of Burlington, and fourth earl of Cork, another branch of the same distinguished family. He was an enthusiastic amateur of architecture, and a very generous friend to men of letters. In him, Bishop Berkeley found his earliest and most efficient patron; and Pope did him the honour to address to him his fourth epistle. Born, 1695; died, 1753.

BOYLSTON, ZABDIEL, an American physician, who introduced the system of inoculating for the small-pox into his native country. Born, 1680; died, 1766.

BOYS, WILLIAM, an eminent antiquary and naturalist; author of a "History of Sandwich," "Observations on Kit's Coty-house in Kent," published in the "Archæologia," &c. Died, 1803.

BOYSE, SAMUEL, a clever but eccentric and dissipated English writer; author of "The Deity" and other poems, and of various contributions to periodical works. His bad habits rendered all efforts to serve him unavailing, and he died in great misery and poverty, in 1749.

BOZE, CLAUDE GROS DE, a French writer and archaeologist; author of the "Medallic History of Louis XIV." &c. Born, 1680; died, 1754.

BRACCIOLETTI, FRANCIS, surnamed Dell' Api, secretary to Cardinal Antonio Barberini; author of "La Croce Riquadrata," "Lo Schemo degli Dei," &c. Born, 1596; died, 1645.

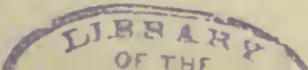

BRACTON, HENRY DE, an English law writer of the 13th century; author of the well known and esteemed treatise "De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ."

BRADBURY, THOMAS, an eminent non-conformist divine, who took a distinguished part in the controversy with Dr. Watts on the subject of the Trinity. Died, 1759.

BRADDOCK, EDWARD, major-general. He was commander-in-chief, in America, during the war with France in the 18th century; and was slain when on the eve of investing Fort Duquesne, in 1755.

BRADFORD, JOHN, an eminent preacher of the reformed religion, who was burnt at Smithfield in the reign of Mary, 1555.

BRADLEY, JAMES, an English divine, astronomer, and mathematician; Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, contributor to the Philosophical Transactions, and author of some Astronomical Observations, published separately. Died, 1762.

BRADLEY, RICHARD, professor of botany at Cambridge, and author of several works, chiefly compilations, on Botany and Horticulture. Dr. Brewster's popular invention, the Kaleidoscope, was at one time said to be due to Bradley; but it appears that the doctor's instrument and the one proposed by Bradley are quite different, and that the latter would be very inferior. Died, 1732.

BRADSHAW, JOHN, an English lawyer, noted in our history for having acted as president on the trial of Charles I. Died, 1659. He had a magnificent funeral; but at the restoration his remains were removed from Westminster Abbey, and hanged on a gallows at Tyburn, with those of Cromwell and Ireton.

BRADSTREET, ANNA, an English poetess of the 17th century. Her father was governor of New England, where she wrote and published her poems.

BRADWARDIN, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury; author of a treatise "De Causa Dei," directed against Pelagianism; and some mathematical tracts, &c. Died, 1349.

BRADY, NICHOLAS, Dr., an English divine; translator of the Aeneid, and, in conjunction with Tate, of the Psalms. Born at Bandon, Ireland, 1659; died, 1726.

BRAHE, TYCHO, a Dane of a noble family; a celebrated astronomer. Though his system is now superseded by that of Copernicus, he deserves honourable mention as an ingenious theorist; and, apart from his error as to the earth being the fixed centre of the universe, his observations as a practical astronomer are highly valuable. Born, 1546; died, 1601.

BRAINERD, DAVID, a celebrated American missionary, who signalised himself by his successful endeavours to convert the Indians on the Susquehannah, Delaware, &c. Died, aged 30, 1747.

BRAITHWAITE, JOHN, an ingenious mechanic, constructor of a diving machine, with which he explored the Royal George, sunk off Spithead; the Hartwell East Indian, off one of the Cape de Verd Islands; and the Abergavenny East Indian, off the Isle of Portland. From the first he only succeeded in raising some guns and an anchor; but from the second and third he brought up property to a very large amount. Died, 1818.

BRAMAH, JOSEPH, an English engineer, distinguished for the number, value, and ingenuity of his mechanical inventions. Among these were his invaluable hydrostatic press, his safety locks, various improvements in the steam-engine, in the process of making paper, in the construction of main-pipes, wheel-carriages, the beer-machine, &c. Born, 1749; died, 1814.

BRAMANTE D'URBINO, LAZARO, a celebrated Italian architect, who first designed and commenced the church of St. Peter at Rome. He was a skilful painter and musician as well as architect, and a volume of poems from his pen was printed in 1756. Died, 1514.

BRANCAS LAURAGUAIS, Duke de, a French nobleman, distinguished for his scientific attainments; discoverer of the composition of the diamond, and a great improver of the manufacture of porcelain. Born, 1735; died, 1824.

BRAND, JOHN, an able and voluminous writer on politics and political economy; author of numerous political pamphlets and some poems. He was rector of Wickham Market, in Suffolk, and of St. George, Southwark. Died, 1809.

BRAND, JOHN, an English divine and antiquary; author of the "History and Antiquities of the Town of Newcastle," "Observations on Popular Antiquities," &c. Born, 1743; died, 1806.

BRANDER, GUSTAVUS, an English antiquary and naturalist. He was of a Swedish family, but born in London, where he was an eminent merchant, and a director of the Bank. He contributed largely to the Transactions of the Antiquarian Society, &c. Born, 1720; died, 1787.

BRANDT, a German chemist of the 17th century; who is said to have discovered phosphorus while attempting to find a solvent by which to convert silver into gold.

BRANDT, ERNEVOLD, Count de, a Danish statesman, convicted of being concerned in the conspiracy of Count Struensee, and executed in 1772.

BRANDT, GEORGE, an eminent Swedish natural philosopher; author of accounts of various valuable experiments made by him upon the metals. Died, 1768.

BRANDT, SEBASTIAN, chancellor of Strasburg; author of "Varia Carmina," "Navis Stultifera," &c. Died, 1520.

BRANTOME, or PIERRE DE BOURDELLES, a celebrated French chronicler. He was a favoured attendant upon Charles IX., Henry III., and the Duke de Alençon; and his memoirs, though somewhat too free in their details, are highly valuable as graphic and faithful illustrations of an interesting period of French history.

BRANWHITE, PEREGRINE, the author of various poems, was born at Lavenham, Suffolk, 1745; died in London, 1794.

BREARNS, HENRY, a Danish naval officer, and writer on navigation; author of a "System of Practical Navigation," &c. Born, 1751; died, 1826.

BRATHWAYTE, RICHARD, an English poet; author of "The Golden Fleecce," "The Prodigal's Tears," "The English Gentleman," &c. Born, 1588; died, 1673.

BRAY, Sir REGINALD, an English statesman, and favourite of Henry VII. He was a frank friend to that sovereign, disdaining to withhold his disapproval when it was deserved. He is chiefly memorable for having superintended the erection of that beautiful structure, Henry VII.'s chapel at Westminster, and for having finished that of St. George at Windsor. Died, 1503.

BRAY, Dr. THOMAS, an English divine, who laboured with great zeal in propagating the gospel in foreign parts, and who went several times to America to promote that object, was born in 1656; and died, rector of St. Botolph's, Aldgate, in 1730.

BRAY, WILLIAM, F.S.A., an industrious

antiquary; editor of Evelyn's "Diary and Memoirs," and a contributor to the Archæologia, &c. Died, 1832; aged 97.

BREDA, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter; a very close imitator of the style of Wouvermans. Died, 1750.

BREENBERG, BARTHOLOMEW, a celebrated painter, particularly skilful in small landscapes. Born at Utrecht, 1620; died, 1660.

BREGUET, ABRAHAM LOUIS, an eminent watch and chronometer maker at Paris, by birth a Swiss. Born, 1747; died, 1823.

BREISLAK, SCIPIO, a celebrated Italian geologist, born at Rome in 1708, who under Buonaparte was appointed inspector of the salt-petre works and powder mills in Italy. He wrote several scientific works, and was intimate with Cuvier, Chaptal, &c. Died, 1826.

BREITINGUER, JOHN JAMES, a Swiss divine; editor of a new translation of the Septuagint, &c. Died, 1776.

BREITKOPF, JOHN GOTTLIEB EMMANUEL, a printer and type founder of Leipsic; he discovered an improved composition of type metal, and wrote a treatise on Bibliography, &c. Born, 1719; died, 1794.

BREMER, SIR JAMES JOHN GORDON, rear-admiral of the Blue, whose name is so well-known for his distinguished services in the war with China, was born in 1786. Entering the navy in 1794, he rose through the intermediate grades with much personal distinction, and in June, 1814, he became a post-captain. When captain of the Tamar, 26 guns, he was dispatched to form a settlement on Melville Island, Australia, and joined in the closing scenes of the Burmese war. In 1836, he was created a knight commander of the order of the Guelph (K.C.H.); and in 1837, in the Alligator, of 26 guns, he founded the settlement of Port Essington. He afterwards returned to India, and assumed the command in chief of that station, on the death of Sir F. L. Maitland, at the commencement of the Chinese war. To place on record the various distinguished achievements that in design owed their birth, and in execution their success, to his presiding genius, from the organisation of the expedition that left Singapore in 1840, on its mission of triumph and glory to China, until the final capture of Canton in 1841, would be to compile a history of the war itself. His services were rewarded by the dignity of K.C.B. being conferred on him; and the voice of the country was echoed in a vote of thanks to him from both Houses of Parliament. His last employment was as commodore superintendent of Woolwich dockyard, from which office he retired in consequence of ill health, in 1848. Died, 1850.

BRENNER, HENRY, royal librarian of Stockholm, an eminent oriental scholar; translator of the "History of Armenia" from the language of that country; and author of "Observations on Czar Peter the Great," &c. Died, 1732.

BRENNUS, a general of the Gauls, who after ravaging Thessaly and Greece, attempted to plunder the temple of Delphi. Being repulsed, he slew himself, 278 B.C.

BRENNUS, a memorable Gallic general.

Having invested Rome, he was offered a thousand pounds weight of gold to spare the city. While the gold was being weighed, he threw his sword and helmet into the opposite scale; and when reproached for his injustice, replied, with the scornful exclamation, "Væ victis!"—Woe to the vanquished! Enraged at this insolence, Camillus put an end to the negotiation, gave battle to the Gauls, and put them to flight. This occurred about 388 B.C.

BRENTON, Captain EDWARD PELHAM, R.N., an officer whose services at sea during the war were scarcely greater than those which he performed on shore and during peace. Gifted with great ingenuity, he made several mechanical improvements connected with his profession, of which naval men speak in the highest terms. He was the liberal supporter of several of the most useful charities in the metropolises. Of one of these, "the Children's Friend Society," he was, in fact, the founder; and it is not too much to say, that to it hundreds of poor children owe their removal from the horrors of vice and want, to a life of virtuous exertion, and its concomitant—comfort and happiness. Captain Brenton was also very favourably known as an author, by his "Naval History of Great Britain, from 1783 to 1822," and a "Biography of Earl St. Vincent." Died, 1839.

BREQUIGNY, LOUIS GEORGE, OUDARD DE FEUDIX, a learned French writer; author of "Histoire des Révolutions de Gènes," "Ordonnances des Rois de la Troisième Race," &c. Died, 1795.

BREREWOD, EDWARD, an English antiquary and mathematician; author of "The Patriarchal Government of the Ancient Church," a treatise "De Ponderibus et Pretii Veterum Nummorum," &c. Born, 1565; died, 1613.

BRET, ANTHONY, a French writer; author of "Commentaries on Moliere," "Quatre Saisons," a poem, &c. Died, 1792.

BRETEUIL, LOUIS AUGUSTE LE TONNELIER, an eminent French diplomatist, and at one time secretary of state; but being a zealous partisan of monarchy, he was compelled to flee from France at the commencement of the revolution. In 1802 he was permitted to return, and died in 1807.

BRETON, NICHOLAS, an English pastoral poet in the time of queen Elizabeth; author of "An Old Man's Lesson and a Young Man's Love," "Phyllida and Corydon," &c.

BRETON, RAYMOND, a French friar and missionary to the West Indies; author of a French and Caribbean Dictionary, &c. Died, 1679.

BRETSCHNEIDER, HENRY GODFREY VON, an Hungarian, whose versatility of talent was only equalled by the perseverance with which he exercised it in satirising the follies and impostures of the age. Born, 1739; died, 1810.

BREUGHEL, PETER, commonly known as "Old Breughel," an eminent painter; chiefly of common-life subjects, such as rustic merry-makings. Born near Breda, 1510; died, 1570.

BREUGHEL, JOHN, son of the foregoing, called, from his dress, "Velvet Breughel;" so excellent a landscape painter, that Rubens painted some pictures in conjunction with him, Rubens putting in the figures. Born at Brussels, 1640, died, 1625.

BREUGHEL, PETER, a brother of the above, and also a painter. His fondness for painting horrible subjects procured him the sobriquet of "Hellish." Died, 1642. Another brother, ABRAHAM, excelled in fruit and flowers.

BREVAL, JOHN DURANT DE, an English writer and military officer; author of "The History of the House of Nassau;" "Calpe," a poem, &c. Died, 1739.

BREWER, ANTHONY, a dramatist of the time of James I. and Charles I.; author of "The Lovesick King," "The Country Girl," &c.

BREYNIUS, JAMES, a botanist of Dantzic; author of "Fasciculus Plantarum Rariorum," &c. Died, 1697.

BREYNIUS, JOHN PHILIP, a naturalist of the 18th century; author of a treatise on the kermes insect, &c.

BRIDAINE, JAMES, an eminent French ecclesiastic, whose indefatigable zeal, or itinerant propensities, induced him to undertake 256 journeys, so that his powers were displayed in almost every village throughout France. He was the author of "Spiritual Songs," which were extremely popular. Born, 1701; died, 1767.

BRIDGEWATER, FRANCIS EGERTON, Duke of, a nobleman who devoted much attention to, and expended large sums in the improvement and extension of canal navigation, seconded by the skill of Brindley. Born, 1736; died, 1803.

BRIDPORT, ALEXANDER HOOD, Admiral lord, a gallant naval officer, and the youngest brother of Admiral Hood. He bore a part in Lord Howe's celebrated victory, June 1. 1794; in the following year he defeated a French squadron, capturing three sail of the line; and nobly distinguished himself on many other occasions during the war. Died, 1814.

BRIET, or BRIETIUS, PHILIP, a French writer; author of "Annales Mundi," "Theatrum Geographicum Europæ Veteris," &c. Died, 1668.

BRIGGS, HENRY, an eminent English mathematician and Savilian professor of geometry, at Oxford; author of "Arithmetica Logarithmica," "Tables for the Improvement of Navigation," "Animadversiones Geometricæ," &c. Born, 1536; died, 1630.

BRIGGS, WILLIAM, an eminent physician and oculist; author of "Ophthalmographia," an anatomical description of the eye and a new theory of vision. Died, 1704.

BRILL, MATTHEW, an eminent landscape painter, employed by pope Gregory XIII. in decorating the Vatican. Died, 1584.

BRILL, PAUL, brother of the last named, and also eminent as a landscape painter. Pope Clement VIII. employed him to paint a landscape sixty-eight feet wide for the Scala Clementina; in which piece he introduced St. Clement thrown into the sea with an anchor attached to his neck. Died, 1626.

BRILLAT-SAVARIN, ANTHELME, a French writer, known chiefly from his work, entitled "The Physiology of Taste." Born, 1755; died, 1826.

BRINDLEY, JAMES, an eminent English mechanic and engineer, to whose great zeal and abilities we owe some of the most important of our navigable canals. So highly, indeed, did he estimate their importance to a commercial nation, that, being jocularly asked, while under examination before a committee of the House, for what purpose he supposed rivers to have been created, he quite seriously replied, "To feed navigable canals." His first great work was the canal from Worsley to Manchester, which he executed for the Duke of Bridgewater. He afterwards completed the Grand Trunk, Birmingham, Chesterfield, and others. Born, 1716; died, 1772.

BRINKLEY, Dr. JOHN, bishop of Cloyne, an able divine, but still more eminent for his scientific acquirements, was born in 1760. While a graduate of Oxford he was elected to the professorship of astronomy in Dublin University, an honour to which his previous writings and discoveries in science fully entitled him. Died, September, 1835.

BRINVILLIERS, MARGUERITE D'AUBRAI, Marchioness of, horribly notorious for having poisoned her father, brother, and two sisters. She had formed a criminal attachment for a Gascon officer, named Godén St. Croix, and her family caused him to be sent to the Bastille. There he learned from a fellow prisoner the art of compounding subtle poisons, of which he and his mistress made use to avenge themselves on her family. His mask slipping from his face while he was distilling poison, he died suddenly; and her anxiety to obtain a casket that had belonged to him, led to inquiries which terminated in her detection. She was beheaded, and her body burnt, 1676.

BRISBANE, Admiral Sir CHARLES. He entered the navy, on board the Alcide, in 1779; received a severe wound in Rodney's fleet on the 12th of April, 1782; and was promoted to the rank of lieutenant in 1790. He shared the active services of Lord Hood off Toulon, and of Lord Nelson during the siege of Bastia, where he nearly lost an eye; was made captain in 1795; and the following year received the thanks of the Admiralty for his conduct during the capture of some Dutch ships in Saldanha Bay. The firmness with which Sir Charles acted, quelled the disposition to mutiny which then appeared through the fleet at the Cape. In 1805 he was appointed commander of the Arethusa; and in 1807 achieved the capture of the island of Curaçoa, when he received the honour of knighthood. The following year he was made governor of St. Vincent's, in which station he remained till his death; being raised to the rank of rear-admiral in 1805, and to that of vice-admiral in 1820. Died, 1829.

BRISSON, or BRISSONIUS, BARNABAS, an eminent French lawyer and philologist; author of a treatise "De Regio Persarum Principatio," &c. During the siege of Paris by Henry IV., in 1579, he remained in the city, and was compelled by the partisans of the League to act as first president of the parliament; and his conduct as a magistrate was made the pretext for putting him to death, in 1591.

BRISSON, MATHURIN JAMES, a French chemist and naturalist; author of a treatise on "Ornithology," "Principles of Chemistry," &c. Born, 1723; died, 1806.

BRISSOT, PIERRE, a French physician; author of a treatise in favour of bleeding in cases of pleurisy and inflammation of the viscera; and editor of Galen's treatise "De Curatione Morborum." Died, 1522.

BRISSOT, JEAN PIERRE, one of the most active of the French revolutionists, and a clever writer; author of "Le Courier Belgique," and other political journals; "A Plan of Conduct for the Deputies of the People," "Address to all Republicans," &c. He was a man of great and versatile ability, which he evinced both in the legislative assembly and as a member of the convention; but he had not the moral courage to abstain from a participation in those scenes of revolutionary violence which covered so many with eternal infamy, although his fruitless endeavour to save the life of the king shows that he in reality disapproved of them. Unable to resist the power of Robespierre, he endeavoured to escape to Switzerland, but was arrested, condemned, and executed, in 1793. Brissot was a great admirer of the Americans, assumed the habits of the Quakers, and introduced the fashion of wearing the hair without powder. He was also the leader of the party called the Girondists, or Brissotins.

BRITTON, THOMAS, a dealer in small coal, noted, on account of his attachment to music, as the "musical small-coal man." His harmless life was put an end to by a silly trick of a ventriloquist, which frightened him so much that he never recovered. Born, 1654; died, 1714.

BROCKLESBY, RICHARD, an eminent physician and literary man; author of some medical tracts, "A Dissertation on the Music of the Ancients," &c. Born, 1722; died, 1797.

BROGLIE, VICTOR FRANCIS, Duke de, a gallant French general under the old monarchy, who emigrated at the commencement of the revolution, and put himself at the head of a corps of emigrants at Champagne. Born, 1718; died, 1804.

BROGNIART, AUGUSTE LOUIS, a professor of chemistry, and surgeon to Louis XVI.; author of "Tableau Analytique des Combinaisons et Décompositions des Différentes Substances," &c. Died, 1804.

BROKE, Rear-admiral Sir PHILIP BOWES VERE, a gallant English officer, the eldest son of Philip B. Broke, esq., of Nacton, Suffolk, was born in 1776, and commenced his naval career as a midshipman in 1792. After the usual initiation, during which he was present in several general engagements, he obtained the rank of commander in 1799, and post-captain in 1801. The various services he subsequently performed in different parts of the globe, though they were neither few nor unimportant, we shall not enter upon; but he is chiefly celebrated for the far-famed action between his ship, the Shannon, of 38 guns, and the American frigate, Chesapeake, mounting 49, in June 1813. The news of a victory so nobly gained against such fearful odds—at a time when an opinion was gaining ground that our frigates were not a match for the large vessels (misnamed frigates) of the Americans—was hailed in England with every demonstration of national pride, and besides the complimentary congratulations that attended the gallant author of it, he was, for his "distinguished zeal, courage, and intrepidity," raised to the dignity of a baronet of Great Britain. Died, Jan. 2. 1841, at his seat, Brokehall, Suffolk.

BROME, ALEXANDER, an attorney and satirical poet, whose writings, on the side of Charles I., are said to have greatly obstructed the progress of puritanism. In addition to writing satirical songs, he translated from Lucretius and Horace, and wrote a comedy, called "The Cunning Lovers." Born, 1620; died, 1666.

BROME, RICHARD, an English dramatist, contemporary with Ben Jonson, to whom he was originally servant. His comedies were formerly very popular, but they are not now performed. Died, 1632.

BRONSTED, PETER OLAF, a distinguished Danish philologist and antiquary, was born in 1780, entered the university of Copenhagen in 1796, and took the degree of doctor in philosophy in 1806. In company with his friend Dr. Koes he made a scientific expedition to Greece, and in excavating the temples in Ægina, &c. many fine monuments in ancient Greek art were discovered. On his return to Denmark he was assisted with pecuniary means by the government, and appointed diplomatic agent to the Papal court in 1818. He afterwards travelled through the Ionian isles, Malta, and Sicily, for the purpose of prosecuting additional investigations; he subsequently made Paris his principal residence, coming occasionally to England; and in 1827 he visited his native country, where he received the honorary title of privy councillor of legation, and numerous other marks of distinction. The first part of his principal work, entitled "Travels and Researches in Greece," appeared in 1826, at Paris, simultaneously in the French and German languages; the second part in 1830. Died at Copenhagen, in consequence of a fall from his horse, June 26. 1842, aged 61.

BROOCMAN, CHARLES ULRIC, a Swedish writer on education, especially as regards the education of teachers. His principal work is "An Account of the Educational Institutions of Germany, from the earliest period up to his own time." Died, 1812.

BROOKE, or BROKE, Sir ROBERT, chief justice of the common pleas in the reign of queen Mary, and author of various legal works. Died, 1558.

BROOKE, FRANCES, a clever novelist and dramatic writer; authoress of "Lady Juliet Mandeville" and other novels; the tragedies of "Virginia" and the "Siege of Sinope;" "Rosina," a musical entertainment, &c. Died, 1789.

BROOKE, HENRY, a political and literary writer; author of "Letters addressed to the People of Ireland," "The Earl of Westmoreland," a tragedy; the celebrated novel of "The Fool of Quality," &c. Born at Rantavan, in Ireland, 1706; died, 1783.

BROOKES, JOSHUA, an eminent anatomist and surgeon, was born in 1761; and after studying under the most celebrated men of his day, commenced his career as a professor of anatomy, pathology, and surgery, when about 26 years of age. His museum was enriched with the choicest anatomical specimens and osteological preparations; and the lectures on anatomy and its kindred sciences, which, during a long life, he was in the habit of delivering to his pupils (of whom he could reckon 7000), laid the foundation of their scientific fame to some of the most distinguished members of the profession. His last appearance as a lecturer was in 1827; and in January, 1833, he died, aged 72.

BROOKS, JOHN, an able officer in the American army, a skilful physician, and a man of letters. He early distinguished himself in the war of American independence, and ultimately arrived at the rank of a general; but the duties of a soldier did not unfit him for professional pursuits; he was the president of many literary, religious, patriotic, and benevolent societies; and for many years filled the office of chief magistrate for his native town, Medford, in Massachusetts. Born, 1752; died, 1825.

BROOME, Dr. WILLIAM, an English divine and poet. In addition to his own poems, and a translation of Anacreon's Odes, he contributed eight books to Pope's translation of the Odyssey; but having complained of his scanty remuneration, his brother bard rewarded him with a niche in the Dunciad. He was vicar of Eye, Suffolk, where he died, in 1745.

BROSCHI, CARLO, better known by the name of Farinelli, one of the finest singers ever known. He was retained to divert the melancholy of Philip V. of Spain, and acquired vast political power in the reigns of that monarch and his successor. Unlike the generality of royal favourites, he behaved with invariable modesty and honour. Born at Naples, 1705; died, 1782.

BROSSARD, SEBASTIAN DE, an eminent French musician; author of "Prodomus Musicalis," &c. Died, 1730.

BROSSE, GUY DE LA, a French botanist and physician to Louis XIII.; author of "L'Overture du Jardin Royal," and other botanical works. Died, 1751.

BROSSES, CHARLES DE, a French lawyer and the schoolfellow and friend of Buffon; author of "Letters on Herculaneum," &c. Born, 1709; died, 1777.

BROTHERS, RICHARD, a fanatic, who, in 1793, commenced his career as the apostle of a new religion, and announced himself as "nephew of the Almighty and prince of the Hebrews, appointed to lead them to the land of Canaan." He predicted various absurdities, and it is a melancholy fact that his disciples were not confined to the poor and ignorant. The great orientalist, Halhed, and other men of unquestionable ability, advocated this maniac, whose career at length attracted the notice of government, and he was committed to Bedlam for life as a confirmed lunatic. He published several works, redolent alike of blasphemy and absurdity.

BROTIER, GABRIEL, a learned French Jesuit, and librarian to the college of Louis le Grand; author of a treatise "On the Ancient Hebrew, Greek, and Roman Coins," an excellent edition of Tacitus, and other classics, &c. Born, 1723; died, 1789.

BROTIER, ANDREW CHARLES, a French abbé, nephew of the above. He was a friend to the royalist cause, and the editor of L'Année Littéraire, which was so obnoxious to the party in power that he was transported to Guiana, where he died, in 1798.

BROUGHTON, HUGH, a learned Hebrew scholar and polemical writer, who was educated at the expense of the celebrated Bernard Gilpin. Born, 1549; died, 1612.

BROUGHTON, THOMAS, a prebendary of Salisbury, and a literary character of considerable merit; author of "Christianity distinct from the Religion of Nature," "Dissertations on the Prospects of Futurity," "Hercules," a drama, &c. He was also one of the principal contributors to the Biographia Britannica. Died, 1774.

BROUNCKER, WILLIAM, Lord, the first president of the Royal Society at Oxford, and author of some papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. Died, 1584.

BROUSSAIS, FRANÇOIS JOSEPH VICTOR, a celebrated French physician, the author of some very learned medical works, which, however, are very much defaced by the crude and most dogmatical materialism. Born, 1772; died, 1838.

BROUSSONET, PETER AUGUSTUS MARIA, an eminent French naturalist; author of "Ithyologia," "Varie Positiones circa Respirationem," &c. Born, 1761; died, 1807.

BROWALLIUS, JOHN, bishop of Abo; an eminent naturalist, and the author of various tracts on botany, &c. Died, 1755.

BROWN, CHARLES BROCKDEN, an eminent American writer, chiefly known in this country by his powerful novels, "Wieland" and "Edgar Huntley." Died, 1810.

BROWN, JOHN, D.D., an eminent clergyman and indefatigable writer. He was born, in 1715, at Rothbury, Northumberland, educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; and after various church preferments became chaplain to the king. The chief of his numerous works are "Essays on the Characteristics of the Earl of Shaftesbury," "Barbarossa," a tragedy; an "Estimate of the Manners and Principles of the Times," a "History of the Rise and Progress of Poetry," and "Thoughts on Civil Liberty, Licentiousness, and Faction." It is supposed that his mental exertions were too great, for he fell into a state of dejection, which terminated in his death, by his own hand, in 1766.

BROWN, JOHN, a Scotch painter and author, favourably known in the former character by his painting of the bust of Homer from the Townley marbles, and by his portrait of Pope. As an author he is even more distinguished by his "Letters on the Poetry and Music of the Italian Opera," which he addressed to his friend, Lord Monboddo. Born, 1752; died, 1787.

BROWN, JOHN, a very learned, though self-educated Scotch divine; author of the "Self-interpreting Bible," "Dictionary of the Bible," and numerous other religious works. Born, 1772; died, 1787.

BROWN, JOHN, M.D., an eminent Scotch physician, and the founder of a new system of medicine, which bears his name. He divided all diseases into two great classes,—the one from deficient excitement, and the other from its redundancy; and though his opinions have not been unconditionally received, they have very materially influenced the practice of his professional successors. Dr. Brown's principal works are "Elements of Medicine" and "Observations on the Old Systems of Physic." Born, 1735; died, 1788.

BROWN, JOHN, an eminent English engraver; his best works are engravings from Salvator Rosa. Died, 1801.

BROWN, LAUNCELOT, an eminent landscape gardener, whose great merit consisted in imitating nature, and abandoning the stiff and clipped formality so universally prevalent at that time in the pleasure grounds of our nobility. From his constant use of the phrase, "this spot has great capabilities," he was called Capability Brown. Born, 1715; died, 1782.

BROWN, ROBERT, an English clergyman, founder of the sect of Brownists, subsequently better known by the title of Independents. His chief work was a controversial one, "A Treatise on Reformation, without tarrying for any Man." Notwithstanding his violent hostility to the Church, he at length became reconciled to it either through conviction or policy, and obtained a benefice; but his character remained as violent as ever; and, when 80 years old, he was imprisoned in Northampton gaol for an assault, and died there in 1630.

BROWN, THOMAS, a humorous writer, more distinguished for wit than for morality. His works, indeed, notwithstanding their great literary merit, have fallen into comparative oblivion on account of their coarseness. Died, 1704.

BROWN, Dr. THOMAS, an able metaphysician and moral essayist; professor of moral philosophy at Edinburgh. He wrote "Observations on Darwin's Zoonomia," some poems, and several moral and metaphysical essays; but his fame chiefly rests upon his treatise "On the Philosophy of the Human Mind," a work which is deservedly held in very high estimation. Born, 1777; died, 1820.

BROWNE, GEORGE, Count de, an Irish officer in the Russian service, who so nobly distinguished himself on many great occasions, that he was rewarded with the government of Livonia; from which, when he had held it 30 years, he wished to retire, but Catharine II. would not accept his resignation, replying, "Death alone shall part us." Born, 1698; died, 1792.

BROWNE, ISAAC HAWKINS, an English lawyer and poet. His best English works are a poem addressed to Highmore, the painter, "On Design and Beauty;" and a shorter one, called "The Pipe of Tobacco," in which he very skillfully imitated the tone of thought and expression of Cibber, Philips, Thomson, Young, Swift, and Pope. The work, however, on which his reputation chiefly depends, is a Latin poem, on the Immortality of the Soul. Born, 1706; died, 1776.

BROWNE, PATRICK, M.D., an eminent naturalist; author of "The Civil and Natural History of Jamaica," catalogues of the birds and fish of Ireland, and of the plants of the Sugar Islands. Born in Ireland, 1720; died, 1790.

BROWNE, SIMON, a dissenting minister of considerable ability, but chiefly remarkable for an unhappy hallucination. He imagined that "God had annihilated in him the thinking substance, and utterly divested him of consciousness." This delusion perpetually haunted him, and yet he furnished the completest refutation to it by composing several argumentative tracts, and by some very laborious compilations. Died, 1732.

BROWNE, Sir THOMAS, an eminent physician and learned author. His "Religio Medici" attracted much notice; and his treatises "On Urn Burial" and "On Vulgar Errors" abound with curious erudition, in which, however, they are excelled by his tract, entitled "The Garden of Cyrus." Of his style Dr. Johnson was the defender; and also, perhaps unconsciously, in some degree the imitator. Born 1605; died, 1682.

BROWNE, EDWARD, son of Sir Thomas, physician to Charles II., translator of some of the Lives of Plutarch, and author of an amusing book of travels. Born, 1642; died, 1708.

BROWNE, ULYSSES MAXIMILIAN, the son of an expatriated Irish officer, entered the Austrian service, and by his great skill and bravery, when employed against the Turks, rose to the rank of field-marshal. He afterwards greatly distinguished himself at Placentia and other places in Italy; and at length died of the wounds he received at the battle of Prague. Born, 1705; died, 1757.

BROWNE, Sir WILLIAM, an able and eccentric physician of the 18th century. He was the author of numerous optical and other essays; and, at his death, bequeathed a sum of money for the provision of three medals, of the value of five guineas each, for Greek and Latin odes and epigrams by undergraduates of Cambridge. Born, 1692; died, 1774.

BROWNE, WILLIAM, an English poet of the 17th century; author of "Britannia's Pastorals," "The Shepherd's Pipe," &c.

BROWNE, WILLIAM GEORGE, an enterprising English traveller; author of "Travels in Africa, Egypt, and Assyria." He was murdered while on his way to explore the regions south of the Caspian, by a Persian banditti, in 1814.

BROWNRIGG, WILLIAM, an ingenious physician and natural philosopher; author of "The Art of making common Salt," treatises on platina and carbonic acid, &c. Died, 1800.

BRUCE, ROBERT, a descendant of David, earl of Huntingdon, and competitor with John Balliol for the crown of Scotland, at the death of Alexander III.

BRUCE, ROBERT, grandson of the above, and the most heroic of the Scottish kings. After many desperate struggles he totally defeated Edward II. at the battle of Bannockburn, and thus firmly established himself on the throne; but his life was so completely devoted to his country, that it belongs rather to history than to biography to be his chronicler. He was born in 1274; died, 1329.

BRUCE, JAMES, one of the most celebrated of modern travellers. For a short time he held the post of British consul at Algiers, but resigned it in order to gratify his passion for travelling. After traversing the greater portion of Asia Minor, he set out on a journey to ascertain the source of the Nile. An account of this journey he subsequently published; and some of his statements, particularly those which referred to the manners and customs of Abyssinia, were received with mingled incredulity and ridicule. Though greatly annoyed by the disgraceful illiberality with which he had been treated, he bore the taunts and sneers of his shallow critics with a taciturn pride, not deigning to satisfy disbelief, or to disarm ridicule, but trusting the day would ere long arrive when the truth of what he had written would be confirmed by others; and it is now clearly proved, from the statements of many subsequent travellers, that he was every way undeserving of the censure bestowed on him. He was born at Kinnaid House, Stirlingshire, in 1730; and died, in consequence of an injury sustained by falling down stairs, at his paternal estate, in 1794.

BRUCE, JOHN, an able writer on commerce, moral philosophy, and political economy; author of "First Principles of Philosophy," "Annals of the East India Company," &c. Died, 1826, aged 82.

BRUCE, MICHAEL, a Scotch poet. His parents being of the poorest class, his early life was one of considerable privation. This and his ardent attachment to poetry, probably aggravated a constitutional predisposition to consumption, and he died in the 21st year of his age, in 1767. His poems are few in number, but singularly plaintive and elegant.

BRUCE, PETER HENRY, a German military officer of Scotch descent. He was at the battle of Pruth, and was several times employed by the Russian court in diplomatic missions. His memoirs, published after his death, give some curious details of his travels. He died in Scotland in 1757.

BRUCKER, JOHN JAMES, a German Lutheran clergyman; author of "Historia Critica Philosophiæ," &c. Born, 1696; died, 1770.

BRUCKNER, JOHN, a Lutheran divine, pastor of the Walloon congregation at Norwich; author of "Théorie du Système Animale," "Criticism on the Diversions of Purley," &c. Born, 1726; died, 1804.

BRUEYS, DAVID AUGUSTIN, a French dramatic writer; in early life a Protestant, but afterwards a bigoted adherent to the Catholic faith. Born, 1640; died, 1723.

BRUEYS, FRANCIS PAUL, a gallant French admiral, commanding the fleet which conveyed the army of Buonaparte to Egypt, and killed at the battle of the Nile.

BRUGMANS, SEBALD JUSTINUS, a learned Dutchman, physician-in-chief of the army, and the author of some valuable medical works. After the union of Holland with France, Napoleon made him inspector-general of the hospitals; and it has been remarked that so skilful were his arrangements, that the number of deaths by wounds and diseases was never increased by hospital fevers. After the battle of Waterloo, he promptly procured medical aid for upwards of 20,000 men. Born, 1763; died, 1819.

BRUGNATELLI, LOUIS, an Italian physician and chemist; author of "Bibliotheca Tisica d'Europe," &c. Born, 1726; died, 1818.

BRUGUIERES, JOHN WILLIAM, a French naturalist and physician; author of many essays on subjects of natural history, the best of which is the "Natural History of Worms" in the Encyclopédie Méthodique. Died, 1799.

BRUHL, HENRY, Count of, minister of Augustus III. king of Poland; one of the most artful and expensive courtiers that ever governed a weak and credulous prince. He kept 200 domestics, paying them better than the king himself, and furnishing a more sumptuous table; but, as was natural, he plunged the country into debt and disgrace. Born, 1700; died, 1763.—Various members of this family have attained distinction. FREDERIC, a son of the preceding, besides being remarkable for his skill in the fine arts, wrote several good plays. Died, 1793. HANS MORITZ, his nephew, gained some reputation as an astronomer and political economist, and died while Saxon ambassador in London, 1809.

BRUMOY, PETER, a learned French Jesuit; author of the "Théâtre des Grecs," "History of the Gallican Church," &c. Born, 1688; died, 1742.

BRUNCK, RICHARD FRANCIS PHILIP, a profound classical scholar and critic, was born at Strasburg, but educated by the Jesuits at Paris. For some time he was employed in state affairs, but at length devoted himself wholly to study; and produced the "Greek Anthology," besides highly valuable editions of Aristophanes, Sophocles, Virgil, &c. When the revolution broke out, he took part in it, and was imprisoned at Besançon by the tyrant Robespierre, whose death, however, released him. Born 1729; died, 1803.

BRUNE, W. M. A., a French marshal, born in 1763. Law and literature occupied his attention till the French revolution, when he embraced the military profession, and served as adjutant under Dumourier, in the campaign of 1791. He afterwards served under Buonaparte, in Italy, gaining rapid promotion; and in 1799 he was commander-in-chief of the French and Dutch forces in North Holland, who so successfully opposed the English under the Duke of York. In 1803, he was sent as ambassador to Constantinople, and, during his absence, was made a marshal. On his return he was appointed governor of the Hanseatic cities, in which station he gave some offence to Napoleon, and their cordiality ceased. He submitted to the Bourbons in 1814; but, on his old master's return from Elba, he joined him and took the command of a division of the army in the south of France; and, on the emperor's second abdication, he was put to death by a royalist party at Avignon, August 2. 1815.

BRUNEAU, MATHURIN, an adventurer, who in 1818 assumed the title of Charles of France, was the son of a clog maker. After numerous efforts to pass for some person of importance, he was incarcerated; and from his confinement addressed a letter, signed Dauphin Bourbon, to the governor of the Isle of Guernsey, requesting him to inform his Britannic Majesty of the captivity of Louis XVII. This letter being intercepted by the local authorities, Bruneau was transferred to the prison at Rouen: here he engaged a person named Branzon as his secretary, who found means so far to impose on the Duchess d'Angoulême, as to obtain her interest; and at length a party in his favour procured him abundant supplies. This encouraged the enterprise, until the principal, his secretary, and many friends were brought before the bar of justice, where Bruneau was declared an impostor and a vagabond, and condemned to seven years' imprisonment. Finding, however, that the fraud was still maintained by a powerful party, he was removed to the prison at Caen in 1821, and was afterwards sent to end his days in the castle of Mont Saint Michael.

BRUNEL, Sir ISAMBERT, the well-known executor of that great work of engineering skill, the Thames Tunnel, was born at Haqueville in Normandy, 1769. He was intended for the Church; but he soon evinced so strong a predilection for the physical sciences, and so great a genius for mathematics, that he entered the royal navy, made several voyages to the West Indies, and returned home in 1792. During the French revolution he emigrated to the United States, where necessity, fortunately, compelled him to follow the natural bent of his mind, and to adopt the profession of a civil engineer. Here he was engaged in many great works; but, determined upon visiting England, he offered his services to the British government; and, after much opposition to his plans for making ship-blocks by machinery, he was employed to execute them in Plymouth Dockyard. With a true discrimination, he selected Mr. Henry Maudsley to assist in the execution of the work; and thus was laid the foundation of one of the most extensive engineering establishments in the kingdom, and in which, perhaps, a degree of science and skill has been combined and applied to mechanical invention and improvement scarcely exceeded by any other in the world. The block machinery was finished in 1806; and has continued ever since in full operation, supplying our fleet with blocks of very superior description to those previously in use, and at a large annual saving to the public. The visit of the emperor Alexander to this country, after the peace, led him to submit to the emperor a plan for making a tunnel under the Neva; where the accumulation of ice, and the suddenness with which it breaks up on the termination of winter, rendered the erection of a bridge a work of great difficulty. This was the origin of his plan for a tunnel under the Thames, which had been twice before attempted without success. The history of that great work is too familiar to require that we should repeat it here, but it only crowned a long life almost wholly devoted to the invention and construction of works of great public utility. Mr. Brunel received the honour of knighthood from Lord Melbourne's administration. He was a vice-president of the Royal Society, a corresponding member of the Institute of France, a vice-president of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and a chevalier of the Legion of Honour. Died, 1849.

BRUNELLESCHI, PHILIP, a Florentine architect, patronised by Cosmo de Medici. Among the chief of his architectural works are the Pitti Palace, the monastery of Fiesole, and the cupola of the cathedral church of Santa Maria del Friare at Florence. He was also a sculptor and a poet, as well as an architect; and some of his burlesque verses are published with those of Burchiello. Born, 1377; died, 1446.

BRUNNER, JOHN CONRAD, baron de Brunn, a Swiss physician and anatomist; author of various tracts on physiology and anatomy. Born, 1653; died, 1727.

BRUNO, a saint of the Romish calendar, and founder of the Carthusian order of monks, the first house of which he established in the desert of Chartreuse. Born, 1030; died, 1101.

BRUNO, surnamed THE GREAT, archbishop of Cologne and duke of Lorraine; an able politician, who took a conspicuous part in all the great transactions of his time. He was the brother of the emperor Otho I., and died in 965.

BRUNO, GIORDANO, a Neapolitan, and originally a monk of the Dominican order. The boldness with which he censured the irregularities of his monastery, obliged him to leave it; and, flying to Geneva, he embraced the Protestant religion. Beza and Calvin, however, obliged him to quit that city, and he proceeded to Paris, where he excited much attention by his strictures on the Aristotelian philosophy. After visiting England he settled at Padua, where his freedom of speech attracted the attention of the Inquisition of Venice. He was apprehended, and, refusing to recant, he was burnt in 1600.

BRUNSWICK, FERDINAND, Duke of, one of the principal generals in the seven years war in Germany. Born, 1721; died, 1792.

BRUNSWICK WOLFENBUTTEL, MAXIMILIAN JULIUS LEOPOLD, brother of the preceding, a prince whose name is revered for his disinterested benevolence and humanity, of which the last action of his life is a striking example:—During a terrible inundation of the Oder, which spread destruction in the neighbourhood of Frankfort, where the prince commanded a regiment in the garrison, his zeal to save the lives of a family surrounded by the waters, induced him to put off in a boat to their assistance, when he was swept away by the torrent, and perished in the humane attempt. Born, 1751; died, 1785.

BRUNSWICK LUNENBURGH, CHARLES WILLIAM FERDINAND, Duke of, nephew of the preceding. He studied the art of war under his uncle, and highly distinguished himself in the service of Frederick of Prussia. At the commencement of the French revolution, he took the command of the Prussian and Austrian forces intended for the liberation of Louis XVI.; but the violent manifesto he published served only to stimulate the republican army under Dumourier, and he was compelled to retreat. The ill success of this expedition caused him to resign the command, and occupy himself with the domestic affairs of his new province. In 1806 he was again appointed leader of the Prussian army, and was mortally wounded at the battle of Auerstadt in that year.

BRUNSWICK OELS, FREDERIC AUGUSTUS, Duke of, younger brother of the above, and a general officer in the Prussian service. He was more distinguished as an author than as a general, his treatise on Great Men, "Remarks on the Character and Actions of Alexander the Great," and numerous other works, having been much admired, though only privately circulated. Born, 1741; died, 1805.

BRUNSWICK, FREDERICK WILLIAM, Duke of, youngest son of Charles William Ferdinand of Brunswick, and brother of the persecuted queen Caroline of England, was born in 1771. He soon entered the Prussian army, and, stimulated by his father's unhappy fate and the wrongs of his country, took an active part in the war against revolutionary France. In 1809 he raised a body of volunteers in Bohemia; but finding no chance of making an effectual stand against the power of France, he embarked his troops for England, where they were taken into the British service, and employed in the Peninsula. Foreseeing that great changes were likely to take place on the Continent, he hastened to his paternal dominions in 1813, raised a large body of troops, and was among the foremost to meet the French army in 1815, when, two days before the decisive battle of Waterloo, he fell, gallantly fighting at the head of his "brave Brunswickers."

BRUNTON, MARY, the daughter of Colonel Balfour, was born in one of the Orkney isles; married a minister of the Scotch church; and is known as the authoress of the excellent novels, "Discipline," "Self Control," and other valuable works. Born, 1778; died, 1818.

BRUSONIUS, L. DOMITIUS, author of a work entitled "Facetiarum Exemplorumque Libri VII.;" but better known by the title of "Speculum Mundi."

BRUTO, JOHN MICHAEL, an eminent traveller and writer of the 16th century; author of a "History of Hungary," "Critical Annotations on the Works of Cicero, Horace," &c., and of the "Eight first Books of the History of Florence." Died, 1594.

BRUTUS, LUCIUS JUNIUS, one of the most celebrated characters of antiquity, was the son of Marcus Junius, a wealthy patrician of Rome. The father and brother of Lucius Junius were assassinated by order of their relative, Tarquin the Proud; and Lucius Junius owed the preservation of his life to an assumed idiotism. So completely did this impose upon the tyrant, that he not only spared his young relative's life, but brought him up in his own family, where he was treated as a mere idiot, and surnamed Brutus. He bore all contumely with patience until the outrage of Sextus Tarquin [see LUCRETIA] afforded him an opportunity to arouse the people against both the king and his sons. Throwing off his pretended want of intellect, and displaying an energy the more startling by contrast with his former manner, he joined with Lucretia's husband, Collatinus; caused the gates to be shut, assembled the senate, dilated upon the tyrannies of Tarquin, and caused a decree to be made for banishing the king and establishing a republic. This great change accordingly took place, and Brutus and Collatinus were appointed chief magistrates of the commonwealth with the title of consuls. Terrible as the tyranny of Tarquin had been, his expulsion and the entire change in the form of government gave great offence to many of the Roman patricians; and among those who were opposed to the new constitution were the two sons of Brutus and three nephews of Collatinus, all of whom conspired, with other malcontents, to murder the two consuls and restore Tarquin and the monarchy. The intentions of the conspirators were disclosed by a slave to Poplicola Valerius, a senator; and the conspirators were brought before the consular tribunal for judgment. Mischievous as were the intentions of the criminals, the people would fain have punished them only by banishment; and Collatinus, in his affection for his nephews, was equally disposed to be lenient. Brutus, on the contrary, determined to show that no rank or relationship should avail the enemies of Roman liberty; and disregarding the entreaties of the multitude and his own feelings as a parent, he sternly sentenced his sons to death. Collatinus, even after this signal proof of the inflexibility of Brutus, endeavoured to save his nephews. But the young men were executed, and Collatinus retired from the consulship. Poplicola Valerius was elected as his successor, and, in conjunction with Brutus, proceeded against the Veientes, who with Tarquin and his partisans were marching against Rome. The Roman cavalry was commanded by Brutus, while the enemy's cavalry was led on by Aruns, one of the sons of Tarquin. These leaders were speedily engaged hand to hand; and so great was their mutual hate, that each in his desire to wound his opponent neglected to protect himself; and they both fell dead upon the field. The conflict ending in the victory of the Romans, the body of Brutus was interred with great solemnity, and a statue was erected to his memory. His death took place B.C. 509.

BRUTUS, MARCUS JUNIUS, an illustrious Roman, and a descendant of the preceding. His mother was the sister of Cato; and as she had disgraced herself by an intrigue with Julius Cæsar, Marcus was by many thought to be his son. He at first sided with Pompey, but being treated with great lenity and consideration after the battle of Pharsalia, he attached himself to Cæsar, by whom he was greatly caressed and entrusted. But the stern republican spirit of his reputed ancestor, which he inherited, rendered it impossible for all Cæsar's kindness to him to reconcile him to Cæsar's ambition; and he at length conspired with Cassius and others, and slew him, B.C. 39.

Antony succeeded in exciting the popular indignation against the murderers of Cæsar, who fled from Rome, and raised an army, of which Brutus and Cassius took the command; but being totally defeated at the battle of Philippi, where they encountered the army of Antony, Brutus escaped with only a few friends, passed the night in a cave, and, as he saw his cause irretrievably ruined, requested Strato, one of his confidants, to kill him. For a long time his friend refused; but on hearing Brutus call one of his slaves to perform the fatal office, he exclaimed, "Forbid it, Gods, that it should ever be said that Brutus died by the hand of a slave for want of a friend!" and presenting the sword as he turned away his face, the noble Roman fell on it and expired, B.C. 42, in the 43d year of his age.

BRUYERE, JOHN DE LA, an eminent French writer; author of "Dialogues on Quietism," published after his decease; and of "Theophrastus, translated from the Greek, with the Manners of the present Age." Of this admirable and admired work Voltaire says, "Its rapid and nervous style struck the public at once; and the allusions to living persons, which abound through its pages, completed its success." Born, 1644; died, 1696.

BRYAN, MICHAEL, a connoisseur of paintings, whose judgment was highly esteemed, though he lost large sums by his own purchases. He was the author of a valuable "Biographical and Critical Dictionary of Painters and Engravers." Born, 1757; died, 1821.

BRYAN, or BRIANT, Sir FRANCIS, a distinguished soldier and statesman. He served with great credit against the French in the Earl of Surrey's expedition, and subsequently became chief justiciary of Ireland. He is chiefly memorable, however, as a poet; his works being printed with those of his friends Wyatt and Lord Surrey. Died, 1550.

BRYANT, JACOB, a distinguished antiquarian and philologist; author of an able, though singular, "Analysis of Ancient Mythology," published in three vols. 4to; a treatise on the Truth of Christianity, a work in denial of the existence of Troy, and various other publications of great erudition and ingenuity. Born, 1715; died, 1804.

BRIDGES, Sir SAMUEL EGERTON, bart., a gentleman of versatile talents and eccentric character, was born in 1762, at Wootton Court, in Kent, and was educated at the King's School, Canterbury, and at Queen's College, Cambridge. In 1790, after the death of the last Duke of Chandos, he induced his elder brother, the Rev. E. T. Bridges, to prefer a claim to the barony of Chandos, the consideration of which was long procrastinated; but at length, in 1803, the House of Lords decided against its validity. On the death of his brother, in 1807, Sir Egerton pertinaciously adhered to his favourite, though illusory notion, of obtaining a coronet; maintaining that, though defeated by parliamentary law, he could, when he pleased, assert his rights by common law, while he regularly added to the signature of his name—"per legem terræ, B. C. of S."—meaning Baron Chandos of Sudely. He made several unsuccessful attempts to obtain a seat in parliament, but was ultimately (1812) returned for Maidstone, which borough he continued to represent about six years. In 1814 he was created a baronet; and in 1818, upon the loss of his seat in the House of Commons, he visited many parts of the Continent. In 1826 he returned to England, for two years, and took up his abode at Lee Priory, the seat of Col. Brydges Barrett, his eldest son; at the expiration of which time, his affairs becoming inextricably embarrassed, he finally quitted his native land, and removed to Geneva, where he remained in great seclusion until his death. His literary labours were exceedingly multifarious; poetry, romance, politics, genealogical antiquities, and topography, were the principal; and in many he acquitted himself with considerable skill. His abilities as a genealogist, topographer, and bibliographer, are attested by his "Censura Literaria Restituta," 10 vols.; "Theatrum Poetarum;" "Stemmata Illustria;" "British Bibliography;" "Lex Terræ," &c. Besides these, he published the novels of "Mary de Clifford," "Arthur Fitz-Albini," and "The Hall of Hellingsey;" "Imaginary Biography," 3 vols.; "Recollections of Foreign Travels," 2 vols.; "The Autobiography, Times, Opinions, and Contemporaries of Sir Egerton Brydges," 2 vols.; and numerous others; independent of contributions to many periodicals on almost every subject. Died, September, 1837.

BYDONE, PATRICK, a Scotch gentleman; author of "Travels into Sicily and Malta," &c. Born, 1741; died, 1819.

BRYENNIUS, MANUEL, an early musical composer; he published, in the 14th century, a treatise on harmonies, of which a Latin translation, together with the compositions of the author, was published by Dr. Wallis in 1699.

BUACHE, PHILIP, an able French hydrographer; author of some valuable hydrographical and geographical works. Born, 1700; died, 1775.

BUAT NANCAY, LOUIS GABRIEL DU, an eminent French diplomatist and writer; author of a "History of the Ancient Nations of Europe," "Maxims of Monarchical Government," &c. Born, 1732; died, 1787.

BUC, Sir GEORGE, historian and antiquary, was gentleman of the privy chamber to James I.; and author of "The Life of Richard III.," "The Art of Revels," &c.

BUCHER, MARTIN, a friend of Luther, and so eminent a preacher of the reformed faith, that Cranmer, when archbishop of Canterbury, invited him to England, and he became professor of theology at Cambridge. Born, 1491; died, 1551.

BUCHAN, Right Hon. STUART ERSKINE, Earl of, a nobleman indefatigably devoted to literary and scientific pursuits, and who may justly be styled the founder of the Antiquarian Society in Scotland. In 1791 he instituted an annual commemoration at Ednam, the birthplace of Thomson, in honour of the poet; and on that occasion

Burns composed his "Address to the Shade of the Bard of Ednam." Died, 1829.

BUCHAN, WILLIAM, M.D., a native of Scotland, and author of the well known "Domestic Medicine," &c. Born, 1729; died, 1805.

BUCHANAN, GEORGE, an eminent Scotch historian and poet. The few works which he wrote in his vernacular tongue are greatly admired; but his fame chiefly rests on his Latin works, which are singularly beautiful in their style. Born, 1506; died, 1582.

BUCHANAN, CLAUDIUS, D.D., a Scotch divine, chaplain at Bengal, and professor and vice-provost of the college at Fort William. Of his numerous works the most interesting are "Christian Researches in Asia" and a "Memoir on the Expediency of an Ecclesiastical Establishment in India." Born, 1766; died, 1815.

BUCHOZ, P. JOSEPH, a naturalist and botanist of Metz, who must have been one of the most industrious compilers that ever lived, his works forming more than 300 volumes. Born, 1737; died, 1807.

BUCKINGHAM, GEORGE VILLIERS, Duke of, the unworthy favourite of James I. and Charles I., was raised to the highest offices in the state, became the dispenser of all favours and honours, and conducted himself with so much pride and insolence as to excite popular hatred and disgust. Being entrusted with the command of an army, he lost the flower of it in an ill-conducted attack on the Isle of Rhé, and returned to refit his shattered armament. When he was again about to sail, he was assassinated at Portsmouth, by a lieutenant of the name of Felton, August 23. 1628.

BUCKINGHAM, GEORGE VILLIERS, Duke of, son of the preceding, was born in 1627; studied at Cambridge; served the king in the civil wars; had his estates seized by the parliament, which, however, were afterwards restored to him; and he eventually became a minister to Charles II., and was one of his most profligate courtiers. His political conduct was, like his general behaviour, characterised by unprincipled levity and imprudence; and though his literary and conversational powers were far above mediocrity, yet he was an object of contempt, and died, unregretted, at Kirby Moorside, Yorkshire, in 1688.

BUCKINGHAM AND CHANDOS, ANNE ELIZA, Duchess of, daughter and heiress of the last Duke of Chandos; born in 1779; married to the Marquis of Buckingham, then Earl Temple, in 1796. Throughout life this amiable and accomplished woman displayed those traits of character which shed the brightest lustre on exalted rank, and hallow the memory of their possessors. She was boundless in her charities; pious, affectionate, and sincere; withdrawing from the "poms and vanities" of the world, to indulge in the charms of retirement, where she could encourage the deserving, reform the erring, and minister to the necessities of the distressed. Died at Stowe, 1836.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, JOHN SHIEFFIELD, Duke of, son of the Earl of Mulgrave, was born in 1649; served under Marshal Turenne, and took a part in the revolution of 1668. He also distinguished himself as a poet. Buckingham House, in St. James's Park, since converted into a royal palace, was originally built for him. Died, 1720.

BUCKINK, ARNOLD, an artist of the 15th century, and the first who engraved maps on copper. He illustrated an edition of Ptolemy, which was printed by Sweynheim, of Rome, one of the earliest printers in that country.

BUCKMINSTER, JOSEPH STEVENS, an American divine, of great reputation as an orator and man of letters; author of numerous sermons and orations; and editor of an American edition of "Griesbach's Greek Testament." Born, 1784; died, 1812.

BUDDÆUS, JOHN FRANCIS, a Lutheran divine; professor of theology at Jena, and author of a "German Historical Dictionary," &c. Died, 1729.

BUDGELL, EUSTACE, a distinguished writer, honoured with the friendship of Addison, and other great men of his time, was born at Exeter, in 1685. He wrote memoirs of the "Boyles," "The History of Cleomenes," and numerous papers in the Guardian and other periodicals. He committed suicide in 1737.

BUFFON, GEORGE LOUIS LE CLERC, Count de, an eminent French writer; author of the well known "Histoire Naturelle, Générale et Particulière," a work replete with majestic descriptions of nature and profound thoughts, and one which, however the vagueness of some of its hypotheses may be criticised, will ever command the admiration of mankind. Born at Montbard, Burgundy, 1707; died, 1788.

BUGEAUD, Marshal, duke of Isly, a distinguished French soldier, was born at Limoges in 1784. By the maternal side he was descended from an old Irish family. At an early age he showed a decided predilection for the army; but his family thwarted his views, and he only succeeded by running away from home, and becoming a private soldier. He was promoted to the rank of corporal on the field of Austerlitz; and rose through all the grades of his profession, till he reached the rank of general in 1832. His attachment to the cause of Louis Philippe led, in 1833, to his appointment of commandant of Blaze, a fortress in which the Duchess de Berri was imprisoned; and his conduct in that capacity having been called in question by Dulong, a member of the opposition, a duel ensued, in which the latter fell. His subsequent exploits in Africa gained for him the baton of a field-marshal, and the title of duke from the scene of his victory over the Moors in 1844. Died of cholera at Paris, 1849.

BULL, JOHN, doctor of music, was chamber musician to James I. His compositions were very numerous, the national anthem "God save the King" being among them. The time of his death is uncertain, but he was alive in 1622.

BULL, GEORGE, bishop of St. David's, a learned prelate, and a very industrious and able theological writer; author of "Har-monia Apostolica," "Defensio Fidei Nicenæ," &c. Born, 1634; died, 1709.

BULLER, the Right Honourable CHARLES, a politician of rare promise, was the only son of Charles Buller, esq., of the East India Civil Service, and born at Calcutta in 1806. He received his education partly at Harrow, Edinburgh, and Cambridge, and from an early age gave promise of more than ordinary abilities. In his 24th year he entered parliament on the eve of the Reform Bill for the borough of West Looe, which belonged to his family. But family interest was to him as nothing compared with that of the public. He voted for the bill; and the borough of West Looe was consigned to schedule A; but he was subsequently returned for Liskard, a seat which he retained till his death. In all questions that came before parliament he took an active part; and on many occasions his opinions were far in advance of the Whig party, with whom he subsequently took office. In 1838 he accompanied Lord Durham to Canada as his private secretary; and in this capacity drew up the masterly report upon the affairs of that colony, which is considered as one of the most effective state papers of the age. In 1841 he was appointed secretary to the Board of Control, an office, however, which he relinquished in 1842 on the formation of the Peel ministry. From that time forward his attention was specially directed to the state of the British colonies and to emigration; and in the meantime he had gained the ear of the House of Commons, which had perceived in the young statesman a desire to achieve something beyond the mere triumph of a party: the playfulness of his manner had become not the mask but the ornament of his political talents, and the attachment universally felt for the man had ripened into confidence in the judgment and courage of the statesman. In 1846, on the formation of the Whig Cabinet, he was appointed judge advocate; in November of the same year he was nominated a queen's counsel, sworn of the privy council in July 1849, and in November exchanged the easy office of judge advocate for the onerous duties of chief commissioner of the poor laws, an office which he held till his death. Besides discharging faithfully his official duties, he found leisure for literary pursuits, and many able articles in the Globe and the Edinburgh Review emanated from his versatile pen. As a companion and friend in private life no man's society was more enjoyed by persons of all shades of politics. His wit always told, but never offended. With nothing of the cant of patriotism, and little of the creed of party, he lived in singleness of devotion to the public good; and though, from his untimely end, he has left no conspicuous monument of his public labours, few men have descended to the grave more universally beloved and respected for public virtue and private excellence. Died, November 28, 1848.

BULLET, PETER, an eminent French architect of the 17th century. He constructed the church of St. Thomas Aquinas, and many other splendid edifices in Paris, and wrote some good architectural works.

BULLIALDUS, ISMAEL, a French astro-nomer and mathematician; author of "Philolaus—a Dissertation on the True System of the World," "Tabulæ Philolaicæ," &c. Born, 1605; died, 1694.

BULLIARD, PIERRE, a French botanist; author of "Dictionnaire Élémentaire Botanique," "Herbier de la France," &c. He designed and engraved his own plates. Born, 1742; died, 1793.

BULLINGER, HENRY, a Swiss pastor of the Reformed Church, and the intimate friend of Zuinglius, whom he succeeded as pastor of Zurich. His writings were very numerous, but being almost entirely controversial, they are now little regarded. Born, 1504; died, 1575.

BULOW, FREDERIC WILLIAM, count von Dennewitz, a gallant Prussian general, whose services were most essential to his country on many perilous occasions. He was actively engaged against the French at the earliest periods of the late war; and, in 1808, was made a general of brigade. His memorable victories, in 1813, at Mockern, Luckau, Grosbeeren, and Dennewitz, were rewarded by promotion and a title. He afterwards distinguished himself in Westphalia, Holland, Belgium, &c.; and, as commander of the fourth division of the allied army, he contributed essentially to the victorious close of the battle of Waterloo. Born, 1755; died, 1816.

BULOW, Baron HENRY VON, distinguished in the annals of diplomacy, was born in 1790, at Mecklenburgh Schwerin, where his father filled a high office. While student at Heidelberg, in 1813, he was summoned home to take part in the defence of his country against the French, and after obtaining great distinction in various engagements under Count Wallmoden, he once more returned to Heidelberg to finish his studies, whence he passed into the diplomatic service of Prussia through the influence of Prince Hardenberg and Baron Humboldt, whose daughter he subsequently married. In 1826 he was appointed ambassador of Prussia at the court of St. James's; and to his talents were due several of the most important treaties which allayed the warlike spirit of the times. Here he remained till 1841, when he was nominated minister of foreign affairs at Berlin; but the crisis of affairs in Prussia proved too much for his exhausted energies, and the overstraining of his intellect, in his attempt to guide the vessel of the state, produced a mental alienation, under which he succumbed in 1846.

BUNYAN, JOHN, the celebrated author of "The Pilgrim's Progress," &c., was the son of a travelling tinker, and for a time followed his father's occupation. Mean, however, as was his origin, and dissipated as his early habits confessedly were, it appears that he abandoned the latter, and attached himself to the Anabaptists, among whom he soon became distinguished as a preacher. Being imprisoned for contravening the laws against Dissenters, he employed the twelve years of his confinement in writing the most popular allegory in our language, "The Pilgrim's Progress." He was at length released through the interposition of the Bishop of Lincoln, and resumed his ministry at Bedford, in the gaol of which town he had been imprisoned. Born, 1628; died, 1688.

BUONAFEDE, APPIAN, an Italian abbot, author of "The Poetical Chronology of Great Men," "The History and Spirit of Philosophy," &c. Died, 1792.

BUONAPARTE, NAPOLEON, emperor of the French, king of Italy, &c., was born at Ajaccio, in the island of Corsica, August 15. 1769. His father, Charles Buonaparte, was an advocate of considerable reputation, and his mother, whose maiden name was Marie Letitia Ramoline, was well descended, remarkable for beauty, strong-minded, and accomplished. Napoleon was their second child; Joseph, afterwards king of Spain, being his senior. He was educated at the military school of Brienne, and entered the army as a second lieutenant of artillery, in 1785. At the age of 20, the French revolution opened a field to the exertions of Napoleon; and during his correspondence with the Corsican general, Paoli, who had vainly endeavoured to enlist him on his side, the germs of future ambition began to be developed. In 1793, during the reign of terror, he was actively employed at the siege of Toulon, on which occasion the convention gave him the command of the artillery; and by his courage and exertions the city was recovered from the English and royalists. Subsequently to this he displayed great talents in the army employed against Piedmont; and, in October, 1795, we find him at Paris, commanding the conventional troops which defeated those of the sections, and quelled the revolt. In March, 1796, he married Josephine, widow of Viscount de Beauharnois, who suffered under Robespierre: he was now appointed to the command of the army of Italy, and on the 10th of May following he gained the battle of Lodi. The subjugation of the various Italian states, and his repeated successes over the Austrians, ended in a peace, when he was within 30 miles of Vienna. Thus disengaged, a new theatre for the display of his genius presented itself. With a large fleet, and 40,000 troops on board the transports, he set sail for the intended conquest of Egypt in May, 1798. On his way thither he took Malta; and on the 22d of September we find him celebrating the battle of the Pyramids at Grand Cairo, but his progress was checked by the heroism of Sir Sidney Smith and his handful of British troops at St. John d'Acre; and the various reverses which the French army continued to meet with, coupled with the fact that his presence seemed necessary at home, induced Buonaparte to embark secretly for France, accompanied by a few officers wholly devoted to him, and to leave his brave but shattered army to the care of General Kleber. He landed at Frejus, in October, 1799; hastened to Paris; overthrew the directorial government; and was raised to the supreme power by the title of First Consul. He now led a powerful army over the Alps; fought the celebrated battle of Marengo, in June, 1800; and once more became master of the whole of Italy. A peace with Austria followed these successes; and, soon after, a brief and hollow peace with England. On the 20th of May, 1804, he was raised to the imperial dignity; and in December was crowned, with his empress Josephine, by pope Pius VIII. Here, brief as our space is, we must notice an incident too striking to be overlooked:—As soon as the holy pontiff had blessed the crown, the emperor, without waiting for the remainder of the ceremony, eagerly seized it, and putting it first upon his own head, afterwards placed it on the head of Josephine. He now seriously meditated the invasion of England, assembling a numerous flotilla, and collecting 200,000 troops, which were encamped in the neighbourhood of Boulogne, ostensibly for that purpose; but Austria and Russia appearing in arms against him, and the battle of Trafalgar having nearly annihilated the French navy, he abandoned the design, and marched his troops to the banks of the Danube. On the 11th of November, 1805, the French army entered Vienna; the memorable battle of Austerlitz took place on the 2d of December, and the humiliating treaty of Presburg followed. This year, 1806, may be regarded as the era of king-making. New dynasties were created by him, and princes promoted or transferred according to his imperial will: the crown of Naples he bestowed on his brother Joseph, that of Holland on Louis, and Westphalia on Jerome; while the Confederation of the Rhine was called into existence to give stability to his extended dominion. Prussia again declared war; but the disastrous battle of Jena annihilated her hopes, and both she and Russia were glad to make peace with the French emperor in 1807. Napoleon now turned his eye on Spain; treacherously causing the abdication of Charles IV., and the forced resignation of Ferdinand, while he sent 80,000 men into that country, seized all the strong places, and obtained possession of the capital: but this was the great error of his life, and one of the main causes which led to his downfall. In 1809, while his armies were occupied in the Peninsula, Austria again ventured to try her strength with France. Napoleon thereupon left Paris, and at the head of his troops once more entered the Austrian capital, gained the decisive victory of Wagram, and soon concluded a peace; one of the secret conditions of which was, that he should have his marriage with Josephine dissolved, and unite himself to the daughter of the emperor, Francis II. His former marriage was accordingly annulled; Josephine, with the title of empress, retired to Navarre, a seat about 30 miles from Paris; and he espoused the Archduchess Maria Louisa in April, 1810. The fruit of this union was a son, born March 23. 1811, who was named Napoleon Francis Charles Joseph, and styled king of Rome. Dissatisfied with the conduct of Russia, he now put himself at the head of an invading army, prodigious in number, and admirably appointed, and marched with his numerous allies towards the enemy's frontiers, gained several battles, and at length reached Moscow, where he hoped to establish his winter quarters, but which he found in flames. A retreat was unavoidable; and now was presented to the eye of ambition the most appalling scene recorded in modern history—

a brave and devoted army encountering all the horrors of famine in a climate so insupportably cold that their freezing bodies strewed the roads, while an exasperated phalanx of Cossacks hung upon the rear of the main army, hewing down without remorse the enfeebled and wretched fugitives. Buonaparte fled to Paris, partially disclosed his losses, and called upon the senate for a new army of 350,000 men; which was unanimously agreed to, and he marched to meet the combined Russian and Prussian forces. Victory still for a time hovered over his banners; but Austria having joined the coalition, the great battle of Leipsic, in which he lost half of his army, was decisive as to the war in Germany. Napoleon, however, again returned to Paris, and demanded another levy of 300,000 men. The levy was granted, and the new campaign, 1814, was attended with various success; till the overwhelming number of his enemies, who entered the French frontiers at different points, at length compelled him to abdicate, and accept the sovereignty of the Isle of Elba, with the title of ex-emperor, and a pension of 2,000,000 livres. From this place he soon found means to escape, secretly embarking on the night of the 25th of February, 1815, in some hired feluccas, accompanied by about 1200 men; he landed at Frejus on the 1st of March, speedily reached Paris, and expelled Louis XVIII. from the kingdom. But the confederated armies were now in motion; and though he marched against them with a large army and an immense supply of stores and ammunition, the ever memorable battle of Waterloo put an end to his political career. He withdrew from the army, and proceeded to the coast, with the intention of embarking for America; but fearful of being captured by the British cruisers, he resigned himself, on the 15th of July, into the hands of Captain Maitland, and went on board the Bellerophon. By the joint determination of the allies he was sent to the isle of St. Helena, where, accompanied by several of his old friends and domestics, he arrived on the 13th of October, 1815, as a state prisoner. During his exile he was subject to much annoyance, real or imaginary, and died on the 5th of May, 1821, of cancer in the stomach: a disease which was evidently hereditary, his father having, at about the same age, died of a similar malady. In giving this sketch of Napoleon's life, we have somewhat exceeded our usual limits; and it is neither our purpose nor our wish to make a single comment on his character as a man. His wondrous deeds will long afford matter for deep reflection; and while some may be dazzled by his amazing military talents and stupendous achievements, others will turn from them with sickening disgust.

BUONAPARTE, NAPOLEON FRANCIS CHARLES JOSEPH, duke of Reichstadt, only son of the emperor Napoleon by his second wife, Maria Louisa of Austria. After his father's downfall, he was wholly under the care of his grandfather, the emperor of Austria. He was from infancy of a weakly constitution, and a rapid decline terminated his life in 1832, at the early age of 21. It would appear, from a work by M. de Montbel, entitled "Le Duc de Reichstadt," that the young Napoleon possessed many amiable qualities, and was greatly beloved by those who knew him; while he had all the enthusiasm and passion of youth in extreme force, alternating with a distrust, a caution, and a rapidity in fathoming the characters of the persons with whom he was necessarily brought into contact, which are the usual qualities of age; and that he took the deepest interest in every thing connected with his father's former greatness, or relating to military affairs.

BUONAPARTE, JOSEPH, an elder brother of Napoleon, was born in Corsica, in 1768. Educated for the law at the college of Autun in France, he became a member of the new administration of Corsica under Paoli; but soon afterwards emigrated to Marseilles, where he married the daughter of a banker named Clari. In 1796 he was appointed commissary of the army in Italy then commanded by his brother Napoleon; and in 1797, having been elected deputy to the Council of Five Hundred by his native department, he repaired to Paris, whence he was shortly afterwards sent by the executive directory as ambassador to the pope. During the revolution which broke out at Rome under Duphot, he displayed considerable energy; and on his return to Paris he was made councillor of state, and was subsequently employed by Napoleon to negotiate the treaties of Luneville with the emperor of Germany, and of Amiens with England. When Napoleon attained the imperial crown, Joseph was recognised as an imperial prince, and in this capacity he headed the expedition against Naples in 1806, which resulted in his being proclaimed king of Naples and Sicily. Here he reigned till 1808, effecting beneficial changes in the administration of the law and the institutions of the country. In 1808 he was appointed king of Spain, Murat having succeeded him as king of Naples. But in Spain he encountered much greater difficulties than at Naples; and during the five years of his reign he was thrice obliged by the successes of the allied armies to quit his capital; the last time, in 1813, after the battle of Vittoria, to return no more. He now retired to France. In January of the following year, when Napoleon set out for the army, he was appointed lieutenant-general of the empire and head of the council of regency to assist the empress-regent; but in this capacity he displayed little firmness, and consented to the capitulation of Paris, which resulted in the abdication of Napoleon and his banishment to Elba. He then retired to Switzerland; but he rejoined Napoleon on his return to Paris in March 1815, and after the defeat at Waterloo he embarked for the United States, where he purchased a large property, and continued for many years to reside there under the name of the Count de Survilleirs. Died at Florence, 1844.

BUONAPARTE, LUCIEN, prince of Canino, the next brother after Napoleon in birth, and after him, too, the ablest of the family. He was born at Ajaccio in 1775; and having quitted Corsica, with his family, in 1793, he became a commissary of the army in 1795, and soon afterwards was elected deputy from the department of Liamone to the Council of Five Hundred. It was here that he first distinguished himself by the energy of his manner, the fluency of his language, the soundness of his arguments, and his apparent devotion to the existing government. During Napoleon's absence in Egypt, he maintained a constant correspondence with him; and, on his return, Lucien was the chief instrument of the revolution which followed. When the sentence of outlawry was about to be pronounced against his brother, he opposed it with all the force of his eloquence; and when he perceived that remonstrances were of no avail, he threw down the ensigns of his dignity as president, mounted a horse, harangued the troops, and induced them to clear the hall of its members. By his subsequent energy, coolness, and decision, he led the way to Napoleon's election as first consul, and was himself made minister of the Interior, in the room of Laplace. But, great as were the services which Lucien had performed for his brother, the latter became jealous of his abilities, and feared his popularity. A coolness between them soon took place; and, with that cunning which marked so many of his actions, he took care to remove Lucien from the immediate scene of action, by sending him ambassador to Madrid. In the spring of 1802 he returned to Paris, was outwardly reconciled with the first consul, and entered a second time upon the tribuneship. He had married, at an early age, the daughter of a wealthy innkeeper; and, his wife having been now some time dead, he united himself to one Madame Joubertou, the widow of a stock-broker, a woman distinguished for her gallantries. This gave great offence to Napoleon, and was a severe blow to the system he had long contemplated of forming royal alliances for his relatives. He therefore used every means in his power to induce Lucien to consent to a dissolution of the marriage; but, to his honour be it recorded, he constantly spurned all the proposals that were made to him to sacrifice his wife. For several years he took up his residence in Rome, where he was a welcome visitor, having merited the gratitude of the pope by the zealous support he had given the concordat; and when, in 1807, he found that the enmity of his brother rendered his stay in that city no longer safe, he retired to an estate which he had purchased at Canino, and which his holiness had raised into a principality. It was not long, however, before he found that the emissaries of Napoleon were hovering round his retreat, and he fled secretly to Civita Vecchia, from which place he embarked in Aug. 1810, with the intention of proceeding to the United States. A storm threw him on the coast of Cagliari; but the king of Sardinia refused him permission to land; he was accordingly forced to put out to sea; and being captured by two English frigates, he was conveyed first to Malta and afterwards (Dec. 18.) to England. After a time he was permitted to purchase a beautiful estate near Ludlow, in Shropshire, where he spent three calm and peaceful years, completing, during that period, a poem upon which he had long meditated, entitled "Charlemagne, or the Church Delivered." The peace of 1814 having opened his way to the Continent, he returned to his old friend and protector, Pius VII. After the battle of Waterloo he urged the emperor to make a desperate stand for the throne; but the cause was hopeless; and Lucien, having retired to Italy, devoted the remainder of his days to literature and the fine arts. He died at Viterbo, June 29. 1840.

BUONAPARTE, LOUIS, a younger brother of Napoleon and ex-king of Holland, was born at Ajaccio, in Corsica, September 2. 1778. He entered the army at an early age, accompanied his brother to Italy and Egypt, and on Napoleon's successive elevations to the consulship and the empire rose to be a councillor of state and a general of division, and received the titles of constable of France and colonel-general of carabineers. After having been successively appointed governor of Piedmont, and governor ad interim of the capital, in place of Murat, he took the command of the army of the North in Holland; and in 1806 the Batavian republic having been changed into a kingdom by Napoleon, Louis was nominated king at the request of the States of Holland. In this capacity he conducted himself with equal skill and humanity, and such was the affection with which his Dutch subjects had inspired him, that he refused without hesitation the crown of Spain which was offered him by the emperor. In 1810, Louis, having long resisted the emperor's commands to enforce the continental blockade, which would, as he believed, have proved detrimental to his people's interests, abdicated in favour of his son; but the abdication was rejected by Napoleon, who thereupon united Holland to the French empire; and the ex-king leaving Holland secretly, repaired to Gratz in Styria, where he resided several years under the title of Count de Saint Leu. After the fall of Napoleon, he finally retired to the Papal States with some members of his family, where he devoted himself chiefly to literary pursuits down to the period of his death. His only surviving son, Louis Napoleon Buonaparte, the offspring of his marriage with Hortense Eugenie de Beauharnois (which see), daughter of the empress Josephine, is the first president of the French republic, established in 1848. Died at Leghorn, 25th June, 1846.

BUONAPARTE, MARIE LETITIA, the mother of Napoleon. From the widow of a poor Corsican officer she saw herself elevated to the dignity of being the mother of monarchs; and she lived to witness their removal from the thrones they had respectively usurped. Died, Feb. 3. 1836.

[The most authentic genealogical documents ascribe a Florentine origin to the Buonaparte family, and trace them back to the year 1120, when one of them was exiled from Florence as a Ghibelline; and in 1332 we find that John Buonaparte was podestà of that city. In 1404, his descendant and namesake, who was plenipotentiary to Gabriel Visconti, duke of Milan, married the niece of pope Nicholas V. His son

(Nicholas Buonaparte) was ambassador from the same pontiff to several courts, and viceroy of the holy see at Aescoll. In 1667 Gabriel Buonaparte established himself at Ajaccio, and for several generations his descendants were successively heads of the elders of that city. But Napoleon Buonaparte ridiculed the pride of ancestry, and was ready on all occasions to declare, that the exalted station he had attained was due to his own merits alone.]

BUONO, a Venetian architect of the 12th century, who erected the well-known tower of St. Mark at Venice, a campanile or bell-tower at Arezzo, and several other grand edifices. He is deservedly reckoned among the earliest improvers of modern architecture.

BUONONCINI, GIOVANNI BAPTISTA, a celebrated Italian composer, and one of Handel's most powerful rivals in England. Besides operas, he composed various cantatas and sonatas, and the grand funeral anthem for the Duke of Marlborough. He is supposed to have died at Venice about the middle of the 18th century.

BUPALUS, a famous sculptor of the isle of Chios in the 6th century, B.C. He is said to have hanged himself in vexation at a satire written upon him by Hipponax, a poet, whose leanness he had caricatured in a statue.

BURCARD, or BROCARDUS, bishop of Worms, in the 11th century. Assisted by the abbot Albert, he compiled the famous collection of Canons, in 20 books, entitled "Magna Decretorum, seu Canonum Volumen." Died, 1026.

BURCHARD, JOHN, a native of Germany; master of the ceremonies to the pope, and, subsequently, bishop of Citta di Castello; author of a journal or diary of pope Alexander VI., the MS. of which, with a continuation by some other hand, is in the Chigi Library at Rome. Died, 1605.

BURCKHARDT, JOHN LEWIS, a Swiss gentleman, who proposed to the English association for exploring Africa to be their missionary. He was unfortunately carried off by dysentery while waiting for the caravan with which he was to go to Timbuctoo. His papers were sent to England, and from them have been published his "Travels in Nubia" and "Travels in Syria and the Holy Land." Born, 1784; died, 1816.

BURCKHARDT, JOHN CHARLES, a learned German astronomer; author of "Tables de la Lune," &c., and of a German translation of La Place's "La Mécanique Céleste." Born, 1773; died, 1825.

BURDER, GEORGE, an eminent dissenting minister; author of "Evangelical Truth defended," &c., and one of the editors of the Evangelical Magazine. Died, 1832.

BURDETT, SIR FRANCIS, bart., an aristocrat by birth and fortune, but for a long series of years one of the most popular members of the British parliament, was born in 1770, and received his education at Westminster School and Oxford University. On returning from a continental tour, during which he had ample opportunities of witnessing the progress of the French revolution, he was evidently imbued with some portion of its spirit, which was in no small degree fostered and encouraged by his friend and instructor, the celebrated John Horne Tooke, the well-known author of the Diversions of Purley, of whom, indeed, Sir Francis may fairly be considered the élève. In 1793 he married the youngest daughter of Thomas Coutts, esq., the wealthy banker, with whom he received a large fortune; and in four years afterwards, on the death of his grandfather, succeeded to the baronetcy. In 1796, Sir Francis was returned to parliament, by the interest of the Duke of Newcastle, as member for Boroughbridge, his colleague being Mr. Scott, afterwards Lord Eldon; and he soon distinguished himself by his resolute hostility to the measures of government, which he denounced as being inimical to the liberties of the people. In 1802 he offered himself as a candidate for Middlesex in opposition to Mr. Mainwaring, and was returned; but, on a new election in 1804, he was defeated by Mr. Mainwaring, jun., polling a majority of five votes, 2828 to 2823. At the next general election (1806) he again became a candidate for the county, but was defeated by Mr. Mellish, who outnumbered him by more than 2000 votes. At this time Sir Francis was a person of great influence in the city of Westminster; and a vacancy in its representation occurring through the death of Mr. Fox, the baronet started for the prize, in company with Lord Cochrane, against three other candidates, viz. Sheridan, Elliot, and Paul, with the latter of whom he fought a duel, in which both the combatants were wounded. Sir Francis was returned by a vast majority, at the head of the poll, his colleague being Lord Cochrane. His opposition to ministers was now formidable, unceasing, and so indiscreet, that an opportunity soon presented itself to his political enemies, of making his conduct the subject of legal proceedings. In 1810, having addressed a letter to his constituents, in which he declared that the House of Commons had exercised their power illegally by committing John Gale Jones to prison, the publication of this letter was deemed a gross breach of privilege, and the speaker was directed to issue his warrant for the apprehension and commitment of Sir Francis Burdett to the Tower. He refused to surrender, and barricaded his house; whereupon, after a lapse of two days, the sergeant-at-arms, accompanied by police officers and a military force, succeeded in breaking in, and conveyed him to the Tower. On the return of the military the infuriated mob attacked them, and in their defence they shot one man and wounded several others. The prorogation of parliament put an end to his imprisonment; and recollecting the excitement which prevailed at the time of his committal, he wisely proceeded privately by water to his home, rather than jeopardise the lives of his "friends and supporters," by indulging them, as they wished, with a public procession through the streets of the metropolis. He afterwards brought an action against the speaker, &c., but was, of course, unsuccessful. Though we mention some of the most important events of his life, we cannot follow him through his parliamentary career—his vehement opposition to the suspension of the habeas corpus act, his reiterated speeches in favour of parliamentary reform, his advocacy of Catholic emancipation, &c.; but pass on to the year 1819, when he was prosecuted by the attorney-general for addressing a letter to his constituents, strongly animadverting on the proceedings of the magistrates and yeomanry at the memorable meeting of the people at Manchester. The letter was pronounced a libel, and he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment in the King's Bench, and to pay a fine of 1000*l*. Sir Francis Burdett had ever been a loud and zealous advocate for parliamentary reform, yet, unlike thousands of the demagogues who seized upon the word "reform" when they meant "revolution," he never desired to see the prerogatives of the monarch or the privileges of the house of peers in the slightest degree invaded. But we feel bound, however reluctantly, to say, that the absurd turbulence of Sir Francis Burdett's earlier years seemed to spring from a restless vanity, and an eager craving after mob applause; while his departure, at a very advanced period of life, from the party of which till then he had for nearly two score years been the avowed champion, savoured less of true and high conservative feeling, than it did of petulant vanity. He died, Jan. 23, 1844, aged 74.—Lady Burdett, who had for many years suffered greatly in her health, died the same month.

BURDON, WILLIAM, an able English writer; author of "Materials for Thinking," of which Colton largely availed himself in his Lacon; "Thoughts on Politics, Morality, and Literature." "Life and Character of Buonaparte," &c. Died, 1818.

BURGER, GODFREY AUGUSTUS, a celebrated German poet; well known in this country by his ballad poems of the "Wild Huntsman's Chase" and "Leonora," both of which have been translated into English, and become highly popular. Born, 1748; died, 1794.

BURGESS, DANIEL, a dissenting preacher, very popular in his day on account of his quaint and familiar style of pulpit oratory, of which a single specimen will suffice. "If," said he, on one occasion, "any among you want a cheap suit, he must go to Monmouth Street; if a suit for life, he will go to the Court of Chancery; but if you want an eternal suit, you must go to Christ, and put on his robe of righteousness." Born, 1645; died, 1713.

BURGESS, Right Rev. THOMAS, bishop of Salisbury, was born in 1756, at Odiham, in Hampshire, where his father carried on business as a grocer. He was educated at Winchester; obtained a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1775; and, by his talents and diligence, in a short period became logic reader and tutor of the college. He had by this time distinguished himself as a scholar of very considerable pretensions, by the publication of several able works; and he found a patron in Dr. Shute Barrington, who collated him, in 1787, to the prebend of Wilsford and Woodford, in Salisbury cathedral, and afterwards preferred him to a prebendal stall at Durham. His next advancement took place under the administration of Mr. Addington (who had been his fellow student at Winchester and Oxford), and who conferred on him, in 1803, the vacant see of St. David's. From the moment of his elevation to the episcopal bench, he displayed the most devoted and exemplary attention to the concerns of his diocese; he planned and formed a society for the foundation of a provincial college for the instruction of ministers of the Welsh Church; and the establishment at Lampeter stands as a noble monument of his activity and benevolence. On the death of Dr. Fisher, in 1805, he was translated to the bishopric of Salisbury; and throughout the twelve years of his episcopal duties in that diocese, he zealously contributed to promote the interests of those committed to his charge. Among his numerous works are editions of "Burton's Pentalogia" and "Dawes's Miscellanea Critica," "Considerations on the Abolition of Slavery," an "Essay on the Study of Antiquities," "First Principles of Christian Knowledge," "Reflections on the Controversial Writings of Dr. Priestley," "Emendationes in Suidam et Hesychium et alios Lexicographos Græcos," 4 vols.; "The Bible, and Nothing but the Bible, the Religion of the Church of England;" with many others, theological, classical, and political. Bishop Burgess was mainly instrumental in founding the Royal Society of Literature, of which, in 1821, he became the first president; but in 1832, on account of his loss of sight, and other infirmities, he resigned the office in favour of the late Lord Dover. Died, Feb. 19, 1837.

BURGH, JAMES, the able author of the "Dignity of Human Nature," &c., was a native of Scotland, and educated at St. Andrew's. Though brought up to a trade, he afterwards filled several situations, more or less connected with literature, and for the last twenty years of his life was master of an academy at Stoke Newington. Born, 1714; died, 1775.

BURGOYNE, JOHN, an English general. During the American war he led the army which was to penetrate from Canada into the revolted provinces, in which he encountered difficulties too great for its successful issue. Little interest is now attached to his memory as a commander, but he deserves our notice as the author of "The Maid of the Oaks," "The Lord of the Manor," and some other dramatic works. Died, 1792.

BURIDAN, JOHN, a philosopher of the 14th century. Being expelled from Paris through the influence of his philosophical opponents, he sought shelter in Germany, and was instrumental in founding the university of Vienna. He wrote commentaries on the logic, ethics, and metaphysics of Aristotle; but is now chiefly remembered as the inventor of the well-known dilemma of the ass between two bundles of hay, by which he used to illustrate the doctrine of free-will. Died, 1358.

BURKE, EDMUND, an eminent modern writer, an orator of the first class, and an able statesman, was the son of a highly respectable attorney in Dublin, where he was born, January 1. 1730. After completing his studies at Trinity College, Dublin, he entered himself as a law student in the Temple; but he applied himself far more zealously to letters than to law. His "Vindication of Natural Society" and his "Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful" introduced him to the best literary society; and he at length determined upon devoting himself to that pursuit for which he was undoubtedly the best fitted—politics. Of his public course, particularly his hostility to the doctrines of revolutionary France, we need not here speak, for it is a portion, and a prominent portion, of the history of his time. In private life he was kind and amiable; in public, ardent and indefatigable. As an orator and writer, he was almost without a rival. Died, 1797.

BURKITT, WILLIAM, an English divine; author of a "Practical Exposition of the New Testament." Born, 1650; died, 1703.

BURLEIGH, WILLIAM CECIL, lord high-treasurer of England in the reign of Elizabeth; born in 1520, and brought up to the study of the law. He was patronised by the protector Somerset, in Edward the Sixth's reign, and made a privy councillor; and when Elizabeth came to the throne, his political sagacity and the devotion he showed to his sovereign earned for him the highest honours. His state policy has been admitted on all hands, but it squared little with humanity, as may be gathered from the persecutions which he encouraged against the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots. Died, 1598.

BURMAN, PETER, a celebrated Dutch critic and scholar; professor of history, rhetoric, and Greek at the university of Leyden. He wrote a variety of dissertations and epistles, philological and critical, and published editions of various Latin classics with notes. Born, 1668; died, 1741.

BURMAN, PETER, a nephew of the above, professor of history and rhetoric at Amsterdam; editor of the works of Claudian, Aristophanes, &c. Born, 1714, died, 1778.

BURMAN, JOHN, brother of the preceding, and eminent equally as a physician and a botanist; author of "Thesaurus Zeilanicus," &c. Born, 1707; died, 1779.

BURN, RICHARD, LL.D., an English clergyman; author of a "History of the Poor Laws," joint author with Mr. Nicholson of a "History of Westmoreland and Cumberland," and compiler of the well-known work "Burn's Justice." Died, 1789.

BURNES, SIR ALEXANDER, a lieutenant-colonel in the Indian army, and political resident in the court of the Soojah at Cabool, was born at Montrose, in 1805. Having obtained the appointment of cadet, he arrived at Bombay in 1821; and, on account of his proficiency in the Persian and Hindostanee languages, was at first employed as an interpreter and translator. His regiment, the 21st native infantry, having been ordered to Bhooj in 1825, Lieut. Burnes joined it, and during the disturbances in Cutch was appointed quarter-master of brigade, though at the time he was under 20 years of age. His superior talents and zeal soon attracted the attention of the authorities, and he was speedily appointed Persian interpreter to a force of 8,000 men, assembled for the invasion of Scinde, under the command of Colonel M. Napier of the 6th foot. In Sept. 1829, he was appointed assistant to the political agent at Cutch, and was engaged in surveying the north-west frontier. Early in 1830 a present of horses having arrived at Bombay from the king of England, to be sent to the Maharajah Runjeet Singh, Lieut. Burnes was selected to proceed with them to Lahore, the capital of the Punjaub country. He was also entrusted with presents to the Ameers of Scinde; but though this was the ostensible object of his mission, the chief motive was to obtain full and complete information in reference to everything pertaining to the geography of the Indus. This extraordinary journey was performed amid delays, obstructions, and difficulties, but with admirable tact and perseverance; and the work recording these travels, which was published some little time after his return to England in 1833, possesses the highest interest. Soon after his return to India in 1835, Lieut. Burnes, in acknowledgment of his diplomatic and other services, was knighted and advanced to the brevet rank of lieutenant-colonel; and on the final restoration of the Shah Soojah, in Sept. 1839, he was appointed political resident at Cabool, with a salary of 3000*l.* But he was not long destined to fill the post which his merits had gained; for, at the very outset of the insurrection in Cabool, it was the melancholy fate of this enterprising and deserving officer—then only in his 37th year—to be assassinated, together with his brother, Lieut. Charles Burnes, and several others. Died, Nov. 2. 1841.

BURNET, THOMAS, an English divine and philosopher; author of "Archæologia Antiqua de Rerum Originibus," &c. He was master of the Charter-house, and is distinguished for the bold resistance he made to James II., who wished to make a Roman Catholic a pensioner of that establishment. Died, 1715.

BURNET, GILBERT, bishop of Salisbury; a learned prelate and an able and industrious writer; author of the well-known and valuable "History of the Reformation," "History of his own Times," &c. Born, 1643; died, 1715.

BURNETT, JAMES, Lord MONBODDO, a distinguished Scotch judge; author of a "Dissertation on the Origin of Language," &c. Though both learned and acute, he exposed himself to much ridicule by asserting the existence of mermaids and satyrs, and by other ridiculous theories, particularly his whimsical speculations relative to a supposed affinity between the human race and the monkey tribe. Born, 1714; died, 1779.

BURNETT, GILBERT THOMAS, F. L. S., the lineal descendant of the celebrated Bishop Burnet, was born in 1800, and having received a classical and scientific education, studied with success under medical and anatomical professors; and, ultimately became professor of medical botany at King's College, London. Died in 1835.

BURNEY, CHARLES, the well-known author of the "History of Music," and perhaps still more celebrated as the father of the authoress of "Evelina," &c., was born at Chester in 1726. He early showed a taste for music, and having acquired considerable knowledge of the art under the celebrated Dr. Arne, he settled in London with every prospect of success. But his health failed, and he accepted the place of organist at Lynn, where he resided nine years. In 1760 he returned to London with his health restored, and he at once obtained as many pupils as enabled him to support his family in comfort and independence. His professional merit obtained for him, in 1769, the degree of doctor of music from the university of Oxford; and his attainments, the suavity of his temper, and the gentle simplicity of his manners not only gained for him ready admission to the first literary circles, but his own little house in St. Martin's Street, Leicester Square, was long the resort of all that was distinguished for talent, rank, or fashion. In 1806 he obtained a pension of 300*l.* per annum. Besides his History of Music, Dr. Burney published "The Life of Metastasio," a "Musical Tour through France and Italy," and he contributed nearly all the musical articles to Rees's Cyclopædia, for which he obtained 1000*l.* Died, 1814.

BURNEY, CHARLES, second son of the musical composer, was a classical scholar and critic of high reputation. Dr. Burney's classical acquirements were first displayed in the Monthly Review, and there were few Greek scholars who could compete with him. Among his works are an Appendix to Scapula's Greek Lexicon, the choral odes of Æschylus, &c. His valuable library was purchased by parliament for the British Museum. Born 1757; died, 1817.

BURNEY, Rear-Admiral JAMES, eldest son of the above, entered the navy at an early age, and accompanied the ill-fated Cook on his two last voyages. After long and arduous services, he attained the rank of rear-admiral. He was an able geographer; and his "History of Voyages of Discovery" and other valuable writings show him to have been an accurate thinker. Born, 1759; died, 1821.

BURNEY, WILLIAM, LL.D., master of the Royal Academy, Gosport; a school where many distinguished naval and military officers have been educated. He was the author of "Lives of the Naval Heroes of Great Britain," &c. Born, 1762; died, 1832.

BURNS, JOHN, M.D., and professor of surgery in Glasgow University, was born in 1780. Besides being the author of many valuable works relating to his profession, he published a work on the evidences and principles of Christianity, which has gone through many editions. It was at first published anonymously; but it was obviously the production of a medical man; and it is related that the father of Dr. Burns, who was for sixty years a minister in Glasgow, having read it, expressed himself much pleased with it, and said to his son, "Ah John! I wish you could have written such a book." Though in his eightieth year,

Dr. Burns was still active both in body and mind; but his vigorous old age was suddenly cut short by the calamity which befell the Orion on her passage from Liverpool to Glasgow, June 17, 1850.

BURNS, ROBERT, a celebrated Scotch poet, whose rich humour, pathos, and energy have never been surpassed, was born in 1759, near the town of Ayr. His parents were in humble circumstances, but they gave him a good plain education, and as he grew up he added to it an acquaintance with French and mathematics. His poems are too well known and appreciated to need description in this place; but it is not unnecessary to remark that his prose, consisting chiefly of letters hastily written and never intended for publication, are scarcely less honourable to his genius. He was naturally of a convivial turn; and after having been unfortunate in various attempts to gain a living by agricultural and other pursuits, he was made an exciseman: this employment confirmed him in habits of dissipation, which caused an illness, of which he died, in the 37th year of his age, in 1796. An excellent edition of his works, with a Life, &c. by Allan Cunningham, was published in 1835.

BURROW, REUBEN, an able mathematician; author of a tract on "Projectiles," a "Restitution of Apollonius on Inclinations," &c. He was making a trigonometrical survey of Bengal when he died, in 1791.

BURTON, the Rev. EDWARD, D.D., regius professor of divinity in the university of Oxford, and rector of Ewelme, was born in 1794; educated at Westminster, and matriculated at Christchurch, Oxford. His talents, close application, and exemplary conduct, did not pass unnoticed; and he rose from one honourable station to another. His various pamphlets and the works he edited, prove that he was able and industrious. Died, 1836.

BURTON, JOHN, an English divine and critic; author of various theological treatises; poetry in Greek, Latin, and English; and other productions. Died, 1771.

BURTON, ROBERT, an English divine; author of that singular work, "The Anatomy of Melancholy;" which Archbishop Herring describes as "the pleasantest, the most learned, and the most full of sterling sense." The archbishop adds, that the wits of the reigns of Anne and the first George were deeply indebted to Burton; and we may venture to say, that the "wits" of the succeeding reigns have been no less so. Born, 1576; died, 1640.

BUSBY, Dr. RICHARD, the venerable master of Westminster School—celebrated for his abilities as a classical teacher and as an unflinching disciplinarian—was born in 1606. He held the situation of head-master from 1640 to the time of his decease, in 1695—a period of 55 years.

BUSCHE, or BUSCHIUS, HERMAN VON DER, a learned German, friend and fellow-labourer of Luther; author of Scholia on ancient writers, Latin poems, &c. Died, 1534.

BUSCHETTO DA DULICHIO, a Greek architect of the 11th century. He erected the cathedral church of Pisa, the first specimen of the Lombard ecclesiastical style of building.

BUSCHING, ANTHONY FREDERIC, an able and industrious writer, to whom the science of statistics is greatly indebted; author of a "Magazine of Modern History and Geography," "Elements of Natural History," "Character of Frederic II. of Prussia," "History and Theory of the Belles Lettres," &c. His works, in short, amount to 100 volumes. Born, 1724; died, 1793.

BUSHE, the Right Hon. Sir CHARLES KENDAL, was one of the most eminent of all the lawyers and the statesmen that made the courts and the parliament of Ireland so brilliant towards the close of the 18th century. Though he had to contend against such opponents as Ponsonby, Plunkett, Flood, Grattan, Curran, and Saurin, he was never found unequal to the contest, whether at the bar or in the house. He was raised to the chief justiceship of Ireland, and made a privy councillor in 1822, and shone in that high office as brightly as he had shone as advocate and orator. The infirmities of a very advanced age at length compelled him to retire upon a pension of 3000*l.* per annum; and he had scarcely done so, when he was attacked by effusion upon the brain, and died July 7, 1843.

BUTE, JOHN STUART, Earl of, a British statesman, descended from an ancient Scotch family, was born early in the 18th century. In 1738 he was appointed one of the lords of the bedchamber to Frederic, prince of Wales, the father of George III. Soon after the young king's accession, over whom Bute possessed unbounded influence, he was made secretary of state, and, quickly after, first lord of the treasury. Under his ministry, a peace, which disappointed the hopes of the people, was concluded with France and Spain; and what added greatly to his unpopularity, was the marked favouritism he showed for his countrymen, filling the most lucrative offices in the state with Scotchmen. He at length resigned his offices, and retired into private life, which he adorned by his benevolent disposition and his love of science. Botany was his favourite study, and he expended vast sums in its pursuit. Died, 1792.

BUTLER, ALBAN, an English Catholic divine. He was for some time chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk, but at length became president of the college of St. Omer's. The chief of his works is the "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and other principal Saints." Died, 1773.

BUTLER, CHARLES, a Roman Catholic, bred to the legal profession, and a most indefatigable and accomplished scholar. His numerous works, with the exception of his "Notes to Coke upon Littleton" and his "Reminiscences," are of a religious or political character; and, indeed, as the able advocate of his own religious community, he is principally to be regarded. It may be truly said that neither the fire of youth, the interruption of business, the variety of his employments, nor the bustle of the world, could ever moderate his ardour for study. He was the author of "Lives of the Saints," "Historical Account of the Laws against the Roman Catholics," "Book of the Catholic Church," &c. Born, 1750; died, 1832.

BUTLER, JOSEPH, bishop of Durham, an extremely learned and able prelate; author of the well-known and invaluable work, "The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Course and Constitution of Nature." Born, 1692; died, 1752.

BUTLER, SAMUEL, an English poet, whose principal work, "Hudibras," is probably, both in design and execution, the most strikingly original we have. Wit abounds throughout it, and the odd double rhymes in which the author so much delighted, are singularly well adapted to add point to the ridicule he chose to inflict. His other works are far inferior to Hudibras; and of the thousand imitations of that work, not one has the true Hudibrastic commingling of wit, humour, knowledge of the world, and facility of expression. Born, 1612; died, 1680.

BUTLER, Dr. SAMUEL, bishop of Lichfield, a learned and most exemplary English divine. He was born at Kenilworth, in Warwickshire, and received his education at Rugby School, to which he was admitted in 1783. In 1792 he removed thence to St. John's College, Cambridge, where his course was rapid and brilliant, nearly, if not quite, without parallel, his prizes and distinctions far exceeding in number those obtained by any of his contemporaries. In 1798 he was appointed to the mastership of Shrewsbury School, and, about the same time, he was selected for the arduous task of preparing a new edition of Æschylus for the university press. His learning and his indefatigable exertions soon produced for Shrewsbury a very high rank and reputation among our public schools. After receiving several minor preferences, he was, in 1836, promoted to the bishopric of Lichfield. Though a perfect martyr to ill health, he was a very voluminous author. His "Sketch of Ancient and Modern Geography" and his "Ancient and Modern Atlases" are the best works of their kind. Born, 1774; died, 1840.

BUTTNER, CHRISTOPHER WILLIAM, a German naturalist and philologist, whose zeal in pursuit of his favourite studies was such, that, in order to buy books, he restricted himself to what was barely necessary to sustain life, never making more than one frugal meal a day. Born, 1716; died, 1801.

BUXHOWDEN, FREDERIC WILLIAM, Count of, a general in the Russian army. He entered on a military life at an early age, and was engaged in the war against the Turks in 1769; till, rising by degrees, he, in 1794, obtained the command of Warsaw and the administration of Poland. In 1805 he commanded the left wing of the army at the battle of Austerlitz, which advanced while the centre and right wing were beaten; but, after the battle of Pultusk, he was unjustly superseded by Bennigsen. He was, however, again made commander-in-chief, and, in 1808, conquered Finland. Died, 1811.

BUXTON, JEDEDIAH, a singularly gifted person, whose powers of calculation, derived solely from nature, have probably never been equalled. It is said that he was asked this most difficult question—"In a body whose three sides are, respectively, 23,145,789 yards, 5,642,732 yards, and 54,965 yards, how many cubical eighths of an inch are there?" and that, amid all the distractions of the labours of a hundred men, he gave the exact answer in little more than five hours! But it was only in calculating that he had any intellectual superiority; in other respects, his mind was rather below than above the average. He died towards the close of the 18th century.

BUXTON, Sir THOMAS FOWELL, bart. This distinguished philanthropist was born at Earl's Colne, Essex, in 1786; and received his academical education at Trinity College, Dublin. Having, in 1811, joined the firm of Truman, Hanbury, and Co., the eminent London brewers, his connection with the locality of Spitalfields made him personally acquainted with the sufferings of his poor neighbours; and the powerful appeals he made in their favour in 1816 led to an extensive and well-organised system for their relief. His success in this charitable undertaking induced him (in conjunction with his sister-in-law, Mrs Fry, and his brother-in-law, Mr. Hoare) to examine into the state of our prisons, and to publish the result of his labours. This not only led to the formation of the Prison Discipline Society, but was the basis upon which many of the modern improvements in our gaols are founded. In 1818 he was returned M. P. for Weymouth, which borough he continued to represent till 1837, when he was defeated by Mr. Villiers. During the time he held a seat in the house, his energies were almost unceasingly directed to ameliorate the condition of the oppressed. He became the recognised successor of Mr. Wilberforce, and he had the supreme satisfaction of seeing his efforts for the abolition of slavery crowned with complete success. To other subjects of paramount interest, viz. the reform of our criminal code—the civilisation of Africa, by commercial, agricultural, and missionary enterprise—the support of benevolent institutions, particularly such as had for their objects the education and improvement of the poor—to these, and such as these, Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton applied himself with a persevering assiduity that did honour to his name. In 1840 he was created a baronet. Died Feb. 19. 1845.

BUXTORF, JOHN, a Calvinist divine, professor of Chaldee and Hebrew at Basle; author of "Thesaurus Linguae Hebraicae," "Institutio Epistolaris Hebraica," &c. Born, 1564; died, 1629.

BUXTORF, JOHN, son of the preceding, and his successor in the professorship at Basle; author of a "Chaldaic and Syriac Lexicon," &c., besides other classical and theological works. It is recorded of him, that, at the early age of four years, he was able to read Hebrew and Latin.—Two others of the same name, his son and nephew, were also noted for their skill in the Hebrew tongue.

BYNG, JOHN, fourth son of Viscount Torrington, was, like his father, an admiral. After having frequently and highly distinguished himself, he was tried by court-martial for alleged cowardice. He was dispatched to the relief of Minorca, at that time blockaded by a French fleet; and his hesitation to engage an enemy of superior strength excited the clamour of the nation against him. When the news arrived in England, the dastard ministry, wishing to avert the public odium from their unsuccessful measures, took advantage of the admiral's unpopularity; and though the court by which the ill-fated commander was tried, recommended him to mercy, they suffered the unjust sentence to be carried into execution. He was shot at Portsmouth, March 14. 1757; meeting his death with the firmness of a hero and the resignation of a Christian.

BYRNE, WILLIAM, an eminent English engraver. His works are very numerous, and remarkable for the excellence of their aerial perspective. Died, 1805.

BYROM, JOHN, an ingenious prose writer and poet, and the inventor of a system of stenography. He was also a contributor to the Spectator, under the signature of "John Shadow." Born, 1691; died, 1763.

BYRON, the Hon. JOHN, an eminent naval commander and circumnavigator, whose sufferings, when wrecked in the Wager, are graphically described in his "Narrative." He rose to the rank of admiral, and commanded in the West Indies during the American war. Born, 1723; died, 1768.

BYRON, Right Hon. GEORGE GORDON BYRON, Lord, grandson of the preceding, born, Jan. 22d, 1788, was the sixth in descent from his ancestor, Sir John Byron, who received the estate of Newstead as a grant from king Henry VIII. The notoriously licentious conduct of his father, Capt. Byron, who had deserted his wife and squandered her fortune, made him an exile from England; and he died in 1791, leaving his widow and son almost destitute. Mrs. Byron having previous to this event retired to her native city of Aberdeen, in order to live within the limits of her scanty income, she placed her son early in the grammar school of that city; but when, in 1798, by the death of his great uncle, without issue, he became possessed of the family title and estates, he was placed under the guardianship of Lord Carlisle, who sent him to Harrow. His love of liberty and independence were prominent traits in his disposition, and they were seconded by a fixed aversion to control. In 1804 he went to Cambridge, and there became chiefly remarkable for his eccentric habits, and his defiance of the rules of discipline. On quitting Cambridge he took up his residence at Newstead Abbey, and soon after published his "Hours of Idleness." Although marked by some features of juvenility, this production gave undoubted indications of poetic genius; but it met with most severe and unmerited censure from the Edinburgh Review. The ridicule thus cast by the critic on the poet was not suffered to rest there; he exerted his powers, and amply revenged himself in the celebrated satire of "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers." About that period he experienced a great disappointment in seeing Miss Chaworth, who had been the early object of his love, married to another. His course of life was now marked by extravagance and dissipation, impairing both his health and fortune; and it was probably to extricate himself from the Circæan snares by which he was surrounded, that he resolved on an excursion to the Continent. He was accompanied by his friend and fellow-colleague, John Cam Hobhouse, esq.; and after a stay of two years he returned, and gave to the world the first two cantos of "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage." This was quickly succeeded by "The Giaour," "The Bride of Abydos," "Lara," "The Corsair," &c.; and the noble bard became the poetical idol of the day. In January, 1815, he married Anna Isabella, only daughter of Sir Ralph Milbanke Noel; but the union was not productive of happiness, and they separated soon after the birth of a daughter. This rupture gave rise to many rumours reounding little to Lord Byron's credit, and he again went to the Continent, with a determination not to return to his native country. He often changed his residence; and during his various travels, while he visited the most celebrated parts of the south of Europe, his admirers in England were indulged with the productions of his powerful and versatile muse; sometimes proudly soaring into the pure regions of taste, breathing noble sentiments and chivalric feelings; at other times, descending to impure voluptuousness, or grovelling in sheer vulgarity. In 1823 the state of the Greeks awoke his noble feeling of independence; and, with a disinterested generosity that scarcely has its parallel, he resolved to devote his fortune, his pen, and his sword in their cause. His energies, however, were no sooner called into action, than he was assailed by disease; and he expired, of a fever, at Missolonghi, on the 19th of April, 1824, in the 37th year of his age, to the inexpressible sorrow of the Greeks, by whom he was venerated for his personal exertions and liberal pecuniary aid. Few instances have occurred in which inconsistency appeared so glaring as in the various qualifications of this highly gifted nobleman. With powers of reasoning beyond the faculties of most other men, he was capricious and unfixed; and with a poetic taste that approached the sublime was sometimes mixed a reckless unalloyed profligacy, evidently the offspring of sensuality, and the parent of immoral consequences in others. In proportion, therefore, as we admire the commanding talents and poetic eloquence of Byron, so are we compelled to deprecate the unholy purposes to which they were too often made subservient. "Prostituted genius is but splendid guilt." We close this sketch by observing, that his only daughter, the Hon. Augusta Ada Byron, was married to Lord King (now Earl Lovelace), in 1835.

BYTHNER, VICTORINUS, was a native of Poland, but educated in England, where he finally established himself as a physician; author of "Lyra Prophetica Davidis Regis," &c. Died, 1664.

BZOVIUS, or BZOVSKI, ABRAHAM, a learned Pole; professor of theology and philosophy. He wrote the "Lives of the Popes," "Annals of the Church," &c. Born, 1567; died, 1637.

C.

CAAB, or CAB, BEN ZOHAIK, an Arabian Jew, rabbi, and poet. He satirised Mahomet so severely, that "the Prophet" made war on the Arabian Jews for the purpose of getting the poet into his power; but when Mahomet's success was no longer doubtful, Caab became his zealous panegyrist, abandoned Judaism for Mahometanism, and was greatly in Mahomet's favour. He is said to have assisted in the composition of the Koran. Died, A.D. 622.

CABALLERO, Marquis, a Spanish liberal, born in 1769. He adhered to Joseph Buonaparte on the abdication of Charles IV., and was made one of his chief ministers. On the fall of the former, Ferdinand VII. passed a decree of perpetual banishment against him; but he was recalled by the Constitutionalists in 1818.

CABANIS, PETER JOHN GEORGE, a French physician of considerable eminence. Becoming intimate with Mirabeau, he was made a member of the council of five hundred; and under the government of Napoleon he was one of the senators. His writings are chiefly medical; but in addition to these he published an interesting account of the last illness and death of Mirabeau. Born, 1757; died, 1807.

CABARRUS, FRANÇOIS, Count, a Frenchman, who having settled in Spain in a commercial character, rendered that country considerable service in establishing a paper currency, when cut off from her resources in America. He was afterwards the Spanish minister of finance; to which office he was appointed by Joseph Buonaparte. Born, 1752; died, 1810.

CABESTAN, or CABESTAING, WILLIAM DE, a Provençal poet of the 13th century, celebrated alike for his talents and misfortunes. Having excited the jealousy of Raymond de Seillans, he had him put to death; and his heart was dressed and served up to the lady, who, on learning the horrible nature of her repast, died of grief.

CABOT, SEBASTIAN, an English navigator of great eminence, was the son of a skillful Venetian pilot, who resided at Bristol. He made several voyages with his father (who had obtained from Henry VIII. letters patent, empowering him and his three sons to discover unknown lands and conquer them), and they on one occasion discovered Newfoundland, and on another saw the mainland of America, being the first Europeans who had done so. He was among the first to notice the variations of the needle. His skill in maritime affairs induced Edward VI. to settle a pension on him as grand pilot of England; and he was consulted on all questions relating to trade and navigation. He published a map of the world, and a work, entitled "Navigazione nelle parte Septentrionale." Born, 1477; died, 1557.

CABRAL, or CARRARA, PEDRO ALVAREZ, a celebrated Portuguese navigator of the 16th century.

CACCIA, GUGLIELMO, surnamed, from his place of residence, Il Moncalvo, a very excellent painter. He executed some fine altar pieces, but his fame chiefly rests upon his small Madonnas, which are highly valued. Died, 1625.

CACCINI, GIULIO, an Italian musician and composer. In conjunction with Peri, he composed the opera of "Eurydice," on the occasion of the marriage of Henri Quatre and Mary de Medici; and it is said to have been the first opera performed in public. He was also the author of a work, entitled "Nuovo Musiche." Died, 1615.

CACCINI, FRANCESCA, daughter of the above, much celebrated at Florence in the 17th century, as a poetess and composer of music.

CADAMOSTO, LOUIS, a Venetian navigator, patronised and employed by the king of Portugal. He discovered Cape Verd Islands. An account of his voyages and discoveries was published after his death, which took place in 1484.

CADE, JOHN, a noted rebel, better known by the familiar appellation of Jack Cade, was a native of Ireland, from which country he had been obliged to flee for his crimes. During the feeble government of Henry VI. he put himself at the head of 20,000 men, collected from the populace in Kent, and marched into London, where he boldly proposed the rectifying of various abuses in the state. Elated with his popularity and success, he next assumed the title of Lord Mortimer, declaring himself the rightful heir to the throne, as a descendant of Edward III.; but this foolish and presumptuous extravagance induced the citizens to resist him, and the insurgents were soon compelled to submit to the royal authority. All who returned to their homes were pardoned; but Cade, who was excepted from the general amnesty, and for whose body 1000 marks were offered by the government, wandered about the woods of Kent and Sussex for a time, till at length he was discovered, and killed in a garden at Holkfield, Sussex, by a gentleman of Kent, named Alexander Eden.

CADET, J. MARCIL, a Corsican, born in 1751; inspector of the mines in Corsica, and author of some eminent geological, statistical, and mineralogical works; among others, one on Corsican jaspers.

CADET DE VAUX, ANTHONY ALEXIS, a French author, editor, and member of various learned societies. He established the "Journal de Paris," and wrote several works connected with agriculture. Born, 1743; died, 1828.

CADET DE GASSICOURT, CHARLES LOUIS, brother of the preceding; author of the "Dictionary of Chemistry," in 4 vols.; various Travels; "Letters on London and the English Nation," &c. Born, 1769; died, 1821.

CADMUS, the founder of Thebes. His history, like that of many other personages of high antiquity, is much mingled with fable. It seems certain, however, that he was born in Phœnicia or Egypt, and that Greece owed to him the sixteen letters of which its alphabet originally consisted. He flourished in the 16th century B. C.

CADMUS, the Milesian, the first Greek author who wrote a prose history. Dionysius, of Halicarnassus, ascribes to this writer "The Antiquities of Miletus and all Ionia," but no portion of the work is now extant.

CADOG, son of Brychan, a saint, and founder of some churches in Wales in the 5th century.

CADOG, surnamed The Wise, a Welsh bard of the 6th century. He was the first who made a complete collection of British proverbs.

CADOGAN, WILLIAM, first earl of Cadogan, entered the army early in life; and, after he had attained the rank of a brigadier-general, distinguished himself at the battle of Blenheim. In short, he was present with the Duke of Marlborough in all his great victories; and, at his death, succeeded him as commander-in-chief and master of the ordnance. Died, 1727.

CADOGAN, WILLIAM, M. D., a skilful English physician; author of a treatise on the gout, in which he wisely insists upon abstinence as the best preventive and cure; an "Essay on Nursing," &c. Died, 1797.

CADOUDAL, GEORGES, a famous Chouan chief, born in 1769. After the ill success of his efforts for the restoration of the Bourbons, he came to terms with General Brune, in 1800, dispersed his troops, and proceeded to London. While there, he was accused by the French government of planning the infernal machine, Georges having avowed a personal hostility to the First Consul. He afterwards, on receiving the ordon rouge from Monsieur (Charles X.), and a lieutenant-general's commission, embarked with Pichegru in a secret expedition, and landed at Falaise. It has been said that the object was to assassinate Buonaparte, as well as to excite a counter-revolution; and Pitt was accused of sanctioning the enterprise, by a letter to Lord Hutchinson, which is denied. That these charges were fabricated by the emissaries of Buonaparte there is every reason to believe. He was, however, traced by the Parisian police, and put under arrest by a violent seizure, while descending from a cabriolet, during which he wounded two of the officers; and, after a summary judicial process, was executed on the 6th of June, 1804. He died with great courage. The two brothers Polignac were also involved in the same process, and condemned to death, but escaped through the humane exertions of Murat.

CADWALADYR, CASAIL, a Welsh poet of the 16th century; some of whose works still remain in MS., and indicate much ability.

CÆDMON, a Saxon ecclesiastic, supposed to have flourished in the 5th century. A fragment of a hymn, by this author, is preserved in king Alfred's translation of Bede; and is the oldest specimen extant of Saxon poetry.

CÆSALPINUS, ANDREW, an Italian physician and natural philosopher. This enlightened man in some degree anticipated the grand discoveries of Harvey and Linnaeus; his "Quæstiones Peripateticæ," containing some hints on the circulation of the blood; and his treatise "De Plantis," giving the first example of a system of botanical arrangement, based on similarity of structure. Died, 1603.

CÆSAR, CAIUS JULIUS, the first Roman emperor, and one of the greatest men that even Rome ever produced. At the early age of 16 he lost his father, who was a prætor; and, very shortly after that event, he married Cornella the daughter of Cornelius Cinna, the friend of Marius. This connection gave great offence to the powerful Sylla, who, having vainly endeavoured to bring about a divorce, caused Cæsar to be proscribed. Cæsar, however, escaped the search that was made after him, and Sylla was at length induced to exempt him from prosecution, though he did so very unwillingly, telling those who interceded with him that they would repent their kindness, as he could see in Cæsar the germ of many Mariuses. Having distinguished himself as an orator in the impeachment of Cornelius Dolabella, he speedily grew a public favourite, and became successively military tribune, quæstor, and ædile. The profusion with which he lavished his liberality while in these offices, involved him very deeply in debt; but having obtained the government of Spain, he contrived to amass money sufficient for their discharge, though they are said to have exceeded a million and a half sterling; a fact which, as he held the government only a year, says but little for his scrupulousness as to the means he used for self-aggrandisement. Having united with Pompey and Crassus in the memorable coalition, called "the first triumvirate," he became consul, and then obtained the government of Gaul, with the command of four legions. And now it was that his genius had ample scope. His military career was rapid and brilliant. Belgians, Helvetians, and Nervians succumbed to him; the German tribes were repulsed, and Gaul was wholly subjected to the Roman power. These transactions, and his invasions of Britain, are beautifully and graphically related in his Commentaries. His successes had the effect of exciting the jealousy of Pompey, who had influence enough in the senate to cause Cæsar to be recalled from the government of Gaul. He refused to obey this order, and marched with his army into Italy, Pompey retiring into Greece. Having seized the public treasury, and commissioned Mark Antony to watch over his interests in Rome, he proceeded to Spain, where a large army remained in Pompey's interest, which he defeated, and on his return to Rome was declared dictator. He then followed Pompey into Greece, and defeated him in the memorable battle of Pharsalia, from which Pompey escaped only to be assassinated in Egypt. Having crushed every attempt at resistance on the part of the sons and friends of Pompey, and having been honoured with four several triumphs, he was declared perpetual dictator; a title which some of his friends wished to alter to that of king. And as the great body of the Roman people, dazzled by his military genius, and gratified by the liberality of his largesses, were insensible of, or indifferent to, his insatiable thirst for domination, it is more than probable that he would have become an absolute king, but that Brutus and other republicans penetrated his designs, and sternly resolved to make his life the sacrifice to the freedom of his country. Notwithstanding dark hints had been given to him of his danger, he attended a meeting of the senate without taking any measures for the safety of his person, and fell beneath the daggers of the conspirators on the ides of March, in the year 43 B. C., and in the 56th of his age.

CÆSAR, SIR JULIUS, an eminent English civilian, who filled various important offices in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and kings James I. and Charles I. His last office was that of master of the rolls, which he held above 20 years. Born, 1557; died, 1636.

CAFFA, MELCHIOR, an able sculptor, many of whose works adorned the churches of Rome. Died, 1687.

CAFFARELLI, a republican French general, born in 1756. He protested against the despotism of Louis XVI., and served with great distinction under Kleber and Moreau on the Rhine, where he lost a leg, and under Buonaparte in Egypt. He was killed at St. Jean d'Acre, in 1799, by a cannon-ball; and his tomb still remains, without the walls.

CAFFARELLI, GAETANO MAJORANO, a celebrated Italian singer. He studied under Porpora, who made him practise the elements of singing from a single sheet of music paper for five years. He was so well rewarded for his talent, that he purchased the dukedom of Santo Dorato. Died, 1783.

CAFFIAUX, JOSEPH, a Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur; author of the "Genealogical Treasury," an "Essay towards a History of Music," &c. Died, 1777.

CAGLIARI, PAUL, or PAUL VERO-NESE, a celebrated painter. His works are somewhat deficient in correctness of drawing and propriety of costume; but these defects are amply compensated by his excellence of colouring, and by his grace and harmony of composition. His works are very numerous; but the best of them are to be found in the churches of Venice, in which city he long resided, and where he died, in 1538.

CAGLIOSTRO, ALEXANDER, Count, the assumed title of an impostor, whose real name was Joseph Balsamo. He was born at Palermo; and having lost his father at an early age, he was placed under the protection of the friars of mercy, whose order he entered as a novice. Here he acquired the elements of chemistry and physic; but he speedily made his escape, and committed so many frauds in Palermo, that he was obliged to abscond. After visiting various parts, he at length reached Naples, where he married a woman of as abandoned a disposition as himself, with whom he travelled to Spain, Portugal, and England, pretending to supernatural powers, and wringing considerable sums from those who became his dupes. In England this exemplary couple established an order of what they called Egyptian Masonry, and as their dupes were of the higher order, they easily obtained from them the loan of valuable jewels, on pretext of some intended ceremonies. With these they went off to Paris, and lived there in the utmost extravagance. The count, however, was thrown into the Bastille, on a charge of being concerned in the fraud of the celebrated diamond necklace of Marie Antoinette; and when he obtained his liberty, he judged it high time to quit France. He then went to Italy, where his wife divulged some of his crimes to the Inquisition, and he was confined in the dungeons of the Castle of St. Angelo, and died there in 1794.

CAIETAU, the assumed name, taken from that of his birthplace, of Thomas de Vio, a Neapolitan monk, and subsequently general of his order; author of a work on the "Power of the Pope," which procured him the archbishopric of Palermo and a cardinalate; "Commentaries on Aristotle and Aquinas," &c. Died, 1534.

CAILLE, NICHOLAS LOUIS DE LA, an eminent French mathematician and astronomer; author of "Elements of Astronomy," and of numerous other valuable works of science. Born, 1713; died, 1762.

CAIUS, otherwise GAIUS, an eminent Roman lawyer; author of a valuable body of legal institutes. He died about the beginning of the third century.

CALAMY, EDMUND, a presbyterian divine. He was educated at Cambridge, and obtained a living; but he resigned it, and joined the Nonconformists, rather than comply with the order for reading the Book of Sports. He now entered warmly into the religious disputes of the time, and was one of the writers of the treatise against episcopacy, entitled, from the initials of its authors, "Smectymnus." Though he preached before the House of Commons, and was one of the assembly of divines at Westminster, he opposed both the execution of Charles I. and the subsequent domination of Cromwell. At the death of the latter he actively aided in the restoration, and became chaplain to Charles II. The act of uniformity caused him again to secede, and he died in retirement in 1656.

CALAMY, EDMUND, grandson of the above, and a dissenting minister of great note. He was a very voluminous writer. Besides numerous sermons, and controversial tracts against Echard, Hoadley, and others, he published an abridgment of "Baxter's History of his Life and Times," with numerous supplementary articles. Died, 1732.

CALANUS, an Indian philosopher, much esteemed by Alexander the Great. At the age of 83, being afflicted with a painful illness, he caused a funeral pile to be erected, which he ascended with a composed countenance, and expired in the flames, saying, that having lost his health and seen Alexander, life had no more charms for him.

CALAS, JOHN, a merchant of Toulouse, memorable as the victim of judicial murder. His eldest son committed suicide; and as he was known to be attached to the Roman Catholic faith, a rabble cry arose that he had on that account been murdered by his father. It was in vain that the unhappy parent pointed out the fact that he had a Roman Catholic servant who was uninjured. He was condemned literally without the shadow of a proof of his guilt, and put to death by being broken on the wheel. Voltaire and others subsequently caused the process to be revised, and the unhappy widow procured a pension. The unjust and ignominious death of Calas took place in 1762.

CALCAGNINI, CEMO, an Italian military officer, who bore arms under the emperor Maximilian, and pope Julius II., and was distinguished equally as a soldier and a negotiator. Quitting the profession of arms, he became professor of belles lettres in the university of Ferrara. His Latin poetry was much esteemed, but as a prose writer he is more valuable for his matter than for his style. Died, 1541.

CALCRAFT, JOHN, a gentleman of Dorsetshire, and for many years an M.P., entered parliament in 1796. He voted with the Whig party, and especially distinguished himself in favour of George IV. while he was prince of Wales; it was therefore, with surprise and indignation, that the Whigs saw their friend secede from them, and accept office in the Tory administration formed in 1828 under the Duke of Wellington. He retired, of course, when that administration was dissolved; but he voted on their side until 1831, when he gave the casting vote in favour of the Reform Bill. From this time he seemed dejected, mental alleviation succeeded, and he committed suicide.

CALDAS, FRANCIS JOSEPH, a distinguished Spanish naturalist. He was employed by the Congress of New Granada to complete the Flora of Bogota, when the disturbed state of public affairs interrupted the work; and this unfortunate gentleman and his colleague, Don Lozano, having sided with the patriot party, were put to death by the Spanish general Murillo, in 1816.

CALDERON DE LA BARCA, PEDRO, a distinguished Spanish dramatist of the 17th century. In his youth he bore arms, but subsequently became canon of Toledo, and employed his leisure in literature. His plays are very numerous, but, though popular in Spain, their chief merit to an English reader is in their plots; his diction being generally inflated, and not unfrequently coarse. Born, 1600; died, 1687.

CALDERWOOD, DAVID, a Scotch presbyterian divine of the reign of Charles II. His opposition to episcopacy caused him to be banished, and he went to reside in Holland, where he published his celebrated "Altare Demascenum." He subsequently returned to Scotland, and by his writings and personal exertions greatly aided in the establishment of presbyterianism. Died, 1651.

CALENIUS, WALTER, a native of Wales, and one of its historians. He was arch-deacon of Oxford in 1120.

CALENTIUS, ELISIUS, a Neapolitan poet, and prose author. He was preceptor to Frederick, the son of Ferdinand, king of Naples, and the earliest writer on the illegality of putting criminals to death except for murder. Died, 1503.

CALEPINO, AMBROSE, an Italian grammarian and philologist; author of a very valuable polyglot dictionary, and other learned and useful works. Died, 1510.

CALETTI, GIUSEPPE, surnamed IL CREMONESE, an admirable Italian painter. His principal picture is that of St. Mark, in the church San Benedetto, at Ferrara. In some of his works he so closely imitated Titian, that connoisseurs can scarcely distinguish them. Died, 1660.

CALIGULA, CAIUS CÆSAR AUGUSTUS GERMANICUS, the Roman emperor and tyrant, began his reign A.D. 37, with every promising appearance of becoming the real father and friend of his people; but at the end of eight months he was seized with a fever, which, it is charitably presumed, must have permanently deranged his intellect, for his disposition totally changed, and he committed the most atrocious acts of impiety, cruelty, and folly. He caused sacrifices to be offered to himself, his wife, and his favourite horse; murdered many of his subjects with his own hands; had others put to the rack while he was enjoying his meals, or beheld in his presence. But in the midst of his enormities he was assassinated by a tribune of the people, as he came out of the theatre, A.D. 41, in the 29th year of his age.

CALIPPUS, a Greek mathematician of the 4th century B. C., famous for having corrected the cycle of 19 years, invented by Meton, to show the correspondence of time in the revolutions of the sun and moon.

CALLCOTT, JOHN WALL, doctor of music, an eminent English composer. The Nobleman's Catch-club having proposed a prize, he sent in a hundred compositions! It was then ruled that no individual should send more than three compositions of a sort; and Callcott accordingly, in 1789, sent twelve, four of which gained the four medals! For many years he carried off at least one annual prize, until 1793, when the prizes ceased to be given. He wrote, besides glees, catches, and other compositions, a "Musical Grammar," and made some progress with a "Musical Dictionary." Born, 1766; died, 1821.

CALLCOTT, SIR AUGUSTUS WALL, R. A. an eminent English landscape painter, was born at Kensington, in 1773, his eldest brother being Dr. Callcott, the celebrated musical composer. Originally a chorister in Westminster Abbey, he was induced to try his hand at portrait painting; and such was his success, that he immediately followed the new pursuit to which his inclination pointed. Year after year his reputation increased; and from 1799, when he first submitted a specimen of his abilities for exhibition at the Royal Academy, till 1810, when he was elected a Royal Academician, he had advanced almost to the summit of his profession in his own particular branch of art, viz. landscape painting. For many years his pictures of sea-coast views and English inland scenery were in considerable request; nor were they ever deficient in number, his industry being on a par with his ability. On his marriage with the widow of Captain Graham, they made a continental tour, and it was evident soon after his return that his study of Italian scenery and the Italian masters had wrought an entire change in his style of composition. No longer did we see rural scenes of England—mills, market-carts, or ferry-boats; but "Morning" and "Evening," Italian compositions; "Sunset near Canneglia," "Italian Girls at their first Communion," and others of that class. Though for a time, however, he had abandoned, he had not forgotten, the studies of his earlier years; and in 1837 the public were both surprised and delighted with a large picture of "Raffaello and the Fornarina," with figures the size of life. In that year he received the honour of knighthood. Died, Nov. 25. 1844; aged 65.

CALLCOTT, MARIA, Lady, daughter of Rear-admiral George Dundas, was born 1779. Married at a very early age to Captain Graham, R. N., she accompanied him to India, returned to England, and published her travels in the three presidencies before she was twenty-four years of age! Some years later she accompanied her husband to South America, where he died, and she was in Chili during the terrible earthquakes of 1822-3. Besides the "Travels" above named, she published a "History of Spain," a "Scripture Herbal," and several minor works. Her second husband was Sir Augustus Callcott, R. A., the eminent artist. Died, Nov. 1842, aged 63.

CALLET, JOHN FRANCIS, a celebrated French mathematician, hydrographer, and engineer; author of "A Memoir on the Discovery of the Longitude," a "Supplement to Bezout's Trigonometry," and a "Table of Logarithms, from 1 to 108,000." Died, 1798.

CALLIMACHUS, a sculptor and architect of Corinth. He is said to have invented the Corinthian order of architecture, and to have taken the hint of its capital from a plant of the acanthus which surrounded a basket covered with a tile on a tomb. He flourished in the 6th century B. C.

CALLIMACHIUS, a Greek poet and historian. The remains of his writings, consisting of elegies, hymns, and epigrams, have been published by several eminent editors, and translated into English by Dodd and Tytler.

CALLINUS, a Grecian orator and poet, supposed to have lived in the 8th century B. C. Some of his poetry is in the collection of Stobæus; and he is said to have been the inventor of elegiac verse.

CALLISTHENES, a Greek philosopher and poet, a relative and pupil of Aristotle, by whom he was recommended to Alexander the Great. He accompanied that prince in the expedition against Persia, and was at first much esteemed by him. It seems, however, that the philosopher had no small portion of arrogance, a quality not likely to serve him with a despotic and irritable prince. He crowned the offences of his free speaking by boldly reproaching Alexander's assumption of divine honours. For this he was put to death.

CALLOT, JAMES, an eminent French engraver. His plates are very numerous and highly esteemed, and his drawings scarcely less so. Died, 1636.

CALLY, PIERRE, a French divine and philosopher. He was a staunch Cartesian, and was much engaged in controversies on that subject. He also distinguished himself in converting Protestants to the Church of Rome; and envy of his theological success, added to enmity against his philosophy, raised him powerful enemies, who caused him to be banished from Caen, of which he was curé, to Moulins. On his return, he again renewed his exertions among the Protestants, and published a work on the agreement between theology and philosophy, upon the subject of Transubstantiation. This work was condemned as heretical, and he was obliged to recant in his own church. In addition to his controversial works, he wrote some sermons, and an "Introduction to Philosophy," and edited "Boëthius de Consolatione." Died, 1709.

CALMET, AUGUSTIN, a French Benedictine abbot of Senones; author of a "Universal History," "Dictionary of the Bible," and other learned and well-known works. Born, 1672; died, 1757.

CALO, JOHN, or JOHANNITZ, a Bulgarian chief of the 13th century. He put the emperor Baldwin to death, and committed most wanton cruelties in Greece; but was cut short in his evil career by the hand of an assassin.

CALONNE, CHARLES ALEXANDER DE, an eminent French statesman, who succeeded Necker as comptroller-general of the finances in 1783; but after four years of incessant endeavours at financial reform, was obliged to retire to England. He wrote "Observations sur plusieurs Matières du Droit Civile et Coutumier," &c. Born, 1734; died, 1802.

CALPRENEDE, WALTER DE COSTES, Lord of, a French nobleman and friend of the great Condé, who is said to have aided him in the composition of "Cassandra," "Pharamond," &c., voluminous romances, once very popular, but now sunk into almost entire oblivion. Died, 1663.

CALPURNIUS, or CALPHURNIUS, TITUS, a Sicilian Latin poet of the 3rd century. Seven of his eclogues are to be found in the "Poetæ Latini Minores," published at Leyden in 1731, and are thought to be second only to the eclogues of Virgil.

CALVART, DENIS, an eminent Dutch painter, who had the honour of giving the earliest instructions to Guido, Albano, and Domenichino. His chef-d'œuvre is the picture of St. Michael, in the church of St. Peter, at Bologna. Died, 1619.

CALVERT, GEORGE, first lord Baltimore, an English statesman. He was for some time secretary of state to James I., but was obliged to resign this office on becoming a Roman Catholic. He did not lose the favour of the king, however; but obtained a valuable grant of land in America, and by his wise and just conduct formed the colony which has in modern times increased to the populous and wealthy state of Maryland. Died, 1632.

CALVERT, FREDERICK, seventh lord Baltimore; author of a "Tour to the East, with Remarks on Constantinople and the Turks," "Celestes et Inferi," &c. Died, 1771.

CALVERT, FREDERICK, an ingenious and enterprising artist residing in London, whose numerous drawings and lithographic prints afford ample evidence both of his versatility and untiring assiduity. Died, 1835.

CALVI, LAZZARO, an able Italian artist, but of so jealous and evil a disposition, that he poisoned an artist who rivalled him; and, on finding Luca Cambraso's portion of the decoration of a church preferred to his own, abandoned his own profession, and did not resume it for 20 years. Died, 1606.

CALVIN, properly CAUVIN, JOHN, after Luther the most eminent of the religious reformers. His writings, both controversial and practical, were very numerous, and marked by great vigour and perspicuity; and though they are now little read, the principles they inculcate are held by a vast body in all countries in which the reformed religion is established or tolerated. There is, however, a deep stain in the character of this reformer. While vindicating the liberty of conscience, he so far forgot his own principles and disobeyed the behests of the gospel, as to consign to the flames the unfortunate Servetus. The principal work of Calvin is his "Christian Institutes." Born at Noyon, in Picardy, 1509; died, 1564.

CALVISIUS, SELLIUS, a German writer; author of "Opus Chronologicum," a work much praised by Scaliger and other learned men; a treatise on music; a work against the Gregorian calendar, &c. He also composed several psalms and other pieces of church music. Died, 1615.

CAMBACERES, JEAN JACQUES REGIS, duke of Rome, &c., raised to distinction by the French revolution, was born at Montpellier, in 1733, brought up to the legal profession, and by his talents soon attracted the notice of the convention, by whom he was appointed to various judicial offices. In the discussion relative to the fate of Louis XIV., although he was one who declared him guilty, yet he disputed the right of the convention to judge him, and voted for his provisory arrest, or, in case of hostile invasion, his death. For a time he had the management of foreign affairs; and when Buonaparte was first consul, Cambaceres was chosen second consul. After Napoleon became emperor, he was an especial favourite, and was created archchancellor, grand officer of the legion of honour, and ultimately duke of Parma, and president of the chamber of peers. In fine, he always showed a sincere attachment to Napoleon, and devoted his best energies to his cause; and though he was banished on the second restoration of Louis XVIII., yet he was afterwards allowed to return to Paris, where he died in 1824.

CAMBRIDGE, H.R.H., ADOLPHUS FREDERICK, the seventh and youngest son of George III., was born Feb. 24th, 1774. He received his earliest education at Kew, and having completed his studies at Göttingen, he served as a volunteer under the Duke of York, during the campaign of 1793, in Flanders, where he received two wounds; and he bore an active share in the various operations of the arduous campaign in 1794 and 1795. In 1803 he was promoted to the rank of general, and appointed colonel-in-chief of the King's German Legion; in 1813 he received the field marshal's baton; and at the close of the war in 1815 he was nominated viceroy of Hanover; an office which he held till 1837, when the death of his brother William IV. opened the succession to the throne of Hanover to the Duke of Cumberland. His administration of the affairs of that country, if not brilliant, was characterised by great discretion; and in 1831, his mild yet firm conduct went far to extinguish the strong party animosities, which had nearly kindled the flames of civil war. Since the close of 1837 the duke chiefly resided in this country, where he endeared himself to all classes of the community by his affability and bonhomie. He was a zealous supporter of all charitable institutions, and few anniversary meetings or festivals were thought to be complete if the directors had not secured him for the chairman. In politics, the duke was a liberal conservative; but he made it a point of never voting, though he might speak, against the ministers of the crown. Besides being patron of the Art Union, he was exceedingly fond of the fine arts, especially of music, and at one period of his life distinguished himself as an amateur performer on the piano and the violin. We have only to add that on the 7th of May, 1818, the Duke of Cambridge married the Princess Wilhelmina Louisa, daughter of Frederick, landgrave of Hesse Cassel, who with a son and two daughters, the issue of their marriage, still survive. Died, July 8. 1850.

CAMBRIDGE, RICHARD OWEN, an English writer of great and versatile ability; author of "The Scribbleriad," a satire; a "History of the Coromandel War," &c. Died, 1802.

CAMBORNE, PIERRE JACQUES, Baron de, a distinguished French general, was born at Nantes, 1770. Entering the army in 1790, he served with distinction in the campaigns of the republic and the empire. He accompanied Napoleon to Elba in 1814, returned with him in 1815, commanded a division of the Old Guard at the battle of Waterloo, refused to surrender, though his men were nearly destroyed, and fell into the hands of the English, after being severely wounded. In 1816 he was brought before a council of war; but though unanimously acquitted, he was placed in retirement, and did not re-enter his country's service till 1830. The celebrated words, "La Garde meurt, et ne se rend pas," are attributed to him. Died, 1842.

CAMBYSES, king of Persia, succeeded his father, the great Cyrus, in 529 B.C. He was of a violent and vindictive disposition, which he manifested equally by his invasions of Egypt and Ethiopia, and by his cruel treatment of his own subjects. Died, B.C. 521.

CAMDEN, CHARLES PRATT, Earl, a distinguished British lawyer and statesman, was the third son of Sir John Pratt, chief justice of the court of king's bench, and was born in 1713. On the advancement of Henley to the House of Lords in 1757, Mr. Pratt was appointed attorney-general; and in 1762 made chief justice of the common pleas. In 1765 he was created a peer, and the year following advanced to the dignity of lord chancellor. On the question of libels Lord Camden always opposed the doctrine laid down by high authority, viz. that juries were only the judges of the matter of fact, and not of the law. In 1782 he was appointed president of the council, which office he resigned the following year; but he was afterwards re-appointed, and held it till his death in 1794.

CAMDEN, JOHN JEFFREYS PRATT, Marquis, K. G., &c., was born in 1759, being the only son of Charles, first earl Camden, sometime lord high chancellor of England. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge; and in 1780 was returned to parliament as one of the members for Bath; shortly after which he received the appointment of one of the tellers of the exchequer. In 1794 he succeeded his father in the peerage, and the year following he was made lord lieutenant of Ireland. Besides various other important situations, he held the lucrative office of teller of the exchequer for sixty years; and during almost half that term he had resigned the large income arising therefrom, amounting in the whole to upwards of a quarter of a million of money. This patriotic act alone throws a lustre over the name and character of the noble marquis, which will be remembered long after the splendour attached to his rank and honours shall have faded from the memory. For his eminent services to the state, he was created marquis Camden and earl of Brecknock in 1812. Died, 1840.

CAMDEN, WILLIAM, a learned English antiquary. He received his early education at Christ's Hospital, and subsequently studied at Oxford, where he took his B.A. degree. After filling the situations of second and chief master of Westminster School, his proficiency in antiquarian lore procured him the honourable and lucrative office of Clarendon king-at-arms. In addition to his great and well-known work, "The Britannia," he published "Annals of Queen Elizabeth," a Greek grammar, &c. Born, 1551; died, 1623.

CAMERARIUS, JOACHIM, a learned German writer, the friend and biographer of Melancthon. In addition to his original writings, he published several translations from the Greek. Born, 1500; died, 1574.

CAMERARIUS, JOACHIM, son of the above; author of some botanical essays, &c. Born, 1534; died, 1598.

CAMERON, Lieut.-gen. Sir ALLAN. In 1793, he raised, from his private funds, the 79th, or "Cameron Highlanders;" and after a long life spent in the service of his country, died in 1828.

CAMERON, JOHN, a Scotch Protestant divine, who after filling the divinity chair at Glasgow, obtained that of Montauban, in France. Mild by nature and tolerant by Christian philosophy, he endeavoured to mediate between Protestants and Papists; but some furious zealots belonging to the latter caused him to be so severely assaulted, that he died from the effects of the brutal attack. His works were collected and published in three 4to volumes. Died, 1625.

CAMILLA, daughter of Metabus, king of the Volsci. On succeeding her father she distinguished herself in arms, and fell in battle assisting Turnus against Aneas.

CAMILLUS, MARCUS FURIUS, a Roman general. After obtaining the highest honours from his applauding compatriots, he was charged with peculation, and went into exile. But when Brennus and his Gauls besieged the capital, Camillus nobly set aside his private feelings, hastened to Rome, and freed it from the barbarians; after which he was made dictator. Died, B.C. 365.

CAMOENS, LOUIS, a Portuguese poet of first-rate celebrity, was born at Lisbon about the year 1520, and received his education at Coimbra. He served with great credit against the Moors in Africa; and subsequently joined in an expedition to the East Indies, where he wrote a considerable portion of his "Lusiad." This poem has been several times translated into English. Died, 1579.

CAMPAN, MADAME DE, distinguished no less for her amiability than her acquirements, was born at Paris, 1752. Attached to the court in the capacity of companion to the French princesses, she was particularly distinguished by Marie Antoinette, whose good and evil fortune she shared with affecting fidelity and devotion. After the revolution she instituted a celebrated educational establishment at St. Germain; she was subsequently appointed by Napoleon head of the institution for the education of the daughters of officers whom he had enrolled in the Legion of Honour: but after the restoration of the Bourbons, this establishment was dissolved, and her relationship to Marshal Ney involved her in various unpleasant investigations which embittered her life. She died in 1822, leaving behind her, besides a respected name, many educational works (of which her "Education des Filles" deserves particular notice) and valuable memoirs, rich in interesting sketches of the private life of her former mistress and friend.

CAMPANELLA, THOMAS, an Italian monk of the Dominican order. Having strongly opposed the peripatetic philosophy, his enemies caused him to be accused of conspiracy, and he was confined first at Naples, and afterwards at Rome. From the latter place he escaped to France, where Cardinal Richelieu obtained him a pension. His best works are "De recta Ratione Studenti" and "Aphorisma Politica." Died, 1639.

CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD, marquis of Argyle, a zealous and gallant partisan of the Covenanters. At the restoration of Charles II. the marquis was committed to the Tower. After remaining a prisoner about 5 months, he was sent to Scotland, where he was tried for high treason, and beheaded in 1661.

CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD, earl of Argyle, son of the above, and a most zealous and gallant adherent of the royal cause; so much so, indeed, that he was excepted from the general pardon issued by Cromwell in 1654. Though he defeated the endeavours of his enemies to bring him to the scaffold, this noble man most unfortunately ventured to return from Holland, where he had found shelter, and being apprehended, was conveyed to Edinburgh and beheaded in 1685.

CAMPBELL, JOHN, duke of Argyle and of Greenwich, was distinguished equally as a soldier and a statesman. He was brigadier-general at the famous battle of Ramillies, and commanded with brilliant effect at Oudenarde and Malplaquet. To these services he added that of beating the Earl of Mar at Dumblain, and compelling the Pretender to quit the kingdom. These actions, and his exertions in bringing about the union, were rewarded with the Garter and the English dukedom of Greenwich. He also held several offices, of which Sir R. Walpole deprived him, but which he regained that minister's removal. Born, 1671; died, 1743.

CAMPBELL, ARCHIBALD, a relative of the above, and bishop of Aberdeen; author of the very scarce and curious work, "The Doctrine of a Middle State between Death and the Resurrection." He resigned his bishopric in 1724, and died in 1744.

CAMPBELL, GEORGE, D.D., a Scotch divine, principal of Marischal College, Aberdeen, and professor of divinity there; author of the "Philosophy of Rhetoric,"—still a standard work,—a "Reply to Hume on the Miracles," "Lectures on Ecclesiastical History," &c. Born, 1709; died, 1796.

CAMPBELL, JOHN, a Scotch architect, surveyor of the works at Greenwich; author of "Vitruvius Britannicus." Died, 1734.

CAMPBELL, JOHN, a clever and industrious Scotch writer; author of the "Military Histories of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough," a "Political Survey of Britain," the "Lives of the Admirals," &c. Died, 1775.

CAMPBELL, Major-gen. Sir NEIL, was the officer selected by the British government to accompany Napoleon to the island of Elba; and it was during a short excursion, which his bad state of health rendered necessary, that Napoleon effected his escape. This brave and meritorious officer, after spending thirty-one years in the service of his country, fell a sacrifice to the noxious climate of Sierra Leone, of which colony he had been appointed commander-in-chief. Died, 1827.

CAMPBELL, THOMAS, LL.D., an eminent poet, was the son of a highly intelligent and respectable Scotch merchant, who gave him an excellent education at Glasgow, where he greatly distinguished himself. A translation of his from Aristophanes was pronounced by the best judges to be the finest college exercise they had ever seen; and, when little more than thirteen, he won a bursary in his college from a competitor nearly double his age! Such a youth could not be followed by an undistinguished maturity. Leaving Glasgow at an early age, he settled in Edinburgh as a private tutor; and here, when only in his twenty-second year, he published "The Pleasures of Hope"—by all judges allowed to be one of the most elegant poems in our language. The success of this work was such as to allow of his making a tour on the Continent, whence he gave the world those splendid lyrics, "Ye Mariners of England," "The Exile of Erin," and "Hohenlinden." At the battle of Hohenlinden he was so near, that he could see the returning conquerors wiping their blood-stained sabres upon their horses' manes; a circumstance to which, in after years, he was often heard to allude. Soon after his return from the Continent, Mr. Campbell married and settled in London, employing himself not only in occasional composition of poetry, but also in the hard literary drudgery of mere compilation. To such works he could not judiciously put a name which already stood so high on the list of England's noblest poets, but we have reason to believe that, from 1803 to 1809, his labours in this way were as intense and extensive as they were creditable to his love of independence. But he now published "Gertrude of Wyoming," "The Battle of the Baltic," "Lord Ullin's Daughter," and "O'Connor's Child;" and he was engaged by Mr. Murray to write the admirable and well-known "Critical Essays and Specimens." Subsequently he edited the New Monthly and the Metropolitan Magazines; and published "Theodoric," a poem, besides editing some few reprints and compilations. Early in his career he was relieved from the absolute want which too often stings genius into imprudence, by the kindness of Charles Fox, who put him on the pension list for 200*l.* per annum. His health had for some years been but feeble, and in 1843 he retired to Boulogne, where he died; but his remains were conveyed to England and interred in Westminster Abbey. Died, June 15, 1844, aged 67.

CAMPE, JOACHIM HENRY, a German writer; author of a German dictionary, "Letters from Paris, eulogistic of the French Revolution;" "Theophrastus;" and the "New Robinson Crusoe." The last named work, by which he is chiefly known in England, is founded on the popular work of Defoe. Born, 1746; died, 1818.

CAMPEGGIO, LORENZO, originally a professor of civil law at Bologna, but on the death of his wife he entered the church, became a bishop, and at length a cardinal. In 1519 he was sent as legate to England, and while here was nominated bishop of Salisbury. After being for some time in Germany as legate, and employed in opposing Lutheranism, he again came to England to decide between Henry VIII. and Catharine of Arragon, on which occasion he offended Henry without being of any real service to the queen. He appears to have been a man of considerable learning and natural ability; for he reckoned Erasmus and other eminent scholars among his friends. Died, 1539.

CAMPEGGIO, brother of the above, and a bishop; author of several treatises on canon law. Died, 1504.

CAMPER, PETER, a Dutch physician and naturalist. His writings on various departments of natural history and philosophy are collected in six volumes; and, in addition to these, he wrote an ingenious treatise on the physiognomies of men of different nations. Born, 1722; died, 1789.

CAMPHUYSEN, DYRK, a Dutch landscape painter of the 17th century; distinguished for the excellence of his moonlight pieces.

CAMPI, BERNARDIN, an Italian painter, and author of an excellent treatise on the principles of his art. Died, 1584.—Various persons of this name are distinguished in the annals of Italian art.

CAMPIAN, EDMUND, an English Jesuit. He was educated at Christ's Hospital, and graduated at Oxford; but on a visit to Ireland was induced to turn papist, and enter as a Jesuit at Douay. He wrote "Chronologia Universalis," and a drama, called "Nectar and Ambrosia." Being chosen by Gregory XIII. to come to England as a missionary, he was discovered, tried for high treason, and executed in 1581.

CAMPISTRON, JEAN GUALBERT DE, a French dramatic poet. Three volumes of his plays are extant; and some of them are thought to be but little inferior to those of his celebrated contemporary, Racine. Born, 1656; died, 1723.

CAMPOMANES, PEDRO RODRIGUEZ, Count de, a celebrated Spanish statesman, whose profound views in political economy obtained him, in 1705, the appointment of fiscal to the council of Castile. He was afterwards made minister of state; wrote many useful works; and died in 1789.

CAMPS, FRANCIS DE, abbot of Igny; author of a "History of France," "Dissertation on Medals," &c. Died, 1723.

CAMPSON, GAURI, raised by the Mamelukes to the sultanish of Egypt; and slain, after a beneficent reign of 12 years, in an action with Selim, emperor of the Turks, in 1516.

CAMUS, ARMAND GASTON, was one of the deputies from Paris to the states-general in 1789; and, when a member of the convention, voted for the death of the king. Although he opposed the establishment of the consular government, yet Buonaparte continued him in his office of archivist, which he held several years. Born, 1740; died, 1804.

CAMUS, JOHN PETER, a French prelate, remarkable for the raillery he introduced into his sermons. He was created bishop of Bellay by Henry IV., but his severe reproofs of the monks, and his endeavours to check their irregularities, made him many enemies, and he at length resigned his bishopric and retired to a monastery. Among his writings were several religious romances, written with the intention to supplant the less edifying fictions which were just at that time so popular. Born, 1582; died, 1652.

CAMUSAT, NICHOLAS, canon of Troyes; author of "Mélanges Historiques," "Historia Albigenisium," &c. Died, 1655.

CANALETTI, or CANALE, ANTONIO, a Venetian painter, whose excellence was chiefly in landscape. To him is ascribed the merit of having been the first to make the camera obscura useful in painting. Born, 1697; died, 1768.

CANANI, JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian anatomist, professor of anatomy and medicine at Ferrara; author of a valuable and scarce work, entitled "Musculorum Humani Corporis picturata Dissectio." Some writers attribute to him the discovery of the valves of the veins. Died, 1590.

CANAYE, PHILIP, sieur du Fresne, an eminent French statesman and lawyer. He was employed in several embassies from Henry IV., accounts of which are published in three folio volumes. He was converted from Calvinism in the well-known controversy between Du Perron and Du Plessis Mornay. Born, 1551; died, 1610.

CANDAULES, a king of Lydia, put to death by his favourite, Gyges, at the instigation of the queen. Gyges subsequently slew her also, and assumed the crown, b.c. 718.

CANDIDO, PETER, whose real name is said to have been De Witte, was a native of Bruges, where he was distinguished as an historical painter. Many of his works have been engraved.

CANDOLLE, AUGUSTIN P. DE, whose knowledge of botany has placed him in the same rank with Linnæus, was born at Geneva, 1778. Having finished his studies at Paris, he soon attracted the notice of Cuvier and Lamarck, whom he aided in various scientific researches; and in 1808 he was appointed to the chair of botany in Montpellier. Obligated to quit France for having taken office under Napoleon during the Hundred Days, he found refuge in his native city, where a chair of natural history was expressly instituted for him, and where he continued, for many years, to extend the boundaries of his favourite science by his lectures and publications. His chief works are a "Théorie Élémentaire de Botanique," "Regni Vegetabilis Systema Naturale," "L'Organographie et la Physiologie Végétales," &c.; in all of which he seeks to enforce what is called the natural arrangement. Died, 1841.

CANGE, CHARLES DU FRESNE DU, a French antiquary; author of a "History of the Empire of Constantinople," "Byzantine History," &c. Died, 1688.

CANNE, JOHN, an English puritan of the 17th century. Being obliged to fly from England, he settled at Amsterdam, and succeeded Henry Ainsworth as pastor there. He published a Bible, with numerous marginal references.

CANNEMAN, ELIAS, a Dutch statesman, born in 1778. In 1798 he joined the revolution, and held a high financial post at the Hague, when Holland was united to France. In 1813 he was among the first to declare the independence of Holland, and chief contributor to the restoration of the house of Orange.

CANNES, FRANCIS, a learned Spaniard, born in 1737, and died in 1795. He was the author of "A Spanish and Arabian Grammar and Dictionary."

CANNING, the Right Hon. GEORGE, a highly gifted orator and distinguished politician, was born in London, April 11. 1770. His father, who was from Ireland, was a man of considerable literary abilities; but having offended his family by marrying a lady without fortune, came to London, entered himself of the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. Like many others similarly situated, he soon abandoned the law for literature; but this failing to provide him with the means of support, he commenced business as a wine merchant, and failed. Repeated disappointments seriously affected his health and spirits, and he died, broken-hearted, on the very day that his infant son was one year old. His widow, reduced by dire necessity, had recourse to the stage for support, and married an actor: he also died, and she then became the wife of Mr. Hunn, a linendraper of Exeter. But she had the happiness to live to see the success of her son, and to receive from him at all times the tenderest marks of filial affection. The friends of his father first placed him at Hyde Abbey School, Winchester, and afterwards at Eton, where he greatly distinguished himself as a scholar, and formed many connections which were of great service to him in his after life. While at Eton, he displayed great skill as an author, in his contributions to the "Microcosm," a periodical work conducted by the senior scholars. At Oxford also he distinguished himself, and proceeded thence to Lincoln's Inn, his oratorical talents suggesting the bar as the profession best adapted for him. Being introduced to the House of Commons by Mr. Pitt, he abandoned the bar, and devoted himself wholly to politics. His strenuous and able support of the minister was rewarded in 1796 with an under secretaryship of state; and in the year 1800 he was placed in affluence by his marriage with Miss Joanna Scott, the daughter of General Scott, with a fortune of 100,000*l.* His talents as a poet and political writer were unquestionable, and he made an expert use of them in the articles he contributed to the "Antijacobin," a celebrated publication, in which the Whigs were wittily, unmercifully, and in some cases unjustifiably, held up to popular contempt. After the death of Pitt, and the dissolution of the coalition ministry of Fox and Grenville, Canning became foreign secretary in Perceval's administration; and to him may justly be ascribed the line of British policy in Spain, which destroyed the hopes of Napoleon, and led to his final overthrow; for, as he once emphatically declared, "his had been the hand which committed England to an alliance with Spain." Having, as it was alleged, unfairly endeavoured to procure the removal of Lord Castlereagh from office, a duel took place, and both parties had to quit office. In 1812 he was elected a member for the great commercial town of Liverpool; and in 1816 he again became minister, being appointed president of the board of control. In this situation he made himself extremely unpopular by his defence of the Six Acts, and other no less obnoxious measures. On the return of queen Caroline to England in 1820, Mr. Canning retired from office, that he might not have occasion to vote against her. This did not prevent his being appointed governor-general of India in 1822; and he had already made preparations for his departure, when the melancholy death of the Marquis of Londonderry caused the seals of the foreign office to be delivered to Mr. Canning. In conjunction with Mr.

Huskisson, he now advocated a course of both home and foreign polity, strikingly at variance with that of which he had for years been the wittiest and readiest, if not the most profound, defender. His new policy was as popular as his old had been obnoxious; and the Earl of Liverpool being seized with paralysis, from which there was no hope of his recovery, Mr. Canning reached the grand object of his ambition—that of being the acknowledged head of administration. But though the new premier was popular with the country, the party with whom he had in a great measure ceased to act rendered his task a difficult one. The opposition to him was fierce, almost rancorous; and it was soon obvious that he was suffering both in mind and body from over-exertion and constant excitement. These, aggravating the effects of a severe cold, caught while attending the funeral of the Duke of York, brought on a most painful inflammatory disease, which terminated his life at the age of 57, in 1827. As an orator, he has rarely been excelled for finished elegance and classical taste; pouring forth his eloquence in a persuasive, impassioned, and fearless tone; or in a happy vein of caustic irony demolishing the arguments of his opponents. That he was ambitious of place and power, and that during his political career he made some sacrifices of principle to expediency, no one will deny; but, as a statesman, his great aim was to uphold the honour of his country, and to pursue a liberal line of policy at home and abroad; while he was a decided enemy to all intermeddling with those institutions which the wisdom and experience of ages had built up and cemented.

CANO, ALONZO, a Spanish artist; so masterly a painter, sculptor, and architect, that he was surnamed the Michael Angelo of Spain. His colossal statues of St. Peter and St. Paul were so admirably executed, that foreign artists from all parts travelled to see and copy them. Unhappily, in the midst of his triumph and celebrity, he became the victim of a horrible suspicion. During his absence from home his wife was murdered, and his house robbed by an Italian servant; and Cano, being suspected, was put to the rack. The torture itself could not shake his firmness, and as there was no evidence against him he was released. He then entered the church; and although he strictly attended to his religious duties, yet his love of the arts was unabated, and the "ruling passion" was still so strong, that on his death-bed he averted his face from the crucifix of his confessor, because it was ill-carved. Born, 1608; died, 1676.

CANO, JAMES, a Portuguese navigator, who in the 15th century discovered the kingdom of Congo.

CANO, JOHN SEBASTIAN, a Spanish navigator, who was employed as principal surveying officer by Magellan, who circumnavigated the globe in 1520-1. Died, 1526.

CANORMUS, a German mineralogist of great celebrity, born in 1738; director of the mines to the emperor of Russia. He published numerous works on his favourite science.

CANOVA, ANTONIO, a celebrated modern sculptor. He was born, in 1757, at the little village of Passagno, in the Venetian territory. The seigneur of the village, having seen the figure of a lion modelled by Canova when only 12 years of age, was generous enough to place him with Torretti, of Vienna, at that time the greatest living sculptor. At the close of his studies at Vienna he settled at Venice, and manifested the originality of his powers by various works. From Venice he passed to Rome, where he was greatly patronised, and in a comparatively brief time he was admired by all Europe, and more or less employed by every European potentate. Fortune and honours flowed in upon him, and he used them wisely and honourably. Among his numerous works the finest are "Cupid and Psyche," "Venus and Adonis," "Mary Magdalen," and "Napoleon holding the Sceptre." Died, 1822.

CANOVAI, STANISLAUS, an Italian mathematician, born in 1740. He was brought into notice by a work to prove that Americo Vespuccio was the first discoverer of the New World.

CANSTEIN, CHARLES HILDEBRAND, Baron, a German nobleman, distinguished for an improvement in printing, analogous to stereotyping. He caused bibles and testaments to be printed from entire pages, the testaments being sold as low as fourpence each. How the baron's pages were formed does not clearly appear. Died, 1719.

CANTACUZENE, Prince, a Greek patriot, descended from the famous Eastern emperor, John, and one of the first to join Ypsilanti in 1821, when declaring for the liberty of Greece, since re-established.

CANTACUZENUS, JOHN, emperor of Constantinople. After filling several important offices he was proclaimed emperor by the nobles and soldiery; and he endeavoured to heal the wounds which 5 years of civil war had inflicted on the state; but the jealousy of Palaeologus, the rebellion of his own son, and other disasters, induced him to resign the crown and retire to a monastery, where he employed himself in literary labours. He died in 1411, being more than 100 years old; and he may be considered as one of the greatest among the successors of Constantine.

CANTARINI, SIMON, surnamed the Pezarezse, an Italian painter, whose works are frequently mistaken for those of his great master, Guido. Died, 1648.

CANTEMIR, DEMETRIUS, a Moldavian prince; author of "The System of the Mahometan Religion," a "History of the Rise and Fall of the Ottoman Empire," &c. Died, 1723.

CANTEMIR, ANTIOCHUS, son of the above. He was educated in Russia, and employed in some important embassies from that country. He was the author of several poems, and translated Anacron into Russian. Died, 1774.

CANTERBURY, CHARLES MANNERS SUTTON, Viscount,—eldest son of the Most Rev. C. M. Sutton, archbishop of Canterbury,—was born in 1780; received his education at Eton and Trinity College, Cambridge; and, being destined for the legal profession, was called to the bar in 1805. He entered parliament in 1807, as member for Knarborough, which borough he represented till 1832, when he was elected for the university of Cambridge. In 1809 he was appointed to the office of judge advocate general; and on Mr. Abbot (afterwards Lord Colchester) retiring from the speakership of the House Commons in 1817, the talent and political integrity of Mr. Manners Sutton recommended him to the house as one eminently qualified to fill so distinguished and honourable a situation. To a commanding presence, he added urbanity of manners, particularly when addressing his political opponents, which won their esteem; and he conscientiously discharged the important duties of his office. It being reported that he took an active part in the formation of the Peel ministry in 1834, the adherents and friends of Lord Melbourne put Mr. Abercrombie in nomination for the speakership, and he was chosen (Feb. 19, 1835) by a majority of 10. Mr. Manners Sutton was shortly after called to the upper house by the titles of viscount Canterbury and baron Botesford. He died July 21, 1845, aged 65.

CANTIPRATANUS, THOMAS, a divine and philosopher of the 13th century; author of two rare and curious treatises on the natural history of bees. He is also said to have translated into Latin the whole of the works of Aristotle; but Aventine attributes it to Henry of Brabant.

CANTON, JOHN, M.A., an ingenious English mechanic and experimentalist. The chief of his discoveries was that of the means of making artificial magnets, for which the Royal Society gave him its gold medal, and elected him a member. He contributed some valuable papers to the Transactions of the Royal Society, but published no separate work. Born, 1718; died, 1772.

CANUEL, SIMON, a French general, born in 1767. He was in the army at the time of the revolution; and, by embracing the royal cause, rose to the rank of general of brigade in La Vendée. Quitting this career on the guillotining of his leaders, in 1793, he took command under the Directory; but was not employed under the consular or imperial regime till the restoration of the Bourbons, when he was made governor of Lyons. His accusation, by Colonel Fabvier, of provoking anti-Bourbon conspiracies there for the sake of persecution, gave birth to an action for libel against the former, which excited much notice.

CANUTE, surnamed the Great, king of Denmark by inheritance, and of England by conquest. Though his authority in England was ill-obtained, it seems to have been both wisely and justly administered. Died, 1035.

CANUTE IV., surnamed the Pious, king of Denmark. He endeavoured to invade England, but was unsuccessful, and was slain by one of his subjects in a revolt, consequent on a grant he had made to the church. His death took place in 1087.

CAPASSO, NICHOLAS, an Italian divine, and professor of civil law in the university of Naples; author of some works on theology and jurisprudence, which are now but little known; some spirited and popular poetry, Latin and Italian; and a translation, which is highly popular in Naples, of "Homer's Iliad" into the Neapolitan patois. Born, 1671; died, 1746.

CAPEL, ARTHUR, Lord, a distinguished royalist, who, in conjunction with Lord Norwich and Sir Charles Lucas, gallantly defended Colchester against the parliamentary troops. He at length surrendered on a promise of quarter, but was treacherously beheaded. While confined in the Tower he wrote some beautiful verses; and was the author also of a moral work, entitled "Daily Meditations." He suffered in 1648.

CAPEL, ARTHUR, earl of Essex, son of the above. His own merit and the memory of his father caused him to have the honourable employments of ambassador to Denmark and lord lieutenant of Ireland. He subsequently, for a short time, held the office of first lord of the Treasury; but lost his favour at court by voting for the exclusion of the Duke of York. Being accused of participation in the Rye-house plot, he was committed to the Tower, where he cut his throat, or, as was suspected, was murdered, in 1683.

CAPELL, EDWARD, an eminent dramatic critic; editor of a volume of ancient poetry, entitled "Prologues," &c.; but chiefly known for his edition of Shakspeare, a task which is said to have occupied him more than 20 years. Born, 1713; died, 1781.

CAPELLAN, T. F., a Dutch vice-admiral, born in 1760; colleague with Lord Exmouth in the victorious attack on Algiers.

CAPELLEN, G. A. P., Baron, a Dutch statesman, born in 1770; minister of the interior to Louis Buonaparte. On the union of Belgium with Holland, in 1815, he was appointed secretary of state at Brussels by the new king, and in 1815 governor of the Dutch East Indies.

CAPELLO, BIANCA, at first the mistress, and afterwards the wife, of Francis, son of the Grand-duke Cosmo de Medici. She was possessed of great ability, but was both artful and cruel, and her memory is literally detested by the Florentines. The fact that her husband and herself died within a few days of each other, caused it to be surmised that they were poisoned, and rumour charged the dark deed upon the brother of her husband, the Cardinal Ferdinand. Died, 1587.

CAPILLUPI, CAMILLO, an Italian writer of the 16th century; author of "The Stratagems of Charles IX. against the Huguenots."

CAPISTRAN, JOHN, a friar, who distinguished himself in the 14th century by the zeal with which he laboured against Turks and heretics. He headed a crusade against the Hussites, of whom he is said to have made many converts. He died in 1456; and nearly two centuries afterwards was canonised.

CAPISUCCHI, BLASIVS, marquis of Monterio, and general of the papal forces. He signalled himself by great daring and zeal against the Huguenots, especially in defending Poitiers against them in 1569. The tained permission to go to Brunswick, and, afterwards, to make the tour of Italy and Greece. On quitting England, she assumed the title of Countess of Wolfenbützel; and, while at Milan, took into her service an Italian, named Bartolomeo Bergami, in the capacity of a courier, whom she soon elevated to the office of chamberlain, and appointed his sister one of her maids of honour. For a time she resided at a villa on the banks of the lake of Como; but afterwards visited Tunis, Malta, Athens, Constantinople, Ephesus, and lastly Jerusalem. While there she exhibited extraordinary munificence in gifts to the conventual fathers as well as to the poor; and took upon herself to found a new order of knighthood, entitled the order of St. Caroline, of which she constituted Bergami grand master. Her indiscretion in thus exalting Bergami, and the improper familiarity with which it was alleged she treated him, became a theme of general conversation; and commissioners were secretly sent out to Milan by the prince regent, in order to make inquiries into her conduct, and to furnish the necessary evidence on which to obtain a divorce. All circumstances appeared favourable to him for the consummation of this long-desired object. While absent from England, death had deprived her of her friends, George III. and the Duke of Kent; of her daughter, the Princess Charlotte; and her brother, the Duke of Brunswick, who fell in resisting the French previous to the battle of Waterloo. Yet, on the Prince of Wales ascending the throne, January 29, 1820, the ministry offered her an income of 50,000*l.* sterling, the title of Queen of England, and all the dignities appertaining thereto, on the condition that she should continue to reside abroad. This proposal she rejected with great indignation, accused her enemies of the basest conspiracy against her, and returned to England, cheered by the enthusiastic welcome of nine-tenths of the people. She was now publicly accused by the minister, Lord Liverpool, of adultery; and, after a protracted trial, the bill of pains and penalties was passed to a third reading by a trifling majority; but government thought it prudent to withdraw it, and the disgusting proceedings dropped. After this outrage on public decency, preparations were made for the king's coronation. The queen at first demanded to be crowned with him; and this being peremptorily refused, she requested to be present at the ceremony, but had to endure the mortification of being repeatedly turned from the doors of Westminster Abbey and refused admission. The spirit of Caroline sunk under this last effort; for though she endeavoured to display the courage of a Brunswick, and to appear daily in public, yet scarcely had a fortnight elapsed when she was taken suddenly ill, while witnessing a performance at Drury-lane Theatre, and she died on the 7th of August, 1821. Having expressed a wish that she should not be buried in England, her remains were removed to Brunswick, and deposited between those of her father and brother. On the funeral procession passing through London, a violent conflict took place between the life-guards, who were conducting it, and the populace. To what extent the queen was guilty no one can say, the evidence being most conflicting and unsatisfactory; but never was a woman more decidedly the victim of brutal vengeance, or one who had so many pleas to urge in extenuation of her crime, if really guilty.

CARPENTER, Dr. LANT, an eminent theological writer, was born at Kidderminster, 1780. After finishing his education under the care of Mr. Pearsall, a relation of his mother, whose zeal in behalf of the Dissenters is well known, he was sent in 1797 to the academy of Northampton, with a view to the ministry, and on finishing his studies at Glasgow University, he became assistant in a school at Birmingham, subsequently one of the librarians of the Athenæum at Liverpool, where he formed an intimacy with Roscoe, Dr. Currie, and other eminent men, and in 1805 one of the ministers of the Unitarian congregation at Exeter. In this capacity he remained twelve years, in the faithful discharge of his ministerial duties, and gaining golden opinions even from those most hostile to his religious views, by the gentle yet unyielding manner in which they were enforced. In 1817 he undertook the care of the Unitarian church at Bristol; and here he laboured till 1826, when his health, which had long been precarious, began to decline, and he endeavoured to reinstate it by travelling in England and on the Continent. He returned to Bristol in 1829, and continued assiduously to promote every good and useful work; but in 1839 his health once more gave way, and while sailing from Naples to Leghorn, whither he had gone for recreation, he fell overboard unperceived and was drowned, 5th April, 1840. His body was afterwards found near the site of the ancient Antium, and was interred on the seashore. Dr. Carpenter was a most industrious writer. Besides publishing numerous sermons and polemical pamphlets, he contributed largely to Rees's Cyclopædia and many periodicals; and his substantial works, published both during his life and since his death, are masterpieces of style and argument. His "Apostolical Harmony of the Gospels" is referred to as an authority even by his theological opponents. It should be mentioned that Dr. Carpenter was not more distinguished for his piety and moral excellence, than for his varied attainments and his literary eminence.

CARPENTER, RICHARD, an English divine of the 17th century. He was originally educated for the Established Church, but seceded from it, and became a Romish priest. He again recanted, and obtained a vicarage in Sussex; but at the rebellion he quitted England, and again professed himself a Catholic. The restoration caused him to return to England, and turn Protestant. Here it might have been supposed his turnings would end, but he in fact changed once more, and died a Catholic. The writings of this unprincipled man are, "Experience, History, and Divinity," and "The Pragmatical Jesuit."

CARPI, UGO DA, a painter and engraver of the 16th century, to whom is generally attributed the invention of the kind of engraving called chiaroscuro.

CARPI, GIROLAMI DA, a painter of the 16th century, and a very successful imitator of Correggio and Parmegiano.

CARPINI, JOHN DE PLANO, a Dominican friar of the 13th century, and one of the embassy from pope Innocent IV. to the descendants of Zenghis Khan, sent to prevent them from invading Europe, and to induce them rather to turn their arms against the Saracens and Turks.

CARPOCRATES, a heretic of the 2d century, who denied the divine nature of Christ. His followers were accused of lewd and immoral practices, but Dr. Lardner thinks the accusation to have arisen rather from enmity than fact.

CARR, Sir JOHN, an English attorney and writer; author of "The Stranger in France," "The Stranger in Ireland," "A Tour through Scotland," &c. While in Ireland, he was knighted by the lord lieutenant. Died, 1822.

CARR, WILLIAM HOLWELL, an English clergyman, and a distinguished patron of the fine arts. He spent large sums in pictures, which he bequeathed to the National Gallery. Died, 1830.

CARRA, JOHN LOUIS, a French writer and politician. In addition to a periodical, entitled "Les Annales Politiques et Littéraires," he published several essays. Having joined the party of Brissot, he was condemned on the fall of that leader, and guillotined, 1793.

CARRANZA, BARTHOLOMEW, a French Dominican. He distinguished himself at the council of Trent, and had the honour to accompany Philip II. of Spain to England, where he laboured so zealously to establish popery, that the king made him archbishop of Toledo. Here, however, his success ended; for being accused of heresy, he was imprisoned at Rome for ten years, and subsequently sent to a monastery for the remainder of his life. His chief works are, a "Summary of the Council," and a "Treatise on the Residence of Bishops." Died, 1576.

CARRE, LOUIS, an eminent French mathematician. Besides many important contributions to the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences, he published an elaborate "Method of measuring Surfaces and Solids, and finding their Centres of Gravity, Percussion, and Oscillation." Died, 1711.

CARREL, ARMAND, chief editor of the National, and a distinguished political writer. Died of a wound he received in a duel with M. Girardin a few days previous, July 24. 1836.

CARENNO DE MIRANDA, JUAN, DON, an eminent Spanish painter, patronised by Philip IV. In colouring he surpasses all his countrymen, with the exception of Murillo. Died, 1685.

CARRERAS, JOSE MIGUEL, JUAN, and Luis; three brothers, distinguished in the revolution of Chili; who for patriotism, talents, and purity of character had not their equals in that country; yet, by a singularly adverse fortune, they all perished at Mendoza, under the merciless rule of O'Higgins and San Martin. With brutal cruelty the latter sent their aged father an account of the expenses of the execution of Juan and Luis, who suffered in 1818; with an order for its immediate payment. He paid it, and, two days afterwards, expired of a broken heart. Don Jose Miguel did not meet his unhappy fate till 1822, when endeavouring to take advantage of a popular movement in his favour, he was surrounded by a superior force, made prisoner, and executed on the very spot where his brothers had suffered.

CARRIER, JOHN BAPTIST, a monster of ferocity, gendered in the French revolution, was born near Aurillac in 1756. He was sent on a mission to La Vendée, where he caused thousands of victims, men, women, and children, to be drowned, beheaded, or shot, the ordinary mode of execution being too tardy for him. Fifteen thousand individuals perished in this way; in short, the banks of the Loire were strewn with the dead bodies, and the water was so polluted, that it was prohibited to drink it. On the fall of the party called the Mountain, he was tried before the revolutionary tribunal, which condemned him to the guillotine, in 1794.

CARRINGTON, N. T., a modern English poet, who for many years followed the arduous profession of a schoolmaster at Plymouth, devoting his leisure moments only to the service of the Muses. His principal works are, "The Banks of the Tamar" and "Dartmoor." His chief power lay in description; and the latter poem, especially, has merits of a very superior order. Born, 1777; died, 1830.

CARRON, GUY TOUSSAINT JULIEN, a French ecclesiastic and writer; author of "Réflexions Chrétiennes pour tous les Jours de l'Année," "Pensées Ecclésiastiques," &c. Died, 1820.

CARSTARES, WILLIAM, a Scotch divine, but of more influence as a politician, was born at Cathcart, in 1649. In order to remove him from the danger of being led into politics, his friends sent him from Edinburgh, where he had commenced his studies, to Utrecht. Becoming known to the Prince of Orange he soon obtained his confidence, and was much employed by him in forwarding his intentions upon England. Being privy to the Rye-house plot he was apprehended, and put to the torture, which he bore with much fortitude, but at length was induced to make a statement, which was afterwards used against his friend, Mr. Baillie. On his liberation he returned to Holland, where the prince received him very cordially, and made him his chaplain. He accompanied William to England, and though nominally only his chaplain, was in fact one of the most influential and able of his state advisers. Under queen Anne he had no political power, but she caused him to be made principal of the university of Edinburgh, in which important post he gave satisfaction equally to her majesty and to the Scottish public. By the house of Hanover he was equally patronised, and he continued a favourite till his death, which took place, in his 66th year, in 1715.

CARSTENS, ASMUS JACOB, a Danish

painter of very considerable merit. His subjects, nearly all taken from the classic authors, exhibit gracefulness of attitude with vigorous expression. Born, 1754; died, 1798.

CARTE, SAMUEL, an English divine and antiquary; author of a valuable and elaborate work, entitled "Tabula Chronologica," &c. Died, 1740.

CARTE, THOMAS, son of the above, and like him an antiquary and historian, and a divine. On the accession of George I., feeling that he could not conscientiously take the required oaths, he abandoned his profession; and during the rebellion of 1715 he was so strongly suspected, that a warrant was issued against him, but he was safely concealed in the house of a clergyman in Warwickshire. He was subsequently involved in political strife, but he escaped by timely flight. As an author he is chiefly known by his "History of England," and that of the "Revolution of Portugal;" his other works, though numerous, being far less able. Born, 1686; died, 1754.

CARTER, ELIZABETH, an English lady, daughter of a clergyman residing at Deal, in Kent. Under the instructions of her father she became an admirable Greek and Latin scholar, and was well skilled in German, French, Spanish Italian, Portuguese, Hebrew, and Arabic; nor was she a mere reader. She translated Crousaz's critique on Pope's Essay on Man, Algarotti's explanation of Newton's philosophy, and Epicetetus. These dissimilar labours appeared during her life; and, after her decease, six volumes of her correspondence was published, which are calculated to give even a higher opinion of her intellect than her more learned and masculine performances. Born, 1717; died, 1806; aged 89.

CARTER, JOHN, an eminent draftsman, architect, and antiquary. In the latter character he wrote ably and zealously in reprobation of the disfigurement of the remains of ancient beauty by tasteless attempts at improvement. Of his ability as a draftsman and engraver there is abundant proof in the plates of the "Views in England," &c.; and it is worthy of notice, that his various powers were developed by his own industry, unaided by early education. Died, 1818.

CARTER, THOMAS, an eminent Irish musician and composer of vocal music. Among his compositions are the songs, "Oh, Nannie, wilt thou gang wi' me!" and "Stand to your guns, my hearts of oak." Died, 1804.

CARTERET, JOHN, earl of Granville, an eminent English statesman, was born in 1690. Immediately on attaining his majority, he took his seat in the House of Lords. Warmly supporting the Hanoverian succession, he was noticed by George I. and employed by him in various posts until 1721, when he succeeded Craggs as secretary of state. In 1723 he was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; and though he gave the irritable natives some offence by prosecuting the printer of the Draper's (Swift's) letters, he was on the whole a popular viceroy. In the reign of George II. he again held that distinguished post, and with even more success than before. On his return to England he became a strong opponent of Walpole; and when he had succeeded in removing that statesman, and procuring office for himself, he supported measures similar to those he had formerly condemned. But though as secretary of state, and as president of the council, in which office he died, his conduct was marked by much vacillation, he retained his court favour to the last. Died, 1763.

CARTERET, PHILIP, a distinguished naval officer of the 18th century. In conjunction with Captain Wallis he commanded an expedition to the South Seas, in 1766. Of the discoveries they made, some account is given by Hawkesworth in the introduction to his narrative of Cook's voyage.

CARTIER, JAMES, a French navigator of the 16th century, who made several voyages of discovery on the coasts of North America.

CARTWRIGHT, JOHN, an English gentleman, distinguished for his zealous attachment to political reform. Early in life he served in the navy, but subsequently became a major in the Nottingham militia; from which circumstance he was generally known as Major Cartwright, though he had been superseded for many years previous to his death. As what may be called an amateur politician he was before the public for many years, both by his writings in favour of American independence, and on universal liberty, as well as by the public addresses which he promoted in furtherance of a radical reform of the government. He also displayed great firmness and disinterestedness on all occasions where multitudes assembled to advocate and petition for popular rights; and he may be considered, on the whole, as a well-meaning rather than as a wise man. He died in 1824, aged 84.

CARTWRIGHT, DR. EDMUND, brother of the preceding, and a clergyman of the established church. In 1770 he published a pleasing poem called "Armine and Elvira;" but he is chiefly known by some valuable discoveries in mechanics, which obtained for him 10,000*l.* from parliament as the reward of his ingenuity. Died, 1824.

CARTWRIGHT, THOMAS, an eminent puritan divine of the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.; author of "Commentaria Practica in totam Historiam Evangelicam," a "Body of Divinity," "Commentaria Succincta et Dilucida in Proverbia Salomonis," &c. Died, 1603; aged 68.

CARTWRIGHT, WILLIAM, an English divine and poet. Both as a preacher, and as a member of the council of war at Oxford, he zealously and ably served the cause of the unfortunate Charles I.; and his exertions in the latter capacity caused him to be for a short time imprisoned by the parliament. His literary talents must have been great, for Bishop Fell said that he was "all that man could arrive at;" and Ben Johnson, in his familiar way, said, "my son, Cartwright, writes all like a man." But the remains of Cartwright are very disproportionate to these high praises, consisting only of four plays and a few poems. He died, at the early age of 33, in 1643.

CARUSO, LUIGI, an eminent Neapolitan composer. His "Il Fanatico per la Musica" is the work by which he is best known in this country; but all his works are very popular in Italy and Germany. He died early in the present century; but it is not precisely known at what date.

CARY. See FALKLAND.

CARY, Rev. HENRY FRANCIS, the well-known translator of Dante, was born at Gibraltar in 1772. His father was a captain in the army; but soon after the birth of his son he settled in Staffordshire, and sent him when eight years old to Uxbridge School, and afterwards successively to Rugby and Birmingham. In 1790 he was admitted as a commoner of Christchurch, Oxford, and after finishing his college studies he was presented successively with the livings of Abbot's Bromley in Staffordshire and Kingsbury in Warwickshire. The delicacy of his health having obliged him to have recourse to the best medical advice, he came to London in 1808, and after holding various curies in the metropolis and the vicinity, in 1825 he became assistant keeper of printed books in the British Museum, an office, however, which he resigned in 1837, when his application for the chief librarianship was rejected. Mr. Cary was addicted to the muses and literature from his youth up; he contributed largely to the Gentleman's and the London Magazine, produced translations of the "Birds" of Aristophanes and the Odes of Pindar, and wrote a series of Lives of the English Poets, in continuation of Dr. Johnson's; besides editing the works of Pope, Cowper, Milton, Thomson, and Young; but his chief reputation rests on his admirable translation of Dante, which, though somewhat neglected on its first appearance, has since received the meed of acknowledgment from all competent critics. Died, 1844.

CARY, ROBERT, LL.D., an English divine and writer. During the civil war he disgraced himself by leaving the Established Church and joining the Presbyterian party; and, at the restoration, he disgraced the church by again espousing its principles. His tergiversation was rewarded by an arch-deaconry, from which, however, he was ejected in 1664. He wrote a learned and useful work, entitled "Palæologia Chronica." Died, 1688.

CARYL, JOHN, secretary to Mary, queen of James II. He remained faithful to that unfortunate prince, and was rewarded for his fidelity with the titles of earl Caryl and baron Dartford. In the reign of queen Anne he was living in England, and was intimate with Pope. He was the author of some poems, some translations of psalms from the Vulgate, and of two plays—"The English Princess," a tragedy; and "Sir Solomon, or the Cautious Coxcomb," a comedy. The date of his death is unknown.

CARYL, JOSEPH, an eminent nonconformist divine; author of a voluminous and valuable "Commentary on Job." Died, 1673.

CASA, JOHN DE LA, secretary of state under pope Paul IV. He was distinguished as a statesman, and as an ecclesiastic; but his fame rests upon his writings, which are considered among the purest specimens of Tuscan composition. His poems, both light and serious, are of a very high order, but his chief work is a prose dialogue, "Galateo, or the Art of Living in the World." Born, 1503; died, 1556.

CASANOVA, MARK ANTONY, a modern Latin poet. He imitated Martial in his style, and made pope Clement VII. a favourite object of his attack. He at length offended so greatly that he was condemned to die. Clement, however, was induced to pardon him. But the unlucky satirist escaped execution only to perish still more miserably; for, on the taking of Rome by the Imperialists, he was reduced to the necessity of literally begging for bread, and at length died of disease, as it is said, produced by hunger, in 1527.

CASANOVA DE SEINGALT, JEAN JACQUES, whose career of adventure and intrigue in almost all the countries of Europe has gained for him the name of the Gil Blas of the 18th century, was born at Venice, 1725. It would be impossible within our limits to give even an outline of his remarkable career; suffice it to say, that he figured as priest, soldier, and statesman, successively; found means to gain the favour of some of the greatest potentates of Europe, among others, Frederick the Great and Catharine II.; and after roaming from place to place (for his intriguing spirit frequently led to a forced change of quarters) he ended his long life of mingled charlatanerie, profligacy, and ability at Vienna, 1803. His love of literature and science, and his proficiency in them, brought him acquainted with Voltaire and other celebrated literati of the day; and besides other works he left copious memoirs of his life and times. Brockhaus, the Leipzig bookseller, to whom the MS. was entrusted for publication, published them in 1822.

CASANOVA, FRANCIS, brother of the preceding an eminent painter, chiefly of landscapes and battle-pieces. He was employed by Catharine II., of Russia, to paint the victories of her armies over the Turks. Born in London, 1727; died, 1805.

CASANOVA, JEAN BAPTISTE, another brother of the adventurer, was born in London, 1730. He was a pupil of Mengs, and closely connected with Winckelmann in his antiquarian researches. It is well known that, by way of testing the sagacity of the German antiquary, he sent him two pictures, which he had himself painted in the style of those a short time previously found at Herculeaneum, declaring them to be ancient discoveries; and that Winckelmann was so taken in as to insert engravings of them in the first edition of his "History of Ancient Art," with an elaborate commentary upon their merits. Casanova was professor of painting in the Dresden Academy; and his works on ancient art are still cited by the Germans as authorities. Died, 1798.

CASAS, BARTHOLOMEW DE LAS, a Spanish prelate, distinguished for his generous and constant, though unavailing, exertions in favour of the natives of South America. He was born in 1474, and in his 19th year accompanied his father, who sailed with Columbus, to the West Indies. On his return to Spain he embraced the ecclesiastical profession, in order that he might act as a missionary in the western hemisphere, "there to spend his days in preaching the gospel to the Indians, and humanity to their oppressors." Never did man more zealously endeavour to effect a great and good object. Twelve times he crossed the ocean, to plead at the foot of the Spanish throne the cause of the wretched Indians, and passed fifty years of his life in attempting, though with little effect, their amelioration. He was made bishop of Chiapa in 1544, but he resigned his see in 1551, returned to his native country, and died at Madrid, 1566, in the 92d year of his age. Of the writings of Las Casas, the most valuable is his "General History of the Indies."

CASAUBON, ISAAC, a native of Geneva, distinguished by his great erudition and powers of criticism. For several years he held the Greek professorship at Geneva; but at length feeling dissatisfied with the amount of remuneration, he gave up his professorship, and removed to Paris. There he was made professor of the belles lettres, and had a pension, not very punctually paid, assigned him by Henry IV.; at whose death Casaubon came to England, and James I. gave him two prebends. In return, however, the pedantic king required the aid of the great critic in writing against the Roman Catholics. Casaubon's editions of classic authors are very numerous, and display immense industry and erudition. Born, 1559; died, 1614.

CASAUBON, MERIC, D.D., son of the above. His "Pietas contra Maledicos," written against the Catholics, and in vindication of his father, introduced him to the notice of king Charles I., by whom he was presented to some valuable church preferments. During the commonwealth he was persecuted and imprisoned, but remained unshaken in fidelity. At the restoration he recovered his livings. Among his writings the best is "A Treatise concerning Enthusiasm." Died, 1671.

CASE, JOHN, an English physician and philosophical writer; author of "Summa veterum Interpretum in universam Dialecticam Aristotelis." Died, 1599.

CASENEUVE, PIERRE DE, a learned French antiquarian; author of "Origines au Etymologies Françaises," "La Catalogue Française," &c. Died, 1650.

CASIMIR III., called the Great, one of the most illustrious sovereigns the world has ever seen, was born, 1309. Having succeeded his father on the throne of Poland in 1333, he entered upon a course of vigorous and enlightened reform, and closed a long life of devotion to his people's welfare, in 1370.

CASLON, WILLIAM, an English letter-founder, to whom we are indebted for much of the superiority of our printing type. Born, 1602; died, 1766.

CASSAGNES, JACQUES, a French ecclesiastic and poet. He was of so irritable a nature, that a satire of Boileau's actually drove him mad, and he was obliged to be confined in the convent of St. Lazarus until his death, which took place in 1679.

CASSANDER, GEORGE, an able German controversialist. Of his writings, which are very numerous, the ablest and most elaborate is his "Consultatio Cassandri." De Thou praises his mildness and modesty; qualities but too rarely belonging to controversialists. Born, 1515; died, 1566.

CASSAS, LOUIS FRANÇOIS, an eminent French antiquarian and artist; author of "Voyage Pittoresque de la Syrie, de la Phénicie, de la Palestine, et de la Basse Egypte." Born, 1756; died, 1827.

CASSERIO, or CASSERIUS, GIULIO, anatomical professor at Padua. He was at first the menial servant of the great anatomist, Fabricius, at Aquapendente, to whom he became assistant, and, finally, successor in the professorship. His only published work is "Pentasthesion," or a treatise on the five senses. Died, 1616.

CASSINI, JOHN DOMINIC, an eminent astronomer, was born at Perinaldo, near Nice, and studied at Geneva with the Jesuits. His fame reaching France, he was invited to pay a visit to that country, where the kindness shown to him by Louis XIV., and his great minister, Colbert, caused him to remain for the rest of his life. He was the first resident in the royal observatory at Paris, and he continued to inhabit it for upwards of 40 years. During that time his services to science were such as to do high honour to himself, as well as to the liberal monarch by whom he was patronised. He determined the parallax of Mars with the sun, demonstrated the diurnal motion of Jupiter round his axis, and discovered the four satellites of Saturn, in addition to that which Huygens had discovered. He died in 1712, having previously been for some years deprived of sight.

CASSINI, JAMES, son of the preceding, and, like him, an eminent astronomer; author of "A Treatise on the Figure and Magnitude of the Earth," "The Elements or Theories of the Planets," &c. Born, at Paris, 1677; died, 1756.

CASSINI DE THURY, CÆSAR FRANCIS, son of the last named, and his successor in the royal observatory. Like his father and grandfather, he did much to advance science; and, having better instruments than theirs, he was enabled to improve upon their labours. Born, 1714; died, 1784.—The last member of this illustrious family, whose name is also associated with theirs in the pursuit of science, died in 1845.

CASSIODORUS, MARCUS AURELIUS, a Roman statesman and historian. He was of a noble family, and held some of the highest offices of state, including that of consul. His writings are extremely valuable, especially his twelve books of epistles, on account of the light they throw upon the manners of his time; but his style is condemned by Gibbon as being quaint and declamatory. Died, 575.

CASSIUS, LONGINUS CAIUS, a Roman of the last age of the republic, and the associate of Brutus in the assassination of Julius Cæsar. That his patriotism was sincere may fairly be inferred from his reply to Antony, who, on the day after the assassination of Cæsar, tauntingly asked him if he had another dagger: "Yes," was the reply, "if you become a tyrant." At the battle of Philippi he commanded the left wing, and on its giving way he retired to a tent with his freedman, by whom, as it is thought, he was slain, as he was found with his head severed from his body. Brutus, in lamenting him, called him "ultimus Romanorum." Died, B. C. 42.

CASTAGNO, ANDREAS DEL, so called after the village in which he was born, was the son of very poor parents, and, being early left an orphan, he was adopted by an uncle, who employed him in tending cattle in the fields. In this situation he made some attempts at drawing, which caused Bernard de Medici to place him with a master. While studying at Florence he became acquainted with Domenico Venetiano, who was acquainted with the new method of painting in oil and varnish. The splendour of this mode of colouring, the art of which was then unknown in Tuscany, was much admired, and Castagno availed himself of Domenico's friendship to obtain the secret; but not satisfied with this, he was wretch enough to murder his friend and benefactor, in order to be the sole possessor. This he effected without suspicion, but just before his death confessed the horrid crime. Born, 1409; died, 1480.

CASTALIO, or CASTELLIO, SEBASTIAN, one of the earliest friends and fellow labourers of Calvin. Unfortunately for Castalio's worldly condition, he differed from the great reformer on some theological questions. He was in consequence deprived of his office of teacher in the college of Geneva, and repaired to Basle, where he occupied himself with a Latin and a French version of the Bible, gaining a scanty subsistence for his family by teaching Greek. Calvin, unmoved by the indignity to which he had reduced his conscientious and candid opponent, used all his influence to degrade him and thwart his exertions. He had even the meanness to bring against him an accusation of theft, from which Castalio cleared himself triumphantly. Died, 1563.

CASTELL, EDMUND, an English divine and lexicographer, was a native of Hatley, Cambridgeshire. He spent a handsome fortune, and occupied 17 years in the composition of his "Lexicon Heptaglotton," a dictionary in seven languages; but nearly all the copies remained unsold, and but for some preferment in the church, and the Arabic professorship at Cambridge, his zeal, learning, and diligence would have been unrewarded. Born, 1606; died, 1685.

CASTELLI, BERNARDO, a Genoese painter, a friend of Tasso, for the plates of whose Jerusalem, engraved by Agostino Caracci, he drew the designs. Died, 1629.

CASTELLO, GABRIEL LAUNCELOT, a Sicilian gentleman, distinguished for his zeal and talent as an antiquarian; author of "The Literary History of Sicily," "Critical Remarks on a Book printed in Catania, in 1747," "Dissertation on a Marble Statue found in the Campagna of Alessa," &c. Born, 1727; died, 1794.

CASTELNAU, MICHAEL LE, lord of Mauvissiere, an eminent statesman and soldier in the reigns of Charles IX. and Henry III. He was very often in England in the character of ambassador from France. While thus resident here he acted with great kindness towards the unfortunate Mary, queen of Scots. He left memoirs of his negotiations, of which there is an English translation by his daughter. Died, 1592.

CASTI, GIAMBATTISTA, an Italian poet; author of an epic, entitled "Gli Animali Parlanti," translated into English by Mr. Rose; a satire, entitled "Tartaro;" some novels, &c. Born, 1721; died, 1803.

CASTIGLIONE, BALTHAZAR, an Italian statesman and writer. He was employed by various princes in very delicate negotiations. In particular he was sent by the pope, Clement VII., as nuncio to the emperor, Charles V., on which occasion he displayed great talent and dexterity. His celebrity, however, chiefly rests upon his writings. His poems, both Latin and Italian, are much admired, as are his letters, which throw much light on the affairs of his time. But his chief work is "Il Cortegiano," the courier. This work, which is a body of information on the art of living at court, is so much admired by the Italians, that they call it "The Golden Book." Born, 1468; died, 1529.

CASTIGLIONE, GIOVANNI BENEDETTO, a Genoese artist. He excelled in landscapes and animals, but his picture of "The Nativity" shows that he had power for the highest walk of art. He was also an admirable engraver. Died, 1670.

CASTILLO, BERNAL DIAZ DEL, a Spanish officer of the 16th century, one of the companions of Fernando Cortez in his expedition to South America. He wrote a work, rough in style, but full of valuable information, entitled "Historia Verdadera de la Conquista de Nueva Espagna."

CASTOLDI, GIOVANNI GIACOMO, a musical composer of the 16th century.

CASTRACANI, CASTRUCCIO, an Italian general of great skill and courage. He rendered great service to the emperor, Louis V. of Bavaria, who rewarded him with the duchy of Lucca. Though he was almost constantly in service, he found time to cultivate his mind, and his name is among the minor Italian poets. Born, 1281; died, 1328.

CASTRO, JOHN DE, a celebrated Portuguese general, who attended Charles V. in the expedition against Tunis, and was afterwards made governor of the Portuguese settlements in the East Indies. He was as disinterested as brave, and at his death only three rials were found in his coffers. Born, 1500; died, 1548.

CASTRUCCI, PIETRO, a celebrated violinist, who led the orchestra at the King's Theatre in the early part of the last century. He was of a very irritable disposition; and Hogarth has given an admirable caricature portrait of him in the well-known print of "The Enraged Musician."

CATALANI, ANGELICA, one of the most celebrated singers of modern times, was born at Sinigaglia in the papal states, 1782. Her early years were spent in the convent of Gubio; and so perfect were her vocal organs even in her infancy, that the sanctity of the church itself was violated by the applause which her choral performances called forth. Soon after quitting the convent, she made her debut in the theatre Argentina at Rome, in 1802; and the immense success which she achieved on this stage, procured her immediate engagements in all the theatres of Italy. At Lisbon, Madrid, and Paris new triumphs awaited her; but even these were far outshone, in 1806, by the enthusiasm of her reception in England, where she remained 8 years, delighting the metropolis with her appearance at the Italian Opera, and reaping large harvests both of fame and wealth in her provincial tours. After the restoration of the Bourbons, she returned to Paris, where she undertook the management of the Opera Buffa; but this speculation was unfortunate, and Madame Catalani, to repair her shattered fortunes, made a professional tour through all the capitals of Continental Europe, and at length returned to England in 1822, when the enthusiasm of her reception suffered no abatement. Here she remained three years. In 1825 she again visited Paris, and after once more going the round of Europe, she retired to Italy in 1830, when she purchased a villa near Florence, and spent the remainder of her life in the bosom of her family. She had been long married to a French captain, called Valabrègue. To an agreeable person and a lively style of acting, Madame Catalani added a voice of extraordinary brilliancy and power; and in this lay its chief merit, for we do not find that she possessed the faculty of calling forth the tender and deep emotions for which subsequent performers in the same field have been remarkable. Died of cholera, at Paris, 1849.

CATESBY, MARK, an eminent English naturalist, patronised by Sir Hans Sloane and other wealthy lovers of science. He spent many years in America, for the purpose of collecting and describing the most curious natural productions of that country. He fixed his residence in Carolina, whence he made excursions into Florida, Georgia, and the Bahama Islands. The result of his labours was "The Natural History of Canada, Florida, and the Bahama Islands;" a very splendid work in two folio volumes, illustrated by upwards of 200 plates. Born, 1680; died, 1749.

CATHARINE, St., of Sienna, was born at Sienna in 1347, and when she was 20 years of age became a sister of the order of St. Dominic. Having considerable ability and a very lively imagination, she became celebrated as a seer of visions. So great an influence, in fact, did her pretended visions and revelations obtain her, that she was able to prevail on Gregory XI. to be reconciled to the Florentines, and to remove the papal seat to Rome from Avignon, after it had for 70 years been fixed at the latter place. She wrote six treatises on the "Providence of God," "The Divine Doctrine delivered by the Eternal Father speaking to the Spirits," some short prose pieces of devotion, and some poems. She died in 1380, and was canonised by pope Pius II. in 1461.

CATHARINE OF FRANCE, daughter of Charles VI. of France, and the wife of Henry V. of England, who, on his marriage to her, was declared successor to the French crown. Their son, afterwards Henry VI., was crowned in both countries while still an infant. Being left a widow, she privately espoused Owen Tudor, a Welsh gentleman, by whom she had two sons, the elder of whom, Edmund, earl of Richmond, was father of Henry VII. Born, 1401; died, 1438.

CATHARINE OF ARRAGON, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile, was born in 1483. In her 18th year she was married to Arthur, prince of Wales, eldest son of Henry VII. The young prince dying in a few months after his marriage, Henry's mercenary dread of losing the rich dowry of Catharine, induced her brother-in-law, afterwards Henry VIII., to marry her. The vast religious changes to which this marriage gave place belong rather to history than to biography. Suffice it, therefore, to say, that after years of anxiety and spirited resistance, she was divorced. But though she was no longer called queen at court, her attendants at Kimbolton Castle, where she took up her residence, were never allowed to address her otherwise than as a queen, as she protested to the last that the divorce was unjust and illegal. Just before her death she wrote so pathetic a letter to Henry in favour of Mary, their daughter, that, stern as the tyrant was, he is said to have shed tears as he perused it. She possessed considerable literary ability, but some devotional pieces, which are sometimes attributed to her pen, were in fact the production of queen Catharine Parr. Died, 1536.

CATHARINE PARR, eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Parr, of Kendal, in Westmoreland. She was married early in life to Edward Burghes; and, surviving him, she was next married to John Neville, lord Latimer. Her second husband, too, she survived; and, in 1543, was raised to the throne by king Henry VIII., being the sixth and last wife of that polygamic monarch. If we may feel some surprise at her temerity in venturing to share a throne which had been so fatal to most of those whom her despotic husband had previously raised to it, we cannot deny that she conducted herself in her perilous situation with admirable tact and judgment. One proof of this will suffice. Her attachment to the reformed religion, and her kindness to those who supported it, gave deep and deadly offence to the still powerful popish faction. Gardiner, Wriothesley, and others, determined to remove, if possible, so dangerous an opponent from court. Taking advantage of the almost frenzied irritability to which continual pain had roused the always violent temper of the king, they accused her to him of heresy and treason, and so far wrought upon him, that he actually signed a warrant for her committal to the Tower. Being informed of this appalling fact, she repaired at once to the king's presence. The king turned the conversation upon theological topics, and endeavoured to draw her into argument. This, which to an ignorant person, or even to a person of tact, if not aware of the king's precise object, would have been ruinous, she skillfully converted into a means of escape from the peril in which she was placed. Instead of entering into any argument, she humbly replied "that on such topics she always, as became her sex and station, deferred herself to the wisdom of his majesty, he being, under God, her only supreme head and governor here on earth." "Not so, by St. Mary, Kate," replied the king, "you are, as we take it, become a doctor to instruct us, and not to be instructed by us." To this she rejoined, "that she had only ventured to object to his grace's arguments, in order to be benefited by his superior learning and wisdom, and in the hope of being able to divert him for the time from the bodily pain which he had endured." This prudent and ingenious reply did away at once with all the king's suspicions and anger; and when Wriothesley, attended by some guards, called to convey her to the Tower, he found the queen in high favour with the king, and instead of making the former a prisoner, was sent from the presence of the latter with knave, fool, beast, and the like gentle terms. Though during the king's last illness he was, in the words of a writer of that time, "as furious as a chained lion," Catharine continued to retain her ascendancy over him, and at his death he left her a legacy of 4000*l.* in addition to her jointure, "for her great love, obedience, chasteness of life, and wisdom." She afterwards married Sir Thomas Seymour, uncle of Edward VI., but they lived by no means happily together; and when she died, though in childbed, it was currently reported that she was poisoned. She was very much attached to the cause of the reformation; and her letters, some of which have been printed, as well as some devotional treatises, show that she had literary talents by no means common to ladies at that period. Died, 1548.

CATHARINE DE MEDICI, the wife of Henry II., king of France, was the daughter of Lorenzo de Medici, duke of Urbino. In 1519, being then only in her 16th year, she was married to Henry, duke of Orleans, son and successor to Francis I. of France. Her beauty and accomplishments made her the ornament of the French court; and, young as she was, she had deceit and cunning enough to make herself acceptable to all parties. For ten years she brought her husband no children, but she subsequently had ten, of whom three successively were kings of France. With profound policy she secured the affection and confidence of her children in their earliest youth, thereby assuring to herself that influence which she desired to exercise over their maturer age. On the death of her husband, and the accession of Francis II., the powerful Guises shared her political power; and it is probable that it was in order to avoid collision with them that she joined in their detestable fury against the Huguenots. But the reign of Francis was very brief; and when Charles IX., then only in his 11th year, succeeded him, Catharine had all the authority of regent, though not the title. The death of the Duke of Guise still farther increased her power, and she was joined heart and soul with the Catholics in persecuting the Huguenots. To characterise her political conduct at this time, we need only name the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew, an atrocity which just and humane men of every creed, country, and age will join in reprobating. That Charles IX. was urged to this horrid act by the persuasions of Catharine most historians admit; and in less than two years after the massacre he died, worn out in mind and body by the stings of remorse. At the death of Charles, Catharine was declared regent until the arrival of her son Henry from Poland. During her regency she governed rigorously and sagaciously, and delivered up the kingdom to Henry III. on his arrival, in such order as with only common prudence and firmness, would have ensured him a peaceable reign. But the new king's weakness soon relaxed the bands which his mother had so firmly drawn around faction, and civil disturbances ensued, by which Catharine's later years were much embittered. Admitted by all to be a sagacious, adroit, and courageous woman, but detested by every party in the state, she died, aged 85, in 1589.

CATHARINE OF BRAGANZA, daughter of John IV. of Portugal, and queen of Charles II. of England. The dissolute conduct of her husband, and the shameful openness of his illicit amours, gave her much pain. But though neglected by him, she steadily and sternly preserved her own honour, and his so far as it depended on her. After his death she returned to Portugal, and when, in 1704, her brother, Don Pedro, was compelled by his increasing infirmities to retire, she was made regent. She held this office but for a brief space; but her conduct, both as regards her internal measures and her carrying on the war with Spain, showed considerable political ability. She died, in the 67th year of her age, 1705.

CATHARINE I., empress of Russia, was the illegitimate daughter of a Livonian peasant. After some years spent in the service of a clergyman, she married a Swedish dragoon, who shortly afterwards went on an expedition and never returned. She then resided, it is doubtful whether as servant or paramour, with the Russian general, Bauer, when Prince Menzikoff became enamoured of her charms, and made her his mistress. Peter I. now distinguished her by his notice, and she became at first his mistress and afterwards his empress. During his lifetime she showed great devotion to him, and at his death she was proclaimed his successor. But her reign was short; for her indulgence in intoxicating liquors produced a disease of which she died in 1727, at the age of 41.

CATHARINE II., empress of Russia, was the daughter of the prince of Anhalt-Zerbst, born in 1729, and in 1745 became the wife of the emperor Peter III. This prince was addicted to low society and to the most scandalous excesses; and Catharine, even in her youth, was by no means remarkable for chastity. With the inconsistency usually to be observed in such cases, each party reproached the other; Catharine, stung by her husband's brutality, became still more openly indecorous in her conduct, and Peter indulged in low wassail to such an extent that he must have been deranged. He at length became so infatuated by his disgust for Catharine and his passion for one of his mistresses, the Countess Woronzoff, that he had determined to divorce and imprison the former, and make the latter his empress. Informed of his designs, Catharine promptly exerted herself, caused her husband to be seized, and sent him as a prisoner to a small palace about 20 miles from St. Petersburg, where Prince Alexis Orloff put him to death, with the connivance, if not at the positive command, of the empress. This occurred in July, 1762, and in the next month Catharine was solemnly crowned empress of all the Russias. Ill as her power was obtained, she used it wisely and well. She trod firmly in the footsteps of Peter the Great, aiming at once to enrich and civilise her dominions. Schools and towns were founded, public works of equal magnificence and use were commenced and finished, and the horrible tortures which had been inflicted on Russian criminals were almost totally abolished. But her disgusting amours in the mean time disgraced her as a woman, and her tyrannous conduct towards Poland is a foul blot upon her escutcheon as a sovereign. Ambition, however, and lack of female virtue did not wholly degrade her, for her internal policy was as much directed to the useful as to the grand; and amid all the distractions of business and dissipation she found time to encourage literature. Indeed, she was herself the author of instructions for a code of laws, which she also translated into German; and she wrote some dramatic pieces, and some moral tales for the use of children! Died, aged 67, 1796.

CATHARINUS, ADBROSE, an Italian divine; author of "Treatises against the Doctrines of Luther and Ochinus." He attended the council of Trent, and became successively bishop of Minori and archbishop of Cauza. Died, 1553.

CATILINE, LUCIUS SERGIUS CATALINA, a Roman, of a noble family and great talents, but of most depraved habits and evil ambition. He was high in favour with Sylla, who advanced him to the quaestorship and other offices of honour and profit. After the death of this powerful patron, Catiline conspired with other dissolute nobles and their followers, to murder the consuls and senators, and assume the government. Fortunately for Rome, Cicero was one of the consuls; and he, on being made aware of Catiline's designs, branded him with them in that famous oration which alone would suffice to give him the first rank among orators, ancient or modern. Even the effrontery of Catiline quailed before the indignant eloquence of the consul. He left Rome and marched towards Cisalpine Gaul, his confederates in the mean time endeavouring to corrupt the ambassadors of the Allobroges. In this they were defeated by the vigilance and promptitude of Cicero; and Catiline being stopped in his march by the proconsul Q. Metellus Celer, an engagement ensued, in which Catiline, at the head of his associates, fighting with the most desperate courage, was slain, B.C. 62.

CATINAT, NICHOLAS, an illustrious French general, as eminent for his virtues as for his military talents. He was educated for the law, but abandoned the bar for the army, and rose to the highest military honours by his skill and courage. He defeated the Duke of Savoy very signally in 1688, and in 1697 he took the fortress of Ath, in Flanders, after experiencing a desperate resistance. In 1701 he was appointed to the chief command of the army in Italy; but either his skill was inferior to that of Prince Eugene, to whom he was opposed, or age had somewhat weakened his high qualities, for he was decidedly worsted and compelled to retreat. Died, 1712.

CATO, MARCUS PORTIUS, surnamed the Censor, an illustrious Roman. At the early age of 17 he commenced his career as a soldier, and distinguished himself equally by his courage and by his singular temperance. After some time he was made military tribune in Sicily, and then quaestor in Africa, under Scipio. In both these important situations his conduct was marked by a rigid and honourable economy of the public money; and, in his 40th year, he arrived at the high dignity of the consulship. In this situation he strongly opposed the luxury of the Romans, and incessantly endeavoured to animate their hatred of the Carthaginians, by speeches in the senate, usually concluding with "Delenda est Carthago;" "Carthage must fall." He composed many works; but only "De Re Rustica," and some fragments of Roman history, are all that we know of his writings. He was twice married, and had a son by each of his wives. Born, B.C. 232; died, 148.

CATO, MARCUS PORTIUS, surnamed, from his birthplace, "of Utica," was grandson of the younger son of the last named. Being early left an orphan, he was taken into the family of his uncle, Livius Drusus. He served for some time in the army, and obtained the commission of tribune in the army sent against Macedonia. He then became quaestor, and exerted himself for the reformation of abuses. His conduct in this respect, and the unvarying gravity of his demeanour, rendered him almost proverbial for integrity; and Cicero, to whose consular exertions he gave his support, called him "the father of his country." Perceiving the designs of Cæsar, he had the honesty and courage to oppose him; and considering Cæsar more dangerous than Pompey, he ranged himself under the banners of the latter. The fatal battle of Pharsalia compelled him to fly to his native Utica; and when the triumphant Cæsar arrived before that place, Cato calmly retired to his chamber, read Plato's Phædo, or Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul, and ended his life by falling upon his sword, B.C. 45.

CATO, VALERIUS, a Latin poet and grammarian. All that remains of his writings is "Diræ," a poem, which is to be found in Mattaire's "Corpus Poetarum." Died, n.c. 80.

CATROU, FRANCIS, a learned French Jesuit; author of a translation of Virgil, "A History of the Empire of Mogul," "A Roman History," &c.; and for many years a contributor to the Journal de Trevoux. Died, 1737.

CATENBURG, ADRIAN VAN, a Dutch divine of the sect of Remonstrants, professor of theology at Rotterdam; author of "Syn-tagma Sapientiae Mosaicæ," "The Life of Grotius," in Dutch, &c. Died, 1737.

CATULLUS, CAIUS VALERIUS, an elegant but licentious Roman poet. Died, B.C. 40.

CATZ, JAMES, a Dutch statesman and poet, was born in 1577, at Brouwershaven, in Zealand. He held various important offices, was twice ambassador to England, and for 15 years filled the high station of pensionary in Holland. Died, 1660.

CAULAINCOURT, ARMAND AUGUSTIN LOUIS DE, duke of Vicenza, a descendant of a noble and ancient family of Picardy. In the early days of the revolution he was imprisoned as a suspected royalist, but was liberated on being drawn as a recruit for the republican army. There he rose from rank to rank until he became aide-de-camp to Buonaparte, whom he attended in the campaigns of 1805-6-7. Subsequently he was employed in confidential missions, and in the post of foreign minister. After the restoration he lived in retirement. Born, 1773; died, 1827.

CAULET, FRANCIS STEPHEN DE, a French bishop. He was equally zealous for the purity and for the rights of his order; and while he took every opportunity to make useful reforms in his own diocese, he boldly and strenuously opposed the right of the crown to dispose of ecclesiastical benefices during the vacancy of a see. He was deposed; and died, 1630.

CAUSSIN, NICHOLAS, a French Jesuit, confessor to Louis XIII.; author of a treatise "De Eloquentia Sacra et Humana," &c. He was banished from court for opposing Cardinal Richelieu. Died, 1651.

CAVALCANTI, BARTOLOMEO, a learned Italian; author of a work on rhetoric, and of another on the forms of a republic; both able treatises. He served for some time as a military officer, and was employed in some important negotiations by pope Paul III. Died, 1562.

CAVALCANTI, GUIDO, a Florentine philosopher and poet of the 13th century, was a friend of Dante, and, like him, an active Ghibelline. His poems, which are chiefly amorous, are above mediocrity. Died, 1300.

CAVALIER, JOHN, the son of a French peasant in the time of Louis XIV., was born in 1679. He became leader of the Camisards, or Protestants of Languedoc, when they revolted against the tyranny of the king; and, led by him, they forced Marshal Villars to make treaty with them. Cavalier then became a colonel in the king's service, but fearing some treachery he transferred his skill and courage to England, and died governor of Jersey, in 1740.

CAVALIERI, BONAVENTURE, an Italian friar, who became a disciple of Galileo. He was professor of mathematics at Bologna, and wrote some valuable treatises on geometry, conic sections, &c. Died, 1647.

CAVALLINI, PIETRO, a Roman painter. He was pupil of Giotto, whom he assisted in the famous mosaic in St. Peter's. Died, 1364.

CAVALLO, TIBERIUS, an ingenious natural philosopher, born at Naples in 1749, who, on coming to England for commercial objects, was so struck with the discoveries at that period in physical science, that he abandoned his pursuits, settled in London, and devoted his future life to the advancement of science. He was author of many treatises on electricity, acrostation, magnetism, &c., and contributed largely to the Philosophical Transactions. Died, 1809.

CAVANILLES, ANTHONY JOSEPH, a Spanish divine and botanist. After accompanying the Duke of Infantado's children into France as their preceptor, and remaining there 12 years, engaged in the study of various sciences, he was appointed director of the royal garden at Madrid, where he died, in 1804. His principal work in botany is in 6 vols., folio, with 600 plates, designed and engraved by himself.

CAVE, EDWARD, an enterprising bookseller, was born at Newton, Warwickshire, in 1691, and educated at Rugby School. Having been deprived of a clerkship in the post-office, in consequence of his resistance to some abuses of the privilege of franking, he took a shop by St. John's Gate, Clerkenwell, and commenced the Gentleman's Magazine. The work was highly successful; and among the contributors to it was the subsequently famous Dr. Johnson, of whom Cave was one of the earliest friends and employers. Died, 1754.

CAVE, Dr. WILLIAM, a learned English divine; author of "Primitive Christianity," "Lives of the Apostles and Martyrs," and "Historia Literaria." The last named work is an account of the writers against and in defence of Christianity down to the 14th century. Born, 1637; died, 1713.

CAVEDONE, GIACOMO, an eminent Italian painter. He was a disciple of the Carracci; but though some of his works are said to be equal to those of his masters, he died in absolute destitution, in 1660.

CAVENDISH, THOMAS, an English navigator in the reign of Elizabeth, was a native of Suffolk, where he inherited a good estate; but having injured his fortune by early extravagances, he fitted out three vessels to cruise against the Spaniards; and sailing for the coast of South America, succeeded in taking several valuable prizes. After circumnavigating the globe, he returned to England with a large fortune. This he soon dissipated, and again went to sea; but meeting with no success, died of chagrin while off the coast of Brazil, in 1592.

CAVENDISH, Sir WILLIAM, a native of Suffolk, was born in 1505. He obtained the office of usher to Cardinal Wolsey; and the fidelity he displayed on the fall of his patron endeared him to Henry VIII., who took him into his service, and knighted him. In the succeeding reigns he was equally favoured, and his son became the earl of Devonshire. He wrote the life of his early friend and patron, Cardinal Wolsey. Died, 1557.

CAVENDISH, WILLIAM, duke of Newcastle, son of Sir Charles Cavendish, the youngest son of the last named. By James I. he was made a knight of the Bath, baron Ogle, and viscount Mansfield. Charles I. appointed him governor to the Prince of Wales, and made him earl of Newcastle. The earl proved himself worthy of the favour shown to him; for, when Charles I.

resolved on an expedition against the Scots, he contributed 10,000*l.*—a very large sum at that time—besides raising a troop of horse. During the civil war he behaved with great gallantry; and when the royal cause became hopeless, he joined Charles II. in his exile. At the restoration, he was created duke of Newcastle. He was the author of several poems and plays, but is now chiefly remembered as an author for his treatise on horsemanship. Born, 1592; died, 1676.

CAVENDISH, WILLIAM, first duke of Devonshire, was the son of William, third earl of Devonshire. He was born in 1640, and attended James, duke of York, as a volunteer against the Dutch; but he soon made himself obnoxious at court by his opposition in parliament. He gave evidence in favour of Lord William Russell, and even offered to exchange clothes with that unfortunate nobleman to enable him to escape. In 1684 he succeeded to the title of earl of Devonshire, and was shortly afterwards imprisoned, and fined 30,000*l.* for striking Colonel Culpepper in the presence chamber. For the payment of this large sum he gave bond, but before it became due, the arrival of the Prince of Orange had put an end for ever to the tyranny of James. The earl now became a favourite at court, and in 1694 his earldom was raised to a dukedom. Died, 1707.

CAVENDISH, JOHN, Lord, brother of the preceding; an able statesman, who distinguished himself by his opposition to Lord North, and succeeded that nobleman as chancellor of the exchequer. Died, 1793.

CAVENDISH, HENRY, a member of the Devonshire family, and one of the most eminent natural philosophers of modern times, was the son of Lord Charles Cavendish. He devoted himself exclusively to scientific pursuits, acquiring a distinguished rank among those who have most contributed to the progress of chemistry; and his researches relative to hydrogen gas, or inflammable air, gave rise to the practice of acrostation. By the death of an uncle, in 1773, he received a large addition to his fortune; and, being extremely regular and simple in his manner of living, he left at his death the enormous sum of 1,200,000*l.* to his relations. It has been truly said of him, that he was "the richest among the learned, and the most learned among the rich men of his time." Born, 1731; died, 1810.

CAWDREY, DANIEL, a nonconformist divine, and a leading member of the Westminster Assembly. He wrote some sermons and practical treatises, but the chief of his works are diatribes against the Established Church. Died, 1664.

CAWTON, THOMAS, a nonconformist divine. Being implicated in Love's plot against Cromwell, he fled to Holland, and became pastor of the English church at Rotterdam. He was skilled in the oriental languages, and assisted in the Polyglot Bible and Dr. Castell's Polyglot Lexicon. Died, 1659.

CAWTON, THOMAS, son of the above, and, like him, a puritan divine and an oriental scholar. He officiated to a dissenting congregation in Westminster; and was author of "Dissertatio de Usu Linguae Hebraicae in Philosophia Theoretica," a Life of his Father, &c. Died, 1677.

CAXTON, WILLIAM, the earliest English printer, was a native of Kent, and born about 1410. Having served his time as a mercer, he went abroad as agent to the Mercers' Company, and afterwards was taken into the suite of Margaret of York, wife of the Duke of Burgundy. While residing in Flanders, he acquired a knowledge of the art of printing, and translated and printed in that country the Recuyell of the History of Troy. Returning to England, he set up a press in Westminster Abbey; and in 1474 issued the "Game of Chess," the first book ever printed in England. Died, 1491.

CAYLUS, ANNE CLAUDE PHILIP DE, Count of, a French writer; author of the "Description of the Gems in the Royal Cabinet," a truly splendid work; "Dissertations on the Arts," &c.; and founder of a prize for drawing in the Academy of Painting. Born, 1720; died, 1765.

CAZALES. See DE CAZALES.

CAZES, PIERRE JACQUES, a French painter, pupil of Boulogne and the elder Houasse. His principal work is a noble Scripture piece of "The Woman with an Issue of Blood," in the church of Notre Dame. Born, 1676; died, 1754.

CAZOTTE, JOHN, a French writer; author of "Le Diable Amoureux," "Olivier," and other poems, chiefly of the humorous kind. In the revolution, which he opposed with all his power, he was thrown into the prisons of the Abbaye, with his daughter Elizabeth; and when the massacre of the prisoners took place, his daughter threw herself between him and the murderers, thereby preventing the execution of their purpose; but he was again condemned to death, and perished by the guillotine, Sept. 25, 1792, at the age of 72. From the scaffold he died with a firm voice to the multitude, "I die, as I have lived, faithful to God and to my king."

CEBA, AUFALDO, a Genoese poet; author of two tragedies, a history of Rome, and two heroic poems, "Il Furio Camillo" and "Esther." The last-named poem was prohibited at Rome, on the ground of its blending sacred and profane. Died, 1623.

CEBES, a Theban philosopher, pupil of Socrates. The Tablature of Human Life, usually printed with the Enchiridion of Epictetus, is generally attributed to him, but by some his authorship is disputed.

CECCO DE ASCOLI, whose proper name was FRANCIS DEGLI STABILI, an Italian physician, mechanician, and poet; author of "L'Acerta," a poem, &c. In 1322, he obtained the appointment of professor of philosophy and astrology at Bologna, and subsequently that of physician and astrologer to the Duke of Calabria; but being accused of magic, he was condemned by the Inquisition, and burnt to death in 1327.

CECIL. See BURLEIGH.

CECIL, ROBERT, earl of Salisbury, was the second son of Lord Burleigh, the prudent minister of queen Elizabeth. Trained to business under his father, he became first the assistant and then the successor of secretary Walsingham. Towards the close of Elizabeth's reign, he scudulously cultivated the friendship of James VI. of Scotland. The event justified his foresight, for he was made high treasurer and created earl of Salisbury almost immediately after James's accession to the English crown. He was an extremely able, and, generally speaking, upright minister; but the share he had in causing the deaths of Essex and Raleigh, tends much to sink him in the estimation of posterity. Born, 1563; died, 1612.

CECROPS, an Egyptian, who married the daughter of Actæus, a Grecian prince; and founded Athens about 1556 B.C.

CEDREMIS, GEORGE, a Greek monk of the 11th century, who wrote a "History of the World, from the Creation to the Year 1057," which was printed with a Latin version at Paris in 1647.

CELESTI, ANDREA, a Venetian painter. He executed some beautiful landscapes and some fine altar-pieces. Died, 1703.

CELESTINE I., saint and pope; successor of Boniface I. He became pope in 422, condemned the doctrine of Nestorius in 430, and died in 432, with a high reputation for piety and wisdom.

CELESTINE III., pope, succeeded Clement III. in 1191. He claimed the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and conferred the latter on Frederic, son of the emperor Henry VI., on condition that he should be tributary to the holy see. Died, 1198.

CELESTINE V., a pope and saint. He was a Benedictine monk, and founder of an order called Celestines, which was suppressed in France. He led a life of great seclusion, and the fame of his austerity caused him to be elected pope in 1294. Cardinal Cajetan persuaded him to resign, and then, having caused himself to be elected, by the title of Boniface VIII., imprisoned Celestine, who died in confinement in 1296. In 1313, he was canonised by Clement V.

CELLARIUS, CHRISTOPHER, a learned German writer, professor of history at Halle; author of "Notitia Orbis Antiquæ," "Atlas Cælestis," &c., and editor of several Greek and Latin authors. Died, 1707.

CELLIER, RENE, a learned French Benedictine; author of an "Apology for the Morality of the Fathers," written against Barbeyrac, and compiler of a "General History of Sacred and Ecclesiastical Authors." Died, 1761.

CELLINI, BENVENUTO, a Florentine artist, of equal genius and eccentricity. He was apprenticed to a goldsmith and jeweller, and at the same time learned drawing, engraving, and music. Clement VII. employed him both as goldsmith and musician; and such was his reputation for courage, that when Rome was besieged by the Duke of Bourbon, Cellini was charged with the defence of the castle of St. Angelo. During the life of Clement, Cellini was employed to make stamps for the mint, and his coins and medals are exquisite specimens of skill. On the death of his patron he went to France, where he was patronised and employed by Francis I.; but he soon returned to Rome, and being accused of having robbed the castle of St. Angelo while entrusted with its defence, he was there imprisoned. He however escaped, was retaken, but finally released at the intercession of the Cardinal Ferrara. He once more went to France, where he executed some magnificent works, especially some large figures in metal. In 5 years he left France for Florence, where he was employed by the Grand-duke Cosmo. Working equally well in metal and marble, on the largest and on the most minute scale, Cellini, even as an artist alone, was a most wonderful man. But when we remember that he was a musician, an author, and an admirable master of the sword, it is impossible to withhold our admiration from the extent and variety of his genius. As an author, he produced a work on sculpture and the casting of metals, a treatise on the goldsmith's art, and an autobiography full of vivid and vigorous writing. This last work, which contains some details scarcely credible, even with a large allowance for the evident vanity of the author, was translated into English by Dr. Nugent in 1771, and a new edition of it, edited by T. Roscoe, appeared in 1822. Born, 1500; died, 1570.

CELSIUS, OLAUS, a learned Swede; the early patron of Linnaeus, and the first promoter of the science of natural history in Sweden. He published various theological and other works, particularly one entitled "Hierobotanicon," an account of the plants mentioned in the Bible. Born, 1670; died, 1756.

CELSUS, AURELIUS CORNELIUS, a Roman physician of the time of Tiberius; author of treatises on agriculture, rhetoric, and military affairs, and of 8 books on medicine. All except the last work is lost, but that is used in the medical schools of every nation in Europe.

CELSUS, an Epicurean philosopher of the 2d century. He wrote a book against the Christian religion. It is not extant, but if we may judge from Origen's reply to it, Celsus was a keen disputant, even with the disadvantage of assailing truth and defending error.

CELTES, CONRAD, a modern Latin poet, native of Germany. He wrote odes, amatory poems, and epigrams, and a prose history of Nuremberg. Died, 1508.

CENSORINUS, a Roman, twice consul. In 270 the soldiery compelled him to accept the purple, and murdered him a week after he had done so.

CENTLIVRE, SUSANNAH, an English dramatic writer and actress; author of "The Busy Body," "A Bold Stroke for a Wife," &c. Her writings are vivacious and elegant, but they occasionally approach very closely towards indelicacy. Died, 1723.

CEOLWULF, a king of Northumberland in the 8th century, of whom the Venerable Bede makes honourable mention as a just and pious king. His dominion being overrun by Ethelbald, king of Mercia, Ceolwulf retired to the monastery of Lindisfarne, and spent the remainder of his life in retirement and prayer.

CEPHALON, an Ionian author of an epitome of general history from the time of Ninus to that of the emperor Adrian, in whose reign he flourished, and of a history of Troy. In imitation of Herodotus, he divided his epitome into nine books.

CERACCHI, JOSEPH, a Roman sculptor, a pupil of the great Canova. He unfortunately involved himself in political disputes, and was obliged to seek shelter in France, where he was engaged in a conspiracy against the life of Buonaparte, for which he was executed in 1801.

CERATINUS, JAMES, a learned Dutchman, professor of Greek at Leipsic, which office he owed to the recommendation of Erasmus. His true name was Teyng, that which he adopted being a Greek derivative equivalent to Horn, the name of his native place. He wrote "De Sono Græcarum Litterarum," compiled a Greek and Latin lexicon, &c. Died, 1530.

CERCEAU, JOHN ANTHONY DU, a French poet. He wrote several critiques, some comedies, and Latin and French poems. Born, 1676; and accidentally shot, in 1730, by the Prince of Conti, to whom he was tutor.

CERDA, BERNARDA FERREIRA DE LA, a Portuguese lady of the 17th century, remarkable for the extent and variety of her accomplishments. She was well versed in the ancient and modern languages; excelled in rhetoric, mathematics, and philosophy; was a most skillful musician; and wrote various poems and comedies of great merit.

CERE, JOHN NICHOLAS, a distinguished French botanist, director of the botanic garden in the Isle of France. He greatly extended the culture of cloves and other spices in the island, and published a valuable memoir on the cultivation of rice. Died, 1810.

CERINI, GIOVANNI DOMENICO, an Italian painter, chiefly of historical subjects. Born, 1606; died, 1681.

CERINI, JOSEPH, an Italian poet and dramatist. Born, 1738; died, 1779.

CERINTHUS, a heresiarch of the 1st century. He was by birth a Jew, and is supposed to have been a pupil of Simon Magus. His doctrine was a compound of Judaism, Christianity, and the speculations of the Gnostics.

CERISANTES, MARK DUNCAN DE, the son of a Scotch physician, resident in France. He had considerable literary and political talents, but a violent temper. He wrote an account, in Latin, of a mission on which he went to Constantinople by order of Richelieu, and two odes, which are in the Menagianna. He was killed while serving in Italy under the Duke of Guise, in 1618.

CERMENATI, JOHN DE, an Italian writer of the 14th century. He wrote, in Latin, the "History of Milan," which is printed in Muratori's collection.

CERRATO, PAUL, an Italian writer of Latin poetry in the 16th century; author of a poem, "De Virginitate," and other poems to be found in the "Deliciae Poetarum Italorum."

CERUTI, FREDERIC, a learned Italian schoolmaster. He wrote a Latin dialogue on the right Education of Youth, and another on Comedy; and published editions of Horace, Juvenal, and Persecus, each with a paraphrase. Born, 1541; died, 1579.

CERUTTI, JOSEPH ANTHONY JOACHIM, a Jesuit, for some time professor in the society's college at Lyons; author of an "Apology" for his order, and of various miscellaneous pieces. He entered with ardour into the affairs of the revolution, and conducted a paper called "Feuille Villageoise." Born, 1735; died, 1792.

CERVANTES, DE SAAVEDRA, MIGUEL, the celebrated Spanish novelist, was born in 1547. Although he gave early promise of literary talent, he was compelled, through poverty, to seek a subsistence in some other profession, and became a page to the cardinal Giulio Acquaviva, in Rome. He then entered the navy, and lost his left arm at the famous battle of Lepanto. After this, he joined the troops at Naples, in the service of the Spanish king; but, returning homeward, he was unfortunately taken prisoner by a corsair, and remained in slavery at Algiers 5 years. When he was at length ransomed, he settled at Madrid, married, and published in the course of 10 years about 30 dramas; but, though he showed great genius, he was not so successful as his rival Lope de Vega, and he reluctantly abandoned this species of composition for that which has immortalised his name—the production of "Don Quixote." Cervantes had in view, by this work, to reform the taste and opinions of his countrymen. He wished to ridicule that adventurous heroism, with all its evil consequences, which was the source of innumerable novels on knight-errantry. The work was, at first, coldly received, but it soon met with applause, and it may now safely be said to be the most popular work that was ever written. Still its extraordinary good fortune did not extend to the author, who struggled on for many years with nothing to console him in his poverty but his genius, and a proper estimation of his own merit. He died in 1616, leaving, in addition to his celebrity as an author, the character of a firm and noble minded man.

CERVETTO, a celebrated Italian musician, who performed at Drury Lane in the time of Garrick. He much offended that irritable performer by loudly snoring one night, when the audience was in a state of the most perfect silence. Garrick reproached him in the green-room, but the fiddler appeased the actor by exclaiming, "Ah, Mr. Garrick, it is always the way ven I be ver much please!" He died in 1783, at the advanced age of 103.

CESARINI, JULIAN, a cardinal. He was employed by Martin V. and by Eugenius IV. in political negotiations. Being sent by the latter pope to Hungary, he persuaded Ladislaus to break truce with the Turks. The battle of Varna ensued, and the cardinal was slain, 1444.

CESARINI, VIRGINIO, an Italian writer, whose Latin and Italian poems are distinguished by great elegance. Died, 1624.

CESAROTTI, MELCHIOR, an Italian poet, and professor of rhetoric, Greek, and Hebrew in the university of Padua; author of "Essays on the Origin and Progress of Poetry," "On the Italian Language," &c.; and translator into Italian of the "Iliad" and of "Ossian's Poems." Born, 1730; died, 1808.

CEspeDES, PAUL, an eminent Spanish painter. His principal work is "The Last Supper," an admirable picture in the cathedral of Cordova. He was the author of a learned treatise on ancient and modern painting. Died, 1608.

CEVELLOS, the Chevalier DE, formerly minister of foreign affairs for Spain, and successively ambassador at Naples, Lisbon, Vienna, and London. It was he who published the celebrated manifesto when Napoleon invaded the Peninsula, and which at the time made a great impression throughout Europe. Born, 1763; died, 1838.

CEZELLI, CONSTANCE, a heroine of the 16th century. Her husband, while defending Leucate, was taken by the Spaniards; and they threatened Constance that they would put him to death if she did not surrender the fortress. She refused, but offered all her property to ransom him. This was unavailing; and being foiled in two assaults, they raised the siege, and put their barbarous threat in force.

CHABANON, N. DE, a French writer; author of a "Dissertation on Homer," "Life of Dante," a "Treatise on Music," and several mediocre dramas. He also translated Theocritus and Pindar: the latter performance is much praised by Voltaire. Died, 1792.

CHABERT, JOSEPH BERNARD, Marquis of, a distinguished navigator, astronomer, and geographer, born at Toulon, in 1724. He performed several distant voyages, and formed the project of a chart of the Mediterranean. But the American war interrupted the work, and called Chabert to his post, where he distinguished himself so highly, that, in 1781, he was made commander of a squadron. The revolution drove him to England, and he was received by Dr. Maskelyne with great kindness. In 1800 he lost his sight, in consequence of his intense application to study; and, in 1802, he returned to Paris, where Buonaparte assigned him a pension. Died, 1805.

CHABOT, FRANCIS, a French Capuchin: on the breaking out of the revolution, he became a member of the convention, and was guilty of great cruelty, until executed, as a fellow-criminal of Danton, in 1794.

CHABRET, PIERRE, an able French advocate; author of a work entitled "The French Monarchy and its Laws." Died, 1786.

CHABRIAS, an Athenian general, to whom a statue was erected, for aiding the Bœotians against Agesilaus. He conquered Cyprus for the king of Egypt, and was slain at Chio, 535 B.C.

CHABRY, MARK, a French painter and sculptor. His best works, including a fine equestrian statue of Louis XIV., adorned the city of Lyons, but they were destroyed by the revolutionary rabble. Died, 1727.

CHAI, CHARLES, a Protestant divine. He was a native of Geneva, but for many years officiated as pastor of the French church at the Hague. He was author of "An Apology for Inoculation," some theological essays, and a French translation of the Bible. Died, 1785.

CHAISE, FRANCIS DE LA, a French Jesuit, confessor to Louis XIV., over whom he acquired a vast influence. Died, 1709. The site of his house and grounds at Paris is now occupied by the beautiful cemetery which bears his name.

CHALCIDIUS, a Platonic philosopher of the third century. He wrote a commentary on the Timæus of Plato, of which a Latin version was published at Leyden.

CHALCONDYLES, DEMETRIUS, a learned Greek, who, on the taking of Constantinople in 1479, established himself as a teacher of Greek in Italy. He wrote a Greek grammar, and edited the lexicon of Suidas. Died, 1513.

CHALES, CLAUDIUS FRANCIS DE, a French Jesuit, professor of hydrography and mathematics; author of a "History of Mathematics," a "Treatise on Navigation," "Researches on the Centre of Gravity," &c. Died, 1678.

CHALLE, CHARLES MICHAEL ANGELO, a French painter, and professor of painting in the Paris academy. He was a successful imitator of Salvator Rosa and of Guido. Died, 1778.

CHALMERS, ALEXANDER, M.A. F.S.A., was born in 1759, at Aberdeen, where his father carried on business as a printer. When he was eighteen years of age, an appointment of assistant surgeon in the West Indies was procured for him; but, instead of sailing for Jamaica he proceeded to London, where he connected himself with the press. He became editor of the Public Ledger and London Packet newspapers, during the period of the American war. Party politics were then running high, and Mr. Chalmers obtained much credit as a political writer to other journals under the signature of Senex. He was for a long time a contributor to the Morning Chronicle, and afterwards editor of the Morning Herald: he also entered into engagements with several publishers, to edit their books, and published many works in his own name. In 1812 the first portion of the work appeared, which, of all his productions, has the most largely contributed to his fame, namely, "The General Biographical Dictionary," which was completed in 1817; and he continued to occupy himself in literary pursuits till ill-health compelled him to abandon them. Died, 1834.

CHALMERS, GEORGE, a Scotch writer of considerable ability and industry; author of "Caledonia," "An Estimate of the comparative Strength of Great Britain," &c. His statistical ability procured him the situation of chief clerk of the Board of Trade, which he enjoyed for many years. Born, 1744; died, 1825.

CHALMERS, Rev. Dr. THOMAS, was born at Anstruther, in Fife, on the 17th of March, 1780, and was early sent to study at St. Andrew's University. His college career was distinguished by some of his subsequent peculiarities—energy, good humour, companionableness, and ascendancy over others; and it was then that his passion for the physical sciences was first developed. Besides theology, he studied mathematics, chemistry, and some branches of natural history, with more than youthful enthusiasm, and with such success that, besides assisting his own professor, he made a narrow escape from the mathematical chair in Edinburgh. On the completion of his theological studies, he officiated for about two years as assistant in the parish of Cavers, and in 1803 he obtained a presentation to the parish of Kilmarnock in Fifeshire. Here he remained for some years, in the quiet discharge of his clerical duties, when he was suddenly awakened to a knowledge of "vital Christianity," while engaged in writing the article "Christianity" for Brewster's Edinburgh Encyclopædia; and from this moment his quickened and concentrated faculties were intent on reviving the old "evangelism of the Puritans and the Reformers." The heroism with which he avowed his change, and the fervour with which he proclaimed the gospel, made a great sensation in the quiet country round Kilmany; and at last the renown of this upland Boanerges began to spread over Scotland, when, in 1815, the town council of Glasgow invited him to be the minister of their Tron Church and parish. Thither he repaired, and in that city for 8 years sustained a series of the most brilliant arguments and overpowering appeals in behalf of vital godliness, which devotion has ever kindled, or eloquence ever launched into the flaming atmosphere of human thought. In 1817 he visited London. Here his popularity was not less overwhelming. The churches in which he was to preach were crowded to suffocation long before the service commenced; and amongst his auditors were a number of the distinguished clergy, peers, members of parliament, and literary characters of all classes and denominations. "All the world," writes Willberforce in his diary, "wild about Dr. Chalmers. Canning, Huskisson, Lords Elgin, Harrowby, &c. present. I was surprised to see how greatly Canning was affected; at times he was quite melted into tears." After continuing about four years minister of the Tron Church, he was removed to the new church of St. John's. In this new sphere he tried to give practical direction to the theories he had propounded, relative to the support and the suppression of pauperism. In management, he expected it to become a model for all the parishes in Scotland, in the independence of its provision for the abatement of pauperism, as well as in the spiritual agency it was to adopt. But the work he had undertaken, and the invasions made upon his time, deprived him of that solitude so much required for pulpit preparations, especially for such pulpit exhibitions as he was wont to give; and he was fain to seek relief in an academic retreat. In 1824 he accepted the chair of moral philosophy at St. Andrew's; in 1828, he was removed to the chair of theology in the university of Edinburgh; and here he prosecuted his multifarious labours, lecturing, preaching, publishing, organising schemes for the welfare of the church, and taking an active management in her courts, till the disruption of the Church of Scotland in 1843, when he joined the Free Church, which he had mainly contributed to found, and became principal and professor of theology to the seceding body. From that period till he finished his course, there was no fatigue in his spirit, nor hesitation in his gait. In the spring of 1847 he repaired to London to give his evidence before the sites' committee of the House of Commons. "He preached all the sabbaths of his sojourn in England, willfully and powerfully, and on the last sabbath of May he was again at home. That evening he is said to have remarked to a friend, that he thought his public work completed. He had seen the Disruption students through the four years of their course. He had seen the Sustentation Fund organised. He had been to parliament, and borne his testimony in high places. To-morrow he would give in the college report to the Free Assembly; and after that he hoped to be permitted to retire and devote to the West Port poor his remaining days. He was willing to decrease, and close his career as a city missionary. But just as he was preparing to take the lower room, the Master said, 'Come up hither,' and took him up beside himself. Next morning all that met the gaze of love was the lifeless form—in stately repose on the pillow, as one who beheld it said, 'a brow not cast in the mould of the sons of men.'" In this meagre outline of the life of Dr. Chalmers, we have not alluded to the many valuable works which from time to time he gave to the world. His works published during his lifetime, in 25 vols., embrace a variety of subjects, chiefly relating to theology and political economy; among these are his "Astronomical Discourses," first published in 1817, when they formed a new era in the history of pulpit oratory, and are even to this day read with the same avidity which hailed their first appearance. Besides these, 9 vols. of posthumous works, consisting of "Daily Scripture Readings," "Institutes of Theology," &c., have been published by his son-in-law, Dr. Hanna, to whose interesting memoirs of Dr. Chalmers we must refer the reader for the fullest information concerning the life and works of this illustrious man. But we cannot conclude without briefly inquiring what were the mental powers to which Dr. Chalmers owed the magic of his eloquence, and the energy of his character? In an analysis of his mind, the first power that meets us is his brilliant imagination. Kept always in check by his capacity for generalising, and made a willing servant by his power of concentration, it was at all times ready to illustrate any subject he chose. It mattered not what the subject might be, defending his non-residence as a minister of the gospel, or pronouncing an eulogium on mathematics, maintaining his rights against the encroachments of heritors, enforcing the claims of patronage, propounding the civic economy of towns, or defending the Established Church, expatiating on the sublime truths of the gospel, or combating some popular prejudice—each and all he invested with such a splendour of imagination and magnificence of diction, as at once captivated and entranced. But these very powers sometimes led him into seeming inconsistencies. Alive only to the discussion of his present theme, he was apt to forget those which had previously engaged his mind, and how the arguments previously advanced bore upon his present illustration. Hence a casuist might arraign Dr. Chalmers at the bar of strict political consistency, and object to the part he took in some public movements during his career; but an acquittal would be given, on the ground, that he never pleaded any cause, unless convinced at the time that it was for the spiritual and temporal welfare of his fellow-men. But such defects in such a character are like motes in a sunbeam. Considered in every view,—the preacher, swaying at will multitudes by the fascination of his eloquence,—the philosopher, pointing out and illustrating analogies between the sublime truths of the Scriptures and the wonders of nature,—the philanthropist, active and laborious in prosecuting the public good—or the man of God, humble and meek in disposition, and desirous of being conformed to the will of heaven,—we see one great by intellectual power, great by sanctified attainments—one on whose like Scotland will not soon look again. Died, May 31, 1847.

CHALONER, Sir THOMAS, an English statesman. He obtained his knighthood by his gallantry at the battle of Musselburgh, and was afterwards employed as queen Elizabeth's ambassador to Spain and Germany. He translated "Erasmus's Praise of Folly," and wrote "De Republica Anglorum instauranda, libri decem," &c. Died, 1565.

CHALONER, Sir THOMAS, son of the above, was distinguished as a chemist and natural philosopher; author of a tract on the virtues of nitre. Died, 1603.

CHALONER, EDWARD, an English divine, son of the above, chaplain to James I., and one of the most celebrated preachers of his time. He died of the plague, in 1625.

CHALONER, JAMES, brother of the preceding, a member of parliament, and one of the judges of the ill-fated Charles I. His zeal in the parliamentary cause obtained him the governorship of Peel Castle, in the Isle of Man. At the restoration in 1660, messengers were sent to apprehend him, when he committed suicide.

CHALONER, THOMAS, brother of the last named, and also one of the king's judges; author of an account of the (pretended) discovery of the tomb of Moses. He absconded from England at the restoration, and died, 1661.

CHAMBERLAINE, ROBERT, an English poet; author of "The Swaggering Damsel," a comedy; "Nocturnal Lucubrations," &c. Died, 1637.

CHAMBERLAYNE, EDWARD, LL.D.; author of an able work, entitled "The present State of England," &c. Died, 1703.

CHAMBERLAYNE, JOHN, son of the above, translator of the "Religious Philosopher," by Nieuwentijt, &c. Died, 1724.

CHAMBERS, EPHRAIM, an able and most industrious English writer; compiler of the well-known "Cyclopædia" which bears his name. Died, 1740.

CHAMBERS, Sir WILLIAM, an able architect. He built that fine structure, Somerset House, and was the author of a valuable treatise on "Civil Architecture." Though of Scotch descent, he was by birth a Swede, and his knighthood was conferred by the king of Sweden. Died, 1796.

CHAMIER, DANIEL, a French Protestant divine; author of a treatise "De Œcumenico Pontifice," and other learned works. His reputation as a politician was so great, that he was entrusted with the important task of drawing up the edict of Nantes. He was killed during the siege of Montauban, in 1621.

CHAMILLARD, STEPHEN, a learned but very credulous French Jesuit and antiquary; author of "Dissertations on Medals, Gems, and other Monuments of Antiquity." Died, 1730.

CHAMISSO, ADELBERT VON, son of Louis, vicomte d'Ormont, was born at Roncourt in Champagne in 1781. Driven with his parents from their home by the French revolution, he was educated in Berlin, where he became one of the royal pages, served in the Prussian army till the peace of Tilsit, and then returned to France, where he remained till 1812, as professor at Napoleonville. But his strong inclination for his favourite study, natural history, and the attachment he had imbibed for the land of his education, once more drew him to Berlin, where he seized the opportunity of accompanying Kotzebue in his voyage round the world in 1815; and on his return, in 1818, he was appointed superintendent of the botanic garden in Berlin, an office which he held till his death. Chamisso's works range over various departments of literature. "His Views and Observations during a Voyage of Discovery" are replete with interesting matter; his poems take rank among his countrymen with those of Uhland; and, as the author of "Peter Schlemil," he has obtained a European fame. Died, 1838.

CHAMPAGNE, PHILIP, an eminent Flemish painter, was born at Brussels in 1602; went to Paris, where he studied under Poussin, and became painter to the queen Maria de Medici, who gave him the direction of the paintings in the Luxembourg, and he was also made director of the academy of fine arts. His paintings, which are very fine, adorn the dome of the Sorbonne, the museum of Paris, &c. Died, 1674.

CHAMPEAUX, WILLIAM DE, a divine and philosopher, teacher of the celebrated Abelard, who subsequently became his rival. Champeaux rose to be bishop of Chalons, and wrote a treatise "On the Origin of the Soul." Died, 1121.

CHAMPFORT, SEBASTIAN ROCHE NICOLAS, a French litterateur; author of "Elegies of Fontenelle and Moliere;" "Mustapha," a tragedy, and some other dramas, and conductor of the Journal Encyclopédique. He was very intimate with Mirabeau, and friendly to the revolution, until the outrages of the factious disgusted him. Robespierre threw him into prison, and in a fit of insanity he committed suicide, in 1794.

CHAMPIER, SYMPHORIEN, a French physician. He wrote several learned works, and founded the College of Physicians at Lyons. He also served under the Duke of Lorraine, by whom he was knighted for his courage. He compiled several works, of which the most valuable is "Les Grands Chroniques des Ducs de Savoie." Died, 1540.

CHAMPLAIN, SAMUEL DE, a French naval officer. He was governor-general of Canada, and founded the city of Quebec; and there is a lake in Canada which still bears his name. His "Travels in Canada" contain much curious information. Died, 1634.

CHAMPMESLE, MARY DESMARES DE, a French actress. She was originally only a member of a strolling company, but when she appeared in Paris, the great Racine praised her tragic performance, and even afforded her instruction. This raised her to eminence in her profession, and she became highly popular. Died, 1698.

CHAMPOLLION, J. F., a French writer, distinguished for his acquaintance with archæology, especially as regards Egypt. In 1828 he went with an expedition of learned men to Egypt, at the expense of the king, and made many important discoveries there. Among his numerous works are "Précis du Système Hiéroglyphique des Anciens Egyptiens," and "Panthéon Egyptien." Born, 1790; died, 1832.

CHANCELLOR, RICHARD, an English navigator, and founder of the English Russia Company. By this company he was sent to Russia a second time, and, while on his return with the Russian ambassador and suite, he perished off Norway, in 1550.

CHANDLER, EDWARD, bishop of Durham; author of a "Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament," &c. Born, 1671; died, 1750.

CHANDLER, MARY, an English poetess. Born, 1637; died, 1745.

CHANDLER, RICHARD, a divine and antiquary. He travelled, in 1764, through Asia Minor and Greece, at the expense of the Dilettanti Society; and wrote "Travels" in those countries.

CHANDLER, SAMUEL, an eminent dissenting divine; author of a "Vindication of the Christian Religion," a "Vindication of the History of the Old Testament," a "History of Persecution," "History of the Life of David," &c. Born, 1693; died, 1766.

CHANDOS, JOHN, an English general of great celebrity, in the 14th century; distinguished not more for his bravery than for his generosity and moderation. He was killed at the bridge of Leusac, near Poitiers, in 1369.

CHANNING, WILLIAM ELLERY, the Rev. D.D., was born at Newport, Rhode Island, U. S., in 1780. His maternal grandfather, William Ellery, was one of those who signed the declaration of independence, and his father was a partner in the eminent mercantile firm of Gibbs and Channing, at Newport. Educated at Harvard College, he was early induced to abandon the profession of medicine, for which his father intended him, and to prepare himself for the Unitarian ministry; and in 1803 he commenced his career by taking charge of the congregation of the Unitarian chapel in Federal Street, Boston. His eloquence rendered him from that time forth one of the most conspicuous men in America. To deny that his discourses display great genius would be absurd; they are, indeed, beautiful specimens of pulpit eloquence; but, in common with all the Unitarian discourses that we have ever seen, they are the discourses of a mere oratorical moralist rather than those of a Christian preacher. To the honour of Dr. Channing, however, it must be said, that he was ever the advocate of peace, and that though he could not but be aware that his opposition to the slave system must needs diminish his popularity, he was instant in season and out of season in denouncing it. Died, Oct. 2. 1842, aged 62.

CHANTEREAU LA FEVRE, LOUIS, a learned French antiquary; author of the "History of Bar and Lorraine." Died, 1658.

CHANTREY, Sir FRANCIS, R.A., F.R.S., F.S.A., &c., a sculptor of first-rate eminence, was born of village parents, at Norton, near Sheffield, in 1781. When a mere child he discovered considerable talent in drawing and modelling; and during his apprenticeship with Mr. Ramsey, a carver and gilder at Sheffield, the whole of his leisure hours were most assiduously devoted to the study and practice of his favourite pursuits. Having made a compensation to his master for the remaining term of his apprenticeship, he paid a short visit to London, and attended the school of the Royal Academy. He then returned to Sheffield, where, at 20 years of age, he may be said to have commenced business; but his career of fame and fortune was not begun until 1809, when he received an order from Mr. Alexander, the architect, for four colossal busts of Howe, St. Vincent, Duncan, and Nelson, for the Trinity House, and for the Greenwich Naval Asylum. From this period he was unrelaxing in his efforts, and continually successful; and, among the admirable productions of his chisel, there appeared, in 1817, that exquisite group of "The Sleeping Children" (the daughters of the Rev. W. Robinson) in Lichfield Cathedral; universally acknowledged as "images of artless beauty and innocent and unaffected grace." Orders now crowded in upon him in number beyond his ability to execute; and as it would be impossible in our limits to enumerate the whole, the mention of a few of the leading busts and statues must suffice. Among them we notice his busts of Lord Castlereagh, Sir Walter Scott, the poets Wordsworth and Southey, Mr. Canning, John Rennie, George IV., William IV., Queen Victoria, Lord Melbourne, Sir Robert Peel, and the Duke of Wellington; and his statues of James Watt, Dr. Cyril Jackson, Grattan, Washington, Sir Joseph Banks, Spencer Perceval, Canning, Sir John Malcolm, Dr. Dalton, Roscoe, General Gillespie, Lady Louisa Russell (when a child), Bishops Bathurst and Ryder, &c. To this list we ought perhaps to add his principal statues in bronze, viz. George IV., at Brighton and in Edinburgh, Pitt in Hanover Square and Edinburgh, and the equestrian statues of Sir Thomas Munro, at Madras, and the Duke of Wellington for the city of London. Died Nov. 23. 1841.

CHAPELAIN, JOHN, a French poet; author of "La Pucelle," &c. Died, 1674.

CHAPELLE, CLAUDE EMANUEL L'HUILIER, a French poet, and the friend and literary adviser of Moliere. Died, 1688.

CHAPELLE, JOHN DE LA, a French writer; author of the "Life of the Prince of Conti," dramas, &c. Died, 1723.

CHAPMAN, FREDERIC HENRY, a Swedish vice-admiral; author of a "Treatise on Marine Architecture." Died, 1808.

CHAPMAN, GEORGE, an English poet. He wrote 17 dramatic pieces, but he is chiefly remembered for his vigorous translation of Homer, of which Pope is said to have made more use than he chose to admit. Died, 1604.

CHAPMAN, JOHN, a learned English divine; author of "Eusebius, or a Defence of Christianity," &c. Born, 1704; died, 1784.

CHAPONNE, HESTER, was the daughter of a Mr. Mulso, of Twywell, Northamptonshire. Among her first productions is the interesting story of Fidelia, in the Adventurer; but she is principally known by her valuable "Letters on the Improvement of the Mind," addressed to a young lady, and published in 1773. Died, 1801, aged 74.

CHAPPE D'AUTEROCHE, JOHN, a French astronomer. In 1760 he went into Siberia to observe the transit of the planet Venus; and, in 1768, he gave the public an account of his journey in three volumes. He then went to California for the same purpose, but died there in 1769.

CHAPPE, CLAUDE, nephew of the preceding, was born in 1763. He introduced the use of telegraphs into France; and the first public event communicated by it was the capture of Condé, in 1793. The honour of the discovery being claimed by others, his mind was so much affected that he committed suicide, in 1805.

CHAPPLE, WILLIAM, an English topographer. He contributed largely to the Gentleman's Magazine, and edited a part of Risdon's Survey of Devonshire. Died, 1781.

CHAPTAL, JEAN ANTOINE CLAUDE, count of Chanteloupe, a French peer, statesman, and writer. Being a younger son he was destined for the profession of medicine, and had completed his studies when he was induced to accept the professorship of chemistry at Montpellier. His lectures procured him great reputation, and on the breaking out of the revolution he took an active part in it, and was selected by the new government to supply the army with gunpowder. In 1799 the first consul made him counsellor of state; and, in the following year, minister of the interior.

CHAPUZEAU, SAMUEL, a Genevese writer, preceptor to William III. of England; author of an "Account of Savoy," a "Description of Lyons," &c.; and editor of Tavernier's Travels. Died, 1701.

CHARAS, MOSES, a French physician. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he withdrew to Spain, where he became physician to Charles II. His jealous rivals caused him to be imprisoned in the Inquisition, and he only obtained his release by abjuring his religion. His "Pharmacopœia" was translated into Chinese for the use of the emperor. Died, 1698.

CHARDIN, Sir JOHN, a French traveller, whose travels in Persia and the East Indies are extremely valuable. The revocation of the edict of Nantes drove him to England, where he was well received by Charles II., who knighted him. Died, 1713.

CHARENTON, JOSEPH NICHOLAS, a French Jesuit, and for many years a missionary in Persia. He translated Maricana's History of Spain into French, and appended some valuable notes. Died, 1735.

CHARENTE DE LA COINTRE, FRANCIS ATHANASIU DE, a French royalist, and leader of the party in La Vendée. He displayed great bravery in numberless combats; but being at length defeated by the republicans, and wounded, he was taken prisoner, and shot at Nantes, in 1796.

CHARLEMAGNE, or Charles the Great, king of the Franks, and subsequently emperor of the West, was born in 742. He was the son of Pepin, and succeeded his elder brother, Carloman, in 771. Having defeated the Saxons, and overrun Lombardy, he was crowned emperor in 800. Though of a warlike turn, and continually engaged in war, he was a great friend to learning, founded several universities, and attracted by his liberality the most distinguished scholars to his court; among others, Alcuin, from England, whom he chose for his own instructor. He completed many important national works, encouraged agriculture and the arts, and rendered his name immortal by the wisdom of his laws. In private life, Charlemagne was exceedingly amiable, a good father, and generous friend. His domestic economy afforded a model of frugality; his person, a rare example of simplicity and greatness. He despised extravagance of dress in men, though, on solemn occasions, he appeared in all the splendour of majesty; and as his person was commanding and his countenance noble and beneficent, he inspired those who saw him with sentiments of love and respect. He died at Aix-la-Chapelle, in 814, aged 72.

CHARLEMONT, JAMES CAULFIELD, Earl of, an Irish nobleman, distinguished as the political coadjutor of Burke, Flood, Grattan, and the other patriotic advocates of Ireland, and as the commander of the Irish volunteers. His lordship possessed considerable literary talents; and, after his death, his correspondence with Burke and other eminent men was published. Born, 1728; died, 1799.

CHARLES IV., emperor of Germany, son of John of Luxemburg, and grandson of the emperor, Henry VII., ascended the throne in 1347. His reign was distinguished by the golden bull of the diet of Nuremberg, by which the Germanic constitution was established. Died, 1378.

CHARLES V., emperor of Germany and king of Spain, succeeded his grandfather, Ferdinand, on the throne of Spain, in 1516, and became emperor of Germany on the death of Maximilian, in 1519. His title to the imperial crown was disputed by Francis I. of France; but, aided by Henry VIII. of England, Charles maintained himself, and, at the battle of Pavia, even took his rival prisoner. His whole reign, however, was stormy—France, the Moors, and the Protestant princes of Germany gave him full employment, until, in 1556, he resigned the crown to his son, and sought in private life the happiness he had not found in governing an empire. Taken altogether, he is one of the most remarkable characters in history. He exhibited no talents in his youth, it not being till his 30th year that he showed himself active and independent; but, from that time till his abdication, he was, throughout, a monarch. He was indefatigable in business, weighing the reasons on both sides of every case with great minuteness; very slow in deciding, but firm of purpose, and prompt to execute. Being equally rich in resources and sagacious in the use of them; gifted with a cool judgment, and always master of himself, he steadily pursued his plans, and was generally able to overcome the greatest obstacles. Died, 1558.

CHARLES VI., son of the emperor Leopold, was declared king of Spain by his father in 1703, and crowned emperor in 1711. The taking of Belgrade by his general, Prince Eugene, compelled the Turks to make peace with him; and his alliance with Holland, France, and England enabled him to obtain considerable advantages over Spain. Subsequently, however, he was at war with his allies, and thus lost Naples and Sicily; and was also engaged in an injurious contest with Turkey. Died, 1740.

CHARLES VIII., elector of Bavaria, was raised to the empire of Germany, in 1742, by the influence of France and Prussia, though he had a powerful rival in Maria Theresa of Hungary, who was supported by England and Sardinia. Died, 1745.

CHARLES II., surnamed the Bold, king of France. He was crowned king in 840, and elected emperor by the Romans in 875. Died, supposed by poison, in 877.

CHARLES III., king of France, surnamed the Simple. He ascended the throne in 893. His whole reign was one of struggle against the Normans and his turbulent barons, who at length caused Robert, a prince of the blood royal, to be crowned. In the battle fought between the two sovereigns, Robert was slain; but his son, Hugh the Great, pressed Charles so hard, that he sought shelter in the castle of the Count of Vermandois, where he died, in 929.

CHARLES IV., son of Philip the Fair, succeeded to the crown of France in 1322. His reign lasted only 6 years, and in that brief time he was deprived by England of the province of Guienne. Died, 1328.

CHARLES V., surnamed the Wise, was the first prince who bore the title of dauphin, on the death of his brother, in 1364. His reign was very beneficial to his people, whose commerce and agriculture he greatly promoted. He founded the library of Paris, and gained several advantages over the English. Died, 1380.

CHARLES VI., surnamed the Well-beloved, was son and successor of the above. Owing to the feuds of the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans, and the misconduct of his ministers, he was unable to resist the warlike Edward V. of England, who conquered France and disinherited the dauphin. Died, 1422.

CHARLES VII., surnamed the Victorious. He was crowned in 1422, and recovered the whole of his dominions from the English, with the exception of Calais. Died, 1461.

CHARLES VIII., king of France, surnamed the Affable, was the son of Louis XI., and ascended the throne of France in 1483, at the early age of 13. He was a warlike prince, and, in 1495, obtained a victory over an army of Italians five times as numerous as his own. Died, 1498.

CHARLES IX., king of France, succeeded to the throne in 1650. The civil wars, and, above all, the massacre of Paris, have left an indelible stain upon the memory of this prince. Died, 1674.

CHARLES X., ex-king of France, or CHARLES-PHILIPPE DE BOURBON, (known as Count d'Artois until the accession of his brother Louis XVIII., and afterwards as Monsieur,) was the fifth and youngest son of the dauphin Louis, son of Louis XV., and was born in 1757. In early life he had acquired a character for dissipation, extravagance, and hauteur, which bore a still more unfavourable appearance when contrasted with the conduct of his elder brothers; and such indeed was his unpopularity, that at the very onset of the revolution he found it necessary for his personal safety to quit his native land. In 1773 he married the princess Maria Theresa, daughter of Victor Amadeus III., king of Sardinia, to whose court he now fled for refuge. He subsequently visited other parts of Europe, and eventually found an asylum with his brother, Louis XVIII., first at Holyrood House, Edinburgh, and afterwards at Hartwell, in Buckinghamshire. On his succeeding to the throne of France in 1824, it was seen that he adhered too much to the exploded dogmas of the old régime to acquire the same degree of popularity that, by good tact and a more complying disposition, his predecessor had enjoyed. On the 25th of July, 1830, in consequence of the result of a general election, Charles X. issued his two fatal ordinances, one abolishing the freedom of the press, and the other changing the mode of election. A popular insurrection, of three days' continuance, which has since been dignified with the title of "the glorious revolution of 1830," took place in Paris, and paved the way for Louis Philippe. The king retreated from St. Cloud to Rambouillet, where he offered to abdicate in favour of his grandson, the Duke of Bordeaux, and requested from the provisional government a safe-conduct to a sea-port. Embarking at Cherbourg he sailed for England, and for a time took up his residence at Lutworth Castle, and then removed to Holyrood House, the scene of his former exile. There he remained about a twelve-month; afterwards retired to the Austrian dominions; and died, in his 80th year, at Goritz, in Illyria, Nov. 4. 1837. The latter years of this monarch were passed in acts of superstitious devotion: he constantly wore hair-cloth next his skin, he fasted much, and frequently imposed upon himself, as a penance for some hasty expression, an absolute silence for several hours. The Dukes d'Angoulême and de Berri were his sons.

CHARLES II., surnamed the Bad, king of Navarre. He succeeded to his kingdom when only 18 years of age, and his reign was marked by much wickedness. He murdered the constable, Charles of Angoulême; seduced the dauphin, afterwards Charles V., into rebellion against his father; and was accused of employing a person to administer poison to Charles V. His death was as horrible as his life had been wicked. Being ill of a leprosy, his physicians caused him to be swathed in cloths dipped in spirits of wine, and covered with brimstone; and his page accidentally setting fire to these inflammable materials, Charles died in great torture, in 1387.

CHARLES I., king of Naples and Sicily. He was the son of Louis VIII. of France, and, marrying the daughter of the Count of Provence, he became possessed of Provence, and of Anjou and Maine. Defeating Manfred, the usurper of Sicily, he assumed the style of king of Naples; and taking his rival, Conradin, duke of Suabia, and the Duke of Austria prisoners, he eternally disgraced himself by causing them to be put to death on the scaffold. His tyranny at length so much enraged the Sicilians, that on Easter Monday, in 1282, they massacred 8000 of the French—an event spoken of in history as the “Sicilian Vespers.” After this they chose Peter of Arragon for their king instead of Charles, who died in 1285.

CHARLES II., son of the above, and his successor on the throne of Naples. At the time of his father's decease, he himself was a prisoner in the hands of the Sicilians, and he would most probably have been put to death by them but for the humane intercession of Constantia, the wife of Peter of Arragon. At her request he was set at liberty, in 1288, on condition of his renouncing all claim to the crown of Sicily; a condition from which the pope absolved him. His attempts upon Sicily were, however, of no avail, and he was obliged to content himself with Naples, which he governed with wisdom and moderation. Died, 1309.

CHARLES III., king of Naples, great grandson of the last named. He married Margaret, niece of Joan, queen of Naples; and when Joan was excommunicated, in 1380, he obtained that kingdom from the pope. He put the deposed queen to death, and was in his turn excommunicated by the pope. This did not prevent his endeavouring to possess himself of the crown of Hungary, but he was slain in the attempt in 1386.

CHARLES GUSTAVUS X., king of Sweden. He was the son of John Casimir, and ascended the throne on the abdication of queen Christina, in 1654. He was very successful against Poland, but was compelled to raise the siege of Copenhagen, which he sought to possess himself of on account of Denmark having allied itself with Poland. Died, 1660.

CHARLES XI., king of Sweden, son and successor of the preceding. He lost several important places during his war with Denmark, but they were restored to him at the peace of Nimeguen. He greatly increased the power and resources of his kingdom, and died in 1697.

CHARLES XII., king of Sweden, son and successor of the preceding. He was only 15 years of age when he ascended the throne, and his youth encouraged Russia, Denmark, and Poland to unite against him. Those powers, however, found him fully equal to the task of humbling them. Denmark being subdued, he attacked Russia; and in the famous battle of Narva, in 1700, he is said to have slain 30,000 of the enemy, besides making 20,000 prisoners, though his own force was short of 10,000. Poland next felt his power; he dethroned Augustus, and made Stanislaus king in his stead. Thus far his whole course had been prosperous; but in seeking utterly to crush Peter the Great, he sustained a terrible defeat at the battle of Pultowa, and was himself so severely wounded, that he was removed from the field on a litter, and compelled to seek shelter in Turkey. Here his conduct was so violent that the grand signior was compelled to besiege his residence. After desperate resistance Charles was overpowered, and for ten months he was kept a prisoner. He no sooner was allowed to return to his own dominions than he commenced an attack on Norway, and in besieging Fredericksahl was killed by a cannon shot, in 1718.

CHARLES XIII., king of Sweden, was born in 1748; and being appointed, at his birth, high admiral of Sweden, his education was directed chiefly to the learning of naval tactics, and in 1788 he defeated the Russians in the Gulf of Finland. On the murder of Gustavus III. he was placed at the head of the regency; but he resigned the government, in 1796, to Gustavus Adolphus IV., who had become of age, and did not appear again in public life till a revolution hurled the king from the throne. He was then elected, and subsequently bestowed his entire confidence on Marshal Bernadotte, whom the estates had chosen to succeed Prince Christian in 1810. Died, 1818.

CHARLES ALBERT, king of Sardinia, son of Carlo Emanuele, prince of Carignano, was born 2d Oct. 1798. At his birth he had but little chance of ever swaying the sceptre, for there were seven male heirs of the House of Savoy, through whom the crown might have descended. His early life was consequently passed in comparative insignificance, and his name was but slightly known to Europe until the revolution of 1821, which broke out in support of the so-called Spanish Constitution of 1812, compelled king Vittorio Emanuele to abdicate in favour of his brother, and led to Charles Albert's nomination as regent of the kingdom. Charles Albert, who had all along been in the secrets of the conspirators, took measures to carry out their designs; but the Duke of Genevois, in whose favour king Vittorio had resigned the crown, having refused to sanction the proceedings of the new government, and having taken instant measures to put down the insurgents, Charles Albert fled to Novara, and deserted and betrayed the party with whom he had co-operated. Renouncing the opinions he had adopted, he acted as a volunteer in 1823, in Spain, under the Duke d'Angoulême, and there lent his aid to crush the constitution, the principles of which he had so lately attempted to establish in Sardinia. On his return to Turin he remained in retirement until the death of Carlo Felice led to his accession to the throne, 27th April, 1831. During the first 17 years of his reign, few events occurred to give a clear insight into the natural bent of his mind; but in March, 1848, after the Milanese had driven out the Austrians from Northern Italy, he a second time unfurled the revolutionary banner, and in a proclamation to the "people of Lombardy and Venice," espoused the cause of Italian regeneration against Austria. His arms were at first crowned with success; but the Austrian field-marshal Radetzky having regained step by step the positions he had lost, at length compelled the Sardinian forces to evacuate Milan in August of the same year, and in September an armistice was signed by the contending parties. In March, 1849, Charles Albert was forced, by the clamours of his subjects, to renew the war with Austria. But the Sardinian army was defeated at all points by Marshal Radetzky in the shortest campaign on record, four days; and immediately afterwards, on the 24th of March, Charles Albert abdicated the throne in favour of his eldest son, and precipitately leaving Turin, took up his residence at Oporto, where he died, as it is alleged, of a broken heart, July 18th, 1849.

CHARLES, LOUIS DE LORRAINE, archduke of Austria, a distinguished military commander, son of Leopold II., and younger brother of Francis II., was born, 1771. He first entered on the career of arms under Prince Coburg in 1793; and his great abilities, not less than his exalted rank, rapidly procured him elevation in command. After the battle of Neerwinde, which restored that rich province to the imperial power, he was appointed governor of the Low Countries, and was soon after created a field-marshal. In 1796 he was promoted to the command of the imperial armies on the Rhine, gained some advantages over the republican generals Jourdan and Moreau, whom he compelled to retire across the Rhine; took Kehl in 1797; subsequently commanded in Italy against Buonaparte and Massena; long disputed victory at Caldiero, Eckmühl, and Essling; but lost the decisive battle of Wagram, where he was wounded. After this event he lived in retirement, during which he wrote a luminous and impartial narrative of his campaigns, and enriched military science with the profound views set forth in his "Principes de Strategie." Died, 1847.

CHARLES I., king of England, was born in Scotland, in the year 1600. He was the second son of James VI. of Scotland, and I. of England, by Anne, daughter of the king of Denmark; and upon the death of Prince Henry, his elder brother, in 1612, was created prince of Wales. On the death of his father, in 1625, he ascended the throne, his kingdom being engaged in war with Spain, and much embittered against his friend and minister, Buckingham. It unfortunately happened for Charles I. that he had to the full as high and exacting a notion of the royal prerogative as either his father or Elizabeth, while he had to deal with an entirely different state of public opinion. The parliament impeached Buckingham, and the king supported him; war with France was declared, against the popular wish, because Buckingham so willed it; and while the parliament was vexatious in its resistance, the king was obstinate and impolitic in his enforcement and extension of his prerogative. To detail the events consequent upon the disputes between the king and his people, belongs rather to history than to biography. It may suffice, therefore, to say, that previous to and during the civil war, king and people seem to have been pretty equally in the wrong; the former closing his ears to the increased power of the public voice, and the latter exerting that power vexatiously and gratuitously, rather than with a just and wholesome reference to sound moral and political principle. The first battle between the king's forces and the parliamentary army was at Edgehill, in which neither party had much to boast of. For some time, however, the royalists were generally successful; but the battles of Marston Moor, Newbury, and Naseby were all signally unfavourable to the royal cause. Indeed, after the defeat at Naseby, the king was so powerless, that he took the resolution of throwing himself upon the good feeling of the Scottish army, then lying before Newark; and by that army he was basely sold, and delivered into the hands of the parliament. For a time he was treated with much outward respect, but becoming alarmed for his personal safety, he found means to make his escape from Hampton Court. On arriving on the coast, whither he went with the intention of quitting the kingdom, he could not obtain a vessel to go abroad, but crossed over to the Isle of Wight, where the governor, Hammond, confined him in Carisbrook Castle. While there, negotiations were carried on between him and the parliament; but the dominant party, commanding the army, and, as it would seem, anything but sincere in wishing a reconciliation between the king and his people, cleared the House of Commons of the moderate and just members, and erected a court for the trial of the king. Insulted by the rabble, and brow-beaten by the self-erected court, he was condemned to death, and on the 30th of January, 1649, beheaded at Whitehall; his last word to Bishop Juxon being a charge to him to admonish Prince Charles to forgive his father's murderers.

CHARLES II., king of England, son of the above, was born in 1630. He was living as a refugee at the Hague when the inhuman sentence on his father was carried into execution. He, nevertheless, assumed the regal title, and finding that the Scots had proclaimed him, he left the Hague for Scotland, and was crowned at Scone. Cromwell marched towards Scotland to give him battle, and Charles took the spirited course of passing by forced marches into England. Cromwell, however, whose force was superior, discovering the manœuvre, retrograded in pursuit; and the royal army was overtaken at Worcester, and utterly routed. After difficulties and escapes which have rather the air of romance than of stern matter of fact, Charles escaped to France, where he resided for some years, keeping up the mimicry of a court, but frequently reduced to extreme distress. The death of Cromwell, the general discontent of the people with the sordid and narrow-minded bigotry which had thrown a gloom over the whole land, and the dexterous policy of General Monk, restored Charles to his crown and kingdom; and he reigned with a power far greater than that for aiming at which his father had been put to death. Untaught by adversity, he was luxurious, selfish, and indolent. The English Nonconformists were treated with jealous rigour, and the Scottish Covenanters were shot and sabred without compunction. And, perhaps, Charles's reply to some complaints made to him of Lauderdale's cruelty in Scotland, will give quite as full a clue to his kingly character as can be required:—"I perceive," said Charles, "that Lauderdale has been guilty of many bad things against the people of Scotland; but I cannot find that he has acted against my interest." Died, 1685. During this monarch's reign, the capital was visited by heavy calamities; the plague in 1665, and the fire of London in the following year; while pretended plots and conspiracies were made pretexts for bringing some eminent persons, who were obnoxious to the court, to an ignominious death. As to the character of Charles II., he was, in the fullest acceptation of the terms, a sensualist and voluptuary; encouraging, by his example, a taste for dissolute manners, which poisoned the moral health of society; and though he preserved a degree of popularity with the multitude, from the easiness of his manners, yet he was totally destitute of exalted sentiments.

CHARLES EDWARD STUART, called the Pretender, was the grandson of James II., and born at Rome, in 1720. In 1745 he landed in Scotland, and published a manifesto exhibiting the claims of his father to the English throne. He was joined by several of the Highlanders, and on entering Edinburgh, he caused his father to be proclaimed; on which General Cope hastened towards the capital, but was attacked by the Pretender at Preston Pans, and defeated. Instead of making a proper use of this victory, by advancing into England. Charles returned to Edinburgh, wasting his time in an idle parade of royalty. Afterwards, on being joined by Lords Kilmarnock, Cromarty, Balmerino, and other discontented chiefs, he marched as far as Manchester; but hearing that the king was about to take the field, he returned to Scotland, where he defeated the English forces, under Hawley, at Falkirk. In the meantime the Duke of Cumberland advanced to Edinburgh, and from thence to Aberdeen, the Pretender retreating before him. At last the two armies met at Culloden, April 27. 1746, when, after an obstinate conflict, in which the Highlanders displayed prodigious courage, his army was signally defeated, and entirely dispersed. Charles, after wandering about in different disguises, chiefly among the Hebrides, effected his escape to France. He died at Florence in 1788.

CHARLETON, LEWIS, bishop of Hereford, an able prelate, distinguished for his proficiency in theology and the mathematics. Died, 1669.

CHARLETON, WALTER, M. D., an English physician. He resided abroad with Charles II., and returned with him at the Restoration. His writings, in natural history, medicine, theology, and natural philosophy, are very numerous and learned, especially his "Onomasticon Zoicon" and "Chorea Gigantum;" the former a classified arrangement of animals, the latter an essay on Stonehenge. Died, 1707.

CHARLEVILLE, CHARLES WILLIAM, the Earl of, was the son of John Bury, esq., of Ireland, who, having married a co-heiress of Charleville, the title was revived, by patent, in the person of his son, in 1797; who, in 1800, was advanced to the dignity of viscount, and six years afterwards to that of earl. His lordship was possessed of high classical attainments, and was, for several years, president of the Royal Irish Academy. He was a firm supporter of the existing institutions of the country, in their connection with church and state; and during the period of the Irish rebellion, in 1799, he commanded the Tullamore cavalry, and was very active in suppressing outrage. Died, 1835, in his 72nd year.

CHARLEVOIX, PETER FRANCIS XAVIER, a French Jesuit, and for some time a missionary in America. On his return, he became conductor of the Journal de Trevoux. In addition to his numerous contributions to that work, he wrote "Histoire Générale de Paraguay," "Histoire Générale de la Nouvelle France," &c. Died, 1761.

CHARLOTTE AUGUSTA, daughter of George IV. and Queen Caroline, was born Jan. 7. 1796, and married to Prince Leopold of Coburg (now king of Belgium), May 2. 1816. From her earliest years she gave strong indications of nobleness of mind and great capacity; and as she grew up, a feeling of sincere and ardent attachment for her on the part of the people was universally displayed. She was not merely accomplished, according to the common acceptation of the term, but was well-acquainted with history, statistics, and other more abstruse branches of knowledge; spoke several modern languages, and excelled in music, painting, &c. In fine, she possessed in a high degree the several qualities and endowments necessary for the dignified maintenance of an exalted station; while her active benevolence and solicitude for the poor rendered her an object of their especial regard. Her marriage with Prince Leopold was the result of mutual esteem, and their domestic life may safely be held up as a pattern for universal imitation. But the hopes of the nation, and the anxious wishes of a husband, were suddenly blighted: on the 5th of Nov. 1817, the princess was delivered of a still-born child; and, in a few hours after, she was seized with convulsions and expired. Never before, perhaps, was national and individual sorrow so strikingly or so sincerely expressed, and never, perhaps, was it more deservedly bestowed. The unhappy dissensions of her royal parents, and the vicious blandishments of courtly parasites, were strikingly contrasted at Claremont by conjugal affection and the pure pleasures of a virtuous life. No wonder, then, that the people should have looked forward to her reign with delight; nor can it be a matter of surprise that their grief should have been intense when thus bereft of "England's hope."

CHARNOCK, JOHN, an English naval officer and miscellaneous writer; author of a "History of Marine Architecture," "Biographia Navalis," a "Supplement to Campbell's Lives of the Admirals," &c. Died, 1807.

CHARNOCK, STEPHEN, a noneconformist divine. He was a very eloquent and popular preacher, and advocated Calvinistical doctrines with great force and originality. His "Discourse on Providence" is considered the best of his writings. Died, 1680.

CHARONDAS, an ancient legislator. He flourished in the 5th century B.C., and is celebrated for his code of laws drawn up for the inhabitants of Thurium, in Magna Græcia. Among his regulations, was one to prevent any citizen from appearing with arms in the public assemblies. Having inadvertently broken through this law, he plunged his sword into his breast, saying, that he would seal his law with his own blood.

CHARPENTIER, FRANCIS, one of the French literati in the time of Louis XIV. He was the author of a treatise "On the Excellence of the French Language," and other works; but though he had much talent, his flattery of the king, and his praise of modern literature at the expense of the ancients, caused him to be severely satirised by Boileau. Died, 1702.

CHARRERIE, Madame DE ST. HYACINTHE DE, a French lady of versatile ability; authoress of "Lettres Neuchatelloises," "Caliste, ou Lettres écrites de Lausanne," and several successful novels and dramas. Died, 1805.

CHARRON, PETER, a French divine, and a friend of Montaigne, who, by will, left him the privilege of bearing his arms; a strong proof, considering the pride of a Gascon, of his personal consideration. His chief works are "The Three Smiths," a "Treatise on Wisdom," and a volume of "Christian Discourses."

CHASLES, FRANCIS JAMES, a French writer of the 18th century; compiler of the "Dictionnaire de Justice."

CHASLES, GREGORY DE, a French naval officer and a witty writer; author of "Les Illustres Françaises," "Journal d'un Voyage fait aux Indes Orientales," &c. Died, 1720.

CHASSENEUZ, BARTHOLOMEW DE, an eminent French lawyer; author of "Catalogus Gloria Mundi," "Consilia, or Consultations on Points of Law," &c. It is greatly to his credit that he used all his power as president of the parliament of Provence to delay the decree issued by that body against the Vaudois of Merindol and Cabrières. Indeed, it was suspected that his humanity caused the Catholics to hasten his end by poison. Died, 1541.

CHASTELAIN, CLAUDE, a French ecclesiastical writer; author of a "Universal Martyrology," the "Roman Martyrology," and a Journal of his own Life. Died, 1712.

CHASTELARD, PIERRE DE BOSCOLE DE, a French gentleman, whom De Thou supposes to have been grandson of the Chevalier Bayard. He went to Scotland in the suite of the unfortunate Mary, and became so violently enamoured of his royal mistress, as to secrete himself in her apartment. Being discovered when the queen retired to rest, he was committed to prison, and finally beheaded on a charge of treason.

CHASTELER, JOHN G., Marquis of, an eminent Austrian general. He was severely wounded at the siege of Valenciennes in 1793, and was subsequently opposed successively to Lefevre and Murat. In 1808, with Hormayer, he was the soul of the famous Tyrolese insurrection; and he was characterised by Napoleon, in a wrathful proclamation which he had the rashness to issue, as "the leader of a band of robbers," and an outlaw. In all his engagements he displayed equal skill and courage, and was at length rewarded with the honourable post of governor of Venice. Born, 1763; died, 1820.

CHASTELET, GABRIELLE EMILIE DE BRETEUIL, Marchioness of, a French lady, distinguished by her proficiency in science. She translated the Institutes of the Philosophy of Leibnitz from the German, and subsequently becoming acquainted with the philosophy of Newton, she translated his Principia, and added an able commentary. Born, 1706; died, 1749.

CHASTELLUX, FRANCIS JOHN, Marquis de, a French field-marshal; author of "Travels in North America," and a treatise on "Public Happiness." Died, 1738.

CHATEAUBRIAND, FRANCOIS AUGUSTE, Vicomte de, whose chequered career and numerous productions gained him a prominent place in the history of his time, was born at St. Malo, in 1769, the year that witnessed the birth of Napoleon, Mehemet Ali, and Arthur Wellesley. After pursuing his studies at Dol and Rennes, in his 17th year he joined the regiment of Navarre as sub-lieutenant, and repaired to Paris, where he witnessed all the splendours of the throne soon doomed to fall. On the eve of the meeting of the states-general in 1789, animated by a love of adventure, he went to America. Here he spent two years amid the wild grandeur of savage life, "the world forgetting, by the world forgot," when accident threw into his hands a journal which revealed to him the immense events which three years had sufficed to bring about in his native country. The French monarchy existed only in name, a turbulent democracy had taken its place, and the emigrant nobility were turning their swords against their country. It was in their ranks that honour, as understood among "gentils hommes," had marked out his place; and thither he betook himself. Wounded at the siege of Thionville in 1792, he was conveyed in a dying state to Jersey; and after a partial recovery he sailed for England, where he suffered great privations, which a few translations, and, as he subsequently made known, the timely aid of the Literary Fund Society, enabled him to mitigate rather than relieve. Here he published his first work, entitled "Essai Historique et Politique sur les Révolutions Anciennes et Modernes," 1797. After the 18th Brumaire he returned to France, and contributed to the Mercure. His "Atala" appeared in 1801; and was followed in 1802 by his most celebrated work, the "Génie du Christianisme," which has become like a household word through the Christian world. Soon afterwards he was appointed by Napoleon secretary to the French embassy at Rome. In March, 1804, he was nominated minister plenipotentiary to Switzerland; but he resigned on learning the melancholy fate of the Duke d'Anguien, and resisted all the overtures which Napoleon subsequently made to him. For a long time he had meditated a grand poetic work founded on the great events of Christianity; and to qualify himself for this undertaking, he visited in 1806 the great scenes of Bible history, and on his return in 1807 he published "Les Martyrs," and four years later his "Itinéraire de Paris à Jerusalem." In 1814, Chateaubriand hailed the Restoration in a brochure, entitled "Bonaparte et les Bourbons." At Ghent he was considered one of the ministers of Louis XVIII.; in 1815 he was created a peer of France, and the following year he became a member of the Institute. "La Monarchie selon la Charte," which he published the same year, threw him for some years into discredit with the court; but in 1820 the highest state appointments once more lay open to him, and he became successively ambassador at Berlin in 1820, and at London in 1822, and the same year minister of foreign affairs in the Ville ministry, when he organised the invasion of Spain under the Duke d'Angoulême, and took part in the Congress of Verona, the history of which he afterwards recorded. In 1824, being summarily dismissed from office, he took refuge in the columns of the Journal des Déchats, where he vigorously attacked his former colleagues; and on their fall in 1828, he was sent as ambassador to Rome, but resigned his office in 1829, on the formation of the Polignac administration. On the news of the outbreak of the revolution of 1830, he hastened to Paris, where he was hailed with acclamation by the people, but after delivering a glowing oration in favour of the Duke of Bordeaux, he retired from the chamber of peers, never to enter it again. From this period he personally took leave of politics; but he continued to send forth from time to time pamphlets on the government of Louis Philippe, conceived in so bitter and violent a spirit, that he became an object of suspicion to the ministry, and was summarily arrested, but soon discharged. His last years were spent in domestic privacy, cheered by the sympathy of "troops of friends," who looked up to him with respect bordering on veneration; and he expired almost at the moment when some of the most terrible scenes of his early life were renewed in the streets of Paris. Besides the works above mentioned, Chateaubriand wrote "Etudes Historiques," "Essai sur la Littérature Anglaise" (a poor production) and many others, including numerous pamphlets upon historical subjects and the politics of the day. A splendid edition of his collected works was published at Paris in 1826, for which he received 25,000*l.* His "Mémoires," to which great importance was attached during his lifetime, have been published since his death; but even the events of his chequered career, set forth with all the gracefulness of his fluent pen and the fervour of his glowing imagination, lose much of their interest from the overweening vanity which peers through every page, and which has converted that which might have been a grand "pièce justificatif" of a life, as remarkable for political changes as the era in which it was passed, into a theme for the regret of the thoughtful, and the satire of the scornful. Died, July 4. 1848.

CHATEAUBRUN, JOHN BAPTIST VIVIAN DE, a French dramatic writer; author of "Philoctetes," "Mahomet II.," "Les Troyennes," &c. Died, 1775.

CHATEAURENAUD, FRANCIS LOUIS ROUSSELET, Count of, a distinguished French admiral. He was a great scourge to the Sallee rovers, and signally defeated the Dutch fleet in 1675. Died, 1716.

CHATEL, FRANCIS DU, a Flemish painter of the 16th century. His chief work, which is in the town-hall of Ghent, represents the king of Spain receiving the oath of fidelity from the states of Flanders and Brabant.

CHATEL, PIERRE DU, bishop of Orleans, a strenuous defender of the Gallican Church. He was an excellent scholar, and assisted Erasmus in his translations from the Greek. He wrote a Latin letter against the emperor, Charles V., and two funeral orations for Francis I. Died, 1552.

CHATEL, TANNEGUY DU, an able French general. He was in the famous battle of Agincourt; and when the Burgundians surprised Paris, he was fortunate enough to save the dauphin, between whom and the Duke of Burgundy he afterwards brought about a reconciliation. Died, 1419.

CHATELET, PAUL DU HAY, Lord of, a French officer of state in the reign of Louis XIII.; author of the "History of Bertrand du Guesclin," constable of France. Died, 1636.

CHATHAM, WILLIAM PITT, Earl of, one of the most illustrious statesmen that ever graced the British senate, was the son of Robert Pitt, esq., of Boconock, in Cornwall, where he was born in 1708. After studying at Eton and Oxford, he entered the army as a cornet of dragoons, but quitted it on being returned to parliament as a member for Old Sarum. His talents as an orator were soon displayed in opposition to Sir Robert Walpole, and had so great an effect, that the Duchess of Marlborough, who had a deadly hatred to that minister, bequeathed to Mr. Pitt a legacy of 10,000*l.* On the change of administration, he was made joint vice-treasurer of Ireland and paymaster-general of the army, which places he resigned in 1755; but the year following he was appointed secretary of state. In a few months he was again dismissed from office; but an efficient administration being wanted in 1757, and the nation being enthusiastically attached to him, he returned to his former situation as secretary of state. His great mind now revealed its full force, and his ascendancy was complete over the parliament no less than in the ministry. He aroused the English nation to new activity, and, in the space of a few years, we recovered our superiority over France, annihilating her navy, and stripping her of her colonies. France was beaten in the four quarters of the world. In 1760, he advised the declaration of war against Spain, while she was unprepared for resistance, as he foresaw that she would assist France. The elevation of England on the ruins of the house of Bourbon was the great object of his policy. But his plans were suddenly interrupted by the death of George II., whose successor was prejudiced against Pitt by his adversary, the Earl of Bute, a statesman of limited views. Pitt, therefore, resigned his post in 1761, only retaining his seat in the House of Commons. Foreseeing the separation of the American colonies from the mother country, if the arbitrary measures then adopted should be continued, he advocated, especially in 1766, a conciliatory policy, and the repeal of the stamp act. In the same year he was invited to assist in forming a new ministry, in which he took the office of privy seal, and was created viscount Burton, baron Pynsent, and earl of Chatham; but in 1768 he resigned, as he found himself inadequately seconded by his colleagues. In the House of Lords, he continued to recommend the abandonment of the coercive measures employed against America, particularly in 1774; but his warning was rejected, and, in 1776, the colonies declared themselves independent. He still, however, laboured in the cause, and used all his efforts to induce the government to effect a reconciliation with the American states; and, as he was speaking with his accustomed energy on the subject, in the House of Lords, April 8, 1778, he fell down in a convulsive fit. He died on the 11th of the following month, and his body, after lying in state, was solemnly interred in Westminster Abbey, where a superb monument was erected to his memory at the national expense.

CHATHAM, JOHN, Earl of, &c., eldest son of the celebrated statesman whose life we have just given, and brother of the late William Pitt. He was born in 1756, and succeeded to the peerage on the death of his father, in 1778. In the following year he was appointed captain of the 86th regiment of foot, and served in the American war. He was afterwards appointed by his brother (then prime minister) first lord of the admiralty; was sworn a privy-councillor, and elected a knight of the Garter. His promotions, both civil and military, were rapid and numerous under his brother's administration, and he continued to hold office for many years after, under his successors. As lieutenant-general, he commanded the unfortunate expedition to Walcheren, in 1809, and was, three years afterwards, raised to the full rank of general. On the death of the Duke of Kent, he was appointed governor of Gibraltar, which he held, with other offices, to the time of his death, in 1835. He was the last peer of the Pitt family, whose title has now become extinct, and with it the annual pension of 4,000*l.*, besides another pension of 3,000*l.* per annum, granted to his father for three lives, in 1761. The late earl was married, in 1783, to a daughter of Viscount Sydney, but they had no children.

CHATTERTON, THOMAS, an English poet, whose precocious genius and melancholy fate have gained him much celebrity, was born at Bristol, in 1732. His father was sexton of Redcliff church, Bristol; and young Chatterton professed to have received from him several ancient MSS. These he palmed upon the world as the poems of Rowley, a priest of Bristol in the 15th century; and so admirably was his forgery executed, that it is even now rather assumed than proved, though there can be little moral doubt of it, that he did forge and not find the MSS. Having vainly endeavoured to persuade Horace Walpole and other scholars of the genuineness of the MSS., Chatterton, though still a mere boy, became a party writer; but even this resource failed him, and in a state of deep despondency, produced by absolute want, he destroyed himself by poison, in 1770, at the age of 18!!

CHAUCER, GEOFFREY, an admirable English poet, to whom is justly given the title of the father of English poetry. He studied law in the Temple, but soon turned his attention to the court, and became successively yeoman and shield-bearer to Edward III., and comptroller of the customs of London. In the following reign, having embraced the doctrines of Wickliff, he was committed to prison, but released on recanting his opinions. He now retired to Woodstock, where he composed his treatise on the astrolabe. He seems to have been fortunate beyond the usual lot of poets; for, independent of bounties he had bestowed on him by the crown, he derived considerable property and influence from his marriage with a connexion of the great John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster. As a poet, Chaucer is far less read and understood than he deserves; for his writing has a fresh and lusty vigour, rarely to be met with in more modern poetry. Born, 1328; died, 1400.

CHAUDET, ANTOINE DENIS, an eminent French sculptor and painter. His painting of "Æneas and Anchises amid the Conflagration of Troy," produced him great and well merited applause. Died, 1810.

CHAUDON, LOUIS MAYEUL, a French abbé; author of "Lessons of History and Chronology," "Elements of Ecclesiastical History to the Pontificate of Pius VI.," &c. Born, 1737; died, 1817.

CHAUFFEPIE, JAMES GEORGE, a biographical and critical writer, was the son of a French Protestant minister, but born in Friesland. In addition to sermons and theological essays, he wrote a "Historical and Critical Dictionary," designed as a continuation of the great work of Bayle. Born, 1702; died, 1786.

CHAULIEU, WILLIAM AMFRYE DE, a French lyric poet. His poems, which with those of the Marquis de la Fare have been frequently reprinted, are a mixture of Anacreon and the good-humoured philosophy of Horace. Born, 1639; died, 1720.

CHAULNES, ALBERT, Duke de, a French nobleman and man of science. He was well skilled in chemistry, and contributed many valuable papers to the Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences. Died, 1769.

CHAUMETTE, PIERRE GASPARD, one of the wretches who outraged humanity during the French revolution. He was of low origin, and after serving some time on board a ship he became clerk to an attorney. At the breaking out of the revolution he became one of the street orators, and was so conspicuous by his violence, that, in 1792, he was made first a member of the municipality of Paris, and then procureur, or attorney. When the Mountain party, in 1793, wished to overwhelm the more moderate Girondists, Chaumette was one of the chief instruments of doing so, and was in consequence extremely popular. During the confinement of the unfortunate Louis XVI. in the Temple, Chaumette and Herbert heaped every indignity upon him; and with them, it is said, originated the most horrible of all the charges made against the queen. He at length met his reward. Robespierre, himself already on the very verge of ruin, threw him into the prison of the Luxembourg, and he was guillotined in 1794.

CHAUNCEY, CHARLES, D.D., an American divine, and one of the most eminent writers of the sect called Universalists; author of "Thoughts on the State of Religion in New England," "The Benevolence of the Deity considered," "A true Sketch of the Sufferings and Misfortunes of the Town of Boston," &c. Born, 1705; died, 1787.

CHAUNCEY, SIR HENRY, an English lawyer and antiquarian. He was knighted by Charles II. in 1681, and, in 1688, was made a Welch judge. Just before his death he published the "Historical Antiquities of Hertfordshire," one of the most valuable of our county histories. Died, 1700.

CHAUSSE, MICHAEL ANGELO DE LA, a French archaeological writer; author of "Museum Romanum," "Picturæ Antiquæ Cryptarum Romanarum," &c. Died, 1724.

CHEKE, SIR JOHN, an eminent English statesman and scholar. Becoming regius professor of Greek at Cambridge, he strenuously laboured to improve the prevailing pronunciation of that language; and the opposition he met with from Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, produced a literary correspondence between them, which was published at Basle by Cælius Scæundus Curio. Having taken part in the education of Edward VI., that king, on his accession, granted him considerable property in land. He also made him a privy councillor and secretary of state, and conferred the honour of knighthood upon him. Unfortunately for him he engaged, on the death of Edward VI., in the cause of Lady Jane Grey, and was consequently sent to the Tower on the accession of Mary. His life was spared, and he was allowed to leave England; but while he was abroad he gave some new offence to the queen, and his estates were confiscated. Visiting Brussels he was seized by order of Philip II. and sent to England, where, under fear of being put to death, he renounced Protestantism. Having done this, the queen, though she did not restore his estates, gave him some equivalent for them; but she embittered them by compelling him to sit on the bench at the trial of Protestants whose attachment to their faith was stronger than their fears of death. Besides his correspondence with Gardiner, he wrote and translated several treatises. He also left in MS. an English translation of St. Matthew, in which no word was admitted of other than Saxon origin. Born, 1514; died, 1557.

CHELSUM, JAMES, D.D., an English clergyman, chiefly known as an author by two pamphlets, in which he severely criticised "Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." Died, 1801.

CHEMNIZER, IVAN IVANOVITCH, a Russian soldier and poet. He served several campaigns in the imperial guards, and afterwards entered the corps of engineers. When he at length retired he published various tales and fables, which the Russian critics compare to those of La Fontaine. Born, 1744; died, 1784.

CHENEVIX, RICHARD, an Irish gentleman of great and versatile ability as a writer; author of "Remarks on Chemical Nomenclature according to the System of the French Neologists," "Observations on Mineralogical Systems," "The Mantuan Rivals," a comedy; "Henry VII.," a tragedy; "An Essay on National Character," &c. Died, 1830.

CHENIER, MARIE JOSEPH, a French writer; author of "Charles IX.," "The Death of Calas," and some other dramas; of several odes sung on public occasions during the revolution, and of "An Historical Sketch of the State and Progress of French Literature. This writer, who dedicated one of his dramas to Louis XVI., and commenced that dedication with "Monarque des Français, roi d'un peuple fidèle," was among the most violent of the revolutionary agitators, and actually voted in the National Convention for the death of the king whom he had thus apostrophised. He contrived to survive all the horrors of the "reign of terror," and to thrive equally under the directorial, the consular, and the imperial governments. He died in 1811.

CHEOPS, a king of Egypt. Diodorus calls him Chemmis, and makes him eighth in succession from Rhampsinitus. It is said that he reigned 50 years, and built the largest of the pyramids in Egypt; but little is certain of his history, or even of the time when he flourished.

CHERON, ELIZABETH SOPHIE, a French lady, eminent as a portrait painter. She possessed considerable talent for music and poetry, and wrote several psalms and canticles in French. She remained unmarried until her sixtieth year, when she gave her hand to M. le Hay, the king's engineer. Died, 1711.

CHERON, LOUIS, brother of the above, and also a painter. Being refused admittance to the Academy of Painting in Paris, on account of his being a Calvinist, he came to England in 1695, and remained here till his death, which happened in 1713.

CHERUBIN, a French Capuchin friar, astronomer, and mathematician of the 17th century; author of "Dioptrique Oculaire," "A Treatise on the Theory, Construction, and Use of the Telescope," and "La Vision Parfaite."

CHERUBINI, SALVADOR, a distinguished musical composer, was born at Florence in 1760. His precocious skill in music attracted the attention of the Grand-duke of Tuscany, who gave him a pension, and this enabled him to complete his studies under Sarti, whom he afterwards assisted in his compositions. In 1784 he repaired to London, where he produced the "Fiuta Principessa" and "Giulio Sabino." In 1786 he settled in Paris, which thenceforward became his adopted country and the scene of his greatest triumphs. His operas of "Iphigenia," "Lodoiska," "Ali Baba" would alone have testified to the extent and variety of his powers; but his fame chiefly rests upon his sacred music, of which his "Requiem," composed for his own obsequies, deserves particular notice. He was director of the Conservatoire at Paris, where he died, full of years and honours, 1842.

CHESELDEN, WILLIAM, an eminent English surgeon and anatomist; author of a treatise on "The Anatomy of the Human Body," a treatise "On the High Operation for the Stone," "Osteography, or Anatomy of the Bones," a translation of "Le Dran's Surgery," &c. He was an admirable oculist, and though his system of lithotomy involved him in much controversy, it is undoubted that he very greatly improved the means of relieving one of the most terrible complaints to which our nature is obnoxious. He was born in 1688, and died, 1752.

CHIESTERFIELD, PHILIP DORMER STANHOPE, Earl of, was born in 1694, and educated at Cambridge. He first sat in parliament as member for Lostwithiel; and in 1726, on his father's death, succeeded to the earldom of Chesterfield. He was a particular favourite of George II., on whose accession he was sworn a privy councillor; was appointed, in 1728, ambassador extraordinary to Holland; made a knight of the Garter in 1730, and was appointed steward of the household. The latter office he soon after resigned, and he continued for several years the strenuous opponent of Sir R. Walpole, distinguishing himself by his writings in the Craftsman, as well as by his powerful eloquence in the house. In 1745 the government once more availed itself of his talents, and he was sent to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, where he continued a year, exercising his power in a manner calculated to gain the approbation of the people. He was afterwards secretary of state, but deafness and declining health induced him to relinquish office in 1748. His lordship was a man of brilliant accomplishments, but tainted with vanity and infidelity. He wrote some papers in the World, and several poetical pieces, but he is principally known as the author of "Letters to his Son." Died, 1773.

CHETHAM, HUMPHERY, a wealthy merchant of Manchester, to whose well-directed munificence that town owes its college and library. He left funds to purchase the collegiate church, which, being suppressed at the Reformation, had become the property of the Derby family. Mr. Chetham's trustees having executed his will thus far, next obtained a charter of incorporation, and founded a college for the maintenance and education of 40 poor boys, and an excellent library. The number of boys is now increased to 80, and the library receives constant additions from funds left by Mr. Chetham for that purpose. Any one resident in Manchester, or merely a visitor, has free access, by merely writing his name and address in a book for that purpose. Died, 1633.

CHETWOOD, KNIGHTLY, Dr., a dean of Gloucester; author of a "Life of Virgil," a "Life of Lycurgus," &c. Died, 1720.

CHETWOOD, WILLIAM RUFUS, a dramatic writer; author of some plays, which have long since ceased to keep the stage, and of a "General History of the Stage." Died, 1766.

CHEVALIER, ANTONY RODOLPH DE, French tutor to princess, afterwards queen, Elizabeth of England. At the death of Edward VI. he went to Germany, and subsequently to his native country, France; but on the breaking out of the civil war there, again sought England, where he was well received by his former pupil, the queen. When the disputes seemed to be terminated, he again went to France; but on the breaking out of the troubles anew, with the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew, he left France, intending again to seek shelter in England, but died at Guernsey. He was an erudite scholar, and published an excellent Hebrew grammar, an improved edition of the "Thesaurus of Sanct. Pagninus," &c. He had commenced a Bible in 4 languages, but did not live to finish it. Died, 1672.

CHEVILLIER, ANDREW, a French ecclesiastic and antiquary, and librarian to the Sorbonne. He published a Latin dissertation on the "Council of Chalcedon," an historical dissertation on the "Origin of Printing in Paris," &c. Died, 1700.

CHEVREAU, URBAN, an eminent French scholar. He became secretary to queen Christina of Sweden, and is said to have had considerable share in converting her to Catholicism. After acting as tutor and secretary to the Duke of Maine, he at length retired from all public duties, and devoted himself to literature. He wrote "Effets de la Fortune," a romance; "A History of the World," some plays, &c. Died, 1701.

CHEYNE, GEORGE, an eminent physician and writer. He was born in Scotland, and was originally intended for the church, but preferring the profession of medicine, he pursued the necessary studies for it under Dr. Pitcairn, and having taken his doctor's degree, settled himself in London. His first publication was a mathematical treatise, entitled "Fluxionum Methodus inversa," which procured him considerable reputation, and admission to the Royal Society. Too free an indulgence in the pleasures of the table having rendered him enormously corpulent as well as asthmatic, he resolved on strictly adhering to a milk and vegetable diet; and he experienced so much benefit from this course, that all his principal treatises urge it upon others. His chief works are "The English Malady, a Treatise on Nervous Disorders," "A Treatise on Gout," and an "Essay on Regimen." Died, 1743, aged 82.

CHIABRERA, GABRIEL, called the Italian Pindar, was born at Savona, in 1552. Besides odes and epic poems, which are chiefly anacreontic, he wrote several dramas. Died, 1637.

CHIARAMONTI, SCIPIO, an Italian ecclesiastic and writer. His works are very numerous, and are chiefly on the mathematics and natural philosophy. He founded the Academy of the Offuscati, at Osena, in Bologna, and was president of it when he died, in 1652.

CHIARI, PIETRO, an Italian ecclesiastic and poet of the 18th century. He was a rival of Goldoni, and his comedies attained considerable popularity. Those of Chiari were, however, much inferior to those of his rival. Died, 1788.

CHICHELEY, HENRY, archbishop of Canterbury, an able and accomplished scholar and statesman, was born at Higham Ferrers, in 1362. The parliament having addressed the king, Henry V., to appropriate some of the revenues of the church, the archbishop had the address to engage the young king in a war with France. On the accession of the infant king, Henry VI., Chicheley became first privy councillor, and he wisely directed all his attention to church affairs, striving at once to check the progress of Wickliffism, and to moderate the ardour of the papal court. In the expenditure of his revenue he was very liberal; he founded and endowed All Souls College, Oxford, made many important improvements in Lambeth Palace, and built the western tower of Canterbury Cathedral at his own expense. Died, 1443.

CHICOYNEAU, FRANCIS, an eminent physician and professor of medicine at Montpellier. When the plague was raging at Marseilles, he was sent to the relief of the sufferers, whom he re-assured by his calm courage. The important services he rendered on this occasion procured him a pension and several appointments at court. His principal literary production is a work "On the Origin, Symptoms, and Cure of the Plague;" a work doubly valuable on account of the narratives with which it is interspersed, being the result of the author's own experience. Died, 1752.

CHILD, SIR JOSIAH, bart., an eminent London merchant of the 17th century, and author of several works on subjects connected with political economy, among which may be noticed his "Discourse on Trade," &c. Born, 1630; died, 1699.

CHILD, WILLIAM, an English musical composer and musician. He was for many years organist in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and in the Chapel Royal at Whitehall. The simple style of his compositions caused them to be neglected in his own time, but they are now much admired. Died, 1697.

CHILDEBERT I., king of France, who ascended the throne in 511. Aided by his brothers, Clotaire and Clodomir, he attacked and defeated Sigismund, king of Burgundy. Childebert and Clotaire then turned their arms against Spain, but without success. Died, 558.

CHILDEBERT II., king of France, succeeded his father, Siebert, in 575. On the death of his uncle, Chilperic, king of Soissons, he gained the kingdoms of Orleans and Burgundy. Died, by poison, 596.

CHILDEBERT III., king of France. He ascended the throne at the very early age of 12 years; of which circumstance Pepin, mayor of the palace, took advantage to govern both king and kingdom. Died, 711.

CHILDERIC I., king of France. He succeeded his father, Merovæus, in 456; was deposed in the following year, and reinstated upon the throne in 463. Died, 481.

CHILDERIC II., king of France, was the son of Clovis II., and succeeded his brother Clotaire III. in 673. He was a debauched and cruel tyrant, and, together with his wife and son, was assassinated in 673.

CHILDERIC III., surnamed the Idiot, king of France, began his reign in 742, and was deposed in 752.

CHILLINGWORTH, WILLIAM, an English divine. He was a sound scholar, an able mathematician, and above mediocrity as a poet. But his chief bent was towards disputation and metaphysics; and he was so acute in discovering difficulties, that he doubted where men of far less natural capacity and acquired knowledge would have been presumptuously certain. By degrees his habit of doubting became so confirmed and excessive, that Lord Clarendon says of him, "he had contracted such irresolution, and such a habit of doubting, that at length he was confident of nothing." In this state of mind a Jesuit convinced him of the truth of the tenets of Papacy, and he actually went to the Jesuit's college at Douay. While there, he meditated the publication of a vindication of his conversion to the Church of Rome, but Laud, then bishop of London, dissuaded him from his injudicious purpose. This was the more fortunate, as he subsequently returned to England and studied so successfully, that he not only became a Protestant again, but also wrote and published the masterly treatise, entitled "The Religion of Protestants, a safe Way to Salvation." Some hesitation about signing the 39 articles prevented him from obtaining preferment in the church; but he at length consented to sign, and became chancellor of Salisbury, &c. At the breaking out of the civil war, he warmly espoused the royal cause, and published a treatise on the "Unlawfulness of Resisting the Lawful Prince, although most Tyrannous, Impious, and Idolatrous." He also invented a machine, or rather imitated one described by some ancient authors, for the attack of fortified places. Ill health at length compelled him to retire to Arundel Castle, which was surrendered to the parliamentarians under Sir William Waller, who, at his own request, sent him to Chichester, where he died, at the episcopal palace, in 1644.

CHILMEAD, EDMUND, an English mathematician and musician; author of a treatise "On the Music of Ancient Greece;" another, which was not printed, "On Sounds," and a "Catalogue of the Greek MSS. in the Bodleian Library." Died, 1654.

CHILO, one of the seven sages of Greece. He flourished in the 6th century, B.C., and was celebrated for his just conduct as a magistrate. It was he who caused the celebrated "Know thyself," to be graven on the temple of Delphi.

CHITTY, JOSEPH, an eminent special pleader, and the author of many well-known works, which have become indispensable auxiliaries to every legal student and practitioner. Died, Feb. 1841, aged 65.

CHERILUS, a Samian poet of the 5th century B. C. His poem on the victory of the Athenians over Xerxes obtained him a large pecuniary reward, and it was ordered to be solemnly recited every year.

CHOUSEUL, STEPHEN FRANCIS DE, Duke of. He entered the army early, and having attained a high rank, was appointed ambassador to Rome and Vienna, and honoured with a peerage. He then became prime minister of France, to which station he was raised through the influence of Madame de Pompadour. He made many judicious reforms and alterations in the French army, increased the navy, and brought about the celebrated family compact. In 1770 he was dismissed from office, and exiled to one of his estates. Born, 1714; died, 1785.

CHIOSI, FRANCIS TIMOLEON DE, a French ecclesiastic and writer. In his youth he was of very debauched and abandoned habits. For some years he wore the dress of a woman, and passed by the name of the Countess des Barres; but a severe illness had the good effect of awakening him to a sense of the disgrace and danger of his way of life, and he became an abbé. If his abandonment of vicious inclinations were not quite as entire as could have been wished, his conduct was at least more decorous; and among his numerous writings some were well calculated to produce virtuous inclinations in their readers. Besides a Life of David, a Life of Solomon, and a History of the Church, he gave the "Memoirs of the Countess des Barres," containing some account of his youthful irregularities. He also wrote and translated several other pieces, but they are held in very little estimation. Died, 1724.

CHOPIN, FREDERIC, a great modern composer and pianoforte player, was born near Warsaw, 1810. Compelled to leave Poland in consequence of political convulsions, he played in public at Vienna and Munich in 1831, and soon afterwards repaired to Paris, where he continued to exercise his art till the revolution of 1848 drove him to England. He returned to Paris in 1849; but his constitution, which had never been robust, sunk under the rude changes of the preceding year, and he died in the autumn of 1849, leaving behind him a reputation, both as a player and a composer, which will not soon pass away. Every note of his music, whether in his concertos or sonatas, or his scherzi, ballades, polonoises, preludes, breathes an unmistakable nationality; and is marked by distinctness, expression, and elegance.

CHOPIN, RÉNÉ, an eminent French lawyer and writer; author of "The Custom of Anjou," "The Custom of Paris," "De Sacra Politia Monastica," &c. Died, 1606.

CHORIER, NICHOLAS, a French lawyer and writer; author of a "General History of Dauphiny," &c. Died, 1692.

CHORIS, LOUIS, an eminent Russian artist and traveller, born in 1795. He was appointed draughtsman to Captain Kotzebue's expedition round the world in 1814, and on his return published his "Voyage Pittoresque," accompanied with Cuvier's descriptions. He also published "Les Crânes Humains," with observations by Dr. Gall and others. In 1827, M. Choris sailed from France, with the intention of travelling through America; but while on his journey in Mexico, in company with an English gentleman, they were attacked by robbers near Xalapa, and Choris lost his life, March 19, 1828.

CHOUL, WILLIAM DU, a French antiquarian writer of the 16th century. He wrote an excellent treatise on the Religion of the ancient Romans, and on Greek and Roman Antiquities.

CHRETIEN, FLORENT, a French poet. He was of noble family, and was tutor to Henry of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France. Besides writing satires and tragedies, he translated Oppian, some of the plays of Aristophanes, and Pacatus' pænyric of Theodosius. Died, 1596.

CHRISTIAN, EDWARD, an English lawyer and law writer; author of an "Account of the Origin of the Two Houses of Parliament with a Statement of the Privileges of the House of Commons," a "Treatise on the Bankrupt Laws," &c. He was Downing professor of law in the university of Cambridge, and chief justice of the Isle of Ely. Died, 1823.

CHRISTIE, JAMES, the son of an eminent auctioneer in London, was distinguished for his critical taste in the fine arts, and his antiquarian knowledge. Though he followed his father's profession, he found time to give to the world some ingenious and valuable works, viz. an "Essay on the Ancient Greek Game invented by Palamedes," showing the origin of the game of chess; a "Disquisition upon Etruscan Vases;" an "Essay on the Earliest Species of Idolatry," &c. Died, 1831.

CHRISTINA, queen of Sweden. She was the only child of the famous Gustavus Adolphus, whom she succeeded in 1632, being then only 6 years old. During her minority the kingdom was wisely governed by the chancellor Oxenstiern; and when she was crowned, in 1650, she formally declared her cousin, the count palatine Charles Gustavus, her successor. For four years she governed the kingdom with an evident desire to encourage learning and science; and at the end of that time, weary either of the task of governing, or of the personal restraint which royalty imposed on her, she abdicated in favour of her cousin, and proceeded to Rome, where she surrounded herself with learned men, and busied herself with learned pursuits. She also embraced the religion of Rome, though it would seem that her moral conduct was such as to evince no great respect for religion of any kind. On this point it will suffice to say, that while at Paris, on one of the various occasions of her visiting that city, she had her equerry, an Italian, named Monaldeschi, murdered in her own residence, and almost in her own presence; a crime which seems to have had no other cause than the unfortunate equerry's indifference to the blandishments of his mistress. In 1660, the death of her cousin, caused her to go once more to Sweden; but her change of religion, and the reports which had reached that country of her conduct elsewhere, had so disgusted her former subjects, that they resolutely refused to reinstate her in the sovereignty. Being threatened with the loss of her revenues as well as her crown, she consented to preserve the former by finally renouncing the latter; and she retired to Rome, where she died in 1689.

CHRISTOPHE, HENRY, a negro, one of the leaders of the insurgent slaves of St. Domingo. He possessed considerable ability, but his courage was carried to ferocity. He successfully opposed the French, whose perfidious seizure of the negro chief, Toussaint Louverture, he amply revenged, and assumed the title of Henry I., king of Hayti; but he acted so despotically that a conspiracy was formed against him; and Boyer, the successor of Petion, who had established a republic in the south of Domingo, was invited to take part with the discontented subjects of Christophe, and demanded his deposition. At length, finding that even his body-guard was no longer to be depended on, he shot himself through the heart, October 8th, 1820.

CHRISTOPHERSON, JOHN, bishop of Chichester. During the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. he resided abroad on account of his religion, but on the accession of Mary he came to Rome, and was soon raised to the bishopric above named, which, however, he enjoyed barely a year. He translated, from Greek to Latin, Philo, Eusebius, and other authors; but he was rather industrious than learned, and succeeding authors have been much misled by him. Died, 1558.

CHRYSIPPUS, a native of Cilicia, who became a disciple of Zeno. He was fond of paradoxes, with which his writing and discourse abounded; and he was infinitely more subtle in starting difficulties in the arguments of others, than clear in expounding his own views. He flourished in the 2d century B. C.

CHRYSOLOGUE, NOEL ANDRE, a French Capuchin, geographer, and astronomer; author of "Théorie de la Surface Actuelle de la Terre." He also published several maps, charts, and planispheres. Died, 1808.

CHRYSOLORAS, MANUEL, a Greek of noble family. Being sent to Europe by the emperor Manuel Palæologus to solicit the Christian princes to aid Constantinople against the Turks, he settled at Florence as a teacher of Greek. Subsequently he taught at Milan; but when the emperor Manuel came to that city, he was employed by him in a mission to the court of the emperor Sigismund, and afterwards to the general council at Constance, in which city he died. He was author of a "Greek Grammar," a "Parallel between Ancient and Modern Rome," &c. Died, 1414.

CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN, ST., was really named Secundus, but was called Chrysostom, which signifies "golden mouth," on account of his eloquence. He was born at Antioch, and was intended for the bar; but being deeply impressed with religious feelings, he spent several years in solitary retirement, studying and meditating with a view to the church. Having completed his voluntary probation, he returned to Antioch, was ordained, and became so celebrated for the eloquence of his preaching, that on the death of Nectarius, patriarch of Constantinople, he was raised to that high and important post. He now exerted himself so rigidly in repressing heresy and paganism, and in enforcing the obligations of monachism, that Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, aided and encouraged by the empress Eudoxia, caused him to be deposed at a synod held at Chalcedon, in 403. His deposition gave so much offence to the people, by whom he was greatly beloved, that the empress was obliged to interfere for his reinstatement. He soon, however, provoked her anger by opposing the erection of her statue near the great church; and, in 404, another synod deposed him, and exiled him to Armenia. He sustained his troubles with admirable courage; but being ordered to a still greater distance from the capital, where his enemies still feared his influence, he died while on his journey. His voluminous works abound with information, and are very eloquent. Thirty years after his death his remains were removed to Constantinople with great pomp, and he was honoured with the title of saint. Died, 407.

CHUBB, THOMAS, an English writer; author of "The Supremacy of the Father asserted," "Discourse on Miracles," &c. His writings evince great acuteness, but however candid he might be when he commenced as an inquirer, he seems to have made a regular progress towards deism as he went on. Born, 1679; died, 1747.

CHUDLEIGH, MARY, Lady; author of "The Ladies' Defence," a poem, and a volume of "Essays" in verse and prose. Died, 1710.

CHURCHILL, CHARLES, an English clergyman and poet. He was educated at Westminster, but made so little use of the advantages afforded by that academy, that he was refused admission at Oxford on account of classical deficiency. A marriage, as early as it was imprudent, rendered a profession doubly desirable; and after studying for some time in private, he was admitted to holy orders, and obtained a Welch curacy of about 30*l.* a year. The death of his father, who was curate of St. John's, Westminster, brought him once more to London, and he obtained the vacant curacy. Still his income was small, while his love of gay and expensive pursuits was unbounded, and he was on the verge of imprisonment, when Dr. Lloyd, of Westminster School, interfered, and effected a composition with the creditors. He now determined to exert the talents he had so long allowed to lie idle; and his first production was "The Rosciad," an energetic description of the principal actors of that time. Public attention was fixed on this poem by the vehemence with which the players replied to it, and Churchill found it worth his while to give the town a new satire, under the title of an "Apology" for his former one. "Night," "The Ghost"—in which he assailed Dr. Johnson, at that time all but omnipotent in the literary world—and the "Prophecy of Famine," followed; and he at length threw aside all regard for his profession, separated from his wife, and became a complete "man of wit about town," and a professional political satirist. He now rapidly produced an "Epistle to Hogarth," "The Conference," "The Duellist," "The Author," "Gotham," "The Candidate," "The Times," "Independence," and "The Journey." The vigour displayed in these makes it probable that he would in time have devoted himself to higher subjects than party politics, and have produced works calculated to give him higher and more lasting fame; but a fever hurried him to the grave, at the early age of 34, in 1764.

CHURCHILL, Sir WINSTON, a cavalier, whose estates were sequestered during the commonwealth; but they were restored to him by Charles II., who also knighted him. He wrote "Divi Britannici;" histories of the English monarchs. Died, 1688.

CHURCHYARD, THOMAS, an English poet; author of "The Worthiness of Wales," &c. He flourished in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and died early in the 17th century.

CIACONIUS, PETER, an eminent Spanish scholar. Pope Gregory XIII. employed him to superintend an edition of the Bible, the "Decretal" of Gratian, and other works, which that pontiff caused to be printed at the Vatican press. He wrote some very learned notes on Tertullian, Pliny, Seneca, and other Latin writers; a variety of tracts on Italian antiquities; a treatise on the old Roman calendar, &c.; and he aided Clavius in reforming the calendar. Died, 1581.

CIAMPINI, JOHN JUSTIN, a learned Italian; author of "Vetera Monumenta," a "History of the College of Abbreviators," "Lives of the Popes," &c. He was one of the literary associates of Christina, queen of Sweden, during her residence at Rome, and was much aided by her in forming an academy for the study of mathematics, and another for the study of ecclesiastical history. Died, 1698.

CIBBER, COLLEY, an actor and dramatist, was the son of Gabriel Cibber, a celebrated sculptor, and born in London, in 1671. He was educated at Grantham Free-school, and being disappointed of a scholarship at Cambridge, he entered the army. The military profession did not suit his taste; and when only about 18 years old he quitted it for the stage. For some time he had but little success; but his performance of Fondlewife, in the "Old Bachelor," made him very popular, and obtained him the monopoly of parts of that kind at Drury-lane. His first dramatic effort, "Love's Last Shift," appeared in 1695; and it was followed by "Woman's Wit" and "The Careless Husband." His next production as a dramatist was an adaptation of Moliere's Tartuffe, under the title of the "Nonjuror," of which the "Hypocrite" of the more modern stage is a new version. The piece was wonderfully popular, and, in addition to the large profits Cibber derived from its performance, it procured him the situation of poet laureate. This appointment drew upon him the rancour of contemporary wits and poets, and of Pope among the number; but Cibber had the good sense to think solid profit more important than the censure of the envious was injurious; and he wore the bays, and performed in his own pieces till he was nearly 74 years of age. Besides tragedies and comedies, to the number of twenty-five, some of which still continue to be played as stock pieces, Cibber wrote an "Apology" for his own life; an "Essay on the Character and Conduct of Cicero," and two expository epistles to his assailable Pope. Died, 1757.

CIBBER, THEOPHILUS, son of the above, an actor and dramatist, but very inferior in both capacities to his father. He wrote a musical entertainment called "Pattie and Peggy," and altered some of Shakspeare's plays. "The Lives of the Poets of Great Britain and Ireland" appeared with his name; but the work was said to be written by Shields, subsequently amanuensis to Dr. Johnson, from materials furnished by Thomas Coxeter. Cibber was of very extravagant habits, and his life was consequently spent in much distress. He was drowned in his passage to Ireland, 1757.

CIBBER, ANNA MARIA, wife of the last named, and an actress of the highest class. Her union with Theophilus Cibber was productive of both discomfort and disgrace, and she was separated from him for many years. Her conduct, however, made it evident that he had been more to blame for the circumstance that dishonoured them both than she had; and she was as much respected in private life as she was admired on the stage. Her style of acting was well adapted to that of Garrick, with whom she frequently performed. Died, 1763.

CICCARELLI, ALPHONSO, an Italian physician; author of "De Clitumno Flumine," "istoria di Casa Monaldesca," &c. Having forged genealogies, and committed other literary impostures, he was executed at Rome, in 1580.

CICERO, MARCUS TULLIUS, the prince of Roman orators. He was the son of noble parents, and at an early age gave such decided indications of his ability, that after having served in a single campaign under Sylla and P. Strabo, he devoted himself, by the advice of his friends, to the bar. For this purpose he studied under Molo, an eminent lawyer, and Philo the Athenian, then resident at Rome; and, at the age of 26, he commenced practice as a pleader; his first important cause being the defence of Sextus Roscius Amerinus, who was accused of parricide by one Chrysogonus, a freedman of the dictator Sylla. He saved his client, but was obliged to withdraw to Athens from fear of resentment of the dictator. As long as Sylla lived Cicero remained at Athens, turning even his exile into a benefit by diligently studying under Antiochus and other eminently learned men. When he returned to Rome he rapidly rose in his profession, and the quaestorship in Sicily was bestowed upon him. In this office he made himself very popular; and henceforth his course was all prosperous, until he attained the great object of his ambition—the consulship. The bold and evil designs of Catiline made Cicero's consular duty as difficult and dangerous as his performance of it was able and honourable; and he scarcely, if at all, exaggerated his services to Rome when he said that to his conduct "alone was owing the salvation of both the city and the commonwealth." But his popularity declined very soon after the expiration of his consulship, and it was chiefly as an advocate and author that he for some time afterward exerted his splendid talents. At length the task of averting ruin from his own head tasked even his powers to the utmost. Publius Clodius who had now become tribune of the people, raised such a storm against him, that he was a second time obliged to go into exile. This time he sought shelter with his friend Plancus, in Thessalonica, until the repentant Romans recalled him, making him magnificent recompense for the depredation and devastation by which he had been impoverished. In the struggle between Cæsar and Pompey, Cicero espoused the cause of the latter; but after the fatal battle of Pharsalia, he made his peace with the former, with whom he continued to all appearance friendly, until Cæsar fell under the daggers of Brutus and his friends. He now took part with Octavius, and pronounced the bitter philippics against Antony, which at once shortened his life, and added to his fame. Antony, stung to the quick, insisted upon the death of Cicero, and Octavius basely consented to the sacrifice. In endeavouring to escape from Tusculum, where he was living when the news of his proscription arrived, he was overtaken and murdered by a party of soldiers, headed by Popilius Lænas, whose life he had formerly saved by his eloquence; and his head and hands were publicly exhibited on the rostrum at Rome. Cicero was born at Arpinum, b. c. 106; and perished in his 64th year, b. c. 43. He was a perfect model of eloquence; and, as Augustus truly said, "he loved his country sincerely." Of his works, which are universally known and far too numerous to be even named here, there have been almost innumerable editions.

CIENFUEGOS, ALONZO DE, a Spanish writer of the 18th century. Besides tragedies, odes, and other poems, he wrote "Elogio del Marques de Santa Cruz," "Elogio del Senor Don J. Almazara," and "La Pensadora Gladitana."

CIMALINE, JOHN, a Florentine painter. He painted only in distemper, oil colours being then undiscovered; and though he painted historical subjects, he had no idea of light and shadow. Dante praises him; and, considering the barbarism of the time at which he lived, the praise was not undeserved, as all that he accomplished was accomplished in despite of obstacles now happily unknown. He died at the close of the 13th or very early in the 14th century.

CIMAROSA, DOMENICO, a Neapolitan, famous as a musical composer. When the army of revolutionised France took possession of Italy, Cimarosa so openly sympathised with revolutionary principles, that, when the French withdrew, he was thrown into prison, and treated with a rigour which is supposed to have materially shortened his life. Of twenty-six operas which he composed, and most of which are comic, "Il Matrimonio Segreto" and "Il Matrimonio per Susurro," are the most admired. Born, 1754; died, 1801.

CIMON, a celebrated Athenian general. He was the son of Miltiades, and first distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis.

Aristides, surnamed the Just, thought so highly of him, notwithstanding his youth had been very dissipated, that he initiated him into public business. After having repeatedly beaten the Persians, and enriched his country by the spoils he wrested from the enemy, the party of Pericles caused him to be ostracised, on a charge of having been bribed. At the end of five years, which was only half the term for which he had been banished, he was recalled, and again led the Athenians to victory over their Persian foe. While besieging Citium, in Cyprus, he died; having served Athens, not only by his prowess as a soldier, but also by his wisdom in founding public schools. He flourished in the 5th century b. c.

CINCINNATUS, LUCIUS QUINTUS, one of the most illustrious characters of ancient Rome. He was made consul when the senate and the people were striving for the ascendancy; and, being much incensed against the latter for having banished his son, he sternly resisted their demands. He was named consul a second time, but refused the office and retired to his farm, whence he did not again emerge until he was saluted dictator, and entreated to lend his aid against the Æqui, who had closely invested the consul Minucius, and the army under his command. Stepping at once from the petty details of a farm to the momentous duties of a general and a statesman, Cincinnatus exerted himself so efficiently, that the Æqui were fain to retire, after having passed under the yoke. Having caused his son to be recalled from exile, after the chief witness against him had been convicted of perjury, he laid down his vast authority and returned to his farm. He was again, though 80 years of age, made dictator, when Mælius conspired to overthrow the republic; and he put down the domestic conspirator as promptly as he had formerly repelled the Æqui. He flourished in the 5th century b. c.

CINCIUS ALIMENTUS, LUCIUS, an old Roman historian, author of a "History of the Wars of Hannibal," and other works which are now lost; but Pliny frequently quotes the author of them, and speaks of him as a writer of integrity.

CINELLI, GIOVANNI, a Florentine physician; author of "Bibliotheca Volante." Born, 1625; died, 1706.

CINNA, LUCIUS CORNELIUS, a Roman; the friend, partisan, and fellow consul of Marius. He it was who drove Sylla from Rome, and recalled Marius from his African exile. He participated in the numerous murders which followed the return of Marius; and when in his third consulship, and while preparing for hostilities with Sylla, was assassinated, b. c. 84.

CINNAMUS, JOHN, a Greek writer of the 12th century. He was secretary to the emperor Manuel Comnenus, of whom, and of his father, the emperor John, he wrote a history.

CINÒ DA PISTOIA, an Italian juriconsult and poet, born at Pistoia, in 1270, whose proper name was Guittone. He was very eminent as a lawyer, and became a senator of Rome, and professor successively at various universities. In addition to some elgant poetry, by which he is chiefly known, he wrote a "Commentary on the Digest." Died, 1336.

CINQ-MARS, HENRY COIFFIER, Marquis of, was son of the Marquis d'Effiat, marshal of France. He was introduced by Cardinal Richelieu to the notice of Louis XIII., and was for some time a most distinguished favourite of that monarch. Ungratefully to the cardinal and to the king, he instigated Gaston, duke of Orleans, the king's brother, to rebellion. They had proceeded so far in their treasonable designs as to set on foot a treaty with Spain, engaging that power to assist them. But the vigilance of the cardinal discovered their plans, and the marquis was apprehended, and beheaded in 1642.

CIPRIANI, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent painter, born at Pistoia, in Tuscany. In 1755 he accompanied Sir W. Chambers to London, and was one of the original members of the Royal Academy. His drawings are greatly admired for their correctness, fertility of invention, and harmonious colouring; and many exquisite engravings were made from them by Bartolozzi. Died, 1785.

CIRIGNANO, NICHOLAS, an Italian painter, several of whose works are in the churches of Loretto and Rome. Died, 1588.

CIRIGNANO, ANTHONY, son of the above, and also eminent as a painter. Died, 1620.

CIRILLO, DOMINIC, an Italian botanist, president of the Academy at Naples, and professor of medicine in the university of that city; author of "The Neapolitan Flora," a "Treatise on the Essential Characters of certain Plants," &c. When the French entered Naples, Cirillo took an active part against his sovereign; and when the legitimate government was restored, he was executed as a traitor in 1795.

CLAGGETT, WILLIAM, D.D., an English divine; author of four volumes of sermons, and of some well written tracts against dissent and papacy. Died, 1727.

CLAIRAULT, ALEXIS, a French mathematician; author of "Elements of Geometry," "Elements of Algebra," a "Treatise on the Figure of the Earth," &c. He was remarkable for the precocity of his talent; for at four years of age he could read and write, at nine he had so far studied mathematics as to be able to solve some difficult problems, and at eleven he published a work on curves. Born, 1713; died, 1765.

CLAIREFAIT, Counte, an excellent Austrian general. He commanded the Austrian troops against those of the French republic, and evinced equal skill and courage, though inferiority in numbers frequently compelled him to give way before the enemy. Died, 1798.

CLAIRON, CLAIRE JOSEPHINE DE LA TUDE, a celebrated French actress, born near Conde, in 1723, and who, commencing her histrionic efforts at the early age of 12 years, soon became the first tragic performer of her age and country. She died in 1803, having long before quitted the stage for a life of religious seclusion.

CLAPPERTON, Captain HUGH, the celebrated African traveller, was born in Annan, Dumfriesshire, in 1788, and at the age of 13 was apprenticed to the sea-service. Having during his apprenticeship inadvertently violated the excise laws, by taking a few pounds of rock salt to the mistress of a house which the crew frequented, he consented (rather than undergo a trial) to go on board the Clorinda frigate, commanded by Capt. Briggs. Through the interest of friends he was soon promoted to be a midshipman, and in 1814 was raised to the rank of lieutenant, and appointed to the command of the Confiance schooner, on Lake Erie. In 1822 he was chosen to accompany Dr. Oudney and Lieutenant Denham on an expedition to Central Africa, and on his return to England he received the rank of captain. In six months afterwards he was dispatched on a second mission for exploring the country from Tripoli to Bornou, but was not allowed to enter the place. It was during the period of his detention that he was attacked with dysentery, which proved fatal, at Sackatoo, on the 13th of April, 1827. His journals, which were all saved, give an interesting account of the central part of Northern Africa, and the manners and customs of its inhabitants.

CLARENDON, EDWARD HYDE, Earl of, lord high chancellor of England, was born at Dinton, in Wiltshire, in 1608. He was educated at Oxford, and studied law under his uncle, Nicholas Hyde, chief justice of the king's bench. During the civil wars he zealously attached himself to the royal cause, and contributed more than any other man to the restoration. In his judicial capacity his conduct was irreproachable; and as long as he held office, no one could be more decidedly the supporter of the privileges of royalty, or the defender of his country's freedom against the abuses of the royal power. But he at length became unpopular, was removed from his high employments, and, in order to escape the consequences of impeachment, found it prudent to go into voluntary exile. He died at Rouen, in 1764. His "History of the Rebellion," taken as a whole, is an admirable work, and calculated to secure to his memory a lasting fame. His daughter Anne was married to the Duke of York, afterwards James II.; and two daughters, Anne and Mary, the fruit of this marriage, both ascended the English throne.

CLARENDON, HENRY HYDE, Earl of, son of the foregoing, was born in 1638. He was for a short time lord lieutenant of Ireland, in the reign of James II., and wrote a "History of the Irish Rebellion," &c. Died, 1709.

CLARKE, ADAM, LL.D., one of the most eminent modern scholars in the oriental languages and biblical antiquities. He was born in Ireland, and received the rudiments of learning from his father, who was a schoolmaster in that country; but subsequently studied at the school founded by John Wesley, at Kingswood, near Bristol. At the very early age of 18, he became a travelling preacher in the Methodist connection, and for 20 years continued to be so. But though he was very popular as a preacher, it is chiefly as a writer that he demands notice here. He published a very curious and useful Bibliographical Dictionary; a supplement to that work; a most laborious Commentary on the Bible; a Narrative of the last Illness and Death of Richard Porson; and Memoirs of the Wesley Family; and edited Baxter's Christian Directory, and several other religious works. His Commentary on the Bible alone would have been a long labour to a man of ordinary industry. But such were his energy and perseverance, that besides the above works and numerous sermons, he wrote four elaborate and valuable reports on the State of the Public Records, and edited the first volume of a new and laborious edition of Rymers's Fœdera. Born, 1762; died, of cholera, 1832.

CLARKE, EDWARD DANIEL, LL.D., a celebrated modern traveller, and professor of mineralogy at Cambridge, was born in 1767. He accompanied Lord Berwick to Italy in 1794; and in 1799 he commenced a tour through Denmark, Sweden, Lapland, Finland, Russia, Tartary, Circassia, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Greece, and Turkey, returning, in 1802, through Germany and France. By his exertions the library of Cambridge was enriched with nearly a hundred volumes of manuscripts, and the colossal statue of the Eleusinian Ceres. He also brought to this country the sarcophagus of Alexander, and a splendid collection of mineralogical specimens, which he turned to the best advantage in his subsequent popular lectures on mineralogy, when he was appointed to the professor's chair in 1808. He died in 1821, and a complete edition of his works, in 11 vols., was afterwards published.

CLARKE, HENRY, LL.D., professor of mathematics at the military academy at Marlow; author of "An Essay on the Usefulness of Mathematical Learning," a "Dissertation on Perspective," another on "Calculating Numbers," a third on "Stenography," an "Introduction to Geography," &c. Died, 1818.

CLARKE, JAMES STANIER, LL.D., having graduated at Cambridge, was for some years chaplain in the navy, and was in that capacity with Nelson, at the battle of Trafalgar. On being introduced to George III., the king was pleased with him, and he became chaplain and librarian at Carlton House. He wrote numerous publications, which bear his name, and was the founder of the Naval Chronicle. Died, at Brighton, 1834.

CLARKE, JEREMIAH, Mus. Doc., organist to St. Paul's cathedral, and joint organist, with Blow, to his majesty. His compositions are not numerous, but they are remarkable for pathetic melody. An imprudent and hopeless passion for a lady of high rank so much disordered the mind of this amiable and gifted man, that he committed suicide, in 1707.

CLARKE, JOHN, an American divine and writer; author of "Funeral Discourses;" a popular tract entitled "An Answer to the Question, 'Why are You a Christian?'" &c. Died, 1798.

CLARKE, SAMUEL, a learned English divine; author of "Scientia Metrica et Rhythmica," &c. Died, 1669.

CLARKE, SAMUEL, D.D., a celebrated English theologian and natural philosopher, was born in 1675. He was a native of Norwich, of which city his father was an alderman; and was educated at Caius College, Cambridge. While at college, he translated "Rohault's Physics," in order to familiarise students with the reasonings of the Newtonian philosophy. When he took orders, he became chaplain to the Bishop of Norwich, and appeared as an author in his own profession, in 1699, when he published "Three practical Essays on Baptism, Confirmation, and Repentance." By this work he established his reputation as a pious and able writer; and he now entered the lists as a controversialist, by publishing "Reflections" on a book by Toland, entitled "Amyntor." In 1704-5 he was appointed to preach the sermons at Boyle's Lecture, and took for the subjects of his sixteen sermons, "The Being and Attributes of God" and "The Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion." In 1712 he published a new and valuable edition of "Caesar's Commentaries," and a work entitled "The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity." This work involved him in a controversy, in which his principal opponent was Dr. Waterland; and the heterodoxy of Dr. Clarke was made the subject of a complaint in the lower house of convocation. Subsequently he had a controversy with Leibnitz on the principles of religion and natural philosophy; and gave considerable offence by altering the singing psalms at St. James's, where he was chaplain to Queen Anne. Although his alleged heterodoxy had deprived him of all chance of rising in the church, he had so just a sense of what was due to his profession, that when offered the mastership of the Mint, on the death of Sir Isaac Newton, he declined it as incompatible with the clerical office and character. The latter part of his life was distinguished by his letter to Mr. Hoadley, "On the Proportion of Velocity and Force in Bodies in Motion," and his edition of "Homer's Iliad" with a Latin version. After his death, his sermons, in 10 vols., were published by his son. Died, 1729.

CLARKE, JOHN, D.D., brother of the above, dean of Salisbury; author of "Sermons on the Origin of Evil," a translation of Grotius's "De Veritate," &c. Died, 1729.

CLARKE, WILLIAM, an English divine and writer; author of "The Connection of the Roman, Saxon, and English Coins," "A Discourse on the Commerce of the Romans," &c. Died, 1771.

CLARKE. See FELTRE, Duke of.

CLARKSON, THOMAS, a man whose whole life may be said to have almost passed in labouring to effect the extinction of the slave trade, was born at Wisbeach, in Suffolk, in 1760. He was first brought into notice as the friend and champion of the negro, by a Latin prize essay upon this important subject, which was afterwards published in English, and became immensely popular. Associations were now formed, and the question was agitated and discussed throughout the country: at length Mr. Clarkson having become acquainted with Mr. Wilberforce, whose connections and influence were justly regarded as of the highest value, it was agreed that the latter gentleman should bring the subject under the notice of parliament. This was in 1787, and it there met with various success until 1807, when the memorable anti-slavery law obtained the sanction of the legislature. But though Mr. Wilberforce, by virtue of his position, was enabled to take a lead in this great measure, the original promoter of it was still indefatigable; and, outside the walls of parliament, he continued to labour with undiminished zeal. We are bound at the same time to observe, that Mr. Clarkson's active benevolence, though principally exerted in favour of the poor enslaved African, was by no means confined even to that wide sphere. He died Sept. 26. 1846, aged 85.

CLAUDE, JOHN, an eminent French Protestant divine. He composed a reply to a work of the Port-Royalists on the eucharist, and was involved, in consequence, in a controversy with the Catholic writers, in which he displayed immense controversial power. No better proof, indeed, can be desired of the formidable light in which he appeared to his opponents, than is afforded by the fact, that at the revocation of the edict of Nantes he was peremptorily ordered to quit France in 24 hours, though the other Protestant ministers were allowed 15 days. His learning, eloquence of style, and strict morality of life made him a truly powerful advocate of truth, and his polemical writings show how well qualified he was to be its defender. Died, 1687.

CLAUDE LORRAINE, so called from the place of his birth, was an admirable landscape painter. His real name was CLAUDE GELEE, and he was the son of poor parents, who put him apprentice to a pastry-cook. The love of art, however, prevailed over the circumstances in which he was placed; and having received some instruction in drawing from his brother, who was a wood-engraver, he went to Rome, and was employed by the painter Tassi, from whom he received instructions in the fundamental principles of his art. But it was from the study of nature that he derived his best lessons, and in that study he was unwearied, passing entire days in the fields, noting every change in the aspect of nature at the various stages of the day, from sunrise to dusk. Died, 1682. The principal galleries in Europe are adorned with his masterly productions, and his name and style are consequently familiar to the veriest tyro in the art.

CLAUDIUS, CLAUDIUS, a Latin poet, whose place of nativity is supposed to be Alexandria, in Egypt. He flourished under the reign of Theodosius, Arcadius, and Honorius; was patronised by Stilicho; and a statue was erected to his honour in the forum of Trajan. His larger poems lose some of their value from the subjects of them being court panegyric; but in all his poems he displayed a brilliant fancy, and much of the polished elegance of Virgil.

CLAUDIUS, TIBERIUS DRUSUS, a Roman emperor, was born B. C. 9, at Lyons, and originally called Germanicus. After spending 50 years of his life in a private station, unhonoured and but little known, he was, on the murder of Caligula, his uncle, proclaimed emperor by the body-guard, and confirmed in the sovereignty by the senate. At first he performed some praiseworthy acts, but he soon became contemptible for his debauchery and voluptuousness; and he died of poison administered by his second wife, Agrippina, A. D. 54.

CLAUDIUS II., MARCUS AURELIUS FLAVIUS, surnamed GOthicus, a Roman emperor, born, A. D. 214, was raised to the throne on the death of Gallienus; and by his virtues, as well as by his splendid victories over the Goths, he proved himself worthy of his exalted station. Died, 270.

CLAUSEL, BERTRAND, a distinguished French soldier, was born at Mirepoix, 1773. He had already gained distinction in the army of the Pyrenees, at St. Domingo, in Italy, and Dalmatia, when he was sent to Spain in 1810, under Junot and Massena. He besieged Ciudad Rodrigo, was wounded at Salamanca, and having saved during a retreat, memorable in military annals, the army of Portugal, and led it into Spain, was appointed commander-in-chief in the north of Spain in 1813. He was one of the last to lay down arms in 1814; and among the first to declare himself in favour of Buonaparte during the hundred days, when he took the command of Bordeaux, and established the imperial government without striking a blow. Banished on the return of the Bourbons in 1815, he retired to the United States, where he remained some years. Immediately after the revolution of 1830 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Algeria; but in consequence of some misunderstanding with the home government, he returned to France in 1831, received the marshal's baton, and in 1835 returned to Algeria as governor-general of the colony; but the check he sustained at Constantine, in 1836, led to his resignation, and the rest of his days were passed in retirement. Died, 1842.

CLAVEL, JOHN, a highwayman in the time of Charles I. He was taken with some of his comrades and condemned to death, but was pardoned, probably on condition of giving information against his former associates. He is mentioned here on account of a poem which he wrote after his pardon, entitled "The Recantation of an Ill-spent Life, or a Discoverie of the Highway Law, with vehement Dissuasions to all Offenders in that kind; as also cauteous Admonitions, and full Instructions how to know, shun, and apprehend a Thief."

CLAVIERE, ETIENNE, a statesman and financier. He was a native of Geneva, and for some time conducted a bank in that city; but was forced to emigrate to France on account of the part he took in some political offences. In conjunction with Brissot, he published a treatise "De la France et des Etats Unis." Displaying great zeal in revolutionising France and her colonies, he obtained considerable influence, but on the fall of the Girondists he was arrested, and committed suicide in prison in 1793, aged 38.

CLAVIGERO, FRANCESCO SAVEIRO, a native of Vera Cruz, in Mexico. Having made himself acquainted with the traditions and antiquities of the Mexicans, he wrote a very valuable work, entitled "The History of Mexico." An English translation of this work was published in 1787.

CLAVIUS, CHRISTOPHER, a German Jesuit and mathematician. By order of pope Gregory XIII. he corrected the calendar; and he ably defended himself against the animadversions on his labour of the elder Scaliger and others. He also published some valuable mathematical works, among which was an edition of Euclid, with annotations. Died, 1612.

CLAYTON, ROBERT, bishop of Clogher; author of an "Introduction to the History of the Jews," "The Chronology of the Bible Vindicated," "A Vindication of the Histories of the Old and New Testament," written against Bolingbroke, &c. The heterodoxy of some portions of his writings gave so much offence, that measures were contemplated for depriving him of his preferment; a fact which had such an effect upon him, that he died of agitation on the very day proceedings against him were to commence. Born, 1695; died, 1758.

CLAYTON, THOMAS, a worthy representative of the old school of English gentry, was colonel of the royal Lancashire volunteers, and served with his regiment many years in Ireland, during the disturbances before the Union. Colonel Clayton blended genuine courtesy of manners with firmness and decision of character. He was eminently loyal; in times of danger, active and vigorous in repressing tumult; and up to the period of his death, he discharged his magisterial duties with energy and promptness. He died in his 80th year, in 1835.

CLEANTHES, a Stoic philosopher of the 3rd century B. C. He was a native of Assus, in Lydia; but, visiting Athens, he became a zealous disciple of Zeno; and to enable him to attend on that master in the day, he was accustomed to labour by night. His mental and bodily strength was immense, and despite of all the obstacles of poverty, he studied so successfully as to become Zeno's successor. Of his writings only some inconsiderable fragments remain; but his reputation was so great, that, after his death, the senate of Rome decreed him a statue in his native place.

CLEAVER, WILLIAM, bishop of St. Asaph, and principal of Brazenose College, Oxford; author of "Directions to the Clergy on the Choice of Books," "Observations on Marsh's Dissertations on the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke," "Sermons," and other theological works, and a "Treatise on Greek Metres." He was also editor of the celebrated "Oxford Homer," published under the patronage of Lord Grenville. Died, 1815.

CLEGHORN, GEORGE, a Scotch physician, surgeon, and anatomist; author of a "Treatise on the Diseases of Minorca," &c. He served for many years as an army surgeon, but ultimately settled as anatomical professor at Dublin. Died, 1789.

CLELAND, JAMES, LL.D., a distinguished statistical writer, who held the office of superintendant of public works at Glasgow, and by his numerous publications of a local nature, gained the esteem of all conversant with political economy. Born, 1770; died, 1840.

CLEMANGIS, NICHOLAS, a French divine; author of a "Treatise on the Corrupt State of the Church," "Letters," &c. His writings bear very bold testimony to the corruptions of the Romish Church; and he has consequently been much censured by Papists, and much praised by Protestants. Died, 1440.

CLEMENCET, D. C., a French Catholic divine; author of "L'Art de vérifier les Dates," "L'Histoire Littéraire de France," &c. The first named of his works has been truly said to be "a model of chronological knowledge and exactness;" and though he displayed too much of the odium theologium in his opposition to the Jesuits, he was a learned, benevolent, and most industrious writer. Died, 1778.

CLEMENS, ROMANUS, an early Christian, a fellow traveller of St. Paul, and, subsequently, bishop of Rome. His Epistle to the church of Corinth is to be found in the Patres Apostolici of Le Clerc. Clemens is said to have died at Rome, at the end of the 1st century.

CLEMENS, TITUS FLAVIUS, known as Clement of Alexandria, one of the fathers of the church. Of his early career so little is known that it is doubtful whether he was born at Alexandria or at Athens; but about the year 189 he succeeded Pantænus in the catechetical school of the former city, and taught there until 202, when the edict of Severus compelled him to seek a new abode. In 210 he was in Cappadocia, and he was afterwards in Antioch, but when or where he died is unknown. His chief works are "Prætreption, or an Exhortation to the Pagans," "Pædagogus, or the Instructor," "What Rich Man shall be saved," and "Stromata;" the last named of which is a very valuable miscellaneous work, containing facts and quotations to be met with in no other writer.

CLEMENT XIV., pope, whose real name was GANGANELLI, was a native of St. Archangelo, near Rimini. In 1759 he was raised to the cardinalate by pope Clement XIII., and on the death of that pontiff he was elected his successor. He was at first apparently disinclined to the suppression of the powerful but mischievous order of the Jesuits, but he at length became convinced of the necessity for their suppression, and he signed the brief for it in 1773. Shortly after he had signed this important document he was seized with a disorder, supposed to have been the effect of poison; and, after languishing in agonies, which reduced him to a mere skeleton, he died in 1775. Clement was one of the most enlightened and benevolent characters that ever wore the tiara. His manners were lowly and condescending, his appearance plain and simple; and when he was told that the papal dignity required a more sumptuous table, he answered that "neither St. Peter nor St. Francis had taught him to dine splendidly."

CLEMENT, FRANCIS, a French Benedictine monk; author of a completion of "L'Art de vérifier les Dates," a "Treatise on the Origin of the Samaritan Bible," &c. Died, 1793.

CLEMENT, JEAN MARIE BERNARD, a French critic and dramatic writer, who distinguished himself by his strictures on the works of Voltaire, La Harpe, and others. He is the author of the tragedy of "Medea." Born, 1742; died, 1812.

CLEMENTI, MUZIO, an eminent composer and pianist; the father of pianoforte music, and a genius whose fancy was as unbounded as his science; was born at Rome, in 1752. He early evinced a taste for music, and made such progress in the science, that in his 9th year he passed his examination as an organist, and in his 12th he wrote a highly approved mass for four voices. Under the fostering patronage of the highly-gifted Mr. Beckford he came to England, living with him at his seat in Dorsetshire, where he learnt the English language, studied, composed, and gradually arrived at the acme of his profession; enjoying throughout Europe the esteem of his brother musicians, receiving the well-merited admiration of amateurs, and honoured with public applause. In the year 1800 he was induced to engage, as the head of a highly respectable firm, in the music trade; in which he continued, but without any interruption of his duties as a composer, till his death, in 1832.

CLEOBULUS, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was a native of the Isle of Rhodes, in the 6th century B. C.

CLEOBULINA, daughter of the above, is spoken of as possessing great genius; but the enigmas which are attributed to her are by no means remarkable for excellence.

CLEOPATRA, queen of Egypt. She was the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who, at his death, left his crown to her and her younger brother, Ptolemy; but being minors, they were placed under the guardianship of Pothinus and Achilles, who deprived Cleopatra of her share of the government. Cæsar, however, who had met her at Alexandria, being struck with her youthful charms, proclaimed her queen of Egypt; and for some time Cleopatra exercised a very potent and injurious influence over the Roman warrior. After Cæsar's death she exerted her consummate art, and used her beauty and accomplishments to entangle the triumvir, Mark Antony; and becoming involved, notwithstanding her treachery and duplicity, in the ruin he brought upon himself in his contest with Octavius, she put an end to her existence, by applying an asp to her arm, the bite of which caused her immediate death, B. C. 30, aged 39.

CLEOSTRATUS, a native of Tenedos, and an eminent astronomer and mathematician. He first arranged the signs of the zodiac, Aries and Sagittarius, and corrected the error of the length of the Grecian year, by introducing the period termed Octoetaris. According to Dr. Priestley, he flourished in the 6th century B. C.

CLERFAYT, FRANCIS SEBASTIAN CHS. JOSEPH DE CROIX, Count de, an Austrian general, who served with great distinction in the seven years' war, particularly at the battles of Prague, Lissa, &c. From the conclusion of that war till 1788, when he took the field against the Turks, he lived in a state of happy retirement; but in the war which arose out of the French revolution, he commanded the Austrian army with great credit to himself, in 1793 and 1794, though overborne by numbers, and often defeated in consequence. In 1795 he was made field-marshal, and general-in-chief on the Rhine, and closed his military career by totally foiling the plans of the French. He then resigned his command to the Archduke Charles, became a member of the Austrian council of war, and died in 1798, at Vienna, where a splendid monument is erected to his memory.

CLERMONT TONNERE, ANTOINE JULES DE, cardinal, and chief of the French bishops, was bishop of Chalons in 1782, and was an active member from his diocese to the states-general. He is chiefly mentioned, however, as the author of a most interesting "Journal of what occurred at the Temple during the Captivity of Louis XVI." Born, 1749; died, 1839.

CLERMONT TONNERE, STANISLAUS, Count de, was one of the first among the nobility to side with the popular party in the opening scenes of the French revolution. Having at length given umbrage to his party, he was put to death in 1792.

CLEVELAND, JOHN, a political writer of the time of Charles I. He strenuously supported the cause of that monarch, and, for a time, prevented Cromwell from being returned member of parliament for Cambridge. When the civil war actually broke out he joined the royal army, and was made judge advocate to the troops which garrisoned Newark. When that town was surrendered to the parliamentarians, Cleveland made his escape, but was apprehended, in 1655, at Norwich. After a detention of some months he gained his liberty by a temperate, but very manly letter, which he addressed to Cromwell, and in which he justified his opposition to him, on the ground that it was the result, not of any factious or personal motive, but of sincere principle. Of his satires several editions have been printed, but they have shared the fate of most works written on temporary subjects, and are now known to but few. Died, 1659.

CLIFFORD, GEORGE, earl of Cumberland, an eminent naval commander and scholar of the time of queen Elizabeth. He was present at the trial of the unfortunate queen of Scotland, and in the same year sailed for the coast of South America, where he made himself very formidable to the Portuguese. He was captain of one of the ships engaged against the memorable "Armada" of Spain, and subsequently commanded several expeditions to the Spanish main and the Western Islands; in one of which expeditions he had the good fortune to capture a galleon, valued at 150,000*l*. He was a great favourite with queen Elizabeth, who conferred on him the insignia of the order of the Garter. It seems, however, that fame and court favour were the chief rewards of his great talents and industry, as he is said to have died poor. Born, 1558; died, 1605.

CLIFFORD, ANNE, daughter of the preceding. She was married first to Richard, lord Buckhurst, afterwards earl of Dorset, and second son to Philip, earl of Pembroke. She possessed considerable literary ability, and wrote memoirs of her first husband and of some of her ancestors. But she was chiefly distinguished by her generosity and high spirit. She built two hospitals, repaired several churches, and erected monuments to the memory of Spenser and Daniels, the latter of whom had been her tutor. She displayed her spirit when Williamson, secretary of state to Charles II., wished to put a member into parliament for her borough of Appleby. "I have been bullied by a usurper," was her reply, "and I have been neglected by a court; but I will not be dictated to by a subject. Your man shall not stand."

CLINE, HENRY, F. R. S., an eminent surgeon and lecturer on anatomy. He had a very extensive practice as a surgeon; and as a lecturer he was held in the highest estimation both by his pupils and by his professional brethren. Died, 1827.

CLINTON, GEORGE, an American general and statesman. He first served under General Amherst against the French, and, after the conquest of Canada, devoted himself to the study of the law. In 1775 he was a member of the congress; and, being made brigadier-general, he succeeded, though he had a very inferior force, in preventing Sir Henry Clinton from aiding General Burgoyne. Born, 1739; died, 1812.

CLINTON, Sir HENRY, an English general. He succeeded Sir William Howe as commander-in-chief in America; and his ill success in 1781 and 1782 was so severely animadverted upon, that he thought it necessary to exculpate himself through the medium of the press. After his return from America, he was for some time governor of Limerick, and had just been appointed governor of Gibraltar when he died, 1795.

CLITUS, a distinguished Macedonian general, who saved the life of Alexander the Great at the battle of the Granicus, but who, having expostulated with his imperial master when the latter was in a fit of intoxication, was slain by him.

CLIVE, ROBERT, Lord CLIVE and Baron PLASSEY, was born in 1725, and in his 19th year went to India as a writer, but soon quitted that employment for the army. Being entrusted with the attack of Devicottah, a fort of the rajah of Tanjore, he performed this important duty so well, that he was shortly afterwards made commissary. The French having artfully obtained considerable territory in the Carnatic, Clive advised that an attack should be made on the city of Arcot, which being entrusted to him, a complete victory was obtained. This unexpected victory drew off the French from Trichinopoly, which they were then besieging, to retake Arcot, which Clive defended in such a manner that they were compelled to raise the siege. This was followed by a series of victories; and in 1753 he embarked for England, where he received a valuable present from the East India Company, and was raised to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the king's service. After a short stay in England for the benefit of his health, he returned to India, and was shortly called upon to march to Calcutta, of which the nabob Surajah Dow-lah had taken possession. He was again successful, and perceiving that there could be no permanent peace obtained until the nabob was dethroned, he made the necessary arrangements, and in the famous battle of Plassey, put the nabob completely to the rout, and established the power of the English more firmly than it had ever before been. As governor of Calcutta, Lord Clive performed great services, both civil and military; and when he returned to England he was raised to the first peerage by the titles which stand at the head of this article. He once more visited India, but was called upon only for civil measures, which he took with his usual sagacity. In 1767 he returned to England, having done more to extend the English territory and consolidate the English power in India, than any other commander. But the large wealth he had acquired during his long and arduous services exposed him to an accusation in the House of Commons of having abused his power. The charge fell to the ground, but it had the effect of injuring his mind so deeply that he committed suicide in 1774.

CLIVE, CATHARINE, a celebrated actress, was the daughter of an Irish gentleman named Rufar. At an early age she gave her hand to Mr. Clive, a barrister; but a separation taking place between them, she took the stage for her profession, and became a very great favourite. In private life her wit caused her to be sought by persons of the highest rank. Died, 1785.

CLOOSE, NICHOLAS, a bishop of Lichfield in the 14th century. He was possessed of considerable architectural knowledge, and is considered as one of the improvers of the pointed style of the middle ages.

CLOOTS, JOHN BAPTIST DE, a Prussian baron, better known as ANACHARSIS CLOOTS, one of the wildest and most violent actors in the early scenes of the French revolution. He was born at Cleves, and very early dissipated the greater portion of his fortune. In 1790, being at Paris, he presented himself at the bar of the National Assembly, attended by a number of men dressed to represent various foreign nations; and, describing himself as the "orator of the human race," he demanded the right of confederation. After making himself conspicuous by a variety of foolish projects set forth in no less foolish speeches, he was in 1792 sent to the National Convention as deputy from the department of the Oise. As might be expected from his previous conduct, he was among those who voted for the death of the unfortunate Louis XVI. His course, however, was now well nigh run, for, becoming an object of suspicion to Robespierre, he was arrested, and guillotined in 1794.

CLOSTERMAN, JOHN, a German portrait painter. He was employed in Spain, Italy, and England; and in this country there are many of his works; among them the great picture of queen Anne, in Guildhall, London. It is said that when painting the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough and their children, the disputes between her grace and the painter were so frequent and so obstinate, that the duke protested he had as much trouble in mediating between them as in winning a battle. Died, 1713.

CLOUET, M., a French chemist and mechanic. He published some valuable disquisitions in the Journal de Chimie, and some others on metallurgical subjects in the Journal des Mines. He was on his voyage to Cayenne, to make some experiments on vegetation, when he died in 1801. Clouet perfected the manufacture of cast steel in France, and added considerably to their skill in cutlery.

CLOVIS, the first Christian king of France. From a comparatively petty tract he extended his rule far and wide, partly by force of arms and partly by his marriage with Clotilda, daughter of Childeric, the deceased king of the Burgundians. This princess was a Christian, and was very desirous that her husband should be converted to her faith; an event which took place, though not precisely from her exertions in converting him. Being in some peril of losing a battle with a tribe of Germans, Clovis invoked the God of the Christians. The tide of battle changed; Clovis was victorious, and shortly afterwards he and 3000 of his subjects were baptized by St. Remi, bishop of Rheims. Having conquered the petty independent states of Gaul, he added them to his dominions, and established the capital of his kingdom at Paris, where he died in 511.

CLOWES, JOHN, an English divine, rector of the church of St. John at Manchester. Embracing the doctrines of Swedenborg, he published translations of a large portion of his theological writings, and many works in agreement with them. Born, 1743; died, 1831.

CLOWES, WILLIAM, an eminent English surgeon in the 16th and 17th centuries; author of a treatise on syphilis, and of another on the cure of wounds.

CLUBBE, JOHN, an English divine; author of a satirical tract, entitled "The History and Antiquities of Wheatfield," intended as a satire on conjectural etymologists; "A Letter of Advice to a Young Clergyman," &c. Died, 1773.

CLUBBE, WILLIAM, son of the above, vicar of Brandeston, in Suffolk; translator of Horace's Art of Poetry, and of six of the satires of that poet, and author of three lyric odes, &c. Died, 1814.

CLUTTERBUCK, ROBERT, an English antiquary and topographer. He was a native of Hertfordshire, and having an independent fortune, he devoted his time to scientific and literary pursuits. Having collected materials for a new edition of Chauncey's History of Hertfordshire, he changed his plan, and produced a new work instead of re-editing the old one. His work consists of three folio volumes, and is embellished in a style seldom surpassed. Died, 1831.

CLUVIER, PHILIP, a Dutch soldier and scholar; author of "Germania Antiqua," "Sicilia Antiqua," "Italia Antiqua," &c. He is said to have understood and spoken with fluency no fewer than nine languages. Died, 1623.

COBB, JAMES, secretary to the East

India Company; author of "The Siege of Belgrade," "The Haunted Tower," and other dramatic pieces. Died, 1818.

COBB, SAMUEL, an English poet. He was educated at Christ's Hospital, of which admirable school he became head classical master. He wrote "Remarks on Virgil," a volume of "Poems," modernised Chaucer's "Miller's Tale," &c. Died, 1713.

COBBETT, WILLIAM, one of the most remarkable men that ever attracted public attention by the force of mental superiority, aided by persevering industry, was born in the parish of Farnham, Surrey, in 1762, and brought up from his earliest years on his father's farm, in the useful and laborious occupation of husbandry; so that, in after life, he was enabled, with honest exultation, to declare, "I do not remember the time when I did not earn my own living." In this humble and happy state he continued till 1783; but having, during the previous year, when on a visit to his uncle who lived in the neighbourhood of Portsmouth, "seen the grand fleet lying at Spithead," his heart became inflated with national pride, and he suddenly resolved to share the perils and earn the boasted glories of an English seaman's life. He accordingly applied, first to Captain Berkeley, of the Pegasus, man-of-war, and afterwards to the port admiral, Evans, to get himself enrolled; but he was refused, and thus "happily escaped," as he himself writes, "from the most toilsome and perilous profession in the world."—"I returned," says he, "to the plough, but I was spoiled for a farmer. I had, before my Portsmouth adventure, never known any other ambition than that of surpassing my brothers in the different labours of the field; but it was quite otherwise now; I sighed for a sight of the world," &c. Graphic and interesting as Cobbett's account of his early adventures is, our limits warn us to indulge but sparingly in the descriptive throughout his "strange eventful history." An accident—the mere sight of the stage-coach on its journey to London while he was going to Guildford fair—led him suddenly to quit his home and rustic pursuits, in order to seek his fortune in a wider sphere. His first employment, unfitted as he was for it by nature and habit, was that of an "under-strapping quill-driver" in Gray's Inn, the miseries of which he eloquently and wittily depicts, and thus apostrophises: "Gracious heaven! if I am doomed to be wretched, bury me beneath Iceland snows, and let me feed on blubber; stretch me under the burning line, and deny me thy propitious dews; nay, if it be thy will, suffocate me with the infected and pestilential air of a democratic club-room; but save me from the desk of an attorney!" After nine months' toilsome drudgery in Gray's Inn, his desire for a different mode of life induced him to enlist as a soldier, and he was sent to the depot at Chatham, where he remained about a year, attending closely to his duty, but applying every leisure moment to the improvement of his mind, and particularly to a knowledge of grammar, with which he was before totally unacquainted. The regiment at length sailed for Nova Scotia, and was then ordered to St.

John's, New Brunswick, where he soon attracted the notice of his superiors by his industry, regularity, and habitual temperance; and was rewarded by being appointed serjeant-major of the regiment. To early rising, and the grand secret of husbanding his time, Cobbett attributes not only his rapid promotion in the army, but much of his future fame. After seven years' service, the regiment returned to England; and Serjeant-major Cobbett solicited and received his discharge. Having by his unparalleled assiduity while he was in the army gained an insight into many branches of knowledge, and being determined on gaining more, he went to France, in order, chiefly, to perfect himself in the language; but seeing that a war with England was inevitable, he embarked for America, where, under the sobriquet of Peter Porcupine, he quickly began to exercise his talents by the publication of his "Observations" and other political pamphlets, all calculated to uphold the dignity of his native country, and oppose the prevalence of French principles. But he found it necessary to quit America; and, on his return to this country, he commenced a daily paper called the Porcupine, in which at first he strenuously supported the government. But whether it was that he became disgusted with the compromising character of the Addington administration, or felt indignant at the cold hauteur of Mr. Pitt, who refused to meet him; or whether some new light had dawned on him, which made him the advocate of the "rights of the people," certain it is that his publication, now styled "The Weekly Register," contained various articles which were severely denominated libels, and he was arrested, fined, and imprisoned. From this period a gradual change may be discovered in the tone of Cobbett's political disquisitions, and ere long he was looked upon as the mighty leader of the radical reformers. In 1809 he again attracted the notice of Sir Vicary Gibbs, at that time his majesty's attorney-general. The libel related to the flogging of some men in the local militia, at Ely, in Cambridgeshire; he was found guilty, sentenced to two years' imprisonment in Newgate, to pay a fine of 1000*l.* to the king, and at the expiration of the two years to give security for his good behaviour for seven years, himself in 300*l.*, and two securities in 100*l.* each. This severe sentence Cobbett never forgot or forgave; and, in truth, it would require no ordinary share of Christian forbearance to do either. No sooner was he liberated than he showed his enemies that his active mind had received a fresh stimulus; he reduced his "Register" to 2*d.*, whereby its sale was immensely increased, and he sought for every possible means of annoying those who had persecuted him. At length the arbitrary "Six Acts" were passed; and as he firmly believed they were passed for the express purpose of silencing him (particularly the Power of Imprisonment Act), he instantly took his departure for America, and settled in Long Island; from which spot his future "Registers" were dated, till his return to England, in 1819, after that act was repealed. Strange and paradoxical as it may appear, and not less so than discreditable, Cobbett announced, on his arrival at Liverpool, that he had brought with him the bones of the celebrated republican, Tom Paine—the man whom above all others he had formerly decried as a regicide and an infidel! yet to the remains of that man he pretended to pay homage, and called upon his countrymen to honour them by a magnificent public funeral, and the erection of a splendid monument! In 1820 Mr. Cobbett was induced to become a candidate for the representation of Coventry, but met with a signal defeat; and in 1826 he made a similar unsuccessful attempt at Preston, against Messrs. Stanley and Wood. In 1829 and the two following years, the events in Europe gave a more impassioned tone to his writings than they had for some time exhibited. He had the revolutions abroad—the reform bill at home—and the fearful spirit of incendiarism through the agricultural districts, to write about all at once. Nor did the greatness of the several themes exhaust his powers; his spirit hurried on; and each subject, as the other was dismissed, came like a fresh supply of oil to brighten and perpetuate the flame. He wrote about the regeneration of France, and here was a stimulus to indignation; he passed to talk of borough-mongers and corruption, and here the stimulus increased; but when he leaped from the rotten boroughs into the green fields—peered over burning barns and corn-ricks, and sought the cause of the incendiarism in the distress and despair of the class of men from whom he, William Cobbett, had sprung, the stimulus waxed stronger than mere indignation; and, in giving it expression, he nearly swelled it into sedition against a government, which he had always regarded with an avenging hate. In consequence of an article of this description which had appeared in the "Weekly Political Register" on the 11th of December, 1830, he was, on the 7th of July following, tried before Lord Tenterden and a special jury for the publication of "a libel, with intent to raise discontent in the minds of the labourers in husbandry, and to incite them to acts of violence, and to destroy corn stacks, machinery, and other property." Sir Thomas Denman, then attorney-general, was the leading counsel for the crown; while Mr. Cobbett conducted his defence in person; and a more lucid, vigorous, or powerful answer to charges brought by a public prosecution has rarely, if ever, been delivered. The jury deliberated from six o'clock at night till nine the next morning, and then, stating to the judge that there were six of them of one opinion, and six of another, solicited the court to grant their discharge, and they were discharged accordingly. Thus ended this memorable trial. From that hour till the day of his death he never ceased to hold up those to scorn and ridicule who had made this last desperate, but impotent, effort to crush and overwhelm him. From the time of his trial, in 1831, up to the passing of the reform bill, in 1832, Cobbett's time was almost equally divided between the three several occupations of writing, travelling, and lecturing; and as his fame was evidently again on the increase, he looked forward to a seat in parliament at the approaching elections. When the proper period arrived (Dec. 1832) he was put in nomination both for Manchester and Oldham; and though defeated at the former place, he gained his election at the latter by an immense majority. In 1833 William Cobbett was a British senator—the long-sought object of his ambition; and, though far advanced in years, and engaged as ardently as ever in his accustomed active pursuits, he devoted himself to his new duties with all the energy by which his whole life had been characterised. But it was an element unsuited to his habits; late hours and confinement in a heated atmosphere were never intended for him who “usually went to bed at nine o'clock and rose at four.” During a debate on the malt tax, on the 25th of May, he was suddenly attacked with a disease of the throat, from which he never recovered, and on the 17th of June, 1835, he expired. As an author, independent of his long-continued political pamphlets and periodical works before referred to, he was exceedingly industrious; and in those which relate to rural life he was decidedly the most useful writer of the age, as his “Cottage Economy,” “Advice to Young Men,” “Rural Rides,” &c. abundantly prove. He also wrote Grammars of the English and French languages, both of which had a most extensive circulation; also, “A Year's Residence in America,” 20 volumes of “Parliamentary Debates,” &c.; but his last work, “The History of the Reformation,” is so distorted by party views, and so evidently written to serve the cause of popery, that it is difficult to say whether the impartial reader is more likely to be disgusted with its want of candour as a book of history, or amused with the time-serving tirades on the popular topics of the day with which it is so copiously interlarded. Altogether it is a failure, and does the fame of Cobbett more discredit than all the coarse invectives and political tergiversations that are to be met with in his voluminous writings.

[Having so much exceeded our usual limits in the preceding sketch of the life of William Cobbett, we plead, as our excuse, the valuable example it affords (to youth especially) of what may be effected by early rising, habitual temperance, and unrelaxing industry. We have no fear that we shall be charged with eulogising his public conduct, or of exhibiting his political life as worthy of imitation. On all occasions he appears to have followed the dictates of a proud, indomitable will; while he indulged in the most offensive personalities against those who differed from him, and supported his dogmas with a coarseness of language, and a disregard for the feelings of others, alike disgraceful and disgusting. What his character might have been under other circumstances, or how the powerful energies of his mind might have been directed, had not the all-engulfing vortex of party borne him away, it is useless to speculate on: we are bound to regard him as one whose “birth, station, employment, ignorance, temper, character in early life, were all against him; but who emerged from, and overcame them all.”]

COBENTZEL, CHARLES, Count de, an eminent statesman. He was a native of Laybach, and at an early age commenced his public career. During the troubles in the reign of the empress Maria Theresa, his services gave so much satisfaction, that in 1753 he was placed at the head of affairs in the Austrian Netherlands. In this important situation he showed great respect for literature and the arts, and several useful reformations were carried into effect by him. Among his other services was that of founding the Academy of Sciences at Brussels. Died, 1770.

COBENTZEL, LOUIS, Count de, son of the above, and, like him, a diplomatist. At the early age of 27, he was entrusted with a mission to Catharine II. of Russia, and his gallantry and compliance with her taste for theatricals made him a great favourite with her. From 1795 he was concerned in many of the important negotiations between Austria and other powers, until the treaty of Luneville, in 1801. That treaty restoring peace between Austria and France, he was shortly afterwards made minister of state for foreign affairs at Vienna. In 1805 he was dismissed from this office, and he died in 1809.

COBENTZEL, JOHN PHILIP, Count de, a cousin of the last named, and also a diplomatist. Being sent to Brabant to treat with the Netherlanders, who resisted some edicts of the emperor which they considered oppressive, they refused to receive him, and the edicts were in consequence revoked. This failure prevented him from being employed again during the following ten years; but at length, in 1801, he was sent ambassador to Paris. Died, 1810.

COBURG, FREDERIC JOSIAS, duke of Saxe-Coburg, an Austrian field-marshal, was born in 1737. In 1789 he commanded the imperial army on the Danube, and, in connection with the Russian general, Suwaroff, defeated the Turks, and conquered Bucharest. In 1793 he defeated the French at Neerwinden, expelled them from the Netherlands, and invaded France, taking Valenciennes, Cambray, and other places; but when the English army, under the Duke of York, separated from him, he sustained several defeats, retreated across the Rhine, and resigned his command. Died, 1815.

COCCEIUS, JOHN, a Dutch scholar of the 17th century, professor of theology at Leyden. He taught that the Old Testament was merely a type of the New; and the book of Revelation being a principal object of his attention, he warmly asserted the doctrine of the Millenium. His followers formed a rather numerous sect, called Cocceians. Besides ten folio volumes of writings on divinity, which he published during his life, he left a work, not printed till many years after his death, entitled “Opera, Anecdótica Theologica et Philologica.” Born, 1603; died, 1669.

COCCEIUS, HENRY, an eminent Dutch civilian; author of “Prodomus Justitiæ Gentium,” “Theses,” &c. He was raised to the dignity of a baron of the empire in 1713, and died in 1719.

COCCEIUS, SAMUEL, son of the last named, and successor to his title. He became grand chancellor of Prussia under Frederick the Great, and was a chief author of the Frederickian code. He also published a valuable edition of Grotius, "De Jure Belli et Pacis." Died, 1755.

COCHIN, CHARLES NICHOLAS, an eminent French engraver and writer, of the 18th century; author of "Travels in Italy," "Letters on the Pictures of Herculaneum," "Dissertation on the Effect of Light and Shade," &c. His plates are numerous and well executed.

COCHLÆUS, JOHN, an able but bitter opponent of Luther, Calvin, and other reformers, but more especially of the first named, whom he censured with great asperity in his work, "De Actis et Scriptis Lutheri." He published, besides this work, a very curious "History of the Hussites," and he maintained a fierce controversy with Dr. Morrison, an English clergyman, on the subject of the marriage of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn. Died, 1552.

COCHRAN, WILLIAM, a Scotch artist of considerable talent and reputation. After studying at Rome, he settled at Glasgow, where his abilities were so well appreciated, that he realised a respectable fortune. Of his historical pieces, "Endymion" and "Dædalus" are held in high estimation. Born, 1738; died, 1785.

COCHRANE, ARCHIBALD, earl of Dundonald, born, 1749. He became a cornet of dragoons, but exchanged from the army to the navy, and had risen to the rank of lieutenant when he succeeded to the earldom. He now devoted himself entirely to scientific pursuits, with the intent of making improvements in the commerce and manufactures of the kingdom. Among the numerous works published by him in the prosecution of this patriotic intention, were "The Principles of Chemistry applied to the Improvement of Agriculture," "An Account of the Qualities and Uses of Coal Tar and Coal Varnish," &c. He made many useful discoveries, for some of which he obtained patents; but unfortunately, though he did good service to his country, he was so far from enriching himself, that he was at one time actually obliged to receive aid from the Literary Fund. Died, 1831.

COCHRANE, JOHN DUNDAS, nephew of the above, an English naval officer. On retiring from the naval service, he travelled on foot through France, Spain, and Portugal; and then through the Russian empire to Kamschatka. Of this latter journey he published an account in two volumes, which contain much curious information. He was about to travel on foot across South America, when he died at Valentia, in Colombia, in 1825.

COCKBURN, CATHARINE, an English authoress. Though almost self-educated, she began to publish at the early age of 17, her first production being a tragedy, entitled "Agnes de Castro." In two years more she produced another tragedy, entitled "Fatal Friendship," which was received with much approbation at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Besides these, and a tragedy, entiled "The Revolution of Sweden," she published some poems, a "History of the Works of the Learned," "Vindications of the Philosophy of Locke," and several metaphysical treatises. Born, 1679; died, 1749.

COCKER, EDWARD, an English penman and arithmetician; whose fame as a computist was formerly held in such repute, that "according to Cocker" is still used as an arithmetical proverb. Died, 1677.

COCLES, PUBLIUS HORATIUS, a valiant Roman. He was a descendant of the Horatii, and proved himself worthy of his line. When Porsenna, king of the Etruscans, had pursued the Romans to the wooden bridge over the Tiber, Cocles and two companions boldly withstood the enemy until the Romans had crossed the bridge. His two companions then retired, but Cocles remained until the bridge was broken down behind him, and then plunged into the river, and swam to the city.

CODRINGTON, CHRISTOPHER, a native of Barbadoes, was educated at All Souls College, Oxford; to which he bequeathed the sum of 10,000*l.* for the erection of a library, leaving his West Indian estates to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. As an author, this munificent gentleman is only known by some verses addressed to Garth, on the publication of his "Dispensary," and by some Latin poems in the "Musæ Anglicanæ." Born, 1668; died, 1710.

CODRUS, the 17th and last king of Athens. Disguised as a common person, he rushed into the midst of the army of the Heraclidae, and was slain; a sacrifice he was led to make by the oracle having pronounced that the leader of the conquering party must fall. At his death, the Athenians deeming no one worthy to be the successor of their patriotic monarch, established a republic.

COELLO, ALONZO SANCHEZ, an eminent painter, a native of Portugal, whose works obtained for him the appellation of the Portuguese Titian. Born, 1515; died, 1710.

COEN, JOHN PETERSON, governor of the Dutch settlements in the East Indies, and founder of the city of Batavia. He went to India as a merchant, and in 1617 succeeded to the governorship of Bantam, when in 1619 he removed to the new factory he had founded. After passing a short time in Europe, he, in 1627, returned to Batavia, and bravely defended that place against the emperor of Java. So many men perished in this memorable contest, that their bodies produced a pestilence, of which Coen died, in 1629.

COEUR, JAMES, a French merchant of the 15th century. His trade surpassed that of any other individual in Europe; and he is said to have had 300 agents in the Mediterranean. He lent Charles VII. an immense sum, to enable him to conquer Normandy, which was never repaid; for being falsely accused of peculation, and of poisoning the king's mistress, he was so disgusted, that, on getting his release, he went into voluntary exile. Died, 1456.

COFFEY, CHARLES, a poet and dramatist; author of "The Devil to Pay," &c., and editor of an edition of the works of Drayton. He was deformed in person, and performed the part of Æsop for his own benefit. Died, 1745.

COGAN, THOMAS, an English physician, born in Somersetshire, and educated at Oriel College, Oxford. In 1574 he was chosen master of the school at Manchester, where he also practised in his proper profession. He wrote the "Haven of Health," "A Preservative from the Pestilence," and an "Epitome of Cicero's Epistles." Died, 1607.

COGAN, THOMAS, a physician, born at Kibworth, Leicestershire, in 1736; who, in conjunction with Dr. Hawes, founded the Humane Society. He translated the works of Camper, and was the author of "A Philosophical Treatise on the Passions," "Theological Disquisitions," &c. Died in 1818.

COGGESHALLE, RALPH, an English Cistercian monk of the 13th century. He was at Jerusalem when that city was besieged by Saladin; and wrote a "Chronicle of the Holy Land," which was printed in a collection published at Paris in 1725.

COHAUSEN, JOHN HENRY, a German physician. He wrote a curious work, instructing his readers how to live to 115 years of age; it was translated into English by Dr. Campbell, under the title of "Hermippus Redivivus, or the Sage's Triumph over Old Age and the Grave." Died in his 85th year, in 1750.

COHORN, MENNO, Baron, a celebrated Dutch engineer, who, after distinguishing himself as a military officer on many important sieges and battles, fortified Namur, Bergen-op-Zoom, and other towns. He was the author of a "Treatise on Fortification." Died, 1704.

COKAYNE, Sir ASTON, a poet and dramatist of the 17th century. He was educated at Cambridge; and, after having made the grand tour, fixed his residence at a family estate in Warwickshire. ESpousing the cause of Charles I., he was despoiled of his property by the triumphant parliamentarians, to whom he was doubly obnoxious as a royalist and a papist. A collection of his plays and poems was printed in 1638, but it is now not often to be met with. Died, 1634.

COKE, Sir EDWARD, a celebrated English judge and law writer, born at Mileham, Norfolk, in 1549. He pleaded his first cause in 1578; and having married a sister of the minister Burchleigh, he possessed considerable political influence. In 1592 he had obtained a high reputation, and was appointed solicitor-general; and in 1600, being then attorney-general, he prosecuted the Earl of Essex; and the asperity with which he conducted himself to that nobleman amounted to very little less than brutality. In 1603 he was knighted; and we find him prosecuting Sir Walter Raleigh, and behaving to him as unfeelingly as he had formerly behaved to Essex. In 1606 he was made chief justice of the common pleas; and in 1613 he was sworn of the privy council, and removed to the court of king's bench. His activity in the case of Sir Thomas Overbury's murder made him many enemies; and his opposition to the king and chancellor Egerton caused him to be removed from office in 1616. Having vainly endeavoured to get into favour with the court, he in 1621 joined the popular party, and was committed, though only for a short time, to the Tower. In 1628 he represented the county of Buckingham in parliament, and distinguished himself by his zeal against the Duke of Buckingham. In mere legal knowledge he has never perhaps been equalled; but for the nobler qualities of his mind we may seek in vain. His "Commentary on Littleton" and his "Reports" are invaluable. Died, 1634.

COLBERT, JOHN BAPTIST, marquis of Seguelai, a celebrated French statesman, to whose talents, activity, and enlarged views, France owes much of its financial and commercial prosperity, was descended from a Scottish family, but born at Rheims, in 1619, where his father was a wine merchant. In 1648 he became clerk to the secretary of state, Le Tellier, whose daughter he married; and his conduct in this situation recommended him to the king as intendant of finances. Subsequently he became superintendent of buildings, secretary of state, and minister of the marine; and in every capacity he acted so as to merit the love of his countrymen, and obtain the approbation of his king. To literature and the arts he constantly gave encouragement; he instituted the Academy of Sciences, and that of sculpture and painting; and it was at his recommendation that the Royal Observatory was erected. To him, too, Paris owed the erection of many elegant buildings; and, if a less brilliant minister than some of his predecessors, he certainly conferred more substantial benefits upon his country than most of them. Died, 1683.

COLBERT, JOHN BAPTIST, marquis of Torcy, son of the preceding. He filled, successively, the offices of secretary of state for the foreign department and director-general of the posts; and wrote "Memoirs of the Negotiations from the Treaty of Ryswick to the Peace of Utrecht." Born, 1665; died, 1746.

COLCHESTER, CHARLES ABBOT Lord, was born at Abingdon, Berks, in 1757; and having received the rudiments of his education at Westminster School, was entered of Christchurch, Oxford, in 1775. While there he was greatly distinguished for his attainments; and a Latin poem on the czar Peter gained him not only the prize, but also a valuable gold medal from the empress of Russia. After spending some time abroad, he was called to the bar, and practised with every prospect of becoming a popular advocate. His forensic pursuits, however, were but of short continuance, for on entering parliament for Helston he was speedily noticed for his talent and business-like habits, and on the formation of the Addington ministry he was appointed secretary for Ireland, and keeper of the privy seal. He now commenced some useful reforms in Ireland, but before he could complete them he was elected speaker of the House of Commons. In this situation he displayed not only the talent but the tact and address necessary for the duties of his office; and so far was he from being bigoted to his party, that on the division concerning Lord Melville, the numbers for and against that nobleman being equal, he gave the casting vote against him. In 1817 an attack of erysipelas obliged him to resign the office of speaker; on which occasion he was called to the upper house by the title of Baron Colchester, with a pension of 4000*l.* per annum. Much of the remainder of his life was passed abroad and in Scotland; and he died in May, 1829, leaving two sons. He was chiefly remarkable for his knowledge of the forms of the House, though he was also a fluent and elegant speaker.

COLDEN, CADWALLADER, a Scotch physician and writer. He emigrated to America, and having become a very large and prosperous landowner in New York, he was in 1761 made lieutenant-governor of that province. In this office he displayed great talent; but he is chiefly spoken of here on account of his "History of the Five Nations," which is a valuable work. Linnæus, to whom he sent many American plants, gave the name of Coldenia to a new genus. Died, 1776.

COLE, HENRY, dean of St. Paul's, and judge of the arches' court. In the reign of Henry VIII. he held numerous valuable appointments, all of which he resigned on the accession of Edward VI. The reign of Mary restored his prosperity; and it was he who preached the sermon when the venerable Cranmer was sacrificed. On the accession of Elizabeth, this fact was doubtless remembered to his prejudice; for he was not only stripped of all his preferments, but kept in prison till his death, in 1519. He was the author of some controversial tracts and sermons; and a disputation between him and Cranmer and Ridley is also in print.

COLE, THOMAS, a dissenting minister; author of "A Discourse on Regeneration, Faith, and Repentance," &c. Died, 1607.

COLE, WILLIAM, an English herbalist. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, and became secretary to Dr. Duppa, bishop of Winchester. His works are, "The Art of Simpling," and "Adam in Eden, or Nature's Paradise." Died, 1662.

COLEBROOKE, HENRY THOMAS, F.R.S., an eminent Orientalist, and director of the Royal Asiatic Society, was the third son of Sir George Colebrooke, bart., a director of the East India Company. He was born in 1765, and in 1782 was appointed to a writership in India. Being sent as one of a deputation to investigate the resources of a part of the country, it led to his publishing "Remarks on the Husbandry and Commerce of Bengal;" in which treatise he advocated a free trade between Great Britain and her eastern possessions. Soon after this he began the study of the Sanscrit language, in which he subsequently became so eminent. The translation of the great "Digest of Hindû Law," which had been compiled under the direction of Sir W. Jones, but left unfinished at his death, was confided to Mr. Colebrooke; and while engaged in this work, he was appointed to a judicial situation at Mirzapore, where he completed it in 1796. His other works consist of a "Dictionary of the Sanscrit Language," the "Algebra of the Hindoos," and various treatises on their laws, philosophy, and arithmetic; besides numerous communications to the society of which he was director. He died in March, 1837.

COLERIDGE, SAMUEL TAYLOR, eminent as a poet, essayist, and moral philosopher, was born at Bristol in 1770, where he received the rudiments of his education. He was afterwards sent to Christ's Hospital, London, at which establishment he made great progress in the classics; and he completed his studies at Jesus College, Cambridge, where, in 1792, he obtained the gold medal for the best Greek ode. It appears that he was first inspired with a taste for poetry by the perusal of Lisle Bowles's Sonnets; and his intimacy with such men as Southey and Wordsworth (which commenced early in life) was likely to produce a congeniality of feelings and lead to similar results. But, great as Coleridge was as a poet, he was equally great as a writer on morals, philosophy, and politics; and as a public lecturer he was almost without a rival; while such were his powers as an argumentative debater, that he riveted the attention of his audience by the charm of his eloquence, and astounded them by the depth of his reasoning. The chief of Mr. Coleridge's works are, "Sibylline Leaves," a collection of poems; "Biographia Literaria," or biographical sketches of his life and opinions; "Aids to Reflection, in the Formation of a manly Character," &c.; and "The Friend," a series of essays, 3 vols.; besides a variety of minor poems, many of which are replete with beautiful imagery and sublime feeling; and numerous treatises and essays connected with public events in the moral and political world, some of which were published in a separate form, but the major part appeared in the public journals. Died, at Highgate, 1834. His "Specimens of Table Talk," and some of his other productions, were published after his death by his nephew Henry Nelson Coleridge, who distinguished himself by various valuable contributions to Knight's Quarterly Magazine and other works, and who died a victim to rheumatism, 1843.

COLERIDGE, HARTLEY, one of the most original and pleasing writers of the day, son of the above was born in 1797. He was the author of many minor poems of great merit, of "Biographies of Northern Worthies," and an extensive contributor to Blackwood's Magazine. Died, Jan. 6. 1849.

COLET, Dr. JOHN, dean of St. Paul's, and founder of St. Paul's School, was born in London, in 1496. He was an excellent scholar, and took great pains to encourage learning in others, of which his endowment of the noble institution above mentioned leaves ample testimony. Died, 1519.

COLIGNI, GABRIEL DE, admiral of France. On the death of Henry II., he became chief of the Calvinist party, and the most efficient of its leaders against the Guises. When peace was temporarily established in 1571, he appeared at court, and was received with every appearance of cordiality. But at the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew, in 1572, he was among the victims of party rage; and the infamous Catharine de Medici ordered his head to be sent to the pope.

COLIGNI, ODET, brother of the above, archbishop of Toulouse. He was deposed for having embraced the Protestant faith, and retired to England, where he was poisoned by a servant, in 1571.

COLIGNI, HENRIETTA, countess de la Suse; an ingenious French poetess, whose odes and songs are printed with the poems of Pelisson. Died, 1673.

COLLADO, DIEGO, a Spanish Dominican, superintendant of the convents of the Philippines; author of a Japanese dictionary, and a treatise on the Japanese grammar. While he was on his voyage to Europe, the vessel was wrecked, and he perished in 1638.

COLLANGE, GABRIEL DE, a French writer; author of "Polygraphy, or Universal Cabalistical Writing." This book, which he published under the name of J. M. Trithemius, subjected the author to the charge of magic. At the massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572, he was mistaken for a Protestant, and murdered—as one of his biographers naïvely says—"by mistake."

COLLATINUS, L. TARQUINUS, a nephew of Tarquin Superbus, and husband of Lucretia. He aided Brutus in expelling the Tarquins, but soon after went into voluntary exile.

COLLEGE, STEPHEN, a mechanic of the time of Charles II. He was a very zealous supporter of Protestantism, whence he obtained the sobriquet of the "Protestant joiner;" and probably it was on this account that some villainous informers charged him with being concerned in a plot against the king. He defended himself with spirit and ability, but was condemned and executed in 1681.

COLLEONE, BARTHOLOMEW, an Italian soldier of fortune, born at Bergamo, in 1400. He served at first under De Montone, and then in the army of Queen Joan of Naples. Passing into the service of Venice, he totally destroyed the army of Nicholas Piccinino; but being ill rewarded, he left the Venetians, and took his troops to the aid of Philip Visconti. He next served with Francis Sforza, and gained the battle of Frascati over the French. The Venetians now made him their generalissimo, and when he died, in 1475, the senate erected a statue to his memory.

COLLET, PHILIBERT, a French advocate; author of treatises "On Usury," "On Alms," "On Tithes," and on "Excommunication;" besides some works on botany. Died, 1718.

COLLIER, JEREMIAH, an English non-juring divine and learned writer, was born in 1650. He received his education at Cambridge, and was presented with the rectory of Ampton, in Suffolk; which he resigned on being chosen lecturer at Gray's Inn. At the revolution he refused to take the oaths, and was imprisoned in Newgate for writing in favour of James II. He attended Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins when they were executed for the "assassination plot." Two nonjuring clergymen who accompanied him on this occasion were taken up, but Collier escaped, and lay hidden until the affair had blown over, when he again made his appearance, and published "Essays on Miscellaneous Subjects." This work, in three volumes, obtained him considerable reputation; and his next publication was a spirited attack upon the licentiousness of the stage. He was, as a matter of course, replied to by many of the dramatic writers of the time; but he had truth on his side, and his works had good effect. He next translated, and continued Moreri's Dictionary; and his reputation had now so much increased, that queen Anne's government offered him valuable church preferment, which, with a rare consistency, he steadily declined. His remaining works were, an "Ecclesiastical History," brought down to the death of Charles II., some sermons, pamphlets, and a translation of Marcus Antonius. He was consecrated a bishop by Dr. George Hickes, who was himself consecrated suffragan of Thetford by three deprived bishops; and of course Collier's consecration was as illegal and void as theirs. Died, 1726.

COLLIN D'HARVILLE, JOHN FRANCIS, a French advocate, dramatist, and poet; author of "The Inconstant," "Le Vieux Céleataire," and various other dramas. Born, 1750; died, 1806.

COLLIN, HENRY DE, a German poet; author of six tragedies, some fragments of an epic poem, entitled "The Rodolphiad," and a number of spirit-stirring war songs. Born, 1772; died, 1811.

COLLIN, HENRY JOSEPH, a German physician and medical writer; author of a very valuable work on acute and chronic diseases. He has the merit of having added some powerful vegetable remedies to the Materia Medica. Died, 1784.

COLLINGS, JOHN, D.D., a nonconformist divine; author of "The Weaver's Pocket Book, or Weaving Spiritualised," and other works of a similar class. At the restoration he was one of the Presbyterian divines at the famous Savoy conference. Died, 1690.

COLLINGWOOD, CUTHBERT, Lord, a celebrated English admiral, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in 1748. He entered the navy when only 13 years of age, and his services were long, arduous, and valuable. In the action of June 1. 1794, he was flag-captain to Admiral Bowyer on board the Prince; and at the battle of Cape St. Vincent, in 1797, he commanded the Excellent. Having attained the rank of vice-admiral of the blue, and being second in command at the battle of Trafalgar, where the hero of England's navy fell, the command of the fleet devolved upon Admiral Collingwood, whose gallant conduct at the onset had called forth an exclamation of delight from Nelson, and to whose admirable skill and judgment, after the battle, the preservation of the captured vessels was chiefly attributable. For this and his other important services he was promoted to the rank of vice-admiral of the red, and elevated to the peerage. He was brave, indefatigable, just, and kind; strictly preserving discipline, while he gained the love of his compatriots, and merited all that a grateful country could bestow on him. His letters, published since his death, which took place while cruising off Minorca, in 1810, show him to have possessed considerable literary ability.

COLLINGWOOD, FRANCIS EDWARD, a

captain in the English navy, was a midshipman on board the Victory, at the battle of Trafalgar; and to him is ascribed the honour of being the avenger of Nelson's death, having shot the Frenchman in the maintop of the Redoubtable, who was seen to take deliberate aim at the English hero the moment before he fell. Died, 1835.

COLLINS, ANTHONY, a deistical controversialist, was born at Heston, Middlesex, in 1676, and completed his education at Cambridge. Among his works are "A Discourse on Free Thinking," "A Discourse on the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion," "Priestcraft in Perfection," &c. Though he was intimate with Locke and other great men, and spent his life in literary pursuits, his writings exhibit him as an insidious and determined foe to Christianity. Born, 1676; died, 1729.

COLLINS, ARTHUR, a celebrated English genealogist; author of an English "Peerage" and "Baronetage;" lives of "Cecil, Lord Burleigh" and "Edward the Black Prince," &c. He was rescued from poverty by a pension of 400*l.* per annum, granted to him by George II. Born, 1682; died, 1760.

COLLINS, DAVID, grandson of the above, a distinguished military officer, and governor of Van Diemen's Land; author of "A History of Botany Bay," which is written in a very unpretending style, and abounds with interesting information. Died, 1810.

COLLINS, FRANCIS, doctor of the Ambrosian college at Milan; author of a treatise, "De Animabus Paganorum," &c. Died, 1640.

COLLINS, JOHN, an able English mathematician and accountant. He was for some time in the naval service of Venice against the Turks; but at the restoration he was appointed to the office of accountant to the excise office, the court of chancery, &c. He, however, found time to contribute largely to the Transactions of the Royal Society; corresponded with Barrow, Newton, and other eminent mathematicians; and wrote various mathematical works. Born, 1624; died, 1683.

COLLINS, WILLIAM, a highly gifted but ill-fated English poet; author of odes, eclogues, &c. He was born, in 1720, at Chichester, and received his education at Winchester and Oxford. In 1744, he settled himself in London, but suffered from poverty even beyond the common lot of poets. The death of his uncle, Colonel Martin, who bequeathed him a legacy of 200*l.*, raised him from this abject condition; but his health and spirits were broken, and after lingering for some time in a state of mental imbecility, he died in 1756. His odes, which when published were utterly disregarded, are unquestionably among the first productions of British poesy; and the fate of their author is an indelible disgrace to the pretended patrons of genius, and the age in which he lived.

COLLINS, WILLIAM, an artist of distinguished merit, was born in London, 1787. He inherited an enthusiastic admiration for the beauties of nature from both his parents. His father, who was one of the first picture dealers of his time, was a man of considerable literary attainments; and his friendship with Morland the painter early led to his son's initiation into the mysteries of the pencil. In 1807 he became a student of the Royal Academy, and having prosecuted his studies with great zeal and success, he was chosen an associate in 1814, and elected an academician in 1820. From this period he continued to produce without interruption those coast and cottage scenes which gained for him his early reputation, and marked him out as one of the most thorough English artists, in the best and truest sense, of his time. With a view of studying the works of the great masters and of observing nature in new forms, he visited Italy in 1836, and having for two years occupied himself unremittently in advancing his knowledge of painting, he returned to England provided with a new class of subjects, and prepared for a new field of action in his art. Down to the year 1846 he contributed regularly to every exhibition, displaying the versatility of his powers by most elaborate productions illustrative of history, and by frequent revivals of those more domestic subjects by which he had won his early fame. True to his "first love," his last production, "Early Morning," was an English sea-piece. Mr. Collins was imbued with earnest but unaffected piety; and his death, though not unexpected, caused deep regret to a large circle of attached friends and admirers. Died, 1847.

COLLINSON, PETER, an English botanist, to whom we are indebted for the introduction of many ornamental shrubs and plants in our gardens, was born in 1694. He was intimate with Franklin and Linnaeus, the latter of whom gave the name Collinsonia to a genus of plants. Died, 1768.

COLLOT D'HERBOIS, JEAN MARIE, a French actor of little repute, but a heartless savage, and unprincipled republican. On the breaking out of the revolution he became a conspicuous agitator, and was the first who voted for the abolition of royalty. When Robespierre was falling he joined in impeaching him, though he so far resembled him in cruelty, that his treatment of the royalist Lyonese obtained him the sobriquet of the Tiger. He wrote some dramatic pieces, and the almanack of Father Gerard. Being transported to Cayenne, he died there, in 1796.

COLLUTHUS, an Alexandrian heresiarch of the 4th century. He assumed the episcopal office without authority, and was condemned by a council at Alexandria, in 324.

COLLYER, JOSEPH, senior associate engraver of the Royal Academy, was born of parents who were conspicuous in the literary world by their translations from Gesner and Boder, when the German language was but little known in England. One of those productions, the Death of Abel, by Mrs. Collyer, was received with peculiar marks of public favour. The late artist showed superior talent in the stippled style of engraving; his portraits in that line stand unrivalled. Died, 1827.

COLMAN, GEORGE, a dramatic writer and accomplished scholar of the 18th centure. He was born at Florence, in 1733, where his father at that time resided as the British envoy, and his mother was sister to the Countess of Bath. Having received his education at Westminster School and at Christchurch, Oxford, he turned his attention to the law as a profession; but his writings in The Connoisseur having met with success, gave him a bias towards polite literature, and he accordingly abandoned the graver pursuits of legal science. His first dramatic attempt was "Polly Honeycombe," which was performed at Drury Lane with great, though only temporary, success. In the following year, 1761, he produced his comedy of the "Jealous Wife," which at once became popular, and has ever since kept the stage. "The Clandestine Marriage," "The English Merchant," &c., added to his fame; and he wrote a number of other pieces, which, though inferior to these, were by no means deficient in merit. Lord Bath and General Pulteney, at their deaths, left him considerable legacies, which enabled him to purchase a share in Covent Garden Theatre. Disputes arising between himself and the other proprietors, he very soon disposed of this property, and purchased the little theatre in the Haymarket, which he conducted until an attack of paralysis reduced him to a state of mental imbecility. In addition to his writings, mentioned above, he translated the comedies of Terence and Horace, De Arte Poetica. Died, 1794.

COLMAN, GEORGE, "the younger," an eminent dramatist and wit, son of George Colman, was born in 1762, and received his education at Westminster School, Christchurch College, Oxford, and at King's College, Aberdeen. On his return from college, he was entered a student of Lincoln's Inn. Circumstances, however, as well as inclination, led him to abandon the profession of the law, and betake himself to that for which he was so well qualified. In 1784 his first acknowledged play, called "Two to One," was brought forward, and introduced to the public by a prologue from the pen of his father, who announced it as the production of "a chip of the old block." The success of this exceeded his most sanguine expectations, and naturally strengthened his bias in favour of dramatic composition. In 1787 his celebrated opera of "Inkle and Yarico" appeared, and at once stamped his fame. Shortly after this, the elder Colman was attacked with paralysis, which terminating in mental imbecility, his son presided over the destinies of the Haymarket Theatre, and subsequently became its proprietor, catering for the public amusement most felicitously. The prolific pen of "George Colman the younger" seemed never idle; and yet, perhaps, there was scarcely a man in London who spent more hours in convivial pleasures, or whose brilliant flashes of wit so often "set the table in a roar." His principal works, chronologically arranged, were "The Mountaineers," "The Iron Chest," "The Heir at Law," "Blue Beard," "The Review, or Wags of Windsor," "The Poor Gentleman," "Love laughs at Locksmiths," "John Bull," "Who wants a Guinea?"

"We fly by Night," "The Africans," and "X.Y.Z." These, with numerous preludes and interludes, prologues and epilogues, may be said to embrace his dramatic works: his other compositions, entitled "Random Records," "My Nightgown and Slippers," "Broad Grins," "Poetical Vagaries," "Vagaries Vindicated, or Hypocritical Hypercritics," complete the list. George IV. appointed him to the situation of licenser and examiner of plays, an office for which he was admirably qualified. Died, 1836.

COLOCCI, ANGELO, an Italian bishop; author of some very elegant Latin poems. After the fashion of his time, he assumed a Latin name; that of Angelus Colotius Basus. Died, 1549.

COLOCOTRONIS, THEOD., one of the regenerators of modern Greece, was born in Messenia, 1770; distinguished himself in numerous engagements with the Turkish oppressors of his country, and contributed, by his heroic conduct during the insurrection, to the final triumph of the Greek cause in 1828. After the death of Capo d'Istria, he became a member of the provisional government; but having conspired against the regency established till the majority of king Otho in 1834, he was condemned to death, and owed his escape to the clemency of the king. Died, 1843.

COLOGNE, PETER DE, a Protestant divine of the 16th century. He was a native of Ghent, but settled first at Mentz, and finally at Heidelberg. He wrote on the eucharist, and in defence of the Protestant doctrines.

COLOMA, DON CARLOS, marquis of Espina, a distinguished Spanish officer of the 16th century, and at one time ambassador to England. He wrote "The Wars of the Netherlands," and translated Tacitus.

COLOMBIERE, CLAUDE DE LA, a French Jesuit. He instituted a new rite, a service to be performed to the heart of Jesus, which he is said to have stolen from Goodwin, chaplain to Oliver Cromwell. Six volumes of his sermons were published. Died, 1682.

COLOMIES, otherwise COLOMESIUS, PAUL, a French scholar and critic. He was librarian to the archbishop of Canterbury, but lost that office on the deprivation of Sancroft. He wrote "Icon Theologorum Presbyterianorum," "Bibliothèque Choisie," &c. Died, 1692.

COLONNA, FRANCIS, an ingenious philosopher; author of the "Natural History of the Universe." He was burnt to death in his house, at Paris, in 1726.

COLONNA, PROSPERO, son of Anthony, prince of Salerno, was a distinguished military officer. He assisted Charles VIII. of France to conquer Naples, but subsequently aided in retaking it for the house of Arragon. Died, 1523.

COLONNA, POMPEO, nephew of the above, a restless and intriguing Roman cardinal, who at length became viceroy of Naples. A poem of his is extant, entitled "De Laudibus Muliebrum." Died, 1532.

COLONNA, VITTORIA, marchioness of Pescara, a celebrated Italian poetess, whose works are alike remarkable for the beauty of their thoughts and the elegance of their diction. Born, 1490; died, 1547.

COLOTHES, or COLOTES, a Grecian sculptor, contemporary with Phidias, whom he is said to have assisted in the statue of Jupiter Olympius. Several of his works are spoken of in very high terms, especially an ivory figure of Æsculapius.

COLQUHOUN, PATRICK, LL.D., a celebrated writer on statistics and criminal jurisprudence. He was a native of Dumbarton, in Scotland, born in 1745, and early in life went to America. On his return from that country he settled at Glasgow as a merchant, and became lord provost of the city, and president of its chamber of commerce. Subsequently he removed to London, and in 1792 he was made a police magistrate, in which situation he was distinguished by great ability and untiring assiduity. He published several valuable works, including a "Treatise on the Police of the Metropolis," a tract on the "Education of the Labouring Classes," "A Treatise on the Population, Wealth, Power, and Resources of the British Empire," &c. Died, 1820, aged 75.

COLSTON, EDWARD, an English merchant, memorable for his munificence and philanthropy. During his lifetime he expended upwards of 70,000*l.* in aiding various public charities, and he is supposed to have privately given away an equal amount. Notwithstanding his public and private benevolence, however, he left 100,000*l.* among his relatives and dependants. In addition to his other good works, he founded and endowed St. Augustine's School, Bristol, for the education of 100 boys, besides almshouses in other places. His statue, executed by Rysbach, stands in the church of All Saints, Bristol. Born, 1636; died, 1721.

COLTON, CALEB C., a writer of considerable talent, but of eccentric and discreditable habits, was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, where he graduated and obtained a fellowship. He first attracted notice by the publication of a pamphlet, entitled "A plain and authentic Narrative of the Sampford Ghost," in which he attempted to prove that certain occurrences which took place in a house at Sampford Peverell, near Tiverton, originated in supernatural agency. He also wrote a satirical poem, entitled "Hypocrisy," and another on "Napoleon;" but he obtained most of his fame from "Lacon, or Many Things in Few Words," which he published in 1820. Though a benefited clergyman, holding the vicarage of Kew with Petersham, in Surrey, he was a well-known frequenter of the gaming-table; and suddenly disappearing from his usual haunts in the metropolis about the time of Weare's murder, it was strongly suspected that he had fallen by the hand of an assassin. It was, however, afterwards ascertained that he had absconded, to avoid his creditors; and, in 1828, a successor was appointed to his living. He then went to reside in America; but subsequently lived in Paris, a professed gamester; and it is said that he gained by this vicious course of life, in two years only, the sum of 25,000*l.* He blew out his brains while on a visit to a friend at Fontainebleau, in 1832. We almost shudder while we copy from his own "Lacon" the following apophthegm:—"The gamester, if he die a martyr to his profession, is doubly ruined. He adds his soul to every other loss, and, by the act of suicide, renounces earth, to forfeit heaven!"

COLUMBA, Sr., a native of Ireland, who went to Scotland, and founded the famous monastery of Icolmkill. Died, 597.

COLUMBUS, CHRISTOPHER, the most celebrated navigator, and in many respects one of the greatest men recorded in history, was born at Genoa in 1437, and is supposed to have been of humble descent. He soon evinced a strong passion for geographical knowledge, together with an irresistible inclination for the sea. After many years spent in the active duties of a maritime life, with his mind bent on the acquisition of geographical and nautical science, he went to Lisbon, where an elder brother of his was settled; married the orphan daughter of Palestrello, an Italian navigator; and studied all the maps and charts he could procure, making occasional voyages; in which alternation of theoretical and practical improvement he spent several years. His own reflections, corroborated by facts of which he was informed by various seamen, led him at length to feel convinced that there were unknown lands separated from Europe by the Atlantic. After vainly seeking aid from Genoa, Portugal, and England, he at length induced Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain to equip and man three vessels for a voyage of discovery; it being stipulated that Columbus should have a 10th of all profits, and be viceroy of the land he expected to discover. He set sail from Palos, on his daring adventure, on the 2nd of August, 1492; and, after sailing for two months, was in imminent danger of losing the reward of all his study and toil, the variation of the needle having so much alarmed his crews, that they were on the point of breaking into open mutiny, and he was obliged to promise that if three days produced no discovery he would commence his homeward voyage. On the third day they happily hove in sight of one of the Bahamas, and subsequently explored some other of the West India Islands. Having thus far succeeded, he built a fort at Hispaniola, left some of his men there, and then set out on his return to Europe, where he was received with every mark of admiration and regard. The gold and other valuables which he presented to the king and queen in token of his success, excited the spirit of adventure in both the sovereigns and their subjects, and in his 2nd voyage he had no difficulty in obtaining followers. It was not until his 3rd voyage, made in 1498, that he saw the mainland of America, which both Americus Vesputius and Sebastian Cabot reached before him; and though there has been much dispute as to the actual priority, the honour of giving a name to the new world remains with Americus Vesputius. Having assumed the command of the settlement at Hispaniola, various complaints were made against him by his bitterest enemies, and Columbus was not merely displaced, but Bobadilla, a new governor, who had been dispatched thither by the court of Spain, even sent him to that country manacled as a prisoner. Columbus endured this outrage with noble equanimity; and on his return, having obtained an audience of his sovereigns, was partially restored to his dignities; but he found that full justice was never intended to be awarded him. Yet, notwithstanding this unworthy treatment, he made another voyage, in which he encountered every imaginable disaster from storms and shipwreck; and, two years after his return, his noble mind sunk under the load of injustice and oppression. He died at Valladolid, in 1506, in the 70th year of his age.

COLUMBUS, BARTHOLOMEW, Don, brother of the above, famous for his skill in constructing sea charts. Died, 1501.

COLUMELLA, LUCIUS JUNIUS MODERATUS, a native of Gades in Spain. He resided at Rome in the reign of the emperor Claudius; and, besides other works, wrote a treatise on agriculture.

COLUTHIUS, a Greek poet of the 5th century. Suidas mentions the "Calydonics" and the "Persics" of this writer; but all that has reached us from his pen is "The Rape of Helen."

COMBE, Dr. ANDREW, one of the most eminent medical practitioners and writers of our time, was born at Edinburgh, 1797. After going through the customary curriculum of the High School, with the addition of two sessions at the college, he was apprenticed in 1812 to a general medical practitioner. Up to this period he had given little indication of any peculiar talents; but the arrival of Dr. Spurzheim in Edinburgh, in 1815, opened a new era in his life. Attracted and interested by the lectures of the great apostle of phrenology, he sought his acquaintance, and having in 1817 obtained his diploma from the College of Surgeons, he proceeded to Paris to prosecute his studies in the hospitals of that capital, under the advice of Dr. Spurzheim. Here he remained for two years; and after a short tour in Switzerland and Italy he returned to Edinburgh in 1819, eagerly intent upon the practice of his profession. But in this he was disappointed. Soon after he reached home he was seized with symptoms of pulmonary consumption; and from this time, 1820, to the day of his death, he was, though with many intervals of comparative health, a confirmed invalid. But as if the element of bodily suffering, which usually impairs the powers and the usefulness of other men, had been necessary to the full development of his, it is to the exertions of these years of pain and anxiety that we owe the remarkable works which have placed Dr. Combe so high in the rank of the men whose noble privilege it has been to push visibly onwards the great wheel of human progress, by conferring on man the means of improving his mental and physical condition upon earth. For not alone did he learn in suffering how suffering could best be soothed and ameliorated; the sympathy it awakened in his heart led him to trace the poisoned stream to its source, and hence resulted those admirable expositions of the causes of the more ordinary forms of diseased action, and also those clear and practical lessons of prevention, which have advanced hygiene almost to the rank of a positive science. Immediately upon his seizure he determined to go to the south of France, but had not got farther than London when he found himself too unwell to travel, and returned home; there he temporarily recovered, helped to found the Phrenological Society, and in the ensuing August set off again to the Mediterranean, on whose shores he spent two years. At the end of the second year he felt so strong, that he determined to begin practice in Edinburgh, where his high standing among his professional brethren, and general character for good sense, talent, and strict conscientiousness, did not leave him long unemployed. During the next few years he attained great repute from his able papers in reply to the opponents of phrenology, and also rose high in his profession. In 1825 he took the degree of M.D., and two years later was elected president of the Phrenological Society. During these and several following years, he contributed many interesting papers to the Phrenological Journal, and published a work on mental derangement; and in the course of an extensive practice addressed those invaluable letters to his patients, which, combining so happily the earnest and benevolent friend with the able physician and philosopher, must have strengthened his influence as well as greatly added to his usefulness. In 1831 his health again gave way, and he was obliged to pass the winter in Italy, and for some years altogether to abandon the practice of his profession. Indeed, he was never able fully to resume it; for though, by a strict application of his principles to his own state, and an unflinching adherence to the rules he laid down, he seems to have prolonged his life, and enjoyed many intervals of comparative health—and of usefulness (perhaps of a higher kind than lies within the scope of mere practice)—he was unfit for hard work, and must soon have sunk under exposure, exertion, or unfavourable circumstances of any sort. In 1836 he had the gratification of being appointed physician to the king of the Belgians, but the moist atmosphere of Belgium was probably injurious to his delicate frame, for after a short trial he was obliged to resign the resident appointment, from finding his strength inadequate to the due performance of his duties, and he only returned occasionally to examine, and inspect, and to advise the royal family in hygienic matters. Between the years 1834-39, he published the three great works for which he had been so long and so carefully collecting and arranging the materials, "The Principles of Physiology applied to the Preservation of Health and to Education," "The Physiology of Digestion," and "The Moral and Physical Management of Infancy." In 1838 he was appointed one of the physicians extraordinary to the queen in Scotland. By making occasional seasonable journeys to Belgium, Germany, and elsewhere, his health was so far preserved, that for months at a time he was able to act as a consulting physician in Edinburgh, where his well-merited high reputation brought abundance of patients about him. In the autumn of 1844 his health at last gave way so threateningly, as to oblige him to give up all work, and to try the climate of Madeira. There he passed two successive winters in tolerable comfort, returning to spend the summer months among those he loved. After this he only left home once again, and that was to make a voyage to America (which seemed to have been injurious to him), in the summer immediately preceding his death. Surrounded by attached friends, and tended with faithful and most loving care, his life of usefulness was peacefully closed in the autumn of 1847.

COMBE, CHARLES, an eminent classical scholar and a physician, born in 1743. His father was an apothecary in Bloomsbury, and the son was brought up to the same profession, but determining to practise in the higher branches of medicine, he obtained a Scotch degree, and became physician to the London Lying-in Hospital. In conjunction with Dr. Parr and Mr. Homer, he produced an edition of Horace, in 2 vols. 4to., and he was well versed in the science of numismatics. Died, 1817.

COMBER, Dr. THOMAS, dean of Carlisle. On the breaking out of the civil war he was deprived of his preferments and thrown into prison; but he lived to witness the restoration of Charles II. Died, 1663.

COMBER, Dr. THOMAS, dean of Durham; author of "A Companion to the Temple," "A Companion to the Altar," "An Account of the Roman Forgeries in the Councils during the first Four Centuries," &c. Died, 1699.

COMBER, THOMAS, LL.D., grandson of the last named. He was the author of "An Examination of Middleton on the Miraculous Powers," "The Heathen Rejection of Christianity in the first Ages considered," &c. Died, 1778.

COMENIUS, JOHN AMOS, a Moravian minister. He for some time officiated as pastor to a congregation at Fulnek, but was driven thence by the invasion of the Spaniards, and settled in Poland, where he published a work, entitled "Janua Linguarum," which obtained him so great a celebrity that he was invited to England; but the breaking out of the civil war rendered his stay both brief and unprofitable, and he settled for the remainder of his life at Amsterdam. Born, 1592; died, 1671.

COMES, NATALIS, the Latinised name of NATAL CONTI, an Italian writer; author of poems in Greek and Latin, &c., and of a system of mythology. Died, 1590.

COMMANDINE, FREDERIC, an Italian mathematician; the author of some original works, and translator of Archimedes, Apollonius, and other ancient mathematicians. Died, 1575.

COMMELIN, JEROME, a learned French printer. He established his press first at Geneva, and subsequently at Heidelberg; and published several of the Greek and Latin fathers, with notes from his own pen. Died, 1598.

COMMENDOUÉ, JOHN FRANCIS, cardinal. He was a native of Venice, and at 10 years of age was so far advanced in learning as to write Latin verses. Pope Julius III. made him his chamberlain, and entrusted him with several important missions. He was made a bishop by Paul IV., and a cardinal by Pius IV. Died, 1584.

COMMERSON, PHILIBERT, a French physician and botanist. In the latter character he evinced great zeal and industry, and his collection was immense. He wrote "Iethology," two quarto volumes; and the "Martyrology of Botany," an account of those who had lost their lives in botanical pursuits. Born, 1721; died, 1773.

COMMINES or COMINES, PHILIP DE, lord of Argenton; an eminent historian, statesman, and courtier of the reign of Louis XI., born in Flanders, in 1445. His "Memoirs of his own Times" abound with valuable facts and observations, though he is too lenient when speaking of the atrocities of Louis XI. On the death of that monarch, Commynes was thrown into prison and treated with great severity, but was at length liberated. Died, 1509.

COMMIRE, JOHN, a French Jesuit, distinguished for his Latin poetry. Among his works are fables, which some have considered equal to Phædrus. Died, 1702.

COMMODI, ANDREA, an Italian historical painter. His best work is a picture painted for Paul V., of the angels falling from heaven. Died, 1638.

COMMODUS, LUCIUS AURELIUS ANTONINUS, a Roman emperor, son and successor of Antoninus the philosopher. He was guilty of the worst crimes, and was poisoned by his concubine, Marcia, who had discovered that he intended to put her to death, A. D. 122.

COMNENUS DEMETRIUS STEPHANOPOLI CONSTANTINE, the supposed descendant of the celebrated family of the Comeni, which for ages sat upon the throne of the eastern empire, was born in 1749, in the island of Corsica. Having been driven from their possessions in the East by the Turks, they at length emigrated in the 17th century, and, with a colony of Greeks, settled in Corsica, where their leader inherited the title and dignity of capitano, until Corsica became united to France. After studying at Rome, with the intention of becoming an ecclesiastic, Demetrius entered into the service of France, and obtained a captaincy in a regiment of dragoons in 1778. At the beginning of the revolution, he fought under the banners of Condé, and went into exile with other royalists; but he returned to France in 1802, and lived on a pension of 4000 francs, assigned to him by Napoleon. Louis XVIII. confirmed this stipend, and made him maréchal de camp, and knight of St. Louis. He died in 1821.

COMPTE, LOUIS LE, a French Jesuit and mathematician. He was for some time a missionary in China, and on his return to Europe published memoirs of that country. Died, 1729.

COMPTON, SPENCER, earl of Northampton, one of the bravest and most zealous adherents of Charles I. Being overpowered at the battle of Hopton Heath, he was offered quarter, but indignantly refused it, and was slain, March 19. 1643.

COMPTON, HENRY, son of the above. At the Restoration he obtained a cornetcy of dragoons. He soon, however, quitted the army for the church; and, after various preferments, was, in 1675, promoted to the bishopric of London. He opposed the spirit of popery during the reign of James II., and was one of the most zealous friends of the Prince of Orange. When Archbishop Saneroff refused to crown William and Mary, Compton performed that ceremony. Besides many sermons and letters, he wrote a treatise on the Communion, and translated from the Italian the life of Donna Olympia Maldachini. Died, 1713.

CONANT, JOHN, an English divine. He was originally a Nonconformist, but conformed in 1670, and became archdeacon of Norwich and a prebendary of Worcester. Six volumes of sermons are all that he is known to have contributed to literature. Died, 1693.

CONCA, SEBASTIAN, an eminent Italian painter. Died, 1761.

CONCANEN, MATTHEW, a political writer of some talent. His devotion to the ministry procured him the appointment of attorney-general of Jamaica, in which office he acquired a good fortune. He published, besides his political writings, some poetry, and by no means deserved that place in the Dunciad which Pope was induced, in mere party spite, to give him. Died, 1749.

CONCINA, DANIEL, a Dominican monk of Venice. He was very celebrated as a preacher, and so complete a master of canon law, that he was frequently consulted by pope Benedict XIV. Besides numerous other works, he wrote a "System of Theology," in 12 volumes. Died, 1756.

CONCINO CONCINI (more celebrated and better known by his title of Marshal d'Ancre) was by birth a Florentine, and accompanied Mary de Medici, the wife of Henry IV., to France. He obtained great preferment, and after the death of Henry IV. so much abused the influence he had over the queen regent, that when her son, Louis VIII., became old enough to act for himself, he consented to the assassination of the marquis, which accordingly took place in 1617; and in the same year his wife was burned to death as a sorceress. The judges who tried her on this absurd charge, demanded of her by what arts she had gained her ascendancy over the queen; when she made the memorable reply, "My only sorcery has been the influence of a strong mind over a weak one."

CONDE, LOUIS, first Prince of. He was the son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendome, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of St. Quintin, though he was then very young. At the death of Henry II. he became a leader of the Huguenots, and was killed at the battle of Jarnac, in 1569. His memoirs were published after his death.

CONDE, HENRY, Prince of, who at the request of Henry IV. became a Catholic, was born in 1588. In 1616 he was sent to the Bastille, where he remained for three years. After the death of Louis XIII., the prince was liberated, and was made minister of state to the regent. Died, 1646.

CONDE, LOUIS, Prince of, duke of Enghien, the illustrious son of the preceding, and usually called the Great, was born at Paris in 1621. When he was a mere boy, his conversation evinced so much talent, that Cardinal Richelieu predicted that he would become "the first general in Europe and the first man of his time." When only 22 years of age, he gained the victory of Rocroi over the Spaniards; and followed up that achievement by the capture of Thionville and other important places. Subsequently he distinguished himself in various actions in Germany, whence he was recalled and sent to Catalonia, but was repulsed before Lerida. In 1641 he defeated the Imperialists in Flanders, on which occasion the slaughter was prodigious. For a time he sided with the queen mother and her advisers, and even succeeded in reconciling them to their opponents; but being ill treated by Cardinal Mazarin, he joined the malcontents and fought against the court in the civil war of 1652. Refusing to accede to the peace made between the contending parties, he entered into the service of Spain; but at the peace of 1659 he was restored to the favour of France, and greatly distinguished himself, particularly in the conquest of Franche Comté, until infirmity of body compelled him to retire to private life. Died, 1686.

CONDER, JOHN, D.D., an eminent dissenting minister; author of an "Essay on the Ministerial Character," some sermons, &c. Died, 1781.

CONDILLAC, STEPHEN, a French metaphysician; author of an "Essay on the Origin of Human Knowledge," a "Treatise on Animals," a "Treatise on the Sensations," "A Course of Study drawn up for the Instruction of the Prince of Parma," to whom he was tutor, &c. Died, 1780.

CONDORCET, JOHN ANTONY NICHOLAS CARITAT, Marquis of, a French mathematician and philosopher, was born at Ribemont, in Picardy, in 1743, and educated at the college of Navarre. When only 22 years of age he distinguished himself among mathematicians by the publication of his work on "Integral Calculations." Two years afterwards he published a treatise on "The Problem of the Three Bodies," and in the following year his "Analytical Essays." In 1769 he was chosen member of the academy, and in 1773 became its secretary, in which situation he distinguished himself by the graceful elegance of his eulogies. In 1791 he became a member of the national assembly and of the Jacobin club; and he soon became as noted for his political virulence as he had already been eminent for his scientific genius. Becoming obnoxious to Robespierre, that tyrant threw him into prison, where, on the third morning, 28th March, 1794, he was found dead in his bed. Besides the works named above, he wrote "A Sketch of the Progress of the Human Mind," an "Elementary Treatise on Arithmetic," and a tract on "Calculation."

CONFUCIUS, or CONG-FU-TSE, a Chinese philosopher, was born 551 B. C. He spent his life in endeavouring to enlighten and improve his fellow-subjects; and his advice was attended to by the king of Lu with a respect little short of reverence. His descendants to this day are mandarins of the highest button, and his books are regarded by the Chinese as treasures of the purest morality. Died, B. C. 470.

CONGLETON, HENRY BROOKE PARNELL, Lord, was the second son of Sir John Parnell, bart., chancellor of the exchequer, and was born July 3rd, 1776. His elder brother was born dumb, and a cripple, and, by a somewhat unusual stretch of authority, parliament set aside the entail upon the family estates, so that the younger son succeeded to the estates on the death of his father in 1801, and to the title on the death of his brother in 1812. He entered parliament in 1802, but ceased to be a member at the close of the same year. He was again returned in 1806, and retained his seat, in spite of all opposition, until 1832, when he voluntarily retired. From 1833 to 1837 he sat for Dundee; and in 1841 he was raised to the peerage. During his whole parliamentary career he was an extremely useful, though by no means brilliant, member. Finance in all its various branches he was very familiar with, and upon such subjects he very early became a sort of authority to both sides of the house. Died June 8, 1842, aged 65.

CONGREVE, WILLIAM, an eminent English dramatist, was born near Leeds, in 1670, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He entered himself as a student at the Middle Temple, but, like many more before and since, abandoned the law for literature. His first piece, written at the age of 17, was a romance, entitled "Incognita, or Love and Duty Reconciled." In 1693, being then only 21 years old, he wrote his first comedy, "The Old Bachelor." This produced him not only great reputation, but also the substantial benefit of a commissionership in the hackney-coach office, which was given to him by the Earl of Halifax, who afterwards still further patronised and favoured him. He wrote also "Love for Love," "The Double Dealer," "The Mourning Bride," "The Way of the World," an opera; and some poems. Died, 1729. Witty and spirited as Congreve's plays are, they are too licentious to keep possession of the stage at the present day; and in his own time they received severe castigation from the celebrated Jeremiah Collier.

CONGREVE, Sir WILLIAM, the son of a lieutenant-general, and the inventor of the Congreve rockets, was born in 1772, and entered the military service early, in which he obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He possessed much inventive talent, which he applied to the mechanic arts; and for several years the rocket which bears his name, and which was first used in the attack of Boulogne in 1806, was considered a grand auxiliary in warlike operations, although it has now fallen into comparative disrepute. Sir William was a fellow of the Royal Society, and represented Plymouth in parliament. Died, 1828.

CONNOR, BERNARD, an Irish physician, for some time settled at Warsaw; author of a "History of Poland," and also of a Latin work on the miracles of our Saviour. Died, 1698.

CONON, an Athenian general, was the son of Timotheus. Having been defeated in a naval engagement at Ægospotamos by Lysander, he for a time went into exile;

but being aided by Artaxerxes, king of Persia, he returned and defeated the Spartans near Cnidus. He then fortified Athens, and restored it to liberty and security; but being betrayed into the power of Tiribazus, a Persian, he was put to death, 393 B. C.

CONON, an astronomer of Samos, a friend of Archimedes. To flatter Ptolemy Euergetes, he affirmed that the locks of Berenice his queen were made into a constellation. He flourished in the third century, B. C.

CONRAD I., count of Franconia. In 912 he was elected king of Germany, but Arnau, duke of Bavaria, disputed his title, and engaged the Huns to overrun Germany. Conrad, however, avoided the threatened ruin by engaging to pay a yearly tribute. Died, 918.

CONRAD II., son of Herman, duke of Franconia, was elected king of Germany in 1024. Attempts were made to displace him, but he beat his opponents, and in 1027 was crowned emperor at Rome. By the will of Rodolphus the kingdom of Burgundy became his in 1033. Died, 1039.

CONRAD III., emperor of Germany, was son of Frederic, duke of Suabia, and before his election was duke of Franconia. His election produced civil war; but he terminated that and went to the Holy Land, where he lost a vast number of his troops through the Greeks poisoning the fountains. He died, in his own dominion, 1152.

CONRAD IV., duke of Suabia, was elected emperor at the death of his father, Frederick II. The pope, Innocent IV., pretended that the right of appointment lay in him, and preached a crusade against the new emperor. Conrad replied to this by marching into Italy, and taking several important places. Died, 1254.

CONRAD or CONRADIN, son of the last named, who left him the kingdom of Naples. Pope Urban IV. gave that kingdom to Charles of Anjou, who defeated Conrad, then only 16 years old, and caused him to be beheaded in 1268.

CONRI, FLORENCE, an Irish Franciscan friar. He was educated in Spain, and when king Philip wished to make a conquest of Ireland, Conri was sent there to influence the people, the pope making him titular archbishop of Tuam to give him the greater power; but he was unable to effect the wishes of his patrons, and returned to Spain. He was the author of some Latin commentaries on St. Augustin, "The Mirror of a Christian Life." Died, 1629.

CONRINGIUS, HERMANN, professor of physic and politics at the university of Helmstadt; author of valuable treatises on law, German antiquities, and on the Aristotelian system. Died, 1681.

CONSALVI, ERACLE, cardinal and prime minister of pope Pius VII., was born at Toscanella, in 1757. As he had ever opposed the French party in Rome to the utmost of his power, he was banished from that city when the French took possession of it. When, however, the papal affairs were in a better condition he returned; and, as secretary of state, he concluded the famous concordat with Napoleon; continuing, in fact, at the head of all the political and ecclesiastical affairs of the Roman state till the death of the pope, his friend and master. Died, 1824.

CONSTABLE, ARCHIBALD, the most enterprising bookseller that Scotland has ever produced, was born at Kellie in Fifeshire, 1775. After serving his apprenticeship to Mr. Peter Hill of Edinburgh, the friend and correspondent of Burns, he commenced business for himself in 1795; and his obliging manners, general intelligence, and indefatigable activity gained him the esteem of all who came in contact with him. His reputation as a publisher dates from 1802, when he published the first number of the Edinburgh Review; and in 1805 he published, in conjunction with Messrs. Longman and Co., "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," the first of that long series of original and romantic publications in poetry and prose which has immortalised the name of Walter Scott. His tact in appreciating literary merit, his liberality in rewarding it, and the sagacity he displayed in placing it in the most favourable manner before the public, were amply rewarded by the unparalleled success of his literary projects; but in 1826 he was overwhelmed by the disasters consequent on the rage for speculation that marked the preceding year, and the fruits of a life of activity, industry, and exertion were all sacrificed in the prevailing wreck of commercial credit. The well-known "Miscellany" that bears his name was his last project: soon after its commencement he was attacked with dropsy, and died in 1827.

CONSTABLE, JOHN, R. A., one of the most eminent landscape painters of our time, was born at East Bergholt, in Suffolk, 1776. Having early displayed a love of art, he visited London in 1795, for the purpose of ascertaining what might be his chance of success as a painter. Encouraged by the flattering commendations of Farrington, himself a landscape painter of some note, and of "Antiquity" Smith, he laboured hard at the mechanical part of his profession, and in 1802 sent his first picture to the exhibition of the Royal Academy. From this period he was a regular contributor down to the year of his death. Few pencils, indeed, have been more prolific; and the works he has left behind him, both in number and excellence, have earned for him a distinguished place among the landscape painters not only of England but of the world. In 1829 he was elected an academician. Died, 1837. "Memoirs of the Life" of Mr. Constable have been published by his friend and brother artist Mr. Leslie, full of interest, and showing that both artists could wield the pen no less ably than the pencil.

CONSTANS L., FLAVIUS JULIUS, one of the sons of Constantine the Great, and his successor in the sovereignty of Africa, Italy, and Western Illyricum. His brother Constantine endeavoured to dispossess him of it; but being defeated and slain in the attempt, Constans became master of the whole empire. His conduct was, however, so offensive to the people, that the standard of revolt was hoisted, and Constans was put to death, A. D. 350.

CONSTANT DE REBECQUE, BENJA-

MIN DE, a distinguished orator and author, attached to the liberal or constitutional party in France. He was born at Lausanne in 1767, and at the commencement of the French revolution went to reside at Paris, where he soon distinguished himself, both by his political writings and his eloquent speeches in the senate; and when, under the government of the directory, he was elected to the office of tribune, he zealously endeavoured to maintain the equality of citizens, the freedom of the press, and the regular administration of justice. His conduct, however, rendered him obnoxious to the first consul, and he was dismissed from his office in 1802. After retiring to Germany, he again appeared at Paris in 1814, and publicly advocated the cause of the Bourbons; yet we soon after find him assisting in forming the constitution of the Champ de Mai. Though, like many others, he had sufficient cause to retire from France on the second restoration of Louis XVIII., he was allowed to return, and in 1819 was elected a member of the chamber of deputies, where he long remained as a distinguished leader of the opposition, particularly in all the discussions relating to the censorship of the press and the rights of the people. He wrote many works on political questions, was one of the editors of La Minerve, and a contributor to the Biographie Universelle. As an orator he was eloquent and profound; and as a writer lively, imaginative, and acute. Died, 1830.

CONSTANTINE, CAIUS FLAVIUS VALEMIUS AURELIUS CLAUDIUS, surnamed the GREAT, emperor of the Romans, was the son of Constantius Chlorus, by Helena, and born A. D. 274. On the death of his father, in 306, he was proclaimed emperor by the troops. After defeating the Franks, he crossed the Rhine into Belgium, which he overran. In 307 he married Fausta, the daughter of Maximian, but he was soon involved in a war with his father-in-law, who assumed the title of emperor. The usurper's reign was brief; and on his being taken prisoner, Constantius caused him to be strangled. This involved him in a war with Maxentius, son of Maximilian, in which the latter was defeated and drowned in the Tiber. It was at this time that the emperor, as he alleged to Eusebius, saw a luminous cross in the heavens with the inscription, "In hoc signo vinces" (Under this sign thou shalt conquer). He accordingly caused a standard to be made in imitation of this cross; marched to Rome in triumph; published the memorable edict of toleration in favour of the Christians; and was declared by the senate, chief, Augustus, and pontifex maximus. Constantine had married his daughter to Licinius; but the latter, jealous of his fame, took up arms against him, and they met in Pannonia, A. D. 314. Constantine, surrounded by bishops and priests, invoked the aid of "the true God;" while Licinius, calling upon his soothsayers and magicians, relied upon them and their gods for protection. The Christian emperor was victorious, and a peace was granted to Licinius; but he afterwards renewed hostilities, was again defeated, and finally put to death. Thus Constantine became, in 325, sole head of the Eastern and Western empires; and his first care was the establishment of peace and order. He displayed great courage and love of justice, and evinced an ardent zeal for the Christian religion, which he eventually established in his vast dominions. He also endeavoured to increase the solid greatness of his empire, and among other useful works, founded the city of Constantinople. But though his actions on the whole entitled him to the proud surname of "The Great," yet various acts of cruelty, and, above all, the murder of his son Crispus, have left a stain upon his character alike as a man, a Christian, and an emperor. He died in 337, after a reign of 31 years; and he divided his empire between his three sons, Constantine, Constantius, and Constans.

CONSTANTINE II., son of the above. In the division of the empire he had for his share, Gaul, Spain, and Britain; but, discontented with the arrangement, he marched against his brother Constans, and was killed at Aquileia, 340.

CONSTANTINE, FLAVIUS JULIUS, a private soldier, who was raised by the army in Britain to the imperial dignity in 407, on which he crossed over to Gaul, and conquered that country and Spain. He fixed his court at Arles, where he was besieged by Constantius, the general of the emperor Honorius, to whom he surrendered on the promise that his life should be spared; but it was basely violated, and both Constantine and his son were put to death, A. D. 411.

CONSTANTINE IV., who was called the Bearded, was son of Constans II., whom he succeeded in 668. The army having set up his two brothers as his coadjutors, he ordered their noses to be cut off. As a soldier he was prompt and brave. He defeated the Saracens, and called a council at Constantinople, at which the doctrine of the Monothelites was condemned. Died, 685.

CONSTANTINE VI., was son of Leo II., whom he succeeded. Being only 10 years old when his father died, his mother Irene was his guardian and regent of the empire. On arriving at a mature age he assumed the government himself; but Irene, made cruel by ambition, took advantage of an invasion of the Bulgarians to cause her son to be seized and deprived of his eyes. This occurred in 792, and the unfortunate emperor languished some years in obscurity, and when he died was succeeded by his unnatural parent.

CONSTANTINE VII., surnamed PORPHYROGENITUS, succeeded Leo the Wise in 912. He drove the Turks from Italy, and defeated the Lombards. But military affairs did not prevent him from attending to letters; and besides other writings, he left a treatise on state affairs, the geography of the empire; and the "Life of the Emperor Basilus the Macedonian." Died, 959.

CONSTANTINE IX., was son of the emperor Romanus, and, in conjunction with his brother Basil II., succeeded John Rismices in 976; the actual power, however, was chiefly wielded by Constantine. Died, 1028.

CONSTANTINE, DRACONES or PALÆ-

OLOGUS, the last of the Greek emperors, succeeded to the throne in 1449. He was killed in bravely defending Constantinople against Mahomet II., who, in 1453, besieged the city with 300,000 men. This heroic valour displayed by Constantine in this unequal contest demands our admiration; but valour was of no avail, the city was taken by storm, and thus ended the Greek empire.

CONSTANTINE, CÆSAROVITCH PAULOVITCH, grand-prince of Russia, second son of the emperor Paul, and brother of Alexander, was born in 1779. He attended his brother in all his campaigns, and was distinguished for bravery in the field; but he possessed the characteristics of a half-civilised ruler, being cruel and tyrannical in all that related to the government of the Poles, over whom he was placed. He formally renounced his right of succession to his younger brother, the emperor Nicholas, and was present at his coronation. Died, 1831.

CONSTANTIUS, CHLORUS, the son of Eutropius, and the father of Constantine the Great. He obtained the title of Cæsar from his victories in Germany and Britain; and on the abdication of Diocletian was chosen the colleague of Galerius. He died at York, in 306.

CONSTANTIUS, FLAVIUS JULIUS, the second son of Constantine the Great, was born in 317, made Cæsar in 323, and elected emperor in 337. The soldiers, to secure the throne to the three sons of Constantine, massacred the uncles and cousins of those princes, with the exception of Julian the Apostate and his brother Gallus. After this the sons of Constantine divided the empire, Constantius taking the east to his share. Magnentius, governor of Rhætia, murdered Constans, who had reigned over Italy 13 years; on which Constantius marched against the murderer, whom he defeated, and his elder brother being also dead, he became sole emperor. He died on his march against Julian, who had assumed the purple in 361.

CONTARINI. This is the name of a noble Venetian family, of which several filled the office of doge; but their lives present nothing sufficiently remarkable for separate notice here.

CONTAT, LOUISE, madame de Parny, a French actress, remarkable for her beauty, vivacity, grace, and dignity; born, 1760; sustained her station on the stage 32 years; and died in 1818.

CONTE, NICHOLAS JACQUES, a French painter, but more distinguished for the ingenuity of his mechanical contrivances. He accompanied the expedition to Egypt, where his services were of the greatest value; for, the machines and instruments of the army having fallen into the hands of the Arabs, he constructed corn and gunpowder mills, manufactured swords, engineering instruments, telescopes, and, in short, every thing necessary for a military and scientific expedition. Born, 1755; died, 1805.

CONWAY, HENRY SEYMOUR, second son of Lord Conway, was a distinguished military officer and statesman, born in 1720. He served with applause in the seven years' war, was secretary of state from 1765 to 1768, appointed commander-in-chief in 1782, and died in 1795, being at that time the senior British field-marshal.

CONYBEARE, JOHN, bishop of Bristol; author of "An Able Defence of Revealed Religion," against Tindal's "Christianity as Old as the Creation," and of 2 volumes of excellent sermons. Died, 1757.

CONYBEARE, JOHN JOSIAS, a learned English divine, critic, and antiquary; author of a volume of admirable sermons, preached at the Bampton Lecture; and of various articles on Saxon literature, contributed to the Censura Litteraria, and the British Bibliographer. He also contributed some valuable papers, on chemistry and mineralogy, to the Annals of Philosophy and the Transactions of the Geological Society. Died, 1824.

COOK, HENRY, an English painter. He studied in Italy under Salvator Rosa; but for many years after his return to England he lived in obscurity and distress. He was at length employed by king William to repair the cartoons, from which time he seems to have been comparatively prosperous, as Horace Walpole mentions several public works which were either wholly or in part performed by him. Died, 1700.

COOK, Captain JAMES, a celebrated English navigator. He was born at Marton, in Yorkshire, in 1728; and his parents being poor, his early education included only reading, writing, and the rudiments of common arithmetic. He commenced his naval career in the merchant service, then entered on board the Eagle man-of-war, and after 4 years meritorious service was made master of the Mercury. This vessel formed part of the squadron sent against Quebec; and Cook performed the difficult task of taking soundings in the St. Lawrence, in the very face of the French encampment, and of making a chart of the St. Lawrence below Quebec. After various and arduous services he was at length raised to the rank of lieutenant; and then commenced that series of voyages, the details of which form one of the most popular and delightful books in our language. Unhappily, while touching at Owhyhee, Captain Cook, in spite of the utmost prudence and humanity, was involved in a dispute with the natives, and while endeavouring to reach his boat was savagely murdered, on St. Valentine's Day, 1779.—His wife, ELIZABETH COOK, survived him 56 years! having died at her residence at Clapham, in 1835, aged 93. But she had to mourn the loss of her 3 sons in a few years after the unhappy fate of her husband. NATHANIEL, their second son, was lost in the Thunderer, which foundered at sea, in 1780; HUGH, a student at Cambridge, died in 1793; and JAMES, the eldest son, was lost, with his boat's crew, while commander of the Spitfire sloop-of-war, off the Isle of Wight, in 1794.

COOKE, Sir ANTHONY, an eminent English scholar. He was one of the tutors of Edward VI., who highly esteemed him. Born, 1508; died, 1576.

COOKE, BENJAMIN, Mus. Doc., an able musician and composer; author of "How sleep the Brave," "Hark, hark! the Lark," and many other beautiful and popular glees. Died, 1814.

COOKE, GEORGE FREDERICK, an eminent modern English actor, was born in 1756. In early life he was apprenticed to a printer, but his attention to theatricals so completely absorbed his mind, that his master soon had his indentures cancelled. He then tried the navy with no better success, his inclination for the stage being unconquerable. After the usual probation among itinerant companies, he became a star at the larger provincial theatres, as York, Manchester, and Liverpool, and was at length engaged at Dublin for 3 years. Thence his fame travelled to London; and in October, 1800, he made his appearance at Covent Garden in the character of Richard III. His performance of this character gave him at once a place among the very first histrionic artists of the day, and he soon became highly popular in that part, and in Macbeth, Iago, Sir Pertinax Mac Sycophant, Shylock, &c. He afterwards accepted an engagement in America, where he performed with similar success, but his indulgence in riotous and debauched habits completely broke up his originally vigorous constitution, and he died in 1812.

COOKE, THOMAS, an English poet; translator of the works of Hesiod, and of some of those of Cicero. He also wrote some political tracts, dramas, and poems; the latter of which gave offence to Pope, and procured their author a place in the Dunciad. Died, 1756.

COOKE, THOMAS, whose versatility of musical talent has had few equals in our time, was born at Dublin, 1781. He evinced even in his infancy a genius for music; and so assiduously did he cultivate his talents, that at the age of 15 he became leader of the band at the Theatre Royal of his native city. His first appearance as a singer was in the character of Seraskier, in the "Siege of Belgrade;" and so well did he fill the part, that he at once took rank as a first-class vocalist. In 1813 he appeared on the boards of the English Opera House, now the Lyceum, in London, where he at once became a public favourite; and having soon afterwards joined Drury Lane, he filled to the entire satisfaction of all parties, private, dramatic, and public, the various situations of vocalist, director of the musical department, composer, and leader of the orchestra. On his retirement from the stage, he became successively connected with the Philharmonic Society, the Catch Club, and other musical associations, reaping fresh laurels every year by his glees, duets, and ballads, and gaining golden opinions by his agreeable manners, ready wit, and kindly disposition. Besides being the leader of the Philharmonic Concerts for many years, and a conductor on many occasions, he was appointed, in 1846, leader of the Concerts of Ancient Music, and was repeatedly engaged in the same capacity for the great musical festivals throughout the country. Died, 1848.

COOKE, WILLIAM, an eminent English lawyer; author of a "Compendious System of the Bankrupt Laws, with an Appendix of Practical Precedents." He was one of the commissioners who were sent to Milan to take depositions against Queen Caroline, wife of George IV. Died, 1832.

COOKE, WILLIAM, a poet and biographer, born at Cork, in Ireland; author of "The Art of Living in London," "Elements of Dramatic Criticism," "Biographies of Macklin and Foote," "Conversation," a didactic poem, &c. Died, 1824.

COOMBE, WILLIAM, an industrious and clever writer; author of "The Diaboliad," a satire; "The Devil upon Two Sticks in England," "Tour of Dr. Syntax in search of the Picturesque," "History of Johnny Quæ Genus," "English Dance of Death," &c. Died, 1823.

COOPER, ANTHONY ASHLEY, first earl of Shaftesbury, an eminent statesman, born in 1621. He studied for a short time in Lincoln's Inn, but at the early age of 19 he was elected member of parliament for Shrewsbury. From this time his whole life was spent in business or political intrigue. At the breaking out of the civil war he at first sided with the king, but afterwards went over to the parliament, raised troops, and stormed Wareham, in Dorsetshire. After serving in the long parliament, and in the convention which succeeded it, and being also one of Cromwell's privy councillors, he became one of Monk's colleagues in bringing about the restoration of Charles II. For this important service he was raised to the peerage by the title of baron Ashley, and made a lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. As a member of the notorious Cabal ministry, great odium has been thrown upon him by some writers, while others affirm that he opposed some of its worst measures. At all events, his conduct was satisfactory to the king, who, in 1672, created him earl of Shaftesbury, and raised him to the high and important post of lord high chancellor. This office, however, he held only a year; and on the seals being taken from him he became one of the opposition. In this capacity he was so violent, that he was at length sent to the Tower, where he remained more than a year, and only obtained his release at last by making a full submission. When he again got into power, he had the merit of bringing forward, and causing to be passed, the invaluable law called the Habeas Corpus act. His unremitting efforts to exclude the Duke of York from the succession, roused that prince to such strenuous exertions, that in 4 months the ministry was turned out, and shortly afterwards the earl was sent to the Tower on a charge of high treason. On this perilous charge he was acquitted, to the great joy of the people at large; but his triumph was somewhat damped by the withering satire with which his character was depicted in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel. Wearied with incessant toils, much worn in health, and, probably, apprehensive of a time arriving when corruption might render his acquittal on charges, however false, by no means certain, he retired to Holland, where he died in 1683.

COOPER, ANTHONY ASHLEY, third earl of Shaftesbury, and grandson of the last named, was a very eminent English writer, born in 1671. In 1693, after the usual course of education and foreign travels, he was elected member of parliament for Poole, in Dorsetshire; and his parliamentary conduct was marked by an honourable and earnest support of every measure tending to increase the prosperity and maintain the freedom of his fellow subjects. But his public career was stopped by the delicacy of his health; and from the year 1698 he chiefly resided abroad, devoting himself to study, and corresponding with Bayle, Le Clerc, and other eminent literati. He was the author of various works, the principal one of which is entitled "Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times;" but though lively and elegant, they are all tinged with a degree of indecorous levity. As a man, however, both in his public and private life, he was beloved and respected by all parties. Died, 1713.

COOPER, SIR ASTLEY PASTON, bart., a surgeon of distinguished celebrity, was born at Brooke, in Norfolk, in 1768. He was placed with a medical gentleman at Yarmouth, in 1782, but was soon removed to London, in order to attend the hospitals, and was articled to his uncle, W. Cooper, Esq., then surgeon to Guy's Hospital. With him, however, he remained but a few months, being transferred to Mr. Cline, in which situation his extraordinary aptitude for his profession quickly developed itself. In his twentieth year he went to Edinburgh, but quickly returned to London, and took up his abode with Mr. Cline, his former instructor, who found him so able a coadjutor, in his situation of demonstrator to the students, as to assign him a share in his anatomical lectures also. In this prominent position he outshone all who had preceded him as a popular teacher. His class of students increased from 50 to 400, which was the largest ever known in London. "He was," says Mr. Pettigrew, "the idol of the Borough school; the pupils followed him in troops, listening with almost breathless anxiety to catch the observations which fell from his lips upon the several cases presented to his view. But on the days of operation, this feeling was wound up to the highest pitch—the sight was altogether deeply interesting; the large theatre of Guy's crowded to the ceiling—the profound silence obtained upon his entry—that person so manly and truly imposing, and the awful feeling connected with the occasion, can never be forgotten by any of his pupils." In 1792 he visited Paris, and attended the lectures of Desault and Chopart; and on his return he took up his residence in the city, first in Jeffery Square, and afterwards in Broad Street. His practice had now become immense; and, long before he removed to New Street, Spring Gardens, he was decidedly affluent: while there he for many years realised from 18,000*l.* to 20,000*l.* per annum. Satisfied with the acquisition of a splendid fortune, and a reputation for anatomical and surgical skill never surpassed, Sir Astley Cooper some years before his death retired for a time to the country; but he found that a life of quiescence and retirement would not suit his active mind, and he returned to London, once more to resume his professional avocations. Notwithstanding the immensity of his surgical operations, and the time he devoted to anatomical and physiological inquiries, he still found time to publish several works of great utility; but his imperishable fame rests mainly upon his accurate anatomical knowledge, and the extraordinary facility with which he performed the most difficult operations. The honour of a baronetcy was conferred on him at the coronation of George IV., to whom he had been appointed surgeon. Died Feb. 12. 1841, aged 72.

COOPER, JOHN GILBERT, a clever English writer; author of "The Power of Harmony," a poem; "The Life of Socrates," "Letters on Taste," "The Tomb of Shakspeare," &c. Died, 1769.

COOPER, SAMUEL, an eminent English painter, whose excellence in miniature painting gained him the name of the Miniature Vandyke. One of his best works is his portrait of Oliver Cromwell. Died, 1672.

COOPER, SAMUEL, an American clergyman, distinguished both as a preacher and a patriot. He was among the foremost in opposing Great Britain in her dispute with the colonies, and wrote many political tracts; and he was also an eminent critic and theologian. Born, 1725; died, 1823.

COOPER, THOMAS, D.D., bishop of Winchester; author of "An Epitome of the Sunday Lessons," "An Exposition of the Sunday Lessons," "Thesaurus Lingue Romanæ et Britannicæ, et Dictionarium Historicum et Poeticum," &c. He was a very learned and zealous prelate, and most favoured by queen Elizabeth. Died, 1594.

COOTE, Sir EYRE, a distinguished military officer. He was born in Ireland, in 1726, and as early as the rebellion of 1745 bore arms in the king's service. His regiment being ordered to the East Indies in 1754, he greatly distinguished himself at the sieges of Haughley, Chandernagore, and Pondicherry, and at the battle of Plassey, &c. In 1780, Hyder Ally having invaded the Carnatic, Sir Eyre Coote, with a vastly inferior force, arrested his progress, and in various encounters signally defeated him. He died at Madras, in 1783.

COPERNICUS, NICHOLAS, a celebrated mathematician and astronomer. He was a native of Thorn, in Prussia, and received his education at the university of Cracow. He then travelled into Italy, and became a professor of mathematics at Rome. On his return to his native country, his uncle, the bishop of Warmia, gave him a canonry; and being thus at ease as to fortune, he diligently laboured to improve the science of astronomy; and the fruits of his researches appeared in his Latin treatise "On the Revolutions of the Celestial Orbs," in which he represented the sun as occupying a centre round which the earth and the other planets revolve. Aware that bigotry would probably assail him, he says, in his prefatory address to the pope—"If there be any who, though ignorant of mathematics, shall presume to judge concerning them, and dare to condemn this treatise because they fancy it is inconsistent with some passages of Scripture, the sense of which they have miserably perverted, I regard them not, but despise their rash censure."

In fact his great work remained in MS. some years after he had completed it, so diffident was he as to the reception it might meet with; and it was only a few hours before his death that a printed copy was presented to him, giving him assurance that his opinions would see the light, though he would be beyond the reach of censure and persecution. Born, 1473; died, 1543.

COPLESTON, Right Rev. EDWARD, bishop of Llandaff, and dean of St. Paul's, was born at Offwell in Devonshire, of which parish his father was at once the patron and incumbent, 1776. His early education was conducted under the paternal roof. When he was 15 years old, he was elected to a scholarship at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. In 1798 he gained the chancellor's prize for a Latin poem; and in 1795 he was elected fellow of Oriel under the most honourable circumstances, became college tutor 2 years later, and after filling various higher offices connected with the university, he exchanged his professorial career for the honours of the church, being in 1826 appointed dean of Chester, and in 1827 bishop of Llandaff and dean of St. Paul's. At an early period of his life, Dr. Copleston gained great distinction by his polemical pamphlets in favour of the university; and besides contributing various articles to the Quarterly Review, gave to the world numerous sermons and charges, all of them distinguished by vigour, clearness, and precision of thought. Died, 1849.

COPLEY, JOHN SINGLETON, an eminent painter, was born at Boston, in the United States, in 1738; visited Italy in 1774; and in 1776 came to England, and was chosen a member of the Royal Academy. As an artist he was self-educated, and had executed many works of merit before he left America; but his "Death of Lord Chatham" established his fame in this country. Many other fine historical subjects were subsequently produced by him, among which were "The Siege of Gibraltar," "Death of Major Pierson," "Charles I. in the House of Commons," &c. He died in 1815. Mr. Copley was the father of Lord Lyndhurst, late lord chancellor of England, and since chief baron of the exchequer.

CORAM, THOMAS, a man who deserves the gratitude of his country for devoting a long life to the cause of philanthropy. After great sacrifices, and persevering exertions for years, he established and obtained a charter for the Foundling Hospital, which, added to other benevolent undertakings, so impaired his fortune, that in his old age it became necessary to relieve his necessities by a public subscription. Died, 1751.

CORBET, RICHARD, D.D., an English divine, and a poet; author of a spirited "Narrative of a Journey to France," and of various other poems, published under the title of "Poetica Stromata." He was remarkable for wit, and no less so for an eccentricity and mirthful jocularly, which did not very well accord with the character of his profession. It did not, however, prevent him from being raised, successively, to the bishoprics of Oxford and Norwich. Born, 1582; died, 1635.

CORDARA, JULIUS CÆSAR, an Italian

Jesuit; author of an able work, entitled, "Historia Societatis Jesu," &c. Died, 1784.

CORDAY D'ARMANS, MARIE ANNE CHARLOTTE, a female of great beauty and courage, who, in revenge for the death of her lover, an officer in the garrison of Caen, became the murderer of Marat, a wretch more execrable for his sanguinary fury than any of his infamous compeers. This monster had denounced her lover as an enemy of the French republic, and caused his assassination; and she determined to rid the country of one whose enormities had risen to such a height, that he was everywhere regarded as the head of that class so emphatically called buveurs de sang (the drinkers of blood). That she was actuated by a sense of duty, and felt that she was about to perform an act of patriotic heroism, there is not the slightest doubt; and as the circumstances attending it possess more than ordinary interest, the following detailed account will perhaps be here admissible, although our limits generally forbid the insertion of so long a narrative. Inspired with a deep-rooted hatred against Marat, Charlotte Corday left her home, and on arriving at Paris (July 12. 1793), she went to his house, but was not admitted. On the same evening she wrote to him as follows:—"Citizen, I have just now come from Caen. Your love for your country no doubt makes you desirous of being informed of the unhappy transactions in that part of the republic. Grant me an interview for a moment. I have important discoveries to make to you." The following day came, and, with a dagger in her bosom, she proceeded to the house of Marat, who, just on the point of coming out of his bath, immediately gave orders that she should be admitted. The assemblies at Calvados were the first subjects of conversation, and Marat heard with eagerness the names of those who were present at them. "All these," he exclaimed, "shall be guillotined." At these words Charlotte plunged her dagger into his bosom, and he instantly expired, uttering the words, "To me, my friend!" Meanwhile the maid remained calm and tranquil as the priestess before the altar, in the midst of the tumult and confusion. She was afterwards conducted as a prisoner to the Abbaye. A young man, who begged to die in her place, was also condemned to death. Her first care was to implore the forgiveness of her father for disposing of her life without his knowledge. She then wrote to Barbaroux as follows: "To-morrow, at 5 o'clock, my trial begins, and on the same day I hope to meet with Brutus and the other patriots in elysium." She appeared before the revolutionary tribunal with a dignified air, and her replies were firm and noble. She spoke of her deed as a duty which she owed her country. Her defender (Chaveau Lagarde), full of astonishment at such courage, cried out, "You hear the accused herself! She confesses her crime; she admits that she has coolly reflected upon it; she conceals no circumstance of it; and she wishes for no defence. This unshaken calmness, this total abandonment of herself, these appearances of the utmost internal tranquillity, are not natural! Such appearances are not to be explained only by that political fanaticism, which armed her hand with the dagger. To you then, gentlemen of the jury, it belongs to judge of what weight this moral view may be in the scale of justice!" His words could make no impression on the minds of the judges. She was condemned, and led to the scaffold; retaining her calmness and presence of mind to the last, though pursued by the crowd with yells and shouts of execration. She was born at St. Saturnin, near Seez, in Normandy, 1763; and suffered by the guillotine, July 17. 1793.

CORDIER, MATHURIN, an eminent professor at Paris in the 16th century, better known by his Latin name, CORDERIUS; author of the "Colloquies" so much used in the education of youth, and various other works. Died, 1564.

CORDINER, CHARLES, an antiquarian and topographical writer, was born at Peterhead in 1746. He completed his education at King's College, Aberdeen, and was soon after admitted to the order of priesthood by Dr. Traill of Down and Connor. He was afterwards appointed to the charge of St. Andrew's Episcopal Chapel, Banff. Mr. Cordiner was the first of the clergy of English ordination who united with the Scottish Episcopal Church after the abrogation of the very remarkable and severe penal laws passed in the reign of George II., and abolished under the more paternal government of George III. He early displayed a taste for drawing and painting, which he cultivated afterwards as an amusement for his leisure hours; and, during his residence at Banff, he designed the paintings of the windows of the mausoleum of Duff House for the Earl of Fife. He was also devotedly attached to the study of antiquities, more especially those of the northern parts of Scotland. He was introduced to Mr. Pennant, when on his tour through Scotland, and at his suggestion he was induced to write "The Picturesque Scenery and Antiquities of the North of Scotland," 1780, London, 1 vol. 4to; in a series of letters to Mr. Pennant, being a continuation or supplement of such places in the north of Scotland which had not been visited by that gentleman in the course of his tour. The engravings which accompany this work are from designs by Mr. Cordiner, and are much admired for their accuracy. He died at Banff, 19th November, 1794, aged 48.

CORDOVA, JOSE M., general in chief of the auxiliary Colombian army in Bolivia, who repeatedly distinguished himself by his bravery, and was for a long time the faithful adherent of Bolivar; but he set up the standard of revolt in Antioquia, where he was attacked by General O'Leary, and slain, Nov. 17. 1829.

CORELLI, ARCHANGELO, a Bolognese musician and composer. His fame chiefly rests upon his solos, which are considered a complete standard work for forming the hand of young violinists. Died, 1713.

CORIATE, or CORYATE, THOMAS, an English traveller and writer. For a considerable time he held a situation in the household of Prince Henry, son of James I., and was so remarkable for oddity and eccentricity, that, as Anthony Wood remarks, "he was the whetstone for all the wits of the age." In 1608 he commenced a pedestrian tour of Europe; and having walked 300 miles with one pair of shoes, he hung them up, on his return, in the parish church of his native place, Odcombe, in Somersetshire. This eccentric traveller, who is said to have introduced into England the use of table forks, published "Crndities hastily gobbled up in Five Months' Travel in France, Savoy, Italy, Rhetia, Helvetia, Germany, and the Netherlands;" "Coriate's Crambe, or his Colewort twice Sodden," "Traveller for the English Wits," and "A Letter from the Court of the Great Mogul." He died while travelling in the East Indies, in 1617.

CORILLA, MARIA MADELINA FERNANDEZ, a celebrated improvisatrice. Her abilities, both as a poetess and a musician, were very great, and so versatile, that a mere enumeration of the subjects upon which she could extemporise would demand more space than we can afford. She became a member of the academy of the Arcadi at Rome, and was solemnly crowned at the accession of Pius VI. She was married to a signor Morelli, of Leghorn; but her conduct after marriage was very unworthy of her great genius. Died, 1800.

CORINNA, a celebrated poetess, to whom the Greeks gave the appellation of the Lyric Muse. She composed a great number of poems, of which only a few fragments have come down to us; and five times obtained the poetic wreath from her great competitor, Pindar. She flourished in the 5th century B.C., and a tomb was erected to her memory in her native city, Tanagra, in Boeotia.

CORIOLANUS, CAIUS MARCIUS, was a descendant of the patrician family of the Marcii, and was from an early age distinguished for the courage and pride so much prized by the Romans. In a war with the Volscians, the Romans besieging Corioli, the capital of the Volscians, were driven back to their lines. Marcius rallied his countrymen, pursued the enemy, and possessed himself of Corioli; for which he was rewarded with a large share of the spoil, and with the surname of Coriolanus. Subsequently, in disputes which took place between the patricians and plebeians, Coriolanus made himself so obnoxious to the latter, that he was banished. Stung by the ingratitude of his countrymen, he joined the Volscians, and, jointly with Tullus Aufidius, led a numerous army against Rome. He had encamped within five miles of the city, and its ruin seemed inevitable, when, at the urgent entreaties of his mother, he withdrew his army. It is generally supposed that, in a tumult of the enraged Volscians, he was assassinated as a traitor to their cause; but the historian Fabius affirms that he lived many years after this event. B. C. 448.

CORNARO, LUDOVICO, a Venetian noble, whose precepts derive great force from the good result of his own practice of them. Having greatly injured his health by too free indulgence in the pleasures of the table, he had the resolution entirely to abandon that indulgence, and to restrict himself to 12 ounces of food and 14 ounces of wine in the 24 hours. Having by this regimen restored himself to health, he wrote various treatises recommendatory of the system from which he had derived so much benefit. Besides these, which are collected under the title of "Discorsi della Vita Sobria," he wrote "Trattato delle Acque." He commenced his dietary rule when he was 40, and died at the great age of 104, in 1566.

CORNEILLE, PIERRE, the greatest of the French dramatic poets. He was born at Rouen in 1606, and for some time practised in that city as an advocate. His first dramatic performance was "Mélite," a comedy, which met with such distinguished success, that he was encouraged to devote his rare powers to the drama. The tragedies of "Medea," "The Cid," "The Horatii," and "Cinna," followed, and established for their author a pre-eminent station among French dramatists. Besides the foregoing, he wrote many other tragedies; and translated Thomas à Kempis, "On the Imitation of Jesus Christ." It is melancholy to reflect that the great Corneille, who had achieved fame equally for himself and his country's literature, ended his days in poverty and distress. Died, 1684.

CORNEILLE, THOMAS, brother of the preceding, and also a fertile and successful dramatist, was born in 1625. Several of his tragedies are admirable; in fact, there seems to be a good deal of truth in Voltaire's assertion, that Thomas Corneille would have had a great reputation, if he had not had a great brother. Besides dramatic works, he wrote a "Dictionary of Arts and Sciences," a "Geographical and Historical Dictionary," and a translation of the Metamorphoses of Ovid. Died, 1708.

CORNELIA, an illustrious Roman lady. She was daughter of Scipio Africanus, wife of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, and mother of the two famous tribunes. She was of a grave and dignified deportment, and possessed so great a control over her feelings, that when a friend condoled with her on the death of her sons, she replied, "The woman who had the Gracchi for sons cannot be considered unfortunate." Her literary talents must have been considerable, as Cicero very highly commends some of her epistles. She flourished in the second century B.C., and after her death the Romans erected a statue to her memory, bearing the inscription, "To Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi."

CORNELISZ, or CORNELIUS, LUCAS, a Dutch painter, who came to England, and was much employed by Henry VIII., who appointed him his painter.

CORNWALLIS, Sir CHARLES, an able English statesman. He was sent to Spain as ambassador from James I., and was treasurer to that king's son, Prince Henry. Died, 1630.

CORNWALLIS, CHARLES, Marquis of, son of the first Earl Cornwallis, was born in 1738, and entered the army as soon as he had completed his education at Cambridge. In America he acted a conspicuous part, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Brandywine, and at the siege of Charlestown. After gaining the important battles of Camden and Guildford he determined to invade Virginia; but his plans failing, and owing, as he affirmed, to the inefficient conduct of Sir Henry Clinton, upon whom he had relied for support, he and his army were made prisoners. In 1786 he was made governor-general and commander-in-chief in India. The government of Bengal found it necessary to uphold the rajah of Travancore against the sultan of the Mysore, and the first campaign being unsuccessful, in 1791 he invaded the Mysore, besieged Seringapatam, and compelled Tip-poo Sahib to submit to the humiliating terms imposed on him by his conqueror. Having performed this important service, Lord Cornwallis returned to England, was raised to the rank of marquis, and made master-general of the ordnance. In 1798 he was sent to Ireland as lord lieutenant; and in the trying and terrible scenes of the rebellion so conducted himself as to gain the good opinion of the public, while vigorously upholding and vindicating the laws. In 1801 his lord-ship's lieutenantcy expired, and he was sent on a mission to France, where, in 1802, he signed the peace of Amiens. In 1804, he was a second time appointed governor-general of India; but his arduous services had now completely worn out his frame, and he died, soon after his arrival in India, at Ghazepore, in the province of Benares, in 1805.

CORONELLI, VINCENT, a Venetian ecclesiastic, and a professor of geography and mathematics. He was the author of a very extensive atlas, and the founder of the geographical society at Venice. Died, 1718.

CORREA DA SERRA, JOSEPH FRANCIS, a botanist, and the founder of the Academy of Sciences at Lisbon, was born at Serra, Portugal, in 1750. Having gone to France just previous to the revolution, and been intimate with Broussouet, the naturalist, he was charged with being a Jacobin and freemason, and compelled to fly his country, in order to escape from the fangs of the Inquisition. In 1816 he was sent to the United States as Portuguese envoy; re-called in 1819, to be a member of finance; and died in 1823.

CORREGGIO, ANTONIO ALLEGRI DA, a painter of transcendent ability, was born in 1494, at Correggio, in the duchy of Modena. He is the founder of the Lombard School, and unrivalled by all competitors for the grace and loveliness of his figures, and the exquisite harmony of his colouring. An absurd story, since disproved, was long current illustrative of his poverty, and the ill usage he met with from the ecclesiastics of Parma, from the cathedral of which city he painted the "Assumption of the Virgin," and other noted pictures. Died, 1534.

CORRI, DOMENICO, an Italian musician and composer. Having settled in England he produced "The Travellers, or Music's Fascination." He also published a variety of songs and other compositions, but his reputation is chiefly founded upon "The Travellers." Died, 1825.

CORSINI, EDWARD, an Italian monk, professor of philosophy and metaphysics at Pisa; author of "Philosophical and Mathematical Institutions," in six volumes; "Elementary Geometry," several classical works, "A History of the University of Pisa," &c. Died, 1765.

CORTEZ, or CORTES, FERNANDO, the conqueror of Mexico, was born, in 1485, at Medelin, in Estremadura, and, after studying the law, quitted it for the military profession. In 1511 he went with Velasquez to Cuba; and the conquest of Mexico being determined upon, Cortez obtained the command of the expedition for that purpose. In 1518 he set sail with 700 men in 10 vessels; and on landing at Tabasco he caused his vessels to be burned, in order that his soldiers might have no other resource than their own valour. Having conquered the Tlascalans, and induced them to become his allies, he marched towards Mexico, where he was amicably received; but having seized upon their inca, Montezuma, and treated the people with the utmost insolence, the Mexicans first murmured, and then resisted. Cortez besieged the city of Mexico; and in the desperate struggle which ensued, it is said that upwards of 100,000 of the faithful and unfortunate Mexicans were killed or perished by famine. Having reduced the devoted city, Cortez completely overran the Mexican territories; in doing which he committed atrocities which would be incredible if related on any less irrefragable testimonies than those which compel our belief. In reward for the addition he had made to the wealth of Spain, he had a grant of land and the title of marquis; but on returning he found that the court of Madrid were become jealous of his power, and treated him with cold neglect. Died, 1554.

CORTONA, PIETRODA, properly PIETRO BERRETTINI, an Italian painter. He was a native of Cortona, in Tuscany, and at an early age was placed under the tuition of Baccio Ciampi at Rome. The Barberini palace, the new works at the Vatican, and many of the churches of Rome, were decorated by him; and at Florence he adorned the Pitti palace for the Grand-duke Ferdinand II. In addition to being an eminent painter, he was almost equally eminent as an architect. Died, 1669.

CORVISART, JOHN NICHOLAS, an eminent French physician, was born in 1755. He was intended for the law, but his predilection for medical science induced his friends to change his destination. He was chief physician to Napoleon, who made him a baron, and an officer of the legion of honour. Nor was his great merit overlooked by the Bourbons, the place of honorary member of the royal academy of medicine being conferred on him a short time previous to his death, which happened in 1821. He was the author of some valuable medical books, and translated others.

COSIN, JOHN, a learned, pious, and charitable prelate, was born at Norwich, in 1594, and educated at Cambridge. In 1640 he was made dean of Peterborough; but the Puritans deprived him of his preferments, and even went the length of impeaching him on a charge of being inclined to popery. On this he retired to France, where he remained until the restoration of Charles II., who raised him to the see of Durham. Among his writings are "A History of Transubstantiation" and "A Scholastical History of the Canon of the Holy Scriptures." Died, 1672.

COSMAS, surnamed INDICOPLEUSTES, a celebrated merchant of Alexandria, living in the 6th century; who, after making a voyage to India, and writing several books on cosmography, quitted commerce and became a monk.

COSMO I., grand-duke of Tuscany, born in 1519, was the son of John de Medici; and on the assassination of Alexander, chief of the house of Medici, was elected head of the republic of Florence, though strenuously opposed by a party who favoured the Florentine exiles. Several attempts were made to shake the power of Cosmo, but he succeeded in defeating them; and it was probably in order to secure himself able and zealous defenders in case of open revolt, that he instituted the military order of the Knights of St. Stephen. He restored the university of Pisa, and held out the most liberal encouragement to men of scientific and literary eminence to settle there as professors. He also founded the academy of Florence, established its gallery of paintings, and performed many other wise and honourable actions; thus procuring himself a celebrity and influence which probably he would in vain have sought by the more dazzling, but infinitely less useful, achievements of the warrior. After a prosperous reign of 34 years, he died in 1574.

COSTA, EMANUEL MENDEZ DA, a learned naturalist, foreign secretary to the Royal Society; author of "A Natural History of Fossils," "Elements of Conchology," and of various useful papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

COSTA FURTADO DE MENDOÇA, HIPOLITO JOSEPH DA, a Portuguese gentleman of scientific and literary attainments, who, being charged with freemasonry, was thrown into the prison of the Inquisition at Lisbon. Here he was repeatedly examined, and his answers not being satisfactory to his persecutors, he was remanded to his dungeon, with little prospect that his sufferings would terminate otherwise than in death. By one of those fortunate accidents which sometimes make "truth stranger than fiction," his cell was left open, and he was enabled to possess himself of a bunch of keys which opened every lock that was between him and liberty. Having taken these keys, and a book which lay beside them, he made his escape; and after lying hidden several weeks in the immediate neighbourhood of his late dungeon, he found means to embark for England. The book which he brought from his prison contained, inter alia, notes of his examinations before the inquisitors; and soon after his arrival he published a narrative of the persecutions he had undergone, the account of his examinations being taken from the official document of which he had thus oddly become possessed. His talents, and the interest excited by his adventures, obtained him considerable notice, and he became foreign secretary to the Duke of Sussex, and chargé d'affaires in this country for the Brazilian government. Died, 1824.

COSTANZA, ANGELO DI, a Neapolitan poet, of noble birth; author of sonnets and other poems, and of "istoria del Regno di Napoli," containing the history of Naples from 1250 to 1489. Died, 1591.

COSTARD, GEORGE, a learned English divine; author of "Letters on the Astronomy of the Ancients," a treatise on "The Use of Astronomy in Chronology and History," "A Commentary on the Book of Job," &c. Born, 1710; died, 1782.

COSTE, PIERRE, a learned French Protestant, for some time resident in England, and who acted as amanuensis to Locke, but subsequently returned to his own country. He translated into French Locke's Reasonableness of Christianity, Newton's Optics, &c. He also wrote the "Life of the Great Condé." Died, 1747.

COSTER, LAURENCE JANSEN, a native of Haerlem, in Holland, to whom his countrymen ascribed the invention of the art of printing, in the year 1430. The Germans, however, with sufficient proof assert, that the merit is due to Guttemberg, Coster having merely used wooden blocks, and not, as Junius asserts, metal types. Born, 1370; died, 1439.

COSWAY, RICHARD, an eminent English artist. He painted miniatures admirably, and was almost equally great as an oil painter. He was much admired and employed as an artist, and highly esteemed as a man, in despite of the most preposterous mysticism and a host of erudulous eccentricities, which he constantly indulged in to such a degree, that it is but charitable to suppose they had their source in a disordered imagination. He was one of the oldest members of the Royal Academy, and died at the age of 90, in 1821.

COTELIER, JOHN, a learned French divine and critic; the author of "Ecclesia Græcæ Monumenta," and the coadjutor of Du Cange in making a catalogue of the Greek MSS. in the royal library at Paris. Died, 1686.

COTES, FRANCIS, an English artist of great eminence as a portrait painter, as well in oil as in crayons. Died, 1770.

COTIN, CHARLES, a French poet of the 17th century, chiefly known now from the satires levelled at him by Boileau and Molière. He was counsellor and almoner to the king, and a member of the French academy. Born, 1604; died, 1682.

COTOLENDI, CHARLES, a French advocate; author of "Biographies of S. Francis de Sales, Columbus, and Madame de Montmorenci," and other works. Died, 1701.

COTTA, J. G., Baron, an eminent bookseller of Germany, and the proprietor of the Allgemeine Zeitung, a political daily paper, as well as of several others devoted to literature and the arts, was born at Stuttgart, in 1764; for many years carried on an extensive and flourishing concern; and died in 1832.

COTTERELL, Sir CHARLES, an excellent linguist and scholar of the 17th century. He was master of the requests to Charles II., an office which was filled by his descendants for several generations. He translated the romance of Cassandra from the French, besides some works from the Spanish and Italian. Died, 1687.

COTTIN, SOPHIA DE, an accomplished French lady; authoress of "Matilde," "Claire d'Albe," the well known and highly popular "Elizabeth, ou les Exilés de Siberia," &c. Born, 1773; died, 1807.

COTTON, CHARLES, an English poet of the 17th century; author of "Scarronides, or Virgil Travestic;" a supplement to Walton's Treatise on Angling, and a volume of original poems, &c. He also translated Corneille's tragedy of the Horatii and Montaigne's Essays. Born, 1630; died, 1687.

COTTON, NATHANIEL, an English physician and poet; author of "Visions in Verse for the Instruction of Younger Minds." He for some years kept a lunatic asylum at St. Alban's, and the poet Cowper was for a time one of its inmates. Born, 1707; died, 1788.

COTTON, SIR ROBERT BRUCE, a distinguished English antiquarian, was born at Denton, in Huntingdonshire, in 1570. In 1629 he was brought before the privy council, in consequence of a political treatise of his in MS. being lent by his librarian, the contents of which gave so much offence at court, that although Sir Robert was unaware of his librarian's conduct, he was sent to the Tower. He wrote "The Antiquity and Dignity of Parliaments;" and assisted, both with his literary treasures and his purse, Speed, Camden, and other writers on British archaeology. His valuable library is now in the British Museum. Died, 1631.

COTUGNO, DOMENICO, an Italian physician and anatomist; author of "De Aqueductibus Auris humanæ internæ Dissertatio," &c. He discovered that part of the organ of hearing which is named after him Aqueductus Cotunii. Died, 1822.

COUDRETE, CHRISTOPHER, a French priest, and a very able opponent of the Jesuits; author of "A General History of the Jesuits," "Memoirs relative to the Formulary," &c. His bold and liberal tone of thought caused him to be twice imprisoned; at Venice in 1735; and at Paris, in the Bastille, in 1738. Died, 1774.

COULOMB, CHARLES AUGUSTIN DE, a French philosopher and officer of engineers, to whose scientific labours many discoveries in electricity and magnetism are owing. He was born at Angoulême in 1736, and died in 1806.

COUPLET, PHILIP, a Flemish Jesuit and missionary to China; author of "Chronological Tables of Chinese History," "A Treatise on the Philosophy of Confucius," &c. He died, while on a second voyage to China, in 1693.

COURAYER, PETER FRANCIS LE, a Norman ecclesiastic, was born in 1681. Although of the Catholic Church, he wrote zealously and ably in defence of the ordinances of the Church of England, which work was formally censured by an assembly of French cardinals and archbishops; and Courayer consequently left France for England. Here he was well received, and the University of Oxford conferred the degree of LL.D. upon him. Died, 1776.

COURIER, PAUL LOUIS, a witty and able French writer, was born in 1774. He served for some time as an officer in the army; but his republican principles prevented his advancement under Buonaparte; and after the battle of Wagram, he threw up his commission, and resided for some time in Italy. On his return to France his name became notorious as the author of several admirable political pamphlets, but his career was cut short by assassination, in 1825.

COURTANVAUX, FRANCIS CÆSAR LE TELLIER, Marquis de, a French military officer, and also a distinguished natural philosopher. He served with great ability and courage in Bavaria and Bohemia under his uncle, the Marshal de Noailles; but was obliged to quit the service in 1745 on account of ill health. He then devoted his time to science, and became a member of the academy. He was a good astronomer and mechanic. Died, 1781.

COURT DE GEBELIN, ANTHONY, a native of France, minister of the reformed church at Lausanne, in Switzerland; author of "Le Monde Primitif analysé et comparé avec le Monde Moderne," a pamphlet in praise of animal magnetism, &c. Died, 1784. He twice received the prize of 1200 livres annually given by the French academy.

COURTILZ, GAMES DE, a French military officer, remarkable for his strong predilection for literature. His works are "The Annals of Paris," "A History of the Dutch War," "The Lives of Coligni, Turenne, and Rochfort," &c. Some of his opinions giving offence to the court, he was thrown into the Bastille, where he remained nine years. Died, 1712.

COURTNEY, JOHN, a member of the noble Devonshire family bearing that name, was born in Ireland, and became secretary to Marquis Townshend when lord-lieutenant. Being elected member of parliament for Tamworth, he attached himself to the Whig party, and was a commissioner of the treasury in the Fox ministry of 1806. He was a witty and eloquent speaker, and also distinguished himself as an author by his "Poetical Review of the Literary and Moral Character of Dr. Johnson," "Philosophical Reflections on the French Revolution," &c. Died, 1816.

COURTNEY, WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury, born, 1341. He was the fourth son of Hugh Courtney, earl of Devonshire, and Margaret, daughter of Edward I. In 1376, then being bishop of London, he distinguished himself by a violent opposition to the king's demand for a subsidy. In 1381 he became archbishop of Canterbury and lord high chancellor, in which office he showed a rancorous spirit of persecution against the Wickliffites. His character was resolute and arrogant; and though he professed a desire to support the king and the people against the encroachments of the pope, his actions invariably showed that he was in heart a domineering prelate, thoroughly devoted to Rome, and caring little for the dignity of the crown, or the weal of the people. Died, 1396.

COURTOIS, JAMES, surnamed IL BORGONONE, a French painter, especially eminent in battle-pieces. His wife dying of poison, which he was suspected of having administered, he took the habit of a lay brother of the Jesuits, with whom, though he still practised his art, he remained till his death, in 1676.

COURTOIS, WILLIAM, brother of the above, and also an eminent painter. He excelled in historical pieces, and assisted his brother in some of his works. Died, 1679.

COUSIN, JOHN, a native of France, and generally regarded as the earliest French historical painter. He chiefly painted on glass, but his "Last Judgment," painted on canvass for the convent of the Minions at Vincennes, is esteemed an excellent work. He was the author of "Livre de Perspective," and some other treatises connected with the art. Died, 1590.

COUSIN, LOUIS, a French advocate and miscellaneous writer; author of translations from Eusebius and other early church historians, &c. He also edited the Journal des Savans, from 1687 to 1701. Born, 1627; died, 1707.

COUSTON, NICHOLAS and WILLIAM, brothers; two French sculptors of considerable eminence in their profession: the former born at Lyons, in 1658; died, 1733: the latter born in 1678; died, 1746.

COUTHON, GEORGE, a French advocate and president of the court of justice at Clermont. Becoming a member of the legislative assembly and of the national convention, he voted for the trial and death of Louis XVI.; and after hesitating awhile as to the party with which he should act, gave in his adhesion to that of Robespierre. When troops were sent against Lyons, he was commissioner from the convention, and gave with his own hand the signal for the destruction of the noble buildings of that devoted city. Sharing the power and participating in the atrocities of Robespierre, he was also involved in his ruin. Guillotined, 1794.

COUTTS, THOMAS, a London banker, eminent for his wealth and connexions. He came from Scotland at an early age; and from being a junior partner in a mercantile house in the city, rose to be one of the most considerable bankers in England. He was twice married; first to Susan Starkie, by whom he had three daughters; Susan, married, in 1796, to the Earl of Guildford; Frances, married, in 1800, to the Marquis of Bute; and Sophia, married, in 1793, to Sir Francis Burdett. In 1815 his first wife died; and, three months afterwards, he married Harriet Mellon, an actress of some celebrity, to whom he bequeathed the whole of his immense property, consisting of 600,000*l.* in personals, besides real estates in lands and houses, to a great amount. He died in 1821, aged 86; and his widow in due time bestowed her hand and fortune on the youthful Duke of St. Alban's.

COUVREUR, ADRIENNE LE, a celebrated French actress. She was the mistress of the great Marshal Saxe, and when that celebrated commander was in great distress for money and troops, she pledged her plate and jewels for 40,000 livres, and sent the money to him. Died, 1730.

COVELL, JOHN, D. D., a learned English divine. He was for some time chaplain to the English embassy in Turkey, and, while resident in that country, obtained much valuable knowledge on the early constitution of the Greek Church, on which subject, when he returned to England, he published a very valuable work. Died, 1722.

COVENTRY, HENRY, author of "Letters of Philemon to Hydaspes," and one of the authors of the well-known "Athenian Letters." Died, 1752.

COVENTRY, JOHN, a skilful, self-taught English mechanic, whose genius led him to make experiments in mechanics. He invented an hygrometer, which met with the approbation of the Royal Society, and was presented to the king. Subsequently he employed himself in drawing micrometers on ivory and glass; and to such a perfection did he bring them, that his squares were only the millionth part of an inch superficial. He also made two chamber organs, telescopes of extraordinary power, and some balances for the assaying of gold, of such nicety that they would weigh to the thousandth part of a grain. Died, 1812.

COVENTRY, THOMAS, lord keeper of the great seal in the reign of Charles I., was the son of Thomas Coventry, a justice of the court of common pleas. He was born in 1578; educated at Baliol College, Oxford; studied the law in the Inner Temple; and having by various gradations become solicitor-general, attorney-general, and lord keeper, in 1628, he was raised to the peerage; and, according to the character given of him by Clarendon, he was well worthy of his great and uninterrupted success.

COVENTRY, WILLIAM, son of the above. He was knighted in 1665, and made a commissioner of the treasury in 1667; but having offended the Duke of Buckingham, he was forbidden to appear at court. On this he retired to his seat in Oxfordshire, and passed the remainder of his life in privacy. He was author of several works of a political tendency, but not now worth enumerating. Died, 1686.

COVERDALE, MILES, an English divine, and one of the earliest reformers. He was educated at Cambridge, and became a canon of the order of St. Augustin. Having embraced the reformed doctrines he went abroad, and, in 1532, joined William Tyndale in translating the Scriptures. On his return to England he was made almoner to queen Catharine, and subsequently bishop of Exeter. On the accession of queen Mary he retired to the Continent, but returned on the accession of Elizabeth. He died in 1580, aged 81.

COWARD, WILLIAM, an English physician, and author of "Thoughts on the Human Soul; demonstrating the Notion of the Human Soul united to the Human Body to be an Invention of the Heathens, and not consonant to the Principles of Philosophy or Reason." This work excited considerable indignation among the more zealous divines, who procured an order to have it burned by the common hangman. He died about the year 1722.

COWELL, JOHN, an English lawyer and antiquary; author of "The Interpreter," a law dictionary, which was burned by the common hangman on account of some unconstitutional doctrines on the king's prerogative, and "The Institutes of the Laws of England." Died, 1611.

COWLEY, ABRAHAM, an eminent English poet, born in London, 1618. Educated as a king's scholar at Westminster, he very early evinced a taste and aptitude for poetry; and, while only in his 17th year, published a volume entitled "Poetical Blossoms," which procured him considerable reputation. In 1636 he was elected a scholar of Trinity College, Cambridge; where he produced a pastoral comedy, entitled "Love's Riddle," and "Naufragium Joculare," a Latin comedy, which was performed by the members of his college. He resided at the university until 1643, when he was ejected by the Puritan visitors, and became an active partisan of the royal cause. He was much esteemed by Lord Falkland, and accompanied the king in several journeys. When the queen left the country he accompanied her majesty, and remained abroad for some years; during which time he was a chief agent in managing the correspondence between the king and queen. In 1656 he returned to England, and soon after published a volume containing most of the poems printed in the final collection of his works. Being suspected by the party in power, he was thrown into prison, but released on the bail of Dr. Scarborough. He again went abroad, and was again employed in aiding the royal cause. On the Restoration taking place he was for some time neglected; but at length, by the interest of the Duke of Buckingham, he obtained the lease of a farm at Chertsey, which produced him about 300*l.* a year. Died, 1687.

COWLEY, HANNAH, an accomplished English dramatic writer; authoress of "The Runaway," "The Belle's Stratagem," "More Ways than One," &c., besides some poems and farces. The sprightliness of dialogue, and the variety of characters and incidents which this lady introduced in her dramatic works, evince much versatility of genius. Garrick, it is said, could hardly be persuaded that her first piece was the production of a mere boarding-school girl. Died, 1809.

COWLEY, HENRY WELLESLEY, Lord, a distinguished diplomatist, and a scion of that illustrious family of which the Duke of Wellington is the last surviving representative, was born 1773. His first public debut was made as a precis writer in the Foreign Office; he then joined the embassy of Lord Malmesbury to Lille, where he became initiated in diplomatic affairs, and in 1797 he accompanied his brother Lord Wellesley to India, in the capacity of private secretary. Here he was employed in various offices and missions of great delicacy and responsibility; but Europe had more attractions for him than the East, and he returned to England in 1804. In 1807 he was returned to parliament for Eye, and became one of the secretaries of the Treasury; but he did not make any great figure in parliament, and in 1809 he exchanged his parliamentary duties for the embassy at Madrid; a mission which, amid great difficulties and obstructions of all kinds, he fulfilled for thirteen years, to his own increasing reputation, and the welfare of his country. In 1823 he went as ambassador to Vienna; here he remained till 1831; and for the ability he displayed there, coupled with his length of service, he was raised to the peerage with the title of baron Cowley—the original patronymic of the Wellesley family. In 1841 he was appointed ambassador to the Tuilleries. This office he held till the fall of Sir Robert Peel's ministry in 1846; but, long before this event, his declining health had made his voluntary retirement advisable, and, in fact, he did not survive it above a twelvemonth. Died, 1847.

COWPER, WILLIAM, Earl, an eminent English lawyer, who, after passing through various gradations of office, was raised to the peerage in the reign of queen Anne, by the title of viscount Fordwich, and made lord high chancellor. This office he resigned in 1710, but accepted it again in 1714. In 1717 he was created earl Cowper, and in 1718 wholly retired from office. During the latter years of his public life, he very ably exerted himself in favour of religious liberty; and particularly in causing a bill to be thrown out, by which Unitarians would have been subject to severe penalties. Died, 1733.

COWPER, WILLIAM, a distinguished English poet, was born at Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, in 1731. He was the son of a clergyman of good family, and was at an early age removed from a country school to that of Westminster. Being naturally of a timid temper and slight frame, the rough usage he met with from stronger and less sensitive boys rendered his school a place of complete torture to him, as may be seen from the tone of his "Tirocinium." On quitting school, he was articled to an attorney, with whom he remained for three years, and then entered himself of the Middle Temple. He seems, however, to have been by nature unfit for the rough paths of life; for though the interest of his family had procured him the valuable and honourable place of clerk to the House of Lords, his nervousness and mauvaise honte were such, that he was obliged to resign it. He now fell into so terrible a state of nervous and mental debility, that he was for some time placed in the lunatic asylum of Dr. Cotton. The skill and humanity of that gentleman restored him, and he retired to Huntingdon. Here he became acquainted with the family of the Reverend Mr. Unwin; and after that gentleman's death he removed, with Mrs. Unwin, to Olney, Bucks, where he contracted a close friendship with the curate of Olney, the Reverend John Newton, and subsequently with Lady Austen. His natural melancholy gave him so gloomy a view of religion, that his mind was frequently reduced to imbecility. While this was the case, the influence of Lady Austen tended to rouse and sustain him; though that of his other friends seems rather to have increased his weakness, by coinciding with his delusions. But although his mind was so frequently assailed by gloom, and bent down by despondency, he was not only a very voluminous writer, but a poet of first-rate merit. In addition to translating Homer, which he did with more accuracy than Pope, if with less polish, he wrote "The Task,"—the best of all his poems,—"Tirocinium," and a host of smaller poems; and translated some of Madame Guyon's spiritual songs; and his correspondence, which exhibits him as one of the most elegant of English letter-writers, was extremely voluminous. Towards the close of his life, his gloom deepened into absolute despair, from which he never wholly emerged, and he died, 1800. Ample justice has of late been done to the poet, in splendid rival editions of his complete works,—the one by Dr. Southey, the other by the Rev. T. Grimshawe, both published in 1836.

COX, Mrs. LETITIA. The name of this female, who died at Bybrook, in Jamaica, June 26, 1838, is inserted here as affording the most surprising instance of longevity to be met with in modern times. By her own account she was a grown-up young woman at the time of the destruction of Port Royal by an earthquake (June 9, 1692), so that she must have been upwards of 160 years of age. It is worthy of observation also, and especially interesting to those who advocate the "temperance" system, that she declared she never drank anything but water during her whole life.

COX, RICHARD, bishop of Ely; was born at Whaddon, Bucks, in 1500. While at New College, he embraced the opinions of the Reformation, and was consequently thrown into gaol, but obtained his release through the influence of Cranmer. He was then made master of Eton School, and subsequently became tutor to Edward VI., in whose reign he was made a privy councillor, almoner to the king, dean of Westminster, and chancellor of Oxford. During the reign of Mary he resided abroad; but returned to England on the accession of Elizabeth, and was made bishop of Ely. He contributed the Gospels, the Acts, and the Epistle to the Romans, to the "Bishops' Bible," besides writing various controversial tracts.

COXE, WILLIAM, an historian and traveller, was born in 1747. After receiving an university education, he successively accompanied several young noblemen to the Continent in the capacity of tutor; and on his return obtained various preferments in the church till he became a canon residentiary of Salisbury and archdeacon of Wilts. He was the author of "Travels in Switzerland;" "Travels in Poland, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark;" "a History of the House of Austria;" "Historical Memoirs of the Kings of Spain;" "Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole;" and many other works equally interesting, and valuable for their research and adherence to truth. Died, 1828.

COYER, GABRIEL FRANCIS, a French writer, born in 1707. His principal works are the "History of John Sobieski," "Travels into Italy and Holland," and his translation into French of Blackstone's Commentaries. Died, 1782.

COYPEL, the name of several eminent French painters. NOEL COYPEL was born in 1628, and died in 1707. He adorned the old Louvre and the Tuileries, painted some fine pictures for the council hall of Versailles, and executed several scriptural pieces of great merit. His son, ANTHONY, was distinguished by the richness of his imagination and the dazzling nature of his colouring; and his fame laid the foundation for the mannerism of the French school. Died, 1721. NOEL NICHOLAS, usually called Coyvel the uncle, despised the false glitter of this school, and aimed only at truth and nature. He died in 1735. CHARLES ANTHONY, the son of Anthony, was a decided copyist of his father's manner, and accommodated himself to the prevailing taste of the times for gaudy colouring. Born, 1694; died, 1752.

COYSEVOX, ANTOINE, a celebrated sculptor, was born at Lyons, in 1640, and died at Paris, in 1720. Among his best works are the statue of Cardinal Mazarin, in the museum at Paris; an equestrian statue of Louis XIV.; Castor and Pollux, &c. On account of the beauty and animation of his portraits, he was called the Vandyke of sculpture.

CRABBE, Rev. GEORGE, rector of Troubridge, Wilts, and author of "The Library," "The Village," "Tales of the Hall," &c.; a poet, whose "short and simple annals of the poor" exhibit an accurate knowledge of human nature, and show that however homely or painful the scenes may be which he depicts, there is no want of skill or truth in his representations. He had the good fortune to receive the early patronage of the celebrated Edmund Burke, which led to other valuable connections, of whom Dr. Johnson was one; and eventually to church preferment at the hands of the Duke of Rutland. Born, 1754; died, 1832. Crabbe's poetry is distinguished for minuteness of description and close analysis in depicting human character, however dark or disgusting; yet, though searching, minute, and often repulsive, it abounds with vigour, pathos, and originality. An elegant edition of his works, with a life and notes, by his son, was published by Mr. Murray, in 1834.

CRAIG, JOHN, a Scotch mathematician, of the 17th century; famous for a work entitled "Theologiæ Christianæ Principia Mathematica." The object of this curious tract is to apply mathematical calculation to the credibility of the gospel history; upon which principle he maintains that the Christian religion must end, according to the doctrine of chances, in the year 3150, when our Saviour will make his second appearance!

CRAIG, Sir THOMAS, an eminent Scotch lawyer, born in 1548; author of a treatise on feudal law, which has often been reprinted. Died, 1608.

CRAIG, WILLIAM, a Scotch judge, and a literary character of no mean ability, was born in 1745, received his education at the university of Glasgow; entered at the bar in 1768, and succeeded Lord Hailes on the bench in 1792. He was a principal contributor to the Mirror, wrote many papers in the Lounger, and numbered among his friends some of the most eminent literary men of the age. Died, 1813.

CRACKANTHORPE, RICHARD, a learned English divine, and the author of some able works in support of Protestantism. Died, 1624.

CRAMER, FRANCIS, an eminent musician, was born at Mannheim, 1772. Under the direction of his father, formerly leader of the opera band in London, he prosecuted the study of music, for which he had shown an early predilection. In 1799 he succeeded his father as leader of the Ancient Concerts; for many years he was alternate leader of the Philharmonic Concerts with Loder, T. Cooke, Weichsels, &c.; and for upwards of 40 years held the chief place at the great provincial festivals. Died, 1848.

CRAMER, GABRIEL, an eminent geometer; editor of the works of Wolf and the Bernouillis, and author of several mathematical and algebraic works. Born, 1704; died, 1752.

CRAMER, JOHN ANDREW, a German mineralogist, was born at Quedlinburg, in 1710. He was the first who systematised the art of assaying, upon which subject he wrote a very able work. Died, 1777.

CRAMER, JOHN ANDREW, a German poet and miscellaneous writer, was born in Saxony, 1723, but principally resided in Denmark, where he died in 1788. Besides his poems, he wrote "The Northern Spectator," and "Sermons," in 22 vols. He also translated Bossuet's Universal History and other works.

CRAMER, JOHN ANTHONY, D.D., dean of Carlisle, a well-known writer on subjects of classical antiquity, was born in Switzerland, 1793. He received his education in England, and in 1811 was admitted a student of Christchurch, Oxford, where he greatly distinguished himself, and gradually rose through all the university honours, till, in 1831, he was appointed principal of New Hall Inn. During this period he was actively engaged in literary pursuits; and his descriptions of Ancient Italy, Asia Minor, and Ancient Greece are enduring monuments of his accuracy and research. In 1842 he succeeded Dr. Arnold as regius professor of modern history; and in 1844 he was nominated to the deanery of Carlisle. Died, 1848.

CRANMER, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury, whose life is rendered so memorable by the part he took in the Reformation, was born at Aslacton, Nottinghamshire, in 1489, and educated at Jesus College, Cambridge. The opinion which he gave on the question of Henry VIIIth's divorce from his first wife, Catharine of Arragon, recommended him to that monarch, who employed him to vindicate the measure, and sent him to the foreign universities to obtain their opinion upon the point. On Cranmer's return, the king raised him to the archbishopric of Canterbury, in which office he zealously promoted the cause of the Reformation. Through his means the Bible was translated and read in churches; and he greatly aided in suppressing the monastic institutions. In 1536, when Anna Boleyn was destined to lose her reputation and her life, Cranmer meanly stooped to promote the sentence of divorce. This and other compliances with the monarch's will ensured him the gratitude of Henry; who upheld him in all his contests with Bishop Gardiner and others who accused him of heresy and faction. By Henry's will he was appointed one of the council of regency to Edward VI.; and as the young king was brought up chiefly under the archbishop's care, it enabled him to further the objects of the Reformation in a regular and consistent manner, by framing the liturgy, the homilies, articles of religion, &c. When Edward was prevailed on to alter the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey, the archbishop opposed it for a considerable time, but at length consented. On the accession of Mary he was tried on charges of blasphemy, perjury, incontinence, and heresy, and sentenced to be deprived of office. Tempted however, by the promise of pardon, he was induced to sign a recantation of his principles, and avow his sorrow for having entertained them. This was the great object of his enemies. But when Cranmer, who had been sent to Oxford, was brought into St. Mary's church to read his recantation in public, instead of doing what was required of him, he besought the forgiveness of God for the apostasy of which he had been guilty, and exhorted the people against the errors of the Church of Rome, declaring that nothing could afford him consolation but the prospect of extenuating his guilt by encountering the fiery torments which awaited him. This greatly enraged his adversaries, who, after vilifying him as a hypocrite and heretic, dragged him to the stake opposite Baliol College, which he approached with a cheerful countenance, and met his death with the utmost fortitude, exclaiming, as he held out his right hand for the flames to consume it, "This unworthy hand! this unworthy hand!" thus strikingly proving the remorse he felt at having been induced to sign his recantation. Whatever may be said with regard to his submission to the will of a despotic sovereign, or his occasional unsteadiness of principles, it is certain that no man contributed so much as Cranmer to the establishment and independence of the English Church. Died, March 21. 1556.

CRANZ, or KRANZ, DAVID, a Moravian preacher, born 1723, and resided several years as a missionary in Greenland, of which country he wrote a valuable history; also "A History of the Moravians." Died, 1777.

CRASHAW, RICHARD, a poet, born in London, and educated at Cambridge. He was a friend of the poet Cowley; and having embraced the Roman Catholic faith, was appointed to a canonry at Loretto. His poems have considerable merit, and contain ideas which were thought worthy of imitation both by Milton and Pope. Died, 1650.

CRASSUS, LUCIUS LICINIUS, a Roman orator, of whom Cicero speaks in terms of the highest praise. He was consul B.C. 96, and afterwards censor.

CRASSUS, MARCUS LICINIUS, surnamed

Dives from his riches, was of the same family as the preceding. He defeated Spartacus, and put an end to the Servile war. He was first consul, then censor, and formed one of the triumvirate with Cæsar and Pompey. He perished, with a great part of his army, in an expedition against the Parthians, B.C. 53.

CRATINUS, an Athenian poet, to whom the invention of satirical comedy and comic poetry is attributed. His powers of sarcasm are said to have been unrivalled. He was an exception to the rule that intemperance leads to an early grave, having attained the age of 97, though a bon vivant in its fullest sense. Died, B. C. 431.

CRATIPPUS, a peripatetic philosopher, and tutor to the younger Cicero at Athens, where his lectures were well attended.

CRAWFORD, ADAM, a physician and naturalist of considerable eminence in his profession; physician to St. Thomas's Hospital, and professor of chemistry at Woolwich. He was the author of several chemical works, and the first who prescribed muriate of barytes for the scrofula. Born, 1749; died, 1795.

CRAWFORD, ANNE, an actress of great ability, which, combined with her personal beauty, caused her for many years to be highly attractive on the stage. Died, 1801, aged 67.

CRAWFORD, DAVID, historiographer for Scotland in the reign of queen Anne, and the author of several works relative to that country. Died, 1726.

CRAYER, GASPAR, an eminent painter, born at Antwerp in 1582. His productions are allowed to possess great fidelity to nature and excellence of colouring. Died, 1669.

CREBILLON, PROSPER JOLYOT DE, a French dramatic poet, denominated the French Æschylus, was born at Dijon, in 1674. He was intended for the legal profession, but evincing a decided predilection for the drama, the solicitor with whom he was placed encouraged him to pursue the bent of his inclinations. He accordingly devoted himself to the tragic muse, and produced "Idomeneus," which met with success. This was followed by "Atræus," "Electra," and "Rhadamistus," which were still more successful. He then led a secluded life for many years, but again resumed his dramatic labours, and produced the tragedies of "Catiline" and "The Triumvirate." Died, 1762.

CREBILLON, CLAUDE PROSPER JOLYOT DE, son of the foregoing, was born in 1707. He acquired the name of the French Petronius from his novels; one of which, entitled "Les Egaremens du Cœur et de l'Esprit," is alluded to by Sterne in his Sentimental Journey. Died, 1777.

CREECH, THOMAS, an English poet, was born at Blandford, Dorsetshire, in 1659; and after receiving the rudiments of a classical education at Sherborne free-school, finished his studies at Wadham College, Oxford. He translated, into English verse, Lucretius, Horace, Theocritus, &c. Died by his own hand, 1700.

CREIGHTON, ROBERT, D.D., an English divine and musical composer. He shared the exile of Charles II., and spent the leisure thus unhappily afforded him in the study of music. Among his compositions is the celebrated anthem, "I will arise and go to my father," which is performed in nearly all our cathedrals. Died, 1736.

CRELLIUS, JOHN, a German divine. He was a Unitarian, and one of the ablest advocates of that sect, which he defended at once ably and courteously against Grotius. His chief works are "Answer to Grotius," "Two Books concerning the One God, the Father," "A Treatise concerning the Holy Spirit," and "A Defence of Religious Liberty." Died, 1633.

CRESEMBINI, GIOVANNI MARIA, an Italian Jesuit and miscellaneous writer; author of "Istoria della Volgar Poesia," "History of the Academy of Arcadi," of which he was the founder; "Le Rime et le Prose degli Arcadi;" "Notizie Istoriche di diversi Capitani Illustri," &c. Died, 1728.

CRESCENZI, D. JUAN BAPTISTE, marquis de la Torre, was an eminent painter, born at Rome towards the end of the 16th century. Philip IV. made him a grandee of Castile, and honoured him with his title.

CRESCENZI, PIETRO, the restorer of the scientific study of agriculture in Europe, was born at Bologna in 1230. He spent a long life in acquiring and disseminating agricultural knowledge; and his "Ruralium Commodorum" is a masterly production, founded on simple principles, and free from many errors that continued to prevail even for centuries after.

CRESPI, GIOVANNI MARIA, surnamed Il Spagnuolo on account of the coxcombry of his attire, an eminent Bolognese painter of the 18th century. His chief talent lay in caricatures; but there are many of his more ambitious compositions in the palaces and churches of Bologna. In order to command a nice observation of the force of light and shadow, he used to paint in a room in which there was only a sufficient aperture to admit a single ray of light.

CRASSEY, or CRESSY, HUGH PAULIN, an eminent Catholic divine and writer; author of "Exomologesis," a narration of the cause of his conversion to the Catholic faith; "The Church History of Brittany," &c. He was an able writer, and as much distinguished for his candour and good temper in disputation as for his ability in argument. Died, 1674.

CREUTZ, GUSTAVUS PHILIP, Count of, a Swedish poet and statesman, born in 1726. His poem, entitled "Atis og Camilla," is considered a very fine production. He was appointed Swedish minister at Paris, where he remained twenty years, and became particularly acquainted with Marmontel and other celebrated French writers. Died, 1785.

CREVIER, JOHN BAPTIST LOUIS, a French historical writer; author of a continuation of "Rollin's History," "History of the Roman Emperors to Constantine inclusive," "History of the University of Paris," "Observations on the Spirit of Laws," &c. Died, 1765.

CREW, NATHANIEL, bishop of Durham. He arrived at his episcopal dignity partly through the influence of James II., then duke of York, and partly through his consenting to be guilty of simony, paying a large sum to one of the king's mistresses. During the reign of the ill-fated James this prelate aided and counselled him in all his most obnoxious measures, and yet was among the earliest of those who abandoned the fallen monarch, and voted that the throne was abdicated. But his base and time-serving conduct would not have prevented him from losing his bishopric, on the accession of king William and queen Mary, but that he was spared from degradation at the intercession of Tillotson. Died, 1721.

CRICHTON, JAMES, a Scottish gentleman of the 16th century, who, on account of his remarkable endowments, obtained the surname of the Admirable. The most extraordinary tales of his prowess, both bodily and mental, have been handed down to us; but, so far as the latter is concerned, the verses that remain go far to show, that, however astonishing he might be on account of his versatility, he received at least as much praise as he deserved. The late Mr. Hazlitt remarks, "The Admirable Crichton was a person of prodigious capacity; but I know of no proof that he had an atom of genius." And, in continuation, he remarks, "he could learn all that was known of any subject; he could do any thing if others would show him the way to do it." It seems quite clear, however, that he possessed great powers, and was altogether an extraordinary person. He was educated at St. Andrew's, and gave such early proofs of his learning, that he obtained the degree of M.A. when only 14 years of age. He is said to have excelled in eloquence; to have overcome every opponent in logic and scientific disputation; to have known ten languages; and to have been a perfect master of all military and athletic exercises. Dr. Johnson, who cannot be accused of showing much partiality for Scotchmen, has devoted a paper in the Advertiser to the character of Crichton, which he commences by saying, that "whatever we may suppress as surpassing credibility, yet we shall, upon incontestable authority, relate enough to rank him among prodigies." He is said to have been stabbed by his pupil, Vincenzo Gonzaga, son of the Duke of Mantua, and to have died of the wound, in 1583, aged only 23.

CRILLON, LOUIS DE BETHON, an eminent French military officer. Though he was a very zealous Catholic, and one of the leaders at the siege of Rochelle in 1573, he yet felt bound to aid Henry III. against the league. It being proposed to him, by that king, that he should assassinate the Duke of Guise, he nobly replied, "I cannot stain my honour with a deed of shame." On the accession of Henry IV., he became one of the most devoted of that great monarch's friends and generals. By the army he was called "l'homme sans peur;" but Henry gave him the name of "le brave des braves." His independence and nobleness of spirit were equal to his bravery, and his humanity and virtue were not less famous than his heroic achievements. Born, 1541; died, 1616; ant of the above, and, like him, an eminent military officer. He served against England in her war with the United States of America. He commanded at the celebrated siege of Gibraltar, where he was repulsed by the ability and courage of General Elliot. He wrote "Military Memoirs," and died in 1796.

CRILLON, LOUIS ATHANASIUS BALBES BERTON DE, brother of the last named; an eminent French divine and scholar; author of "*Mémoires Philosophiques de M. le Baron de * * , Chambellan de S. M. l'Imp. Reine," a treatise "De l'Homme Morale," &c. Died, 1789.

CRITIAS, an Athenian. He was a pupil of Socrates, but his political conduct was such as to render him by no means a credit to his great tutor. He was among the number of the rulers who are made notorious in history under the title of the "thirty tyrants," and is said to have distinguished himself even among them for cruelty and avarice. When Thrasybulus and his patriotic friends took arms against "the thirty," Critias was slain in an attack made on the Piræus, in the year 400 B. C.

CRÆSUS, the fifth and last king of Lydia. He succeeded his father Alyattes in the year 557 B. C., and was so fortunate in all his enterprises, that he soon became one of the richest monarchs of that time. Vain of his great wealth and influence, he asked the philosopher Solon what he thought of his good fortune: "I pronounce no man fortunate until his death," was the sage's reply. Subsequently the wealthy and powerful monarch was overpowered and made a prisoner by Cyrus, king of Persia. According to the barbarous practice of the time, the unhappy captive was bound to the stake and about to be burnt to death. In this miserable condition he recalled the impressive words of Solon, and thrice repeated that philosopher's name. Cyrus, struck with the earnestness of his tone, demanded an explanation. Cræsus gave it; and Cyrus, probably impressed by it with a more than usual feeling of the mutability of all human greatness, not only spared his life, but also took him into his favour and protection. At the death of Cyrus he recommended Cræsus to the favour of Cambyses. That prince treated him with great insolence and cruelty, and at length ordered him to be put to death; but, through the mercy of the officers to whom it was directed, it was not put into execution, and they were themselves put to death for their disobedience. On the time and place of the death of Cræsus history is silent.

CROFT, Sir HERBERT, an English baronet and divine. He was originally intended for the bar, but took holy orders, though he never held any benefice. He wrote a life of Dr. Young, which was introduced into Johnson's "Lives of the Poets," and a volume of letters entitled "Love and Madness," and supposed to be written by the Rev. James Hackman, who was hanged in 1779 for shooting Miss Ray. Died, 1816.

CROFT, Sir RICHARD, a relation of the last named, and his successor in the baronetcy. He was very eminent as a surgeon and accoucheur; and was selected to attend the princess Charlotte, the lamented daughter of George IV. and queen Caroline. The unfortunate death of his illustrious patient, in 1817, so preyed on his mind, that he committed suicide a few months after.

CROFT, WILLIAM, Mus. Doc., an excellent English musician and composer. His best anthems and a sublime burial service were published in 1724 in two folio volumes, under the title of "Musica Sacra." Born, 1677; died, 1727.

CROKE, Sir ALEXANDER, knt., D.C.L., was the son of a private gentleman, and born at Aylesbury. He was an eminent civilian, and a most voluminous writer, on both general topics and those more immediately connected with his profession. Died 27th December, 1842. Aged 42.

CROKE, Dr. RICHARD, an English divine and scholar; tutor to the Duke of Richmond, the natural son of Henry VIII. He was one of the earliest English cultivators of the Greek language, and wrote some valuable treatises on philosophical subjects. Died, 1538.

CROMWELL, THOMAS, earl of Essex; one of the ablest statesmen of the time of Henry VIII. Being confidentially employed by Cardinal Wolsey, he got a seat in the House of Commons; and to his honour be it said, that when the full tide of popular as well as courtly hate ran against his once powerful friend and patron, he boldly and ably defended him. In all probability this very circumstance tended to recommend him to the truculent Henry VIII., who, on the death of Wolsey, distinguished and employed him. In the various high offices he held, he served the king zealously, ably, and faithfully; but his merit in that respect is greatly diminished by the indifference he displayed as to the welfare of the people. Having, after all his services, given offence to the king, by promoting the marriage between his majesty and Anne of Cleves, he was arrested while sitting at the council table on a charge of high treason, condemned even without a hearing, and notwithstanding a most humble and affecting letter to the king, beheaded on Tower Hill, July 28, 1540.

CROMWELL, OLIVER, one of the most extraordinary characters in English history, was the grandson of Sir Henry Cromwell, and the son of Robert Cromwell, a man of good property, though he carried on the business of a brewer at Huntingdon, where Oliver was born, April 25, 1599. Having been educated at the free-school of that city and at Sydney College, Cambridge, he became a law student at Lincoln's Inn. Here, however, he did not remain long; as in his 21st year he married Elizabeth, the daughter of Sir James Bourchier, and settled at Huntingdon. In his youth he is said to have manifested a degree of wildness, that too often marks that period of life; but as soon as he married he threw the follies of youth aside, and assumed a staid and grave aspect and deportment, well calculated to obtain the esteem and confidence of his neighbours: one of the consequences of which was his being elected member of parliament for Huntingdon in 1625. Shortly after his election he openly deserted the Church of England, and attached himself to the Puritans, who were just then rapidly rising into power and influence. In his parliamentary career he was remarkable rather for his business-like habits and energy of character, than for elegance of language or gracefulness of delivery. His appearance and dress, too, were plain and unprepossessing. He notwithstanding acquired considerable influence even in parliament; and in 1642, when it was resolved to levy forces to oppose the king, Cromwell received a commission from the Earl of Essex, and raised a troop of horse at Cambridge, of which he, of course, had the command. Small as was this beginning, the energy and self-possession of the man made it sufficient. The steps by which he kept ever rising, until he attained a power greater than that for which the unfortunate Charles I. had been slaughtered for only endeavouring to attain, are matters rather of history than of biography. Suffice it, therefore, for us to say, that in his case, as in all other cases, great power ill obtained was fatal to his happiness as an individual. His courage and his singular shrewdness and skill in selecting and employing the agents of a system of espionage, more extensive and detailed than England had ever before been cursed with, maintained him in power; but he was at last both feared and hated by a majority of the people at large, while in his own family even his favourite daughter, Mrs. Claypole, frequently and severely reproached him for his unrighteous tyranny. Conscious of general dislike, even his strong and stern mind gradually succumbed to wearing and carking anxieties. He constantly carried loaded fire-arms, and wore defensive armour under his clothes. At length he fell into a nervous fever, of which he died, in the 60th year of his age, Sept. 3, 1658. The political administration of Cromwell was energetic and decisive; the army was regularly paid, and the public revenues were strictly and economically managed; while the honour of England was well maintained on the ocean, and her foreign commerce assumed a flourishing aspect. He lived without parade or ostentation; he was temperate, indefatigably industrious, and exact in his official duties; yet, under the guise of piety and virtue, he practised the most subtle Machiavelism, using mankind as the tools of his ambition, and maintaining his power as he had acquired it, by boldness, cunning, and tyranny. He had appointed his eldest son, Richard, to succeed him; but the reins of government were not to be held by one so mild and virtuous; and having been compelled by the mutinous officers to dissolve the parliament, he voluntarily abdicated the protectorship, April 22, 1659, and ended his days in tranquil seclusion at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, in 1712. His brother Henry, whose upright administration, as viceroy of Ireland, had gained him many friends, also retired to private life, and died in 1674.

CROMWELL, OLIVER, great grandson of Henry, second son of the Protector. He was for several years a solicitor in London, and held the appointment of clerk to St. Thomas's Hospital. He is noticed here chiefly on account of his valuable publication, entitled "Memoirs of the Protector Cromwell, and his sons Richard and Henry; illustrated by Original Letters and other Family Papers." He succeeded to the family estate of Theobalds, which descended to him through the children of Richard Cromwell, above named, and died at Cheshunt Park, Herts, in 1821, aged 79.

CROUSAZ, JOHN PETER DE, a distinguished Swiss divine, philosopher, and mathematician; author of a "Treatise on Education," an able work on geometry, a powerful criticism on Pope's Essay on Man, a "Treatise on the Human Understanding," &c. Died, 1748.

CROWNE, JOHN, a poet and dramatist of the 17th century, and the contemporary of Dryden. He was a native of Nova Scotia, but passed the greater part of his life in England. At the command of Charles II. he wrote the "Masque of Calisto;" and subsequently he ridiculed the Whig party, in his comedy of "The City Politicks." But though he was a very useful writer to the party whose principles he had embraced, he had more stern honesty of speech than was agreeable to a licentious monarch and a corrupt court. He consequently lived in comparative retirement for some time; but at length was ordered by the king to write that admirable comedy, "Sir Courtly Nice." As the reward for this task, the king had promised to give him a place; but his majesty died on the very day on which the piece had its final rehearsal. Besides seventeen dramas, he wrote "Dæmeida," a burlesque poem; and "Pandion and Amphigeria," a romance.

CROXALL, SAMUEL, an English divine and writer of the 18th century. He attached himself early in life to the Whig party, and wrote several clever pieces in their favour. These however, as is usually the case with party effusions, are now almost wholly forgotten. But, besides these, he wrote an "Imitation of the Song of Solomon" and "Scripture Politics." He also translated Æsop's Fables, and edited, or, as some aver, wrote, "The Royal Manual," a poem which was attributed to Andrew Marvell; also various sermons, dedications, &c.

CROZE, MATHURIN VEYSSURE DE LA, a French writer and eminent oriental scholar; author of "Histoire du Christianisme des Indes," and other works. He was for some time an ecclesiastic of the Benedictine congregation of St. Maur at Samur; but in 1666, being then living at Brazil, he renounced the Catholic faith. Died, 1739.

CRUDEN, ALEXANDER, who was better known during his life by his assumed title of "Alexander the Corrector," was a native of Aberdeen, born in 1701, and educated with a view to his becoming a minister of the kirk of Scotland. Unhappily he exhibited such an unsteadiness of intellect, that he was not considered fit for so important a profession; and, proceeding to London, he for some time maintained himself by giving private lessons in the classics; but in 1732 he commenced business as a bookseller, near the Royal Exchange. While thus employed, he devoted his leisure in compiling a very elaborate and useful "Concordance of the Old and New Testaments," which he dedicated to queen Caroline. Soon afterwards he became decidedly mad, and was placed by his friends in a madhouse at Bethnal Green; from which place, however, he contrived to make his escape, and subsequently brought an action for false imprisonment, but was nonsuited. He subsequently resumed his old employment of correcting the press, superintending several classical works; but he again exhibited such marks of a deranged intellect, that although he continued pretty generally to employ himself in literary matters, and even amassed some money by his labours, the whole tenor of his future life was characterised by a series of intellectual obliquities. As a literary man, however, he was extremely industrious, patient, and able; and his "Concordance" holds, and ever will hold, a very high place in the estimation of all biblical students. Died, 1770, aged 69.

CRUIKSHANK, WILLIAM, an eminent English surgeon, anatomist, and writer; author of "The Anatomy of the Absorbent Vessels of the Human Body," "Experiments on the Insensible Perspiration of the Human Body," &c. Died, 1800.

CRUZ CÁNO Y OLMEDILLA, DON JUAN DE LA, an eminent Spanish geographer of the 18th century; author of the "Mapo Geographico de America Meridional."

CTESIAS, a Greek physician and historian, was a native of Cnidus in Caria. Being taken prisoner in the battle between Cyrus the Younger and his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon, he was employed to cure Artaxerxes of a severe wound. He wrote a history of the Assyrians, and other works.

CTESIBIUS, of Alexandria, an eminent ancient mathematician. He is said to have invented the pump; and he constructed a clepsydra, or water-clock, in which the moving power was a falling column of water. A work of his, entitled "Geodesia, or the Art of dividing and measuring Bodies," is to be found in the Vatican library. He flourished in the 165th Olympiad, or about B. C. 120.

CTESIPHON or CHERSIPHIRON, a famous Ephesian architect. He gave the design for the first temple of Diana of the Ephesians, which was fired by Erostratus. He flourished in the sixth century B. C.

CUDWORTH, RALPH, D.D., an English divine and philosopher; author of a "Discourse concerning the true Nature of the Lord's Supper," "The True Intellectual System of the Universe," &c. He was an extremely learned and powerful writer; and, independently of holding some valuable church preferment, he was master of Christ's College, Cambridge. Died, 1688.

CUFF, HENRY, an eminent English scholar of the 16th century. He was for some time Greek professor at Merton College, Oxford; but growing weary of a secluded life, he became secretary to Robert, earl of Essex, and in that situation accompanied his lordship on the expedition to Cadiz. Being implicated in the transactions which led to the apprehension and trial of the Earl of Essex, the latter charged him with being his adviser and abettor in all his violent measures. Cuff was accordingly tried, condemned, and executed in 1601. Camden, who was well acquainted with him, says, "he was a man of most exquisite harmony and penetrating will; but of a seditious and perverse disposition."

CUJACIUS, or CUJAS, JAMES, a celebrated French jurist. He was professor of law at Turin, and was held in the highest esteem as an expounder of difficult questions. His writings were collected into five folio volumes. Died, 1600.

CULLEN, WILLIAM, a celebrated physician and medical writer, was a native of Scotland, being born at Lanark, in 1712. After serving his apprenticeship to a surgeon and apothecary at Glasgow, he went some voyages as a surgeon. He subsequently settled at Glasgow, and was appointed lecturer on chemistry in the university of that city; in which capacity he obtained so high a reputation, that he at length became medical professor in the university of Edinburgh. As an author, he is well known by his "Lectures on the Materia Medica," "Synopsis Nosologiae Practicae," and his "First Lines on Medical Practice." Died, 1790.

CULPEPER, Sir THOMAS, an English writer of the 17th century; author of "Considerations on Marriage," a "Discourse on Usury," "Brief Survey of the Growth of Usury in England," &c.

CULPEPPER, NICHOLAS, an English herbalist of the 17th century. He was educated at Cambridge; and, after serving his apprenticeship to an apothecary, settled in that profession at Spitalfields, in London. He wrote a "Herbal" and a "Dispensary;" but the science and industry which he indisputably possessed were in a great degree marred by his absurd pretensions to astrology.

CUMBERLAND, RICHARD, bishop of Peterborough; author of a treatise "De Legibus Naturæ"—a very popular work, in opposition to the philosophy of Hobbes; a translation from Eusebius of Sanconiaton's Phœnician History, an "Essay on the Jewish Weights and Measures," "Origines Gentium Antiquissimæ," &c. He was an extremely learned man, but not more remarkable for learning than for modest and unassuming virtues.

CUMBERLAND, RICHARD, an able dramatic and miscellaneous writer, was a son of Dr. Cumberland, bishop of Clonfert, and born in 1732. From Westminster School he went to Trinity College, Cambridge; and was introduced to public life as the secretary of Lord Halifax, when viceroy of Ireland. His first literary efforts obtained for him but little fame; but on the appearance of his comedy of "The West Indian," in 1771, his reputation as a dramatist was at once established. From this period till the time of his decease he continued to be one of the most prolific writers for the stage, though none of his subsequent pieces were so successful as the comedy before mentioned. In 1780 he was employed by the government to conduct a secret negotiation with the courts of Madrid and Lisbon; which, to the disgrace of the ministry, involved him in great distress, as they refused to reimburse his expenses, to the amount of 5000*l.*, which compelled him to part with his hereditary property. To add to his distress, the board of trade was broken up; and he retired, with a trifling pension, to Tunbridge Wells, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits with the most unabating ardour and industry. Besides his numerous dramatic productions, he published a collection of essays, under the title of "The Observer;" also the novels of "Arundel," "Henry," and "John de Lancaster;" "Calvary," a poem; and various other works, the last of which was his own "Memoirs." The comic drama was certainly his forte; but throughout the whole of his writings there is much merit, and many of them possess the elements of a lasting vitality. Died, 1811.

CUMBERLAND, WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, Duke of, second son of George II., was born in 1721, and at an early age entered on the duties of a military life. At the battle of Dettingen, in 1743, he was wounded, while fighting by the side of his father; and in 1745 he signalised himself, when commander-in-chief of the British army in Flanders, at the battle of Fontenoy, where, however, he was obliged to yield the palm of victory to Marshal Saxe. On his return to England he took the field against the Scottish rebel troops, whom he defeated at the battle of Culloden; but he stained his laurels by unnecessary cruelty. Died, 1765.

CUNNINGHAM, ALEXANDER, a Scotch historical writer of the 18th century; author of a "History of Great Britain, from the Revolution to the Accession of George I." This was elegantly written by him in Latin, but a translation of it was published by Dr. Thompson in 1787. Cunningham also held some government employments, among which was that of resident at Venice. Died, 1737.

CUNNINGHAM, ALLAN, an eminent poet, novelist, and miscellaneous writer, was born at Blackwood, in Dumfriesshire, in 1785. His parents were in very humble circumstances, and he was taken from school when only 11 years of age, and apprenticed to a stone-mason. These disadvantageous circumstances did not prevent him from acquiring, by great though desultory reading, much information; and in 1810 he repaired to London, where he at first earned a maintenance by contributing to periodicals, and reporting for the press. At a later period he obtained employment in the studio of the eminent sculptor Chantrey, as principal assistant, which enabled him to prosecute his literary tastes without hazard; and he so well improved his advantages, that he not merely distinguished himself as a critic and historian as to the arts, and as a poet and novelist, but also, by combining the prudence and tact of the man of business with the fervour and feeling of the man of genius, acquired considerable pecuniary resources. Among his numerous works are "Sir Marmaduke Maxwell," a drama; "Paul Jones," and "Sir Michael Scott," novels; the "Lives of Burns and Sir David Wilkie," besides many poems, ballads, and lyrics; but his most important work, and that by which he is best known south of the Tweed, is "The Lives of British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects." Died, 1842.

CUNNINGHAM, JOHN, an ingenious Irish poet and dramatic performer; author of "The Landscape," and other poems, and of "Love in a Mist," a farce, upon which Garrick is said to have founded that of the "Lying Valet." Died, 1773.

CURIO, CÆLIUS SECUNDUS, a learned Piedmontese. Becoming a convert to the reformed religion, the boldness of his preaching gave so much offence to those in power, that he was obliged to fly from Milan, and subsequently from Venice and Ferrara. He at length obtained the appointment of professor of eloquence and the belles lettres at the university of Basle. His principal works are "De Amplitudine beati Regni Dei" and "Pasquillorum tomi duo." Died, 1569.

CURL, EDMUND, a bookseller, whose name is handed down, like many others, by the satirical wit of Pope, kept a shop in the purlieus of Covent Garden, and had his ears cut off in the pillory as a just reward for publishing obscene books. What pity it is that a punishment so salutary should have become obsolete!

CURRAN, JOHN PHILPOT, a celebrated Irish barrister, of humble origin, was born near Cork in 1750; received his education at Trinity College, Dublin; and, coming to London, studied the law in the Temple. In course of time he was called to the bar; and though at first he had to struggle with great difficulties, his brilliant talents, exerted in defence of various persons charged with political offences, overcame all obstacles, and he quickly rose to forensic eminence. He became a member of the Irish House of Commons in 1784; and was a powerful member of the opposition until the Whigs came into office, in 1806, when he was made master of the rolls in Ireland. This office he held till 1814, and received a pension of 3000*l.* on retiring; after which period he generally resided in London. His oratorical powers were of the most splendid kind; his wit, pathos, and withering sarcasm being alike irresistible; and though mean in personal appearance, and not always using his intellectual weapons with good taste, they enabled him to support the character of a popular advocate and an effective debater. Died, 1817.

CURRIE, JAMES, M.D. He was a native of Scotland, but settled as a medical man at Liverpool, where he enjoyed an extensive and very lucrative practice. The fatigues necessarily attendant upon this did not, however, prevent him from devoting considerable time to literature; and he is favourably known as a professional writer by a paper "On Tetanus and Convulsive Disorders" and "Medical Reports," &c. But his literary celebrity rests less upon his professional treatises than upon his biography of the poet Burns, an edition of whose works was superintended by Dr. Currie in a manner which obtained him great and well-merited applause. Died, 1805.

CURTIS, WILLIAM, an eminent English

botanist. He was a native of Alton, in Hampshire, and was apprenticed to an apothecary in that place. But his love of botanical pursuits induced him to relinquish his profession to establish a botanical garden, and exhibit as a botanical lecturer. Besides his lectures, which were published with expensive and handsome illustrative plates, he wrote "Practical Observations on the British Grasses," "Flora Londinensis," an accurate and beautiful work; a Botanical Magazine, &c. Died, 1799.

CURTIS, Sir WILLIAM, bart., a well-known citizen and magistrate of London, whose father had carried on, in an extensive way, the business of a sea-biscuit baker. The son, however, quitted that trade, to engage in the Greenland fisheries; and having secured a considerable portion of wealth, employed it in the banking business, under the firm of Robarts, Curtis, and Co. He was senior alderman of Bridge-ward, and father of the corporation of the city of London, which he represented in parliament during 28 years. Sir William was a loyal and benevolent citizen, of most honourable character in his public transactions, greatly beloved in his private connections, and honoured with the notice and friendship of his majesty George IV. He was raised to the baronetcy in 1802, and died, possessed of great wealth, in 1820.

CURTIUS, MARCUS, a celebrated Roman. Livy relates, that in the year 362 B.C. a vast chasm appeared in the midst of the Forum, which the oracle pronounced could only be closed by the Romans throwing into it that by which they were most powerful. Curtius declared that the arms and courage of the Romans were their most valuable possessions, and having solemnly devoted himself, he put on his armour, mounted his horse, and galloped headlong into the gulf.

CURTIUS, RUFUS QUINTUS, a Roman historian, who wrote the History of Alexander the Great in ten books, the first two of which are lost. The exact period in which he flourished is not known; for though his style would indicate that he lived in one of the best periods of the Latin language, no writer of any earlier date than the 12th century has made any mention of him.

CURWEN, JOHN CHRISTIAN, a member of the ancient family of M'Christen, of the Isle of Man, was for many years the representative in parliament for the county of Cumberland. He devoted a great portion of his useful life to the study of agriculture; and his skilful operations have banished many erroneous practices in the science, and given a new impulse to agricultural exertions throughout the kingdom. Died, 1828.

CUSA, NICHOLAS DE, an eminent cardinal, who took his name from that of the village of Cusa, in the diocese of Treves, where he was born. After some minor preferments in the church, he was sent by pope Eugenius IV. as legate to Constantinople, to endeavour to bring about a union between the Greek and Latin Churches. He was made a cardinal by pope Nicholas V., who also gave him the see of Brixen, in the Tyrol. Besides metaphysical, theological, mathematical, and other treatises, which form three volumes folio, he wrote a very learned and powerful refutation of the Koran. Died, 1464.

CUSSAY, M., the governor of Angers at the time the infamous Charles IX. carried into effect the massacre of St. Bartholomew. He deserves a niche in every biographical work, for having refused to obey the tyrant's orders, in these memorable words:—"I will not stain 50 years of a spotless life by the most cowardly of assassinations."

CUSSON PIERRE, an eminent French botanist and physician. During his travels in Majorca and Spain he made a very valuable collection of the plants of those countries, which, unfortunately, a female of his family, mistaking it for so much mere lumber, threw into the street, and it was utterly destroyed. Besides assisting Sauvages in his celebrated work on nosology, he wrote, and had completely prepared for the press, an elaborate treatise on the umbelliferous plants; a work which could not but have been a valuable contribution to science, but which from some unexplained cause has not been printed. Died, 1784.

CUSTINE, ADAM PHILIP, Count de, was born at Metz, in 1740; and having entered the army early in life, attracted the notice of Frederic of Prussia, under whom he served in the seven years' war. He afterwards accepted a commission in one of the French regiments that assisted the Americans in resisting the English; and on returning to France was made governor of Toulon. In 1792 he had the command of the army of the Rhine; but being suddenly summoned to France, the tyrants of the hour sent him to the guillotine, August, 1793, there to expiate the crime of non-success.

CUTHBERT, an English saint, who had the honour to baptize Egfred, king of Northumberland, and the good fortune to be made bishop of that district. He founded a monastery at Lindisfarne, and died in 686.

CUVELLIER DE TRIE, JOHN WILLIAM AUGUSTUS, a French dramatist of great fecundity and considerable talent, was born in 1766, and died in 1824. He was sometimes called the Corneille of the boulevards.

CUVIER, GEORGE LEOPOLD CHRISTIAN FREDERIC DAGOBERT, Baron; the most eminent naturalist of modern times; was born at Montbelliard, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, in 1769. Having a decided partiality for natural history, he devoted his leisure hours to the pursuit of that interesting science, while acting in the capacity of private tutor in the family of Count d'Hericy, in Normandy. As soon as he quitted this situation he established himself in Paris; and such was his talent, and such the perseverance with which he followed up his examinations and inquiries, that he was ere long acknowledged to be one of the first zoologists in Europe. His profound knowledge and comprehensive views, his ingenious classifications and elegant illustrations, delighted the accomplished visitors of the Lycée, where he lectured; and his fame reaching the ears of Napoleon, the most important offices in the department of public instruction were given to him. He twice visited England, namely, in 1818 and in 1830; and died at Paris in 1832. To Baron Cuvier, France is indebted for the finest osteological collection in the world; while the whole world is indebted to him for the immense addition he has made to the general stock of zoological science.

CYAXARES I., king of the Medes, was a very powerful prince, and subdued all Asia beyond the river Halys. Died, B. C. 585.

CYPRIAN, THASCIUS CÆCILIUS, was a learned father of the church, born at Carthage, and who embraced Christianity in 246. He wrote a work, entitled "Gratia Dei;" succeeded Donatus, as bishop of Carthage; and suffered martyrdom in 258.

CYRIL, St., originally named CONSTANTINE, and called the Philosopher, was the apostle of the Slavi, in the 9th century, and invented the Slavonic alphabet. He died at Rome, in 822.

CYRUS, king of Persia, a renowned conqueror, was the son of Cambyses and Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of Media, by whom he was sent to Persia. Here he soon collected a formidable army, and deposed his grandfather, B. C. 560. He also conquered Croesus, the rich and powerful king of Lydia, and Nabonadius, king of Babylon, whose capital he took, after a siege of two years. Extending his conquests on all sides, till his dominions in Asia reached from the Hellespont to the Indus, he at length marched against the Massagetae, a people of Scythia, then ruled by a queen named Tomyris; but though successful in the first great battle, he was defeated in the second, and slain, B. C. 529.

CYRUS THE YOUNGER was the son of Darius Nothus, and brother of Artaxerxes, whose life he attempted, in order to obtain the throne. He was, however, pardoned, and made governor of Lydia; but he treacherously raised an army, marched against his brother, fought a desperate battle, and was killed, B. C. 400.

CYRUS, of Panapolis, a Latin poet and soldier, in the time of Theodosius the Younger. He was made consul and prefect of Constantinople; afterwards embraced Christianity, and was made bishop of Phrygia, where he died.

CZERNI-GEORGE, whose real name was GEORGE PETROVITSCH, the appellation of "George the Black" being given him on account of the darkness of his complexion, was born of humble parents, near Belgrade; but he raised himself to the rank of a prince by the force of his natural talents, and a degree of courage rarely equalled. With an ardent desire to liberate Servia, his native country, from the Turks, he first raised a small troop, was successful in various encounters, and at length, in 1800, made himself master of Belgrade. A long and arduous struggle followed; and though for a time Czerni-George was the acknowledged prince of Servia, he was eventually compelled to retire to Russia, where he was received with distinction, and created a Russian prince. But he was still bent on repossessing Servia; and having entered that territory, in 1817, he was taken prisoner and beheaded.

D.

DACIER, ANDREW, a critic and classical commentator of some eminence, born, in 1651, at Castres, in Upper Languedoc. He was made perpetual secretary of the French Academy in 1731, and had the care of the cabinet in the Louvre entrusted to him. He translated Horace, Plato, Plutarch, Epicetetus, &c. into French. Died, 1722.

DACIER, ANNE LEFEVRE, wife of the preceding, was born, in 1651, at Saumur, at the university of which place Tanaquil Lefevre, her father, was a professor. Her love of classical literature was displayed at an early age; and her proficiency was so great, that at the age of 22 she produced an admirable edition of "Callimachus," which was followed by various others of the Delphin classics. She subsequently translated Homer, Anacreon, Sappho, Terence, with portions from Aristophanes, Plautus, &c. In 1683 she married M. Dacier, and soon after they both renounced the Protestant religion. Though her life was spent in constant literary labour, she was far from being ostentatious of her eminent abilities. Died, 1720.

DÆDALUS, a celebrated Greek architect and sculptor, who is said to have flourished at Athens in the 10th century B.C., and to have been the inventor of many useful instruments, viz. the axe, the saw, the plummet, the auger, &c. There was also another Dædalus of less note, a sculptor of Sicyon.

DAGOBERT, LOUIS AUGUSTUS, a French general, who in 1793 was chief commander of the army of the Eastern Pyrenees, and was killed in the following year at the capture of Urgel, where he greatly distinguished himself. He was also the author of a work on military tactics.

DAGOBERT I., king of the Franks, sur-named the Great on account of his military successes, began his reign in 628, and died at the age of 32.

D'AGUESSEAU, HENRY FRANCIS, called by Voltaire the most learned magistrate that France ever produced, was born at Limoges in 1668, and died 1751. His works were published in 13 vols. 4to.

DAILLE, JOHN, a Protestant minister of the 17th century; author of several theological works, the chief of which is entitled "Of the Use of the Fathers." As a controversialist he was singularly impartial, and is esteemed even by Roman Catholics. Born, 1593; died, 1670.

DALBERG, CHARLES THEODORE ANTHONY MARIA, a baron of the German empire, prince-primate of the confederation of the Rhine, grand-duke of Frankfort, and, finally, archbishop of Ratisbon, was born near Worms, in 1744. He always espoused the new ideas to which the French revolution gave impulse; and though he opposed the invasion of Germany by the French in 1797, he assisted at the coronation of the emperor Napoleon in 1804. Throughout life he was distinguished for industry in the discharge of his official duties, and for an incorruptible love of justice; he was also the encourager of learning and science, and himself the author of several ingenious treatises, legal, scientific, and philosophical. In 1813 he voluntarily resigned all his possessions as a sovereign prince, and retired to private life, retaining only his ecclesiastical dignity. Died, 1817.

D'ALBRET, CHARLOTTE, sister of John d'Albret, king of Navarre, and wife of Cæsar Borgia. She was a poetess of no mean powers, and as remarkable for virtue as her husband was for vice. Died, 1514.

D'ALBRET, CHARLES, constable of France in the reign of Charles VI., to whom he was related by blood. He commanded the French army at the famous battle of Agincourt, in which he lost his life, 1514.

D'ALBRET, JEANNE, daughter of Margaret, queen of Navarre, and mother of Henry of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV., of France. Died suddenly in 1572.

DALE, RICHARD, an American naval officer, was born, in Virginia, in 1756; was sent to sea at 12 years of age, and at 19 had the command of a merchant-vessel. While serving as a midshipman on board of the American brig of war Lexington, he was taken by a British cutter; but, after being confined a twelvemonth in Mill prison, he effected his escape into France, where he joined the celebrated Paul Jones, then commanding the American ship Bon Homme Richard, and was the first man that boarded the English frigate Serapis, which was captured. In 1801 he had the command of an American squadron, and hoisted his pendant on board the President. He was a brave, honourable, and intelligent seaman. The adventures of his early days were of the most romantic and perilous kind; but his latter years were passed in the peaceful enjoyment of a competent estate at Philadelphia, where he died, in 1826.

DALE, DAVID, a skilful mechanic, and the originator of the well-known Lanark Mills, was born, in 1739, at Stewarton, in Ayrshire. From being a journeyman weaver he became a cotton manufacturer on a most extensive scale, first in conjunction with Sir R. Arkwright, and afterwards on his own account. By his means employment was given to thousands, old and young; nor did he leave the latter without the means of mental instruction, but provided teachers and established schools at all his works. Died, 1806.

D'ALEMBERT, JEAN LE ROND, a celebrated philosopher and mathematician, and an elegant writer, born at Paris, 1717. He had the name of Le Rond from the church near which he was exposed as a foundling. The sciences were greatly enriched by him; and his writings display great genius, judgment, and taste. His name will remain forever attached to the great "Encyclopédie" which he founded, and to which he contributed numerous articles. Died, 1783.

DALIN, OLAUS VON, called the father of modern Swedish poetry, was the author of many spirited satires, songs, epigrams, and fables. He also wrote "The Argus," a work on the plan of the Spectator; "A General History of Sweden;" "Brumhilda," a tragedy, &c. He was born in 1708, and died chancellor of the court of Sweden, in 1763. Queen Louisa Ulrica erected a mausoleum to his memory.

DALLAS, ALEXANDER JAMES, an American statesman and financier, was a native of Jamaica, where his father was an eminent and wealthy physician. He was sent at an early age to England, and completed his education at Westminster School. Finding, at his father's death, that the whole of his property was left at the disposal of his widow, who married again, he went to the United States, was naturalised, and admitted to practise in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, filling up his leisure time by being a contributor to the periodical press. He subsequently obtained several government appointments, and in 1801 was made secretary of the treasury of the United States. This situation he discharged with consummate ability, and in 1815 he undertook the additional trust of secretary of war. Died, 1817.

DALLAS, SIR GEORGE, lord chief justice of the common pleas, was born in London, 1758, educated principally at Geneva, and at the age of 18 he went to India as a writer, where his talents soon raised him to high civil offices. He warmly espoused the cause of Hastings when impeached, and in 1789 he wrote a pamphlet, in which he attributed to him the British supremacy in India. In 1793 he published his "Thoughts upon our present Situation, with Remarks upon the Policy of a War with France," which created considerable sensation, and especially excited the admiration of Mr. Pitt. He was also the author of various other political works, relating more particularly to the state of Ireland; besides some elaborate treatises on the subject of the East India trade and policy; and, lastly, a "Biographical Memoir of his son-in-law, Captain Sir Peter Parker." The works of Sir George Dallas were all elegant and correct compositions, displaying a thorough knowledge of the subjects on which he treated. Died, Jan. 1833.

DALLAS, ROBERT CHARLES, known as the friend and biographer of Lord Byron, was born at Kingston, Jamaica, and studied the law in the Inner Temple. After residing for a time in France and America, he returned to England, and devoted himself to literature. He translated several works from the French, and wrote the novels of "Aubrey," "Perceval," "The Morlands," &c.; but he is now more remembered for his "Recollections of Lord Byron." Died, 1824.

DALRYMPLE, ALEXANDER, hydrographer to the Admiralty and the India Company, was born at New Hailes, near Edinburgh, in 1737, and spent the early part of his life in India, as a writer. He wrote "The Oriental Repertory," three "Collections of Voyages," &c. Died, 1803.

DALRYMPLE, SIR DAVID, a Scotch judge and antiquary, was born at Edinburgh in 1726, and educated at Eton and Utrecht. On his becoming a judge of the court of session in 1766, he took the title of lord Hailes. His principal works are "Annals of Scotland," which Dr. Johnson assisted in revising, and "Memorials relating to the History of Great Britain." Died, 1792.

DALRYMPLE, SIR JOHN, for many years a baron of exchequer in Scotland, and the author of "Memoirs of Great Britain and Ireland," in 3 vols. Died, aged 84, in 1810.

DALTON, JOHN, an English divine and poet, was born at Dean, in Cumberland, in 1709, and educated at Queen's College, Oxford. He obtained the living of St. Mary-at-Hill, London, and a prebend at Worcester. He wrote a volume of sermons, some poems, &c.; and adapted Milton's Comus to the stage. Died, 1763.

DALTON, JOHN, D.C.L., F.R.S., a mathematician and natural philosopher, was born at Eaglesfield, near Cockermouth, in 1766, and gave early indications of his future scientific celebrity. From teaching a school as a boy in his native village, we find him at a subsequent period similarly engaged at Kendal; and in 1793, when in his 23rd year, he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in the new college in Moseley Street, Manchester, with which he remained until the removal of that establishment to York. He made his first appearance as an author in a volume of "Meteorological Observations and Essays," in 1793. In 1808 he published "A New System of Chemical Philosophy," and a second part in 1810. He also frequently contributed to Nicholson's Journal, the Annals of Philosophy, and the Memoirs of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Manchester, of which for half a century he was an active member, and latterly the president. In 1823 he was presented with a gold medal by the Royal Society for his scientific discoveries; and in 1833 the sum of 2000*l.* was raised by his friends and townsmen for the erection of a statue (by Chantrey) to perpetuate his remembrance. His "atomic theory" must ever render his name memorable. Contemporaneously with Gay-Lussac, with whom many of his researches run parallel, he discovered the important general law of the expansion of gases; and his contributions to meteorology were also of the most important kind. A severe attack of paralysis in 1837 considerably impaired his powers, and he died in August, 1844.

DALTON, MICHAEL, an eminent lawyer of the 16th century; the author of a book on the "Office of a Justice of the Peace," and another on the "Duties of Sheriffs." Died, 1620.

DALZIEL, THOMAS, a Scotch general, who was with Charles II. at the battle of Worcester; after which he entered into the Russian service, but was recalled at the Restoration. After the tragical fate of Charles I. he never would suffer his beard to be shaved, and he was also remarkable for other eccentricities in regard to his dress. His devotion to the royal cause rendered him an especial favourite at the court of the "merry monarch."

DAMER, ANNE SEYMOUR, eminent as a sculptor as well as for her general accomplishments, was the daughter of Field-marshal Conway, and born in 1748. She took lessons in the art from Ceracci and Bacon, and afterwards studied in Italy. Died, 1808.

DAMIAN, General, born in 1763; a French royalist, engaged in repeated abortive attempts to rouse France against the revolutionary and imperial regimes, in favour of the Bourbons; and afterwards enjoying a pension of 300*l.* per annum from the British government.

DAMIENS, ROBERT, who, owing to his vicious inclinations, obtained the appellation of Robert-le-diable, was born in 1715, at Tieulloy, a village of Artois. While at Paris, in a menial employment, he was accused of having poisoned one of his masters and robbed another; and having evaded the law by flight, he in course of time returned, to practise new enormities. In January, 1757, he stabbed Louis XV. in the midst of his guards, as he was getting into his carriage. Fortunately, the wound was not mortal, and Damiens was instantly seized; but the most cruel tortures which he was doomed to suffer could not induce him to confess that he had any accomplices; and the horrid sentence, which condemned him to be torn in pieces by horses, was executed, March 28, 1757.

DAMM, CHRISTIAN TOBIAS, a Protestant divine, eminent as a Greek scholar, was born at Leipsic in 1699. His principal work is a "Greek Etymological Lexicon." Died, 1778.

DAMOCLES, a sycophant at the court of Dionysius of Syracuse. He was one day extolling the happy condition of princes, on which the king invited him to a sumptuous entertainment, but caused a naked sword to be suspended over his head by a single hair; thereby intimating the danger that awaited the great, though surrounded by vassals and revelling in luxury. This is said to have produced a salutary effect on the courtier, who begged that the king would dismiss him to any mean station, so that he might live in safety.

DAMON, a Pythagorean philosopher, rendered memorable for his friendship with Pythias. Dionysius having condemned him to death, he obtained leave of absence to go home and settle his affairs, Pythias pledging himself to endure the punishment in his stead if he did not return at the appointed time. Damon was punctual; and this instance of friendship so pleased the king, that he pardoned Damon, and requested to become one of his friends.

DAMPIER, WILLIAM, an English navigator, was born at East Coker, Somersetshire, in 1652, and became a mariner at an early age. During many years of active service in privateers and trading vessels, he several times visited the South Seas; and the result of his observations were given to the public in a work of 4 vols., entitled "Voyages round the World," which for accuracy and interest, as well as for professional knowledge, possess very considerable merit. He died, as is supposed, in 1712, but the exact time is not known.

DANCER, DANIEL, a noted miser, was born in 1716, near Harrow, in Middlesex. In 1736 he succeeded to his family estate, and led the life of a hermit for above half a century. His only dealings with mankind arose from the sale of his hay; and he was seldom seen, except when he was out gathering logs of wood from the common, &c. As he was frequently robbed, he nailed up his door, and by means of a ladder, which he drew up after him, got into his house through the upper window. This miserable specimen of humanity continued to vegetate till 1794, when he died, bequeathing his estates to Lady Tempest, for the charitable attentions she had bestowed upon him.

DANCKERTS, the name of a family of Dutch artists, of whom CORNELIUS, born in 1561, appears to have been the first of any note. He excelled as a portrait and historical engraver, and several among his successors attained celebrity in the same art.

DANCOURT, FLORENCE CARTON, a French actor and dramatic poet, was born in 1661, at Fontainebleau, and was originally a barrister, but quitted that profession for the stage. He produced an immense number of plays, and was particularly successful in introducing subjects of real occurrence, which gave to his comic pieces great piquancy. Died, 1726.

DANDINI, CÆSAR and VINCENT; two Florentine painters of the 16th century, both eminent for their historical pieces; as was also their nephew PIETRO, who died in 1712.

DANDOLO, HENRY, a celebrated doge of Venice, to which high office he was chosen in 1192, when in his 84th year. At the siege of Constantinople, during the fourth crusade, the venerable doge commanded his men to run up to the walls, and was himself the first who leaped on shore. He died in 1205, aged 97.

DANDOLO, VINCENT, a Venetian chemist, descended from the famous doge and captor of Constantinople, was born in 1758. At all times zealous for the independence of Italy, he became a member of the council of the Cisalpine republic, after the treaty of Campo Formio. He died in 1819. Among his works are "Fondamenti della Scienza Fisico-Chemica," &c.

D'ANDRADA, ANTHONY, a Portuguese Jesuit, who discovered in 1624 the country of Cathay and Thibet, of which he published an account. He died at Goa, 1634.

D'ANDRADA, DIEGO DE PAYVA, a learned Portuguese divine, who distinguished himself at the council of Trent by his talents and eloquence, and wrote an elaborate defence of it against the attack of Chemnitius; he died, 1575.—His brother, FRANCIS D'ANDRADA, was historiographer to the king of Spain, and wrote the History of John III., king of Portugal.—Another brother, THOMAS D'ANDRADA, an Augustine friar, called by his order Thomas of Jesus, attended Don Sebastian in his expedition against the emperor of Morocco, was taken prisoner, and shut up in a cave by the Moors, in which place he wrote a book called "The Sufferings of Jesus."

DANGEAU, PHILIP DE COURCHILLON,

Marquis of, was born in 1638, and distinguished himself not less by his own talents than by the patronage he afforded to the literati of his day. He wrote an extensive "Journal of the Court of Louis XIV.," extracts from which have been published, but not the work entire. Died, 1720.

D'ANGHIERA, PETER MARTYR, an Italian scholar of a noble Milanese family, born, 1455; died, 1526, at Granada; leaving several historical works, which are usually quoted under the name of Peter Martyr.

DANICIAN, ANDRE, better known by the name of PHILIDOR, a celebrated player and writer on chess, was born at Paris, and resided several years in England, where he published his "Analysis" of that celebrated game, and also some musical compositions. Died, 1795.

DANIEL, GABRIEL, a French Jesuit; author of a "History of France," and a "Voyage to the World of Descartes," a severe satire on the system of that philosopher. Born, 1649; died, 1728.

DANIEL, SAMUEL, a poet and historian, was born in 1562, near Taunton, Devon, and educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. He became poet laureate on the death of Spenser, and was subsequently appointed to the office of groom of the bed-chamber to James I. Besides various poems, some of which possess considerable merit, he wrote a "History of England" to the end of the reign of Edward III. Died, 1619.

DANIELI, F., an Italian savant, medalist, and antiquarian, born in 1741. In the Neapolitan revolution of 1799, he joined the French republican party; and on the restoration of the king of Naples, by Lord Nelson's means, suffered by the loss of his post in the academy, and the confiscation of his property. Joseph Buonaparte made him perpetual secretary of the Academy of Antiquities at Naples, and in this employment he was continued by Murat. He died in 1812. Among his works are "Le Forche Caudine Illustrate," "Monete Antiche di Capua," "I Regali Sepolchri del Duomo di Palermo," &c.

DANIELL, JOHN FREDERICK, D.C.L., professor of chemistry in King's College, and foreign secretary to the Royal Society; author of "Meteorological Essays," an "Introduction to Chemical Philosophy," &c., besides numerous papers in the Quarterly Journal of Science and Art, and the Philosophical Transactions, was born in Essex Street, London, in 1790. As a proof of the estimation in which his scientific attainments were held, it is only necessary to state that he obtained all the three medals in the gift of the Royal Society, an honour never before conferred on any individual. While attending a meeting of the council of the R. S., March 14. 1845, he was seized with apoplexy, and immediately expired. In his official capacity he was zealous and indefatigable; in his private character, irreproachable.

DANIELL, SAMUEL, an artist, who travelled into the interior of Africa, made numerous drawings there, and on his return published a work entitled "African Scenery." He also spent six years in the island of Ceylon, where he died in 1811. He left an extensive collection of drawings, chiefly illustrative of the natural history of the island; and a volume was published, entitled "The Scenery, Animals, and Native Inhabitants of Ceylon."

DANIELI, WILLIAM, R.A., an eminent draughtsman, born 1769, was initiated in the pictorial art at a very early age, and accompanied his uncle to India, when he was only 14, for the express purpose of assisting in depicting the scenery, costume, &c. of that interesting country. Immediately on their return, the large work, entitled "Oriental Scenery," in 6 folio volumes, was commenced, and continued with the most persevering ardour, until its completion in 1808. He also published "A Picturesque Voyage to India," a work entitled "Zoography," and a great variety of separate views, &c. In 1814, he commenced the "Voyage round Great Britain," a most gigantic undertaking for an unassisted individual. Two or three months in each summer were devoted to collect drawings and notes, and the work was finished in 1825. In 1832, Mr. Daniell, and his friend Mr. Parris, executed the "Panorama of Madras;" and he subsequently painted two others, without assistance, namely, the "City of Lucknow" and the "Mode of Hunting wild Elephants in Ceylon." He was particularly successful in depicting the ocean in all its varied aspects; and his glowing representations of Eastern scenery are well known to the public by his splendid "Oriental Annual." Died, 1837.

DANNECKER, JOHN HENRY, whose statue of Ariadne on the leopard, in M. Bethmann's garden at Frankfort, would suffice to place him in the first rank of modern sculptors, was born at Stuttgart, in 1758. He early gave indications of a talent for art; and after passing some years in the school of design, he set out for Paris in 1783, where he studied under Pajou, and subsequently spent 5 years at Rome, in the contemplation and imitation of the masterpieces of art that adorn that metropolis. The rest of his life was spent chiefly at Stuttgart. His female figures have rarely been surpassed; and his busts of Schiller, Lavater, Gluck, and many of the members of the royal family of Wurtemberg, are models of artistic skill. Died, 1841.

DANTE, ALIGHIERI, or more properly DURANTE, the most renowned of all the Italian poets, was born at Florence in 1265. In the early part of his life he served his country both as a soldier and a statesman, and was employed on many occasions as the Florentine envoy to Rome. Unfortunately for himself, he was made one of the priors, or principal magistrates of his native city, in 1300, during the time it was divided between two parties, the Bianchi and the Neri; and the former (to whom he belonged) being the weakest, he was banished, his property confiscated, and he was long doomed to endure all the sorrows and sufferings of protracted exile. At length he found an asylum with Guido Novello, lord of Ravenna, who, as a friend of the muses, willingly afforded him protection during the remainder of his life. Dante's fame chiefly rests on that extraordinary production, entitled "Divina Commedia," consisting of three parts, Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven; a work alike remarkable for its terrific grandeur and wild display of creative genius, while at times it is equally graceful, tender, and pathetic. He died in 1321.

DANTE, IGNATIUS, a Dominican, of the same family as the poet. He was a celebrated mathematician, and wrote a treatise on the astrolabe. He became bishop of Alatri, and died in 1586.

DANTE, JOHN BAPTIST, professor of mathematics at Venice in the 15th century, was also a member of the above family, and is said to have made a pair of wings, with which he flew over the lake Thrasimeneus.

DANTON, GEORGE JAMES, born in 1759, was an advocate by profession, but became one of the most active among the sanguinary demagogues of the French revolution. After the imprisonment of Louis XVI. at Varennes, he took the lead in the meeting of the Champ de Mars, which paved the way to the dethronement of the king, and ended in those scenes of blood and cruelty that has for ever rendered execrable the name of Jacobin. Well qualified for the position he assumed, by his colossal figure, stentorian voice, and fierce demeanour, he became one of the executive council, and prepared measures for the defence of the capital when it was threatened by the Prussian invaders under the Duke of Brunswick. He was afterwards a member of the convention and of the committee of public safety, and was a chief promoter of all the sanguinary acts of that terrible period. At length a struggle for supremacy took place between him and Robespierre, in which the latter succeeded, and Danton was sent to the guillotine, in 1794.

D'ANTONELLE, PETER ANTONY, Marquis; a conspicuous character in the French revolution. He voted for the death of the queen, and for the destruction of the Girondists. He was himself near meeting the fate to which he so readily consigned others, as he was tried for complicity in the conspiracy of Babeuf; but he was fortunate enough to be acquitted, and died at an advanced age, in 1817.

D'ANVILLE, JEAN BAPTISTE BOERGUIGNON, first geographer to the king of France, member of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, of the Antiquarian Society of London, and adjoint-geographer to the Parisian Academy of Sciences; born at Paris, 1697; died, 1782. D'Anville devoted his whole life to geographical studies, and the numerous valuable maps and works he published left him without a rival. Among the best of his works are the "Atlas of Ancient Egypt," "Orbis Veteribus Notus," and "Orbis Romanus." He published 78 treatises and 211 maps, all of which are distinguished for their accuracy and perspicuity.

DANZI, FRANCIS, an eminent musical composer and performer on the violoncello, born at Mannheim in 1763; author of several operas, "Azakia," the "Midnight Hour," "Iphigenia," &c., and a great variety of instrumental music. He held the situation of director of the opera at Carlsruhe. Died, 1826.

DARAN, JAMES, an eminent French surgeon, born in 1701, was celebrated chiefly for his skill in diseases of the bladder. For a considerable time he was surgeon-major in the imperial army, but settled in Paris, where he acquired both fame and fortune by his practice. Died, 1784.

D'ARBLAY, Madame (FRANCES BURNEY), was the daughter of Dr. Burney, the celebrated composer and author, and may be reckoned among the most distinguished novelists of the last century; her first work, "Evelina," having created a greater sensation among the literati of her time than was probably ever caused by any similar production. Her other chief works were "Cecilia, or the Memoirs of an Heiress," "Camilla, or a Picture of Youth," "The Wanderer, or Female Difficulties," and "Memoirs of Dr. Burney." In 1793 she was married to M. d'Arblay, a French emigrant artillery officer; and having quitted England for a short residence at Paris during the peace of 1802, their detention by Napoleon was the consequence. Her husband afterwards resumed his rank in the army of his native country; and they continued to remain in France till the peace of 1814, when they came to England, and took up their residence at Bath. In that city M. d'Arblay (then a general) died, in 1818. There also died Madame d'Arblay, Jan. 6. 1840. Her memoirs have since been published.

DARCET, JOHN, a French chemist and physician, who contributed much to the progress of chemical science, was born, in 1725, at Douazit, in Guienne. He made several improvements in the manufacture of porcelain, tried the effect of fire on various minerals, and demonstrated the combustibility of the diamond. During the reign of terror his name was in Robespierre's list; but the interest of his friend Fourcroy saved him from the tyrant's murderous fangs; and he died in 1801, a member of the Institute and of the conservative senate.—His son, JOHN PETER JOSEPH, also an ingenious practical chemist, has greatly contributed to the improvement of science by a number of valuable discoveries.

D'ARCO, PHILIP AUGUSTUS, Chevalier, a supposed natural son of the Count de Toulouse, born at Paris, and died, 1779; he wrote several works on history, &c., and at the close of his life retired to Gentilly, where he devoted the remainder of his days to religion.

DARCY, PATRICK, Count, an eminent engineer, was born at Galway, in Ireland, in 1725, and educated at Paris. He entered the French army, and progressively rose to the rank of major-general. He also distinguished himself by his mathematical works, viz. "An Essay on Artillery," "A Memoir on the Duration of the Sensation of Sight," &c. Died, 1779.

D'ARGENSOLA, LUPERCIO LEONARDO, a Spanish poet, born at Balastro, Arragon, in 1565, was secretary of war at Naples, under the viceroy there. He was the author of three tragedies and various poems. Died, 1613.

D'ARGENSOLA, BARTHOLOMEW, brother of the preceding, was chaplain to the empress Maria of Austria, and the writer of some historical works of merit, viz. a "History of the Conquest of the Molucca Islands," "Annals of the Kingdom of Arragon," &c. Died, 1731.

D'ARGENSON, MARK RENÉ LE VOYER PAULMY, Marquis, a distinguished statesman in the reign of Louis XIV., born at Venice, 1652; died, 1721. He was lieutenant-general of the police in Paris, and the first who introduced lettres-de-cachet; he was subsequently chancellor; but finally retired under some disgrace to a monastery, in which he died.

D'ARGENTAL, CHARLES AUGUSTIN FERRIOL, Count, a French writer of the 18th century, to whom some writers attribute the novel, entitled "Mémoires du Comte de Comminges." Died, 1788.

D'ARGENTRE, CHARLES DUPLESSIS, a learned French prelate; born, 1673; died, 1740; he became doctor of the Sorbonne, almoner to the king, and bishop of Tulle.

D'ARGENVILLE, ANTOINE JOSEPH DESALLIER, a native of Paris, in which city his father was a bookseller. He was one of the members of the French academy, engaged in the compilation of the Encyclopédie, and a corresponding associate of most of the European literary societies. He died, 1766.

D'ARGILLATA, PETER, a physician and professor of logic at Bologna; died, 1423; his surgical observations in six books passed through many editions, and are very valuable.

D'ARGONNE, NOEL BONAVENTURE, a French Carthusian monk of the 17th century. His "Mélanges d'Histoire et de Littérature," published under the name of Vigneul de Marville, is a very clever collection of anecdotes, accompanied by striking and just remarks. Argonne is also favourably known as the author of "Traité de la Lecture des Percs de l'Eglise."

D'ARGOTA, JEROME CONTADOR, a Portuguese monk, born at Collares, 1676; died, 1749. He was a member of the Portuguese academy of history, and author of several works on antiquities, &c.

D'ARGUES, GERARD, a mathematician, born at Lyons, 1597; died, 1661. He wrote several treatises on perspective, conic sections, stone-cutting, &c.

DARIUS, surnamed the Mede, by some supposed to be the same as Cyaxeres, son of Astyages, and maternal uncle to Cyrus, died at Babylon about 348 B. C.

DARIUS I., king of Persia, was the son of Hystaspes. He entered into a conspiracy, with six others, against the usurper Smerdis, and having slain him, they agreed that he should have the crown whose horse should neigh first in the morning. By a well-concerted plan of his groom, the horse of Darius neighed immediately he came to the spot where they were to meet, in consequence of which he was saluted king. He took Babylon after a siege of ten months, rebuilt the temple of Jerusalem, and sent the captive Jews to their own country. His forces suffered a defeat from the Greeks at Marathon; on which he resolved to carry on the war in person, but died in the midst of his preparation, B. C. 485.

DARNLEY, HENRY, Earl of, the husband of Mary, queen of Scots, whose hand he received in 1565, and perished about two years afterwards, owing to the house in which he resided being blown up with gunpowder. Whether Mary was privy to this horrid crime, or not, has never been clearly proved; but there are strong reasons to conjecture that her illicit passion for Bothwell, or resentment for the death of her favourite, Rizzio, might have been the cause of the catastrophe.

D'ARNAUD, FRANCIS T. M. BACULARD, a French writer of the 18th century; author of numerous poems, plays, and prose fictions. He was favourably noticed by Voltaire, and Frederic, king of Prussia.

D'ARNAUD, GEORGE, a French critic, whose works are very numerous and erudite. He gave promise of critical excellence, but was cut short in his learned career by death, at the early age of 29. Born, 1718; died, 1747.

DARQUIER, AUGUSTIN, a French astronomer, was born at Toulouse in 1718, and died in 1802. He was a member of the national institute; and his observations were printed in Lalande's "Histoire Céleste."

DARU, PIERRE ANTOINE NOEL BRUNO, a peer of France, eminent as a statesman, poet, and historian, was born at Montpellier, in 1767. At the age of sixteen he entered the army, and at the breaking out of the revolution adopted its principles; but though engaged in active service, he devoted much of his time to literary pursuits. He first published a translation of the works of Horace, which, with his "Cléopâtre," or Theory of Literary Fame, established his reputation as a poet. It was not long before Napoleon discovered his abilities, and rewarded him by various official appointments of trust, in which Daru conducted himself with zeal and ability; and at the time of the first restoration of the Bourbons he held the portfolio of the war department. Though his estate at Menlan was sequestered by Blucher, the allied monarchs soon restored it, and he was called to the chamber of peers by Louis XVIII. He afterwards wrote the "Life of Sully" and the "History of Venice," the latter work being one of the most important productions of modern literature. Died, 1829.

DARWIN, ERASMUS, a poet and physician, was born at Elton, near Newark, in 1721. He was educated at Cambridge, took his doctor's degree at Edinburgh, and settled at Lichfield as a physician till 1781, when he removed to Derby, where he died in 1802. He was a man of great talent but of remarkably eccentric opinions, as his works abundantly prove. His poetic fame rests upon his "Botanic Garden," the versification of which is highly polished but too mechanical. His other great work is entitled "Zoonomia, or the Laws of Organic Life," which, though able and ingenious, is built upon the most absurd hypotheses. He also wrote "Physiologia, or the Philosophy of Agriculture and Gardening," several papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c.

DASCHKOFF, CATHERINE ROMANOWNA, Princess of, born in 1744, was a woman of great courage, and of considerable literary abilities. Having led a body of troops to the empress Catharine, the latter placed herself at their head, and precipitated her husband from the throne. For this service she desired to have the command of a regiment of guards, which the czarina refused; but was made director of the academy of sciences, and president of the newly established Russian academy. She was the author of some comedies and other works. Died, 1810.

D'ASPREMONT, FRANCIS, Viscount, the famous governor of Bayonne, who, when commanded by Charles IX. to massacre the Calvinists, heroically replied, "Sire, among the citizens and soldiers I have found men devoted to your Majesty; but not a single executioner."

DASSIER, JOHN, a French medallist, who engraved a great number of medals of eminent men of the age of Louis XIV. Died, 1763.

DASSIER, JACOB ANTHONY, son of the preceding, was also a medallist, and engraved numerous medals of illustrious men, in a very superior style of workmanship, preserving the likenesses with wonderful correctness. He was for some time actively employed in the mint of England, but went to St. Petersburg, and died at Copenhagen, while on his return to London, in 1759.

DATAMES, a general of the army of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, to which station he was raised from the ranks. He was assassinated B. C. 361.

D'ATTAIGNANT, GABRIEL CHARLES, a French ecclesiastic and poet; author of "Pièces Derobées à un Ami," &c. Born, 1697; died, 1779.

DAUBENTON, LOUIS JEAN MARIE, a French naturalist and physician, was born at Montbar, Burgundy, in 1716. He was the friend and coadjutor of Buffon in his Natural History of Quadrupeds, the anatomical part of which was prepared by him with great clearness and accuracy. He is the author of "Instructions to Shepherds," "A Methodical View of Minerals," and other works; and at the time of his death, in 1800, was a member of the senate and the institute. His wife was the author of a popular romance, called "Zélie dans le Désert." She died in 1824.

D'AUBIGNE, THEODORE AGRIPPA, a French Calvinist of good family, remarkable for his attachment to Henry IV., and for the honesty with which he spoke the truth to that king even when it was least agreeable. He spent the latter part of his life in retirement at Geneva. Died, 1630.

D'AUBIGNE, CONSTANT, son of the above, and father of the notorious Madame de Maintenon. His moral character was very inferior to that of his father; but as an author, his Universal History, and his satires, poems, memoirs, &c., do him considerable credit.

D'AUBUSSON, PETER, surnamed the Buckler of the Church, after having served with great distinction under the emperor Sigismund against the Turks, entered the order of St. John of Jerusalem, became grand-master, and, in 1480, compelled Mahomet II. to raise the siege of Rhodes. Died, 1503.

D'AUDIGUIER, VITAL, a French nobleman; author of a "Treatise on the true and ancient Usage of Duels." Died, 1630.

DAUN, LEOPOLD JOSEPH MARIA, Count, an Austrian field-marshal, was born in 1705. He commenced his military career in the war against the Turks, and greatly distinguished himself; but it was as commander-in-chief, when opposed to Frederic of Prussia, during the seven years' war, that he obtained his fame as a great general. He died in 1766.

DAUNOU, PIERRE CLAUDE FRANÇOIS, a very learned French writer and professor, was born at Boulogne-sur-mer. Being sent to the convention by the department of Calais, he strove to save the king and the Girondists, was thrown into prison by Robespierre, and only owed his escape from death to that monster's fall. He was a very voluminous writer, and his "Course of Historical Study" fully displays the philosopher, the critic, the writer, and no less the honest man, who were all united in his person. Born, 1761; died, 1840.

DAVENANT, Sir WILLIAM, an eminent poet, was born at Oxford, in 1606, and there educated. After having been in the service of the Duchess of Richmond and Lord Brooke, he began to write for the stage; and upon the death of Ben Jonson, he was created poet laureate. During the civil wars he fought for the king, was made a lieutenant-general, and received the honour of knighthood. On the decline of the royal cause he went to France, and formed a design for carrying over a number of artificers to Virginia; but his ship was taken by a vessel belonging to the parliament, and brought to England, where an ignominious death would have awaited him, had it not been for the intercession of Milton; an act of kindness which he afterwards returned. On the restoration of Charles II., he obtained a patent for a theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields. He died in 1668, and was interred in Westminster Abbey. His works consist of plays and poems, all of which display talents far above mediocrity.

DAVENANT, CHARLES, eldest son of the preceding, an eminent author and civilian, was born in 1656. He was successively joint inspector of plays, commissioner of excise, and inspector-general of exports and imports. His "Essays on Trade," in 5 vols., was his principal work; but he also wrote "Circe," a tragedy, and some other plays. Died, 1714.

DAVENANT, JOHN, bishop of Salisbury, was the son of an eminent merchant in London, where he was born in 1570. He was elected professor of divinity at Cambridge in 1609; but is chiefly known as having been sent by James I. to the synod of Dort.

DAVENPORT, CHRISTOPHER, an English Franciscan friar and theological writer. He was chaplain to the queen of Charles I. Born, 1598; died, 1680.

DAVID, St., the patron saint of Wales, was the son of the prince of Ceredica, now Cardiganshire, and born towards the end of the 5th century. On the death of St. Dubricius, he became archbishop of Caerlon, at that time the metropolitan church of Wales; but he translated it to Menevia, now St. David's. He had the reputation of great learning and piety, and was the founder of twelve monasteries, the principal of which was in the vale of Ross.

DAVID I., king of Scotland, succeeded his brother Alexander the Fierce in 1124. He married Maud, grand-niece of William the Conqueror; and was earl of Northumberland and Huntingdon when called to the Scottish throne. On the death of Henry I., king of England, he maintained the claim of his daughter Maud against king Stephen, and seized Carlisle, but was defeated at the battle of Northallerton in 1138. A negotiation was entered into the following year, by which Carlisle was suffered to remain in the possession of David. He died there in 1153.

DAVID II., king of Scotland, was the son of Robert Bruce, at whose death he was only five years old. On the invasion of Scotland by Balliol, David was sent to France; but his party prevailing, after a bloody contest, he returned home in 1342. He made several inroads on England, but was taken prisoner after a brave resistance, and conveyed to the Tower, and did not recover his liberty till 1357, on paying a heavy ransom. Died, 1371.

DAVID, FRANCIS ANNE, an eminent French engraver, who published many illustrated works, among which were "Histoire de France, sous le Règne de Napoleon le Grand," "Elémens du Dessin," &c. Died, 1824.

DAVID DE ST. GEORGE, JOHN JOSEPH ALEXIS, a French litterateur, who devoted much time to the formation of a scheme, originally suggested by the president Des Bosses, for showing the connection between the roots of all languages. He was a member of several learned societies, and the translator of some of Smollett's novels and other English works. Born, 1759; died, 1809.

DAVID AB GWILYM, a celebrated Welsh poet, of the 14th century.

DAVID, JACQUES LOUIS, a celebrated modern French painter, was born at Paris in 1758, and was a pupil of Vien. In 1774 he went to Rome, where his talents for historical paintings were quickly developed; and in 1789 he finished a large picture, representing Brutus condemning his son to death. But whatever were his merits as a painter, his character as a man is for ever degraded by the blind idolatry with which he worshipped those human demons, Robespierre and Marat, as well as by the eagerness with which he accepted office in the worst periods of the revolution. Seated in the National Convention, he became one of the Jacobin Mountain, and appears to have worked himself up to the imaginary belief of a similarity between Collot d'Herbois and Marius—of Phocion and Robespierre. He presented paintings of republican heroism to the National Assembly; he depicted, in a funeral oration, the patriotic death of Marat: avowed his destiny as for ever joined with Robespierre; voted for the death of Louis XVI., and for the civic festival destined to the goddess of Liberty, and the re-acknowledgment of a God for some of the constituent details of which he supplied gratuitous designs. In the sudden changes, however, which at that time took place, he was committed to the Luxembourg, and only escaped the guillotine from the celebrity he had gained as an artist. In 1800, Buonaparte appointed him painter to the government; and, during the imperial domination, David exercised considerable influence over the measures adopted for the cultivation of the fine arts. On the restoration of the Bourbons he was banished from France, and died at Brussels in 1825. His best paintings are, the Rape of the Sabinas, the Oath of the Horatii, the Death of Socrates, Napoleon presenting the Imperial Eagles to the Troops, Mars disarmed by Venus and the Graces, and the Coronation of Napoleon. David's style of painting, formed on a fastidious deference to the classic models of Greece, has a cold and statue-like tameness in the midst of striking elegance of form, and accuracy of costume and design, being deficient in that vitality which forms the beau idéal of the English school.

DAVIDSON, JOHN, a celebrated traveller, was the son of Mr. Davidson, an opulent tailor, in Cork Street, Dublin. In 1814, he was apprenticed to Messrs. Savory and Moore, chemists, and became a partner in that firm at the expiration of his time; but his inclination for travel induced him to quit the business in 1826; and from that period up to the time of his death, he had been almost constantly engaged in exploring distant regions. He visited North and South America, India, Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Greece, Italy, France, and Germany; enriching his mind with the most valuable information, and afterwards imparting it to the public in his lectures. His last expedition was to Africa, and it proved a fatal one. Whilst vainly attempting to reach the great object of European curiosity, the far-famed city of Timbuctoo, and when about 25 days' journey from it (near the southern confines of the district of Egeda), he was robbed and murdered by a party of the tribe of El Harib, Dec. 18. 1836.

DAVIDSON, LUCRETIA MARIA, an American poetess of extraordinary talent, industry, and precocity, was born at Plattsburg in 1808. When she was only four years old she was in the habit of retiring to some secluded place, while her schoolmates were at play, and there occupying herself in making rude drawings, with verses descriptive of them, written in the characters of the printed alphabet. Her parents not being in good circumstances, she was much employed in domestic services; but still she devoted every interval of leisure to intellectual pursuits, and with such a fatal ardour, that it laid the foundation of a disease which terminated in death, August 27. 1825, in the 17th year of her age. Her poetical pieces were afterwards published, with a biographical sketch by Mr. Morse. Her features were singularly beautiful, but an expression of melancholy pervaded them, and in her latter effusions there is an evident consciousness of her premature decay.

DAVIE, WILLIAM RICHARDSON, a native of England, but brought up in America, and graduated at the college of Nassau Hall, New Jersey. He was intended for the law; but yielding to the military spirit which the war of independence had excited in Carolina, he obtained the command of a company in Count Pulaski's legion, quickly rose in rank, and greatly distinguished himself by his zeal, courage, and skill. In 1799 he was elected governor of North Carolina, and, soon after, appointed by President Adams one of the envoys to France. He possessed a commanding figure, a noble and patriotic spirit, and was gifted with a masculine, ready eloquence, alike serviceable to himself and the cause of his country. Died, 1820.

DAVIES, Sir JOHN, an English poet and judge, born in 1570, was a native of Wiltshire, and studied at Queen's College, Oxford; from whence he removed to the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. On the accession of James I. he was created a knight, and appointed to the office of attorney-general for Ireland. In 1626 he was made chief justice of the king's bench, but died during the same year. His principal poem, entitled "Nosce Teipsum," has very considerable merit, and his work on the state of Ireland contains many sound political arguments and reflections.

DAVIES, Dr. JOHN, a learned Welsh divine; author of a grammar of the Welsh language, and a dictionary, Welsh and Latin. Died, 1644.

DAVIES, ROBERT, a modern bard of Wales, and one whose knowledge and love of Cambrian literature were never exceeded, died at Nantglyn, near Denbigh, on New-year's Day, 1836, aged 66. He gained numerous medals and premiums at the different Eisteddfodan, for his Welsh effusions on popular and patriotic subjects; and was also the author of an excellent "Welsh Grammar," &c. Among the admirers of the ancient British language, Mr. Davies was known by the bardic appellation of Bard Nantglyn.

DAVIES, Rev. WALTER, vicar of Llanrhai-adhr, one of the Cambrian patriots, to whom, since the middle, and, more particularly, since the last decennium of the 18th century, the principality became indebted for a new epoch in the development of old British literature, and, at the same time, of the national life and spirit of the Welsh people; was born at Wern, in the parish of Llan-y-Mechain, in 1761. Though born of poor parents, he could trace his origin to a long line of illustrious ancestors. At the age of 11, he was teacher in a rural school; and afterwards matriculated at All Saints, Oxford. Among his countrymen, he ranks with their most distinguished bards, both ancient and modern; and besides innumerable minor prose contributions to various Welsh journals, illustrative of the history, topography, and language of his native country, he wrote "A General View of the Agriculture and Domestic Economy of North Wales and South Wales," published by order of the Board of Agriculture, four volumes, 1810—1818; a work full of shrewd observation, lively description, and excellent practical advice; and published an edition of Haw Morus and of Lewis Glyn Gochi, a historical poet of the 16th century. Died, 1849.

DAVILA, ARRIGO CATERINO, an eminent historian, was born in the territory of Padua, in 1576; and being brought up in France, served with reputation in the French army. On his return to his native country, he held several high offices under the Venetian government; but in 1631, while on his journey to take the command of the garrison at Crema, he was assassinated. He wrote "The History of the Civil Wars of France," a work which still ranks among the best Italian productions.

D'AVILER, AUGUSTINE CHARLES, a French architect of the 17th century; author of some valuable works on architecture.

DAVIS, HENRY EDWARD, an English divine, born at Windsor, in 1756. He was the author of "An Examination of Gibbon's Rome," and the only opponent whom the historian deigned to answer. Died, 1784.

DAVIS, JOHN, an eminent navigator, was born near Dartmouth in Devonshire, and went to sea at an early age. In 1585 he was sent out with two vessels to find a north-west passage, when he discovered the straits which still bear his name. He afterwards explored the coasts of Greenland and Iceland, proceeding as far as latitude 73° N. In 1571 he went, as second in command, with Cavendish, in his unfortunate voyage to the South Seas. After this he made five voyages to the East Indies, in the last of which he was killed in an engagement with some Japanese pirates off the coast of Malacca, 1605. He wrote an account of his voyages, and invented a quadrant.

DAVIS, RICHARD HART, an eminent merchant and banker in Bristol, and for many years one of the representatives of that city in parliament, from which, however, he withdrew on the passing of the reform bill. On four different elections he maintained his seat after severe contests, having for his opponents on two occasions, Henry Hunt and William Cobbett, and Sir Samuel Romilly. On his secession from parliament, a handsome service of plate, of the value of 756*l.*, was raised by subscription, and presented to him by the electors, as a mark of their esteem. Died February, 1842, aged 75.

DAVIS, THOMAS, a miscellaneous writer, by turns a bookseller and an actor, was the author of "The Life of Garrick," "The Life of Henderson," "Dramatic Miscellanies," &c. Died, 1705.

DAVISON, WILLIAM, a native of Scotland, and secretary of state to queen Elizabeth. A great part of his life was spent in diplomatic missions; but he was ultimately sacrificed on the pretence of precipitating the death of Mary, queen of Scots. In order to give a colour of probability to the charge, he was condemned to pay a fine of ten thousand marks, and to be imprisoned during pleasure.

DAVOUST, LOUIS NICHOLAS, duke of Auerstadt and prince of Eckmuhl, a marshal and peer of France, was born of a noble family, at Annoux in Burgundy, in 1770. He studied at Brienne with Buonaparte, and entered the army in 1785. Being an ardent republican, and distinguishing himself on many previous occasions, he accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt; but it was in those brilliant campaigns which took place from 1803 to 1809 that he obtained his high reputation, and was rewarded with the titles of marshal, duke, and prince. He adhered to the fortunes of Napoleon through all his reverses; and was commander of the army which, in 1815, capitulated to the allies under the walls of Paris. Died, 1823.

DAVRIGNY, HYACINTH ROBILLARD, a French Jesuit and historical writer, was born at Caen in 1675, and died in 1719.

DAVY, SIR HUMPHRY, bart., one of the most eminent among modern chemists, was born at Penzance, in Cornwall, in 1778. He was intended for the medical profession, and placed with an apothecary for the necessary initiation; but he gave himself up to the study of chemistry, and, with the consent of his master, quitted him in his 15th year, in order to prepare for graduating as a physician at Edinburgh. Indefatigable in the pursuit of his favourite science, his progress in it was most rapid; his friends encouraged the bent of his genius, and he was induced to suspend his design of going to Edinburgh, and to accept the superintendence of a pneumatic institution at Bristol. While there he published his "Chemical and Philosophical Researches," the fame of which immediately obtained him the professorship of chemistry at the Royal Institution, where his popularity as a lecturer was unbounded. In 1802 he became professor to the Board of Agriculture; in 1818 he was created a baronet; and in 1820 he was elected president of the Royal Society; and a series of scientific discoveries and professional honours flowed on without interruption till his death, which took place at Geneva, in 1829. The invention of the safety-lamp, the discovery of the metallic bases of the alkalies and earths, and of the principles of electro-chemistry, and numerous other discoveries and inventions not less important, attest his skill and industry, and give him an imperishable fame. Besides his separate works of a scientific character, he was the author of numerous papers in the Philosophical Transactions; and when, during his illness, he was disposed to divert his mind with lighter studies, he wrote "Salmonia, or Days of Fly-fishing," and "Consolations in Travel."

DAVY, JOHN, a musical composer of some notoriety, was born in 1765, and died in 1824. He was a pupil of Jackson, discovered a very early genius for music, and composed some successful operas and songs.

DAWE, GEORGE, R. A., an eminent painter, who held the situation of first painter to the emperor of Russia, and was a member of the academies of St. Petersburg, Stockholm, and Florence, excelled both in portraits and historical subjects, and for several years was a regular exhibitor at Somerset House. He was the author of "The Life of George Morland." Died, 1829.

DAWES, MANASSEH, a barrister of the Inner Temple, but who had long retired from practice, and distinguished himself as a writer of tracts and pamphlets on jurisprudence, morals, and political economy. Died, 1829.

DAWES, RICHARD, a learned critic, was born in 1708, and educated at Market Bosworth, under Anthony Blackwell. In 1738 he was appointed master of the grammar school at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. In 1745 he published his "Miscellanea Critica," or a collection of remarks on various ancient authors, a work of high value. In 1749 he resigned his school, and died in 1766.

DAY, THOMAS, an English writer, was born in 1748, and received his education at the Charterhouse, from whence he was removed to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, after which he entered of the Middle Temple, but never followed the law as a profession. His manners were eccentric, and his opinions romantic. He wrote many works, but the only one by which his name will be perpetuated is the "History of Sandford and Merton." Died, 1789.

DE BERNARD, CHARLES, one of the most graceful and lively modern writers of fiction, was born in 1803. His works, "La Femme de Quarante Ans," "Geraut," &c., are chiefly illustrative of French domestic life; and some of his most attractive tales appeared in the feuilleton of the Journal des Débats. He was of a shy and reserved disposition, and many curious anecdotes are told of his abstraction and absence of mind. Died at Paris, 1850.

DECATUR, STEPHEN, an American naval officer, distinguished for skill and bravery, was born in 1779, became captain of the President frigate, and performed many gallant exploits during the late war with this country. In 1812 he fell in with and captured the Macedonian, English frigate, a vessel of inferior class to his own, after an engagement of an hour and a half. In 1815 he endeavoured to elude the vigilance of the British squadron blockading New York, but was captured after a running fight of two hours and a half. He lost his life in a duel with Commodore Barron, in 1820.

DECEBALUS, king of the Dacians, who resisted the Romans in the reign of Domitian. He entered the province of Mœsia, defeated and slew Oppus Sabinus, the Roman commander, and took a number of places. Afterwards he was defeated himself, but still resisted till Domitian agreed to pay him a tribute yearly, which was continued by Nero, but refused by Trajan, who subdued Dacia, on which Decebalus put an end to himself, A. D. 105.

DECIVS, MUS. P., a valiant Roman, who served as military tribune under the consul Cornelius Cossus, B. C. 343, and when the army was in danger of being cut off by the Samnites, he volunteered his services with his party, and completely routed them. Two years afterwards he was chosen consul with Manlius Torquatus, at which time the Romans were at war with the Latins. On this occasion it was agreed between the two consuls, that he whose army first receded from the enemy should devote himself for the good of his country. The division under Decius being hard pressed, gave way, on which he stripped himself of his military habit, and, rushing into the midst of the enemy, was slain. The army under Manlius then gained a terrible victory, and the body of Decius was buried with military honours.

DECIVS, the son of the above, was consul three times, and also censor. Being engaged against the Gauls and Samnites, and victory dubious, he imitated his father by devoting himself, and was slain, after which the Romans defeated the enemy with great slaughter.

DECIUS, a Roman emperor, was born in Pannonia. He distinguished himself by an expedition against the Persians, and by persecuting the Christians. In his march against the Goths he entered a morass, where he and his army perished by the attack of the enemy, in 251.

DECKER, THOMAS, an English dramatist of the 17th century. He was cotemporary with Ben Johnson, who satirised him in his Poetaster, under the name of Crispanus, but Decker retorted in his Satyrromastix, or untrussing of a humorous poet. He wrote several plays, some of which possess merit. He died after 1638.

DECRES, a French admiral, born in 1761. He commanded the Guillaume Tell at the battle of Aboukir, and when that vessel was blown up, was saved and made prisoner by the victors. It is singular that he perished, after rising to the portfolio of minister of marine in 1820, by being blown up by a train of gunpowder deposited in his mattress, the mysterious cause of which (although robbery by a servant is alleged) has never been discovered.

DE DUNSTANVILLE, FRANCIS, Lord, a descendant of the Bassets of Devonshire, whose ancestors came over to England at the time of the Norman conquest, was born at Walcot, Oxfordshire, in 1757. He was elected to represent Penryn in 1780, and joined the Tory party under the administration of Lord North. He had however, in the year preceding, gained much credit in having headed the miners of Cornwall, and led them on to the relief of Plymouth, when the combined fleets of France and Spain had cast anchor in the Sound. Upon that occasion, Mr. Francis Basset was created a baronet. He afterwards changed his view of political affairs, and withdrew his hitherto strenuous support of Lord North and his party. He was created a peer in 1796. Died, 1835.

DEE, JOHN, a mathematician and astrologer, was born at London in 1527, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. In the reign of Mary he was imprisoned on a suspicion of treasonable practices; but was in great favour with queen Elizabeth, who visited him at Mortlake, where he had collected a library. In 1581 he and Edward Kelly commenced their magical operations, which lasted two years, and in which they were joined by a Polish nobleman called Laski, who persuaded them to go to Poland, where they remained some time. The two worthies at length quarrelled, and their adventures abroad made so much noise, that Dee thought it prudent to return to England. In 1596 he was made warden of Manchester College, and died in 1608. He published several mathematical works in Latin and English, and wrote many more which were never printed.

DEERING, J. P., R.A., a distinguished English architect, better known to the public by his original family name of Gandy, was born in 1780. He took the name of Deering for a large estate, and sat in parliament for Aylesbury after the passing of the reform bill. In his early life he travelled in Greece under the auspices of the Dilettanti Society; some of the results of which he exhibited in very fine drawings at the annual exhibitions of the academy, of which, in 1827, he was chosen an associate, and, in 1838, an R.A. Several buildings in the metropolis are altogether or partly the fruits of his talents. Exeter Hall is his design. Died, 1850.

DEFFAND, MARIA DE VICHY CHAMROUD, Marchioness du, a French lady, who for many years was a conspicuous character among the literati of the age, and whose "Correspondence" has been published, was born in 1697. Few females possessed more natural or cultivated talents, and her abode was regarded as the rendezvous of wit and genius; but the laxity of her morals formed a sad contrast to the superiority of her intellectual powers. Died, 1780.

DEFOE, DANIEL, an English writer, whose family name was FOX, was the son of a butcher, and born in 1660. In 1688 he kept a hosier's shop in Cornhill, but falling, he had recourse to his pen for a subsistence. In 1695 he was made acceptant to the commissioners of the glass duty, which office he held till that impost was taken off. In 1701 he produced his "True-born Englishman," a satire, coarse but characteristic. The year following appeared his "Shortest Way with the Dissenters," for which he was sentenced to the pillory, fined, and imprisoned. He was instrumental in promoting the union of England and Scotland. In 1718 he was again committed to prison for some political pamphlets, but Lord Oxford procured his pardon. In 1715 he published the "Family Instructor," a religious performance of merit; and in 1719 appeared his admirable "Robinson Crusoe." Defoe wrote a number of other books, among which was a "Journal of the Plague in 1665," by a supposed witness of it; and died in 1731.

DELABORDE, JEAN BENJAMIN, a celebrated French musical composer and performer on the violin. He was born in 1734; was a great favourite with Louis XV., in whose household he was originally; became afterwards fermier-general, and was guillotined during the reign of terror, as a favourer of monarchy.

DELACAPEDE, BERNARD GERMAIN STEPHEN LAVILLE, a celebrated French naturalist, born in 1756. He held the situation of keeper of the cabinets in the Jardin du Roi at Paris, which he greatly improved; but the events of the revolution interfered with his scientific employments, and he was by no means an inactive spectator of the scene. He was successively secretary and president of the National Assembly, and on the formation of the Institute he was chosen one of the first members. Under the regime of Bonaparte he became president of the conservative senate, and grand-chancellor of the legion of honour; but when, in 1814, the reverses of the emperor tried the fidelity of his friends, Delacapede appeared to waver.

At the restoration of the Bourbons he returned to his studies in natural history, and he died in 1825.

DELACOUR, JAMES, an Irish poet; author of "The Prospect of Poetry," and a poem in imitation of Pope's, entitled "Abelard to Eloisa." His intellect becoming deranged, he possessed the notion that he was gifted with the spirit of prophecy; and having, it is said, made one lucky guess respecting the exact day when the garrison at the Havannah, which was then in a state of siege, would surrender, he went on prophesying ever after. Born, 1709; died, 1781.

DELABRE JOHN BAPTIST JOSEPH, one of the most eminent French astronomers, and a pupil of Lelande, was born at Amiens in 1749. Though he did not commence the study of astronomy till he was 36 years of age, he rapidly acquired great fame, and produced numerous works of great merit; among which are his "Theoretical and Practical Astronomy," 3 vols. 4to., and a "History of Astronomy," in 5 vols. 4to. Died, 1822.

DELANDINE, ANTHONY FRANCIS, a modern French writer, born at Lyons in 1756, of which city he became the librarian. In the early part of the revolution he distinguished himself by his judgment and moderation; but this was too great a crime for the terrorists to pardon, and he was denounced and imprisoned. To the overthrow of Robespierre's party he owed his life, and he devoted the remainder of his days to literature. He wrote "Mémoires Bibliographiques et Littéraires," and other works. Died, 1820.

DELANY, PATRICK, a learned divine, was a native of Ireland, and born about 1686. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and obtained some church preferment from Lord Carteret. In 1732 he published "Revelation examined with Candour;" and in 1738 appeared his "Reflections upon Polygamy." His next publication was the "Life of David;" and in 1754 he published "Observations on Lord Orrery's Remarks on the Life and Writings of Swift." Died, 1768.

DE LA RUE, GERVAISE, a French abbé and an eminent antiquarian; knight of the legion of honour, and a member of many learned societies in Europe; died, at the age of 87, in September, 1835. His works are chiefly elucidatory of Anglo-Norman poetry.

DELAVAL, EDWARD HUSSEY, a chemist and natural philosopher. He particularly directed his attention to optics; and his principal work was "An Experimental Inquiry into the Cause of the Changes of Colours in opaque and coloured Bodies." He was brother to Lord Delaval. Died, aged 85, in 1814.

DELAUVIGNE, CASIMIR, one of the most eminent of the modern French poets, was born of respectable parents at Havre-de-Grace. His works were very numerous, and to the honour of French taste he is said, they were very popular also; for never since the days of Corneille has French verse embodied sentiments more noble or magnificent. Died, December, 1843, aged 49.

DELAUNEY, Count D'ANTRAIQUES, a distinguished political agent during the revolutionary era of France. When Robespierre was in his zenith he emigrated to Germany, and in 1797 he was employed in the service of Russia. While thus engaged in Italy, he was arrested by the agents of France, and thrown into prison; from which he was liberated through the intercession of Madame St. Huberti, a celebrated actress belonging to the French opera, whom he afterwards married. In 1806 he was sent on a mission to England by the emperor of Russia, and he was often employed by the government. He resided at Barnes, Surrey; and, from some cause wholly unaccounted for, he was there assassinated by his Italian servant, in the following manner:—As he was about to step into his carriage to go to London with his wife, on the 3rd of July, 1812, Lawrence, the Italian footman, fired a pistol at the count, which slightly grazed his hair; but perceiving he had missed his aim, the fellow rushed into the house, and immediately returned with a pistol in one hand and a dagger in the other, with which he stabbed both the count and his wife, who expired almost instantaneously. He then ran into the house again, and blew his own brains out.

DELEYNE, ALEXANDER, an ingenious French writer; author of "An Analysis of the Works of Lord Bacon," "The Genius of Montesquieu," "The Spirit of St. Evremor.d.," several articles in the Encyclopédie, &c. Died, 1797.

DELILLE, JACQUES, a modern French poet, of first-rate eminence, was born at Aigue Perse, in 1738. His translation of Virgil's Georgics, in 1769, established his fame, and obtained him admission to the French academy; and though a royalist, his poetical genius ensured him the respect even of the tyrant Robespierre. He was professor of Latin poetry at the college of France, and of the belles lettres at the university of Paris; but in 1794 he withdrew from France, though he returned again in 1801, and was chosen a member of the Institute. He again, however, emigrated; and it was in London that he translated the "Paradise Lost" of our divine poet. After his final return to his own country he wrote his admired poem, "La Conversation," became blind, and died in 1813. Besides the poems already mentioned, the most prominent of his productions are the "Three Reigns of Nature," "Imagination," and "Misfortune and Pity." Without possessing so large a share of creative genius as some others, he was excelled by none in exquisite versification, purity of moral sentiment, or true pathos.

DELISLE, CLAUDE, a French historian, was born at Vaucouleurs, in 1644, and died in 1720. His works are, "Relation Historique du Royaume de Siam;" "Abridgment of the Universal History," 7 vols.; and a "Genealogical and Historical Atlas."—WILLIAM DE, son of the preceding, was born at Paris, in 1675. He was appointed geographer to the king, to whom he had the honour of giving lessons in that science. Died, 1726.—LOUIS DE, brother of the preceding, an able astronomer and geographer, made several journeys on the coast of the frozen ocean, to determine the situation of a variety of places in the countries lying nearest to the north pole; after which he traversed Siberia; and in 1741 went alone to Kamtschatka, with the same object; but died the same year.—JOSEPH NICHOLAS DE, the youngest and most celebrated of the three brothers, was born at Paris, in 1688; visited England, where he formed an acquaintance with Newton and Halley; and in 1726 was appointed astronomer-royal at Petersburg, where he resided twenty-one years, during which he published "Memoirs illustrative of the History of Astronomy," 2 vols. 4to.; and an atlas of Russia. On his return to Paris, in 1747, he was appointed professor of mathematics in the royal college. Died, 1768.

DELISLE, JOHN BAPTIST ISOARD, a French writer, known also under the name of Delisle de Sales, was born at Lyons in 1743. He was the author of "La Philosophie de la Nature," which being denounced as immoral and irreligious, he was tried and imprisoned, thereby acquiring a temporary celebrity. He afterwards wrote romances, histories, and Platonic dreams; was imprisoned during the reign of Robespierre; subsequently became a member of the Institute; and died in 1816.

DELIUS, CHRISTOPHER FRAUGOTT, a mineralogical writer, was born at Walhausen, in Thuringia. He died in Italy in 1799, aged 51. He wrote a "Dissertation on Mountains," 8vo.; and an "Introduction to the Art of Mining," 4to.; both highly esteemed.

DELLA MARIA, DOMINIQUE, a musical composer, of Italian extraction, though born at Marseilles, in 1778. He studied under the first masters in Italy, and acquired a style at once pure, natural, and graceful. He died, aged 28, in 1806.

DELMONT, DEODAT, a painter of history, born at St. Tron in 1581, was a disciple of Rubens, who highly valued him for his genius. He died in 1634.

DELOLME, JOHN LOUIS, a native of Geneva, was born in 1745, and bred to the practice of the law; but, taking an active part in the political events of his country, he was obliged to repair to England, where he at length became known by his celebrated work on the "Constitution of England." He also wrote a "History of the Flagellants;" and, returning to Switzerland in 1775, died there in 1806.

DELPINI, CHARLES ANTHONY, was born in the parish of St. Martin, Rome, and drew his last breath in the parish of St. Martin, London, Feb. 13. 1828. He was the best clown of his day, and the author of several dramatic works. He got up the grand masquerade called "La Fiera di Venegia," which was intended for the entertainment of George IV. on his attaining the age of majority. It was the most superb thing of the kind ever exhibited in this country; and, though the tickets of admission to the Pantheon were three guineas each, Delpini was considerably out of pocket by it. Like too many of his professional brethren, he had failed to provide for the exigencies of old age, and suffered great distress for many years, which being told to the late king, his majesty sent him a present of 200*l*.

DELUC, JOHN ANDREW, a Genevese naturalist, latterly residing in England, where he obtained a pension from queen Charlotte, who appointed him her reader. He was the author of several geological works. Born, 1726; died, 1817.

DEMARATUS, king of Sparta, who accused Clemens before the ephori, as the disturber of Greece, for which he retorted upon Demaratus the charge of illegitimacy, and having bribed the priests of Delphi, the oracle, when consulted, confirmed the charge. Demaratus then resigned the crown, and entered into the Persian service, where he was entertained by Darius Hystaspes and Xerxes as a king.

DEMETRIUS, surnamed POLIORCETES, king of Macedon, was the son of Antigonus. At the age of twenty-two his father entrusted him with an army against Ptolemy, by whom he was defeated near Gaza. But he soon repaired the loss, and with a fleet of 250 ships sailed to Athens, which he delivered from Demetrius Phalereus. He afterwards defeated Cassander at Thermopylæ; but the successors of Alexander, alarmed at his progress, collected their forces, and marched against him. They met at Ipsus, B. C. 301; and after an obstinate battle, the army of Demetrius was defeated, and his father slain, but he himself fled to Ephesus. He, however, mustered a new army, and relieved Athens from the tyranny under which it groaned. He then slew Alexander, the son of Cassander, and seated himself on the throne of Macedonia. At the end of seven years he was obliged to quit his dominion and retire into Asia, where he was reduced to great distress; on which he went to the court of Seleucus, his son-in-law; but a difference breaking out between them, war ensued, and Demetrius was defeated. Deserted by his soldiers, he surrendered himself at length to his son-in-law, who exiled him to Pella, in Syria, where he died, B. C. 284.

DEMETRIUS I., king of Syria, surnamed SOTER, was the son of Seleucus Philopater. He was sent hostage to Rome by his father, on whose death Antiochus Epiphanes, and after him his son Antiochus Eupator, the one the uncle, and the other the cousin of Demetrius, usurped the throne of Syria. He applied to the Roman senate for assistance to recover his right, but in vain. The Syrians, however, recognised him for their lawful prince, and at last he obtained the throne. He then declared war against the Jews, in which Judas Maccabæus lost his life, bravely fighting for the liberties of his country. A confederacy of the neighbouring kings was formed against Demetrius, who was slain B. C. 150.

DEMETRIUS II., called NICATOR (conqueror), was the son of the preceding. Ptolemy Philometor, king of Egypt, placed him on the throne of his father, after expelling the usurper, Alexander Balas, B. C. 146. He married Cleopatra, the wife of the same Alexander, and daughter of Ptolemy. He was subsequently taken prisoner by the king of Parthia, who gave him his daughter in marriage, which so incensed Cleopatra, that she married Antiochus Sidetes, her brother-in-law. Sidetes, however, fell in battle, and Demetrius recovered his throne; but he did not retain it long, for he was once more expelled by Alexander Zebina, and was killed by the governor of Tyre, B. C. 127.

DEMETRIUS, PHALEREUS, a philosopher of the peripatetic sect. The Athenians were so charmed with his eloquence, as to erect statues to his honour. He afterwards fell into disgrace, and retired to the court of Ptolemy Lagus, king of Egypt, whose son banished him from his dominions, and he died by the bite of an asp, 234 B. C. He wrote several books, and, it is said, furnished the library of Alexandria with 200,000 volumes.

DEMETRIUS, czar of Russia, commonly called the false Demetrius, was, according to most historians, a native of Jarowslaw, and a novice in a monastery, where he was tutored by a monk to personate Demetrius, son of the czar John Baailowitz, who had been murdered by Boris Gudonow. Having learnt his tale he went into Lithuania, embraced the Roman Catholic religion, and married the daughter of the palatine Sendomir. In 1604 Demetrius entered Russia at the head of a small army, was joined by a number of Russians and Cossacks, and defeated an army sent against him. On the death of Boris, the people strangled his son, and placed Demetrius on the throne; but his partiality to the Poles, and contempt of the Greek religion, occasioned an insurrection, and he was assassinated in 1606, after reigning about eleven months.

DEMOCEDES, a Grecian physician, who with his family became captives to the Persians, and were carried to Susa, where he worked with the other slaves. But happening to cure Darius, he was liberally rewarded, and admitted to the royal table. He returned to his own country, and married the daughter of Milo.

DEMOCRITUS, one of the most celebrated philosophers of antiquity, and of the Eleatic school was born at Abdera, B. C. 460. He studied under Leucippus; and on the death of his father, who was a wealthy citizen, he travelled to Egypt, Chaldea, and other countries, by which he greatly enlarged his stores of knowledge; and when he returned to his native city, though at first slighted, his intellectual acquisitions gained the respect of his countrymen, and he was placed at the head of public affairs; but, indignant at the follies of the Abderites, he resigned his office, and retired to solitude, devoting himself wholly to philosophical studies. In his system he developed still farther the mechanical or atomical theory of his master Leucippus, and applied it not only to the formation of the universe, but to the soul of man, the senses, the elements, &c. He was also a practical philosopher and a moralist, his grand axiom being, that the greatest good consists in a tranquil mind. He has been absurdly called the "laughing philosopher" (in contrast to the weeping Heraclitus), which epithet is supposed to have originated in his practice of humourously exposing the absurdities of his countrymen, whose stupidity was proverbial. He wrote numerous works, but none of them now exist; and he lived to the great age of 105.

DEMOIVRE, ABRAHAM, born at Vitry, in Champagne, in 1677, was driven from his native country by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and settled in England, where he obtained a livelihood by his skill in teaching the mathematics. He was undoubtedly one of the first calculators that ever existed; and published "The Doctrine of Chances," "Miscellanea Analytica," &c. Died, 1754.

DEMOSTHENES, the greatest orator of antiquity, was the son of an opulent sword-blade manufacturer at Athens, and was born about 380 B. C. Having lost his father when a mere child, his education was neglected; but at the age of seventeen he determined to study eloquence, though his lungs were weak, his pronunciation inarticulate, and his gestures awkward. These impediments he conquered by perseverance, till by degrees he surpassed all other orators in the power and grace of eloquence. When the encroachments of Philip of Macedon alarmed the Grecian states, he depicted his ambitious design with so much effect, that similar orations are to this day called Philippics. When that monarch was about to invade Africa, Demosthenes was sent as ambassador to prevail on the Bœotians to assist them, in which mission he succeeded. He was also at the battle of Chæronea, but his conduct there showed that he was as deficient in personal courage as he was inimicable in the senate. The influence of Demosthenes being on the decline, Æschines took advantage of it to bring an accusation against him on the subject of his conduct at Chæronea, and his having had a crown of gold awarded him; but the orator so well defended himself in his celebrated oration De Corona, that he was honourably acquitted, and his adversary sent into exile. Shortly after, however, Demosthenes was convicted of receiving a golden cup and twenty talents from Harpalus, one of Alexander's generals, who had retired to Athens with a quantity of plunder, which he had gathered in Asia. To avoid punishment, he fled to Ægina, where he remained till the death of Alexander, when he was recalled by his countrymen, and brought home in triumph. But this change of fortune was of short duration. The victory of Antipater was followed by an order to the Athenians to deliver up Demosthenes, who fled to the temple of Neptune, at Calauria, where he poisoned himself, B. C. 322. The speeches of Demosthenes were natural, concise, vigorous, and logical: he was by turns calm, vehement, or elevated, as the case required; in energy and power of persuasion, in beauty and vigour of expression, and in language at once strong and melodious, he surpassed all his predecessors.

DEMOUSTIER, C. A., a French author of celebrity, descended by the father's side from Racine, and by the mother's from La Fontaine. He was born in 1760, and died in 1801. Among his works are "Le Siège de Cythère," a poem, and many successful comedies, "Les Femmes," "Les Trois Fils," "Le Divorce," "Alceste," "La Chaumière Indienne," &c.

DEMPSTER, THOMAS, a Scotch writer, was born in 1579, and studied at Cambridge, from whence he removed to Paris. He was afterwards professor of philology at Pisa, and died at Bologna in 1625. He wrote several works, the most curious of which are a "Martyrology of Scotland," a "List of Scottish Writers," and a "History of the Etruscans."

DENHAM, Lieut.-col. DIXON, an enterprising traveller and intrepid soldier, was born in 1786, and entered the army as a volunteer in 1811, serving with honour in the peninsular war, where he obtained a lieutenancy. In 1821 he was chosen to proceed to Central Africa, in company with Captain Clapperton and Dr. Oudney, for the purpose of exploring those regions; his courage perseverance, address, and conciliatory manners peculiarly fitting him for such an undertaking. On his return to England, in 1824, he published a "Narrative" of his travels. In 1826 he was sent to Sierra Leone as superintendent of the liberated Africans, and in 1828 was appointed lieutenant-governor of the colony; soon after which he was seized with a fever, which quickly proved fatal.

DENHAM, Sir JOHN, a poet of some celebrity, was born in 1615, at Dublin, where his father was chief baron of the exchequer, but afterwards became a judge in England. In 1641 appeared his tragedy of "The Sophy," and soon after he was made governor of Fareham Castle for the king. In 1643 he published his "Cooper's Hill." He attended Charles II. in his exile, and was sent by him ambassador to Poland. At the Restoration he was knighted and appointed surveyor-general of the royal buildings. Died, 1668.

DENNA, GIACOMO CARLO, an Italian historian, was born in 1731, at Revel, in Piedmont. For many years he was a professor of rhetoric at Turin, and ultimately became librarian to Napoleon. His principal works are "History of the Revolutions of Italy," "The Political and Literary History of Greece," "The Revolutions of Germany," &c. He died at Paris, in 1813.

DENMAN, Dr. THOMAS, an eminent physician and medical writer, was born at Bakewell Derbyshire, in 1733. He first served in the navy as a surgeon, and having obtained much experience, on quitting it he commenced practice in London, where he eventually attained great professional celebrity. In 1770 he commenced giving lectures on the obstetric art, and was appointed licentiate in midwifery of the College of Physicians in 1783. He wrote an "Essay on Puerperal Fever," an "Introduction to the Practice of Midwifery," and "Aphorisms" for the use of junior practitioners. His son was the late distinguished chief justice of the court of king's bench. Died, 1815.

DENNIS, JOHN, a dramatist and critic, was born in London, in 1657, studied at Cambridge, and devoted himself to literature. Throughout life he was almost perpetually in broils with one or other of the wits of the age; and Pope, in return for his animadversions, gave him a conspicuous place in the Dunciad. He originally had a considerable fortune; but having dissipated it, the Duke of Marlborough obtained for him the place of land-waiter at the Custom House; this he mortgaged, and his latter days were spent in poverty, aggravated by blindness. Died, 1734.

DENON, DOMINIQUE VIVANT, Baron de, was born, in 1747, at Chalons-sur-Saone, in Burgundy. Though originally destined for the law, he was appointed to the office of "gentilhomme ordinaire" about the person of Louis XV. He afterwards resided several years in Italy, as secretary of embassy, during which period he applied himself sedulously to the study of the arts. He was so fortunate as to pass through the years of terror without incurring the displeasure of any of the republican tyrants; and having attracted the notice of Buonaparte, he accompanied him to Egypt, alternately wielding the pen, the pencil, and the sword. On returning to Paris, he was appointed general director of the museums, and had the superintendence of the medallic mint, and all works of art executed in honour of the French victories. After the abdication of the emperor, he retained his office, but was deprived of it in 1815, in consequence of having joined him on his return from Elba. He was a man of great and varied talents; and his able work, entitled "Travels in Upper and Lower Egypt during the Campaign of General Buonaparte," has gained him an imperishable fame. Died at Paris, 1825.

D'EON, the Chevalier. EON DE BEAUMONT, CHARLES GENEVIEVE LOUISE AUGUSTE D', was born at Tonnerre, in 1728, and known until 1777 as the Chevalier D'Eon. He was equerry to Louis XV., chevalier, doctor of law, parliamentary advocate, military officer, ambassador, royal censor, &c.; occupying in short, during his eventful life, the most varied stations with consummate skill, and involving his sex and real character in unparalleled mystery. Sent as envoy on a difficult mission to the Russian court, his insinuating manners gained him the favour of the empress Elizabeth, and for five years he was the medium of a secret correspondence between her and the king of France. In consequence of these services, he was made captain of dragoons, and received a pension of 2400 livres. He returned to France in 1758, and subsequently distinguished himself in the military service. After the conclusion of peace, he went to London as secretary of legation, under the Duke of Nivernois, and obtained possession of some important papers. On the return of the duke, he remained as resident, and afterwards as minister plenipotentiary, but was finally dismissed from his employment, and lived 14 years at London in a kind of exile. During this period, suspicions arose as to his sex, which led to several extraordinary wagers. In July, 1777, a curious trial took place before Lord Chief-justice Mansfield, on an action brought against Mr. Jaques, a broker, who had received several premiums of 15 guineas, to return 100, whenever it should be proved that the chevalier was a woman. By the evidence of Louis Legoux and M. de Morande this fact was supposed to be so well established, that Hayes, the plaintiff, obtained a verdict, but it was afterwards set aside on the ground of the illegality of the wager. D'Eon after this put on female attire, and returned to France; but on the commencement of the revolution, which deprived him of his pension, he returned to England. Being reduced to poverty, he supported himself for some time by giving lessons in fencing, and by publicly exhibiting his skill in that art in the principal towns in the kingdom. When age had enfeebled him, and the notoriety of his character had abated, he depended in a great measure for subsistence on the aid of his friends. Among these was Elisee, first surgeon of Louis XVIII., who kindly assisted him till his death, in London, in 1810, and attended the dissection of his body. The account of this witness, with other undeniable evidence, leaves it beyond doubt that D'Eon was of the male sex. What the reasons were that could induce the chevalier, who was undoubtedly a brave soldier and an able diplomatist, to assume female attire, and to join in the deception when there was no apparent reason for it, remain undiscovered; but they were probably of a political nature, and might have been suggested by the manœuvring policy of the French court to attain some particular object. That D'Eon was a man of talent is sufficiently evident by his works, which appeared under the title of "Loisirs du Chevalier D'Eon," in 13 vols. 8vo.

DERBY, JAMES STANLEY, Earl of, a gallant English nobleman, who in the action at Wigan, in Lancashire, with 600 horse bravely withstood a body of 3000 horse and foot, commanded by Colonel Lilburne. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and beheaded, in violation of a promise of quarter which had been given him, in 1651.

DERHAM, WILLIAM, D. D., a learned divine and philosopher, was born at Stowton, near Worcester, in 1657. He was a large contributor to the Transactions of the Royal Society, and published many separate works upon theologico-philosophical subjects. Died, 1735.

DERMODY, THOMAS, a poet of some merit, was the son of a schoolmaster, and born at Ennis, Ireland, in 1775. He obtained through Earl Moira a commission in the army; but so confirmed were his habits of intemperance, that he died, a victim to disease, in 1802. His poems, which were written under the pressure of necessity, and often in great haste, possess considerable merit.

DERRICK, SAMUEL, a native of Ireland, who, on the death of Beau Nash, was appointed master of the ceremonies at Bath and Tunbridge Wells. On coming to London he attempted the stage; but being unsuccessful as an actor, he had recourse to his pen. He wrote "A View of the Stage," "The Third Satire of Juvenal in English Verse," "Sylla," a dramatic piece; and edited "Dryden's Poems," 4 vols., a "Collection of Voyages," &c. Born, 1724; died, 1769.

DERSCHAWIN, or DERZHAVINE, GABRIEL ROMANOVITSCHE, a Russian poet and statesman, was born at Casan, in 1743. In 1760 he entered the army as a common soldier, but soon distinguished himself; and, after a military service of 14 years, entered the civil service, in which he arrived at the important situations of treasurer of the empire and minister of justice. He holds a high place among the bards of his country. Died, 1819.

DERYCK, or DERICK, PETER CORNELIUS, a painter of Delft, born in 1568, and died in 1630. He excelled in landscape.

DESAGULIERS, JOHN THEOPHILUS, an ingenious philosopher, was born in 1683 at Rochelle, and educated at Oxford, where he succeeded Dr. Keil as lecturer in experimental philosophy. He published a "Course of Experimental Philosophy," a "Dissertation on Electricity," &c. He was a useful member of the Royal Society, and contributed several papers to their Transactions. Died, 1749.

DESAIX DE VOIGOUX, LOUIS CHARLES ANTHONY, a French general, was born in 1768. In the early part of the revolution he became aide-de-camp to General Custine; and contributed greatly, by his talents, to the famous retreat of Moreau. In the battle of Rastadt he commanded the left wing, and forced the Archduke Charles to retire. He afterwards defended the bridge of Kehl with great bravery, and was wounded. He accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt, was appointed governor of the upper part of the country, and signed the treaty of El-Arish with the Turks and English. He was killed at the battle of Marengo, to which victory he greatly contributed, June 14, 1800.

DESAULT, PETER JOSEPH, a French surgeon, born in 1744, who, during the violence of the revolution, was confined some time in the Luxembourg prison, but his usefulness saved his life. He died while attending the dauphin, June 1, 1795, which induced a suspicion that he was dispatched because he would not poison that unfortunate prince. He wrote a work, entitled "Traité des Maladies Chirurgicales," &c.

DESCARTES, RENÉ, a celebrated French philosopher, was born at La Haye, in Touraine, in 1596, and received his education at the Jesuits College at La Fleche. On leaving that seminary he removed to Paris, and applied to the study of mathematics. In 1616 he entered into the army of the Prince of Orange; and, while serving in the garrison at Breda, solved a difficult mathematical problem which had been posted in the public streets. This introduced him to the acquaintance of the learned Beckmann, the principal of the college of Dort. While at Breda, he wrote, in Latin, a treatise on music, and projected some other works. He next served in the army of the Duke of Bavaria, but soon after quitted the military life, and travelled into Italy, where he saw the famous Galileo at Florence. In 1629 he settled at Amsterdam, and applied assiduously to the mathematical sciences, particularly dioptrics, in which he made some important discoveries. About this time he visited England, and during his stay made observations on the declination of the magnetic needle. His philosophy now became the subject of much discussion, and met with an extensive reception, though with considerable opposition. At the invitation of Christina, queen of Sweden, he went to Stockholm, where he died in 1650. His principal works are "Principia Philosophiæ," "Dissertatio de Methodo recte regendæ Rationis," &c.; "Dioptrica," "Meditationes," and "Geometry."

DESERICIUS, or DESERITZ, JOSEPH INNOCENT, an Hungarian divine, was born in 1702. Being called to Rome, he was created a cardinal, and was appointed by Benedict XIV. ambassador to the hospodar of Wallachia. He wrote several books, and died in 1765.

DESEZE, RAYMOND, or ROMAIN, a native of Bourdeaux, and an able counsellor of the parliament of that city, was born in 1750. He afterwards practised at Paris, and his acknowledged talents caused him to be named one of the counsel for the unfortunate Louis XVI., whose cause he most ably defended, after Target had declined the dangerous task. He was imprisoned for a time, but escaped the scaffold; and on recovering his liberty, he was never induced to serve the directory, the consulate, or the imperial government. On the return of the Bourbons he received, as the only survivor of the three selected by Louis for his counsel, the grateful notice of Louis XVIII. for his devotedness to his royal and unfortunate predecessor. He held several distinguished offices; was a peer of France, a knight of the order of Malta, a member of the French academy, and president of the court of appeal. Died, 1828.

DESFORGES, PETER JOHN BAPTIST CHOUARD, a dramatic writer and actor, was born at Paris, in 1746. His taste for the drama was very early evinced; and he not only wrote for the stage, but commenced his career as a performer in 1769. He, however, quitted the stage in 1782, and devoted his time principally to dramatic composition. He is the author of 24 comedies, besides some romances, which latter afford unequivocal proofs of a sensual mind.

DESGODETS, ANTHONY, a French architect, was born in Paris, in 1653. On his passage to Rome in 1674, he was taken by the Algerines, and kept in slavery 16 months. On being exchanged he repaired to Rome, where he composed a work, entitled "The Ancient Edifices of Rome;" and, on his return to Paris, he was made comptroller of the royal buildings, and architect to the king. Died, 1728.

DESHAYS, JOHN BAPTIST HENRY, a celebrated painter, was born at Rouen, in 1729. Died in 1765.

DESHOULIERES, ANTOINETTE DU LIGIER, a handsome, witty, and accomplished woman, and a writer of much versatility, was born at Paris, in 1634; married a gentleman of family, and was on terms of friendship with the principal literati of the age. She produced numerous plays and operas, few of which were successful; but her "Idyls," "Elogues," and "Moral Reflections" are still admired. She died, after 12 years of suffering, of a cancer in her breast, in 1694.

DESHOULIERES, ANTOINETTE THERESE, a daughter of the preceding, and the inheritor both of her talents and her sufferings; having written various poems, &c., and been for 20 years the victim of cancer. Died, 1718.

DESIDERIUS, or DIDIER, the last king of Lombardy, succeeded Astolphus in 756. His daughters were married to the two sons of Pepin, king of France, Carloman and Charlemagne.

DESMATZEAUX, PETER, a biographical writer, was born in 1666. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he took refuge in England, became fellow of the Royal Society, and died in London, in 1745. He translated into English Bayle's Dictionary, and wrote the Lives of Chillingworth and John Hales.

DESMOULINS, BENOIT CAMILLE, born in 1762, was a fellow-student with the tyrant Robespierre. He was a man of strong mind, possessing powerful talents, which became injurious owing to the extreme violence of the measures at that time adopted. In 1789, Desmoulin was the favourite orator of the people, whom he harangued in all places, and on all occasions. His colleagues having no further need of him as an auxiliary, conspired to hasten him to the scaffold, where he suffered on the 4th of April, 1794.

DESPARD, EDWARD MARCUS, an officer in the British army, was a native of Queen's County, in Ireland. At the close of the American war he served in the West Indies, where he distinguished himself by an expedition on the Spanish main. For his services there he was made lieutenant-colonel, and in 1784 appointed superintendent of the English affairs at Honduras; but his conduct giving offence to the settlers, complaints were sent home against him, and he was suspended. He applied to government for an investigation of his conduct, which was rejected, as were also his claims. This naturally irritated him; and conceiving that he was at least entitled to a fair hearing, he became a violent democrat, and for his inflammatory conduct was imprisoned. Having collected some followers from the lowest classes, they held secret meetings, to which no persons were admitted without taking a treasonable oath. At these assemblies various plans were devised for the murder of the king; and at last it was determined to make the attack when his majesty went to the parliament house. The plot being discovered, the colonel and several others were taken up, and brought to trial by a special commission, Feb. 5. 1803; when the charges being proved, Despard and 7 others were found guilty, and executed.

DESPARD, General JOHN, entered the army at an early age, and saw much service in different quarters of the globe. He had been in 24 engagements, had two horses shot under him, was three times shipwrecked, taken prisoner once, and had the standard of his regiment shot out of his hand, when an ensign, at 15 years of age. After all these "hair-breadth escapes" he lived to attain his 85th year, and died in 1829, at Swan Hill, Shropshire.

DESSALINES, JOHN JAMES, originally a slave in St. Domingo, but having an opportunity of showing great courage and talents during the disturbances in that colony, became second in command to Toussaint Louverture; on whose imprisonment he was chosen emperor of Hayti, under the title of James I. This was in 1804; but he retained his imperial dignity only two years, having perished the victim of a conspiracy, in 1806.

DESTOUCHES, PHILIP NERICAULT, an eminent French dramatic writer, was born at Tours in 1680. Being sent to London, in 1717, to aid the negotiations then carrying on, he continued there seven years, and married. On his return to France he retired into the country, where he devoted himself to agriculture and the belles lettres. His principal pieces are "Le Philosophe Marie" and "Le Glorieux." Died, 1754.

DEVEREUX, ROBERT, Earl of Essex, born in 1567, accompanied the Earl of Leicester to Holland, where he behaved with much bravery at the battle of Zutphen, and on his return to England was made master of the horse. In 1591 he commanded the forces sent to the assistance of Henry IV. of France; and in 1596 he was appointed joint-commander with Lord Howard in an expedition against Spain, where he contributed to the capture of Cadiz. In 1597 he was made earl marshal of England, and, on the death of Lord Bureleigh, chancellor of Cambridge. About this time he incurred queen Elizabeth's displeasure in a remarkable manner: at a private council held respecting the appointment of a proper person to govern Ireland, he had the imprudence to oppose her majesty with rudeness, on which she gave him a box on the ear. The earl instantly laid his hand on his sword, and swore he would not have taken such treatment even from her father. He then withdrew, and instead of making his submission, continued to complain of the treatment he had received. At length a reconciliation was effected; and on the breaking out of the rebellion of Tyrone, Essex was appointed to the government of Ireland; but being unsuccessful there, the queen became displeased, and sharp letters passed between them. He, therefore, returned to England, and waited on the queen, who gave him a better reception than could have been expected. However, he soon fell into disgrace, and was imprisoned. In 1600 he regained his liberty, but instead of conducting himself with caution, he gave vent to his indignation in coarse and virulent terms. His enemies having intelligence of his actions and speeches, sent for him to attend the council, which he refused, and began to arm in his own defence. Some blood was shed before he surrendered, on which he was made close prisoner, tried, and beheaded, in 1601. Essex was rash, bold, and presumptuous, but at the same time generous and affectionate: he was also the friend and patron of literature.

DEVEREUX, ROBERT, earl of Essex, son of the preceding, was born in 1592, and restored to his family honours by James. In 1620 Essex served under Sir Horatio Vere in the Palatinate, and afterwards under Prince Maurice in Holland. On his return to England he appeared as a member of the opposition against the court; and on the breaking out of the rebellion had the command of the parliamentary army. He gained the battle of Edgehill, after which he took Reading, raised the siege of Gloucester, and fought the first battle of Newbury. By the self-denying ordinance in 1645 he was deprived of his command, and died the year following.

DEVONSHIRE, GEORGIANA CAVENDISH, Duchess of, a female alike remarkable for personal graces and mental accomplishments, was the eldest daughter of Earl Spencer; born in 1757, and married to the Duke of Devonshire in her 17th year. Her "Passage of Mount St. Gothard," and such other of her poems as have been published, bear the impress of a highly cultivated mind. She also evinced very considerable powers in musical composition, and had a decided taste for the fine arts. Died, 1806.

D'EWES, Sir SIMONDS, an antiquary, was born in 1602, and created a baronet in 1641; but on the breaking out of the civil war he espoused the cause of democracy, and died in 1650. He was the author of "The Journals of the Parliaments during the Reign of Elizabeth."

DE WINT, PETER, a distinguished artist, whose numerous drawings formed for forty years an attractive feature in the exhibitions of the Old Society of Painters in Water Colours, was born at Stone, in Staffordshire, where his father practised as a physician, 1783. English landscape scenery formed the chief theme for his fertile pencil; and his free and masterly handling of his subjects was only equalled by their truthfulness to nature, and the care which he bestowed on the minutest details. Died, 1849.

DE WITT, JOHN, an enlightened statesman, was born in 1625, at Dort, in Holland. At the age of 23 he published an excellent mathematical work, entitled "The Elements of Curved Lines." In 1650 he was chosen pensionary of his native city; and, after distinguishing himself in public affairs, was elected pensionary of Holland. While in that capacity he concluded a peace with Cromwell, one article of which excluded the House of Orange from the stadtholdership; and in 1667 he established the perpetual edict for abolishing the office of stadtholder, for which he received public thanks. However, in 1672, when Holland was invaded by the French, and civil dissension overspread the country, both John de Witt and his brother Cornelius were barbarously murdered by the populace.

DIAZ, BARTHOLOMEW, a Portuguese navigator, who, in 1486, with two small vessels, discovered the Cape of Good Hope, which he named the Cape of Tempests, and perished there in a storm, in 1500. The king, however, changed it to its present more auspicious appellation.

DIAZ, JOHN, a martyr to the frantic zeal of his brother, was a native of Cuenza, in Spain. He studied at Paris, where, by reading the works of Luther, he became a Protestant. He then quitted France, and visited Calvin at Geneva; afterwards he went to Strasburg, and lastly to Neuberg, whither he was followed by his brother Alphonsus, a zealous Catholic. Alphonsus finding his exhortations could not reclaim him, pretended to close his visit and take his departure, but secretly returned at break of day, with a companion, and murdered him with an axe. The assassins were pursued and taken; but as they were about to be brought to trial, Charles V. took the affair into his own hands, by saying that he would take cognisance of it at the approaching diet. This horrid deed was perpetrated in 1546. The miserable fratricide afterwards hanged himself.

DIBDIN, CHARLES, a dramatist, poet, and actor, but mostly celebrated as a writer of songs and a musical composer, was born at Southampton, in 1745. He was intended for the church, and received his early education at Winchester; but, seduced by his love of music, and relinquishing all thoughts of the clerical profession, he first became a candidate for the situation of organist at a village church in Hampshire, and then took up his abode in London. He made his first appearance as a performer, in 1762, at the Richmond theatre, and two years afterwards appeared on the London boards, as Ralph, in the Maid of the Mill; but he never shone as an actor, though both as a writer of light dramatic pieces and musical compositions he was very successful. He invented a new kind of monodramatic entertainment, consisting of music, songs, and recitations, of which he was the sole author and performer. His sea songs were eminently popular; some, indeed, are of a very superior character, and doubtless had a most favourable influence with British sailors, whose feelings they described, and whose heroism they lauded. For a while Dibdin enjoyed a pension of 200*l.* a-year from government, but lost it by a change of the ministry; and so improvident had he been while in the zenith of his popularity, that in the closing years of his life he would have suffered extreme indigence, had not an annuity been purchased for him by public subscription. Altogether he produced about 1400 songs and 30 dramatic pieces; besides which he wrote "A History of the Stage," his "Professional Life," "A Musical Tour," three novels, &c. He died in 1814.

DIBDIN, THOMAS, a dramatic author and song writer, was the eldest son of the celebrated Charles Dibdin, whose "naval songs" he was engaged in editing at the time of his death. He had the honour of having Garrick for his godfather; and in 1775, when only four years of age, he appeared on the stage as Cupid, in Shakspeare's "Jubilee," to the Venus of Mrs. Siddons. At 16 he was apprenticed to Mr. (afterwards Sir William) Rawlins, to learn the trade of an upholsterer; but born and bred to "the profession," it was no wonder that after a few years he quitted the shop, and sought his fortune on the boards of various provincial theatres. From that time until 1795 he is said to have performed in every department of the drama, and written more than 1000 songs. He afterwards obtained an engagement at Covent Garden Theatre; and numerous were the operas, farces, and entertainments which, for that and other establishments, were produced by his fertile and inventive genius, during the term of half a century. From among them we may select "The Cabinet," "The English Fleet," "Mother Goose" (which yielded more than 20,000*l.* profit to the managers of Covent Garden Theatre), "The High-mettled Racer" (a clear gain to the proprietors of Astley's of 13,000*l.*), "The Jew and Doctor," "Past Ten o'Clock," &c. But, alas! prolific as was his brain, and successful as were his pieces, the latter days of his long and active life were uncheered by the result of his previous labours. Died, Sept. 1841.

DIBDIN, the Rev. THOMAS FROGNALL, D.D., nephew of the celebrated song writer, and himself the most zealous bibliographer, and one of the most voluminous and miscellaneous writers of his time, was born at Calcutta, 1775, and after receiving his education under the care of an uncle at Reading, matriculated at Oxford, as a commoner of St. John's College, where his taste for literature and history commenced. The law being his destination, he became a pupil of Mr. Basil Montague; but he subsequently changed his views, and after waiting some time for a degree, he was ordained a clergyman in 1804. His early preferences consisting chiefly of preachings or lectureships in the metropolis, he was enabled to prosecute his favourite studies with equal zeal and satisfaction; and for nearly thirty years the press may be said to have teemed with the works that emanated from his fertile and versatile pen. A bare list of these would inconveniently crowd our columns; but we must make room for the "Bibliomania," which was published in 1809, and at once established the author's fame in this peculiar department; the "Biographical Decameron," published in 1817; a "Biographical, Antiquarian, and Picturesque Tour," the result of a continental sojourn in 1818; "Reminiscences of a Literary Life," in 1836; a "Northern Tour," in 1838, besides various sermons and innumerable other works on literary, bibliographical, and kindred topics. Dr. Dibdin was one of the founders of the Roxburgh Club, founded in 1812. In 1823 he obtained, through Earl Spencer, whose friendship he enjoyed through life, and in whose magnificent library he could at ease pursue his favourite studies, the vicarage of Exming, near Newmarket; and in 1824 he was presented to the rectory of St. Mary's, Bryanstone Square, which he held till his death, Nov. 18. 1847.

DICK, SIR ALEXANDER, a Scotch physician, was born in 1703, and studied at Leyden under Boerhaave. In 1756 he was chosen president of the college of physicians at Edinburgh, to which he was a benefactor. He died in 1785. He was the first who paid attention to the culture of the true rhubarb in Britain; for which he received, in 1774, the gold medal from the London Society for promoting arts and commerce.

DICK, Major-general SIR ROBERT HENRY, was the son of the late Dr. Dick, of Tullimet in Perthshire. He entered the army as an ensign in the 75th foot, in 1800; and in 1804 obtained a company in the 78th. He accompanied the expedition to Sicily, and was wounded at the battle of Maida; joined Abercromby, and was present at the battle of Alexandria, and was severely wounded at Rosetta. In 1808 he was appointed to the 42d Highlanders; accompanied the 2d battalion to the Peninsula, and commanded a light battalion at Busaco and Ciudad Rodrigo, and the 1st battalion of the 42d at the storming of Fort St. Michael, and during the siege of Burgos, &c. He served in the campaign of 1815, and was severely wounded at Quatre Bras while commanding the 42d. On the restoration of peace he retired to his paternal estate at Tullimet; but his wife dying in 1830, retirement had no longer any charms for him, and he again sought the tented field. He obtained an honourable command in India, and fell in the memorable victory over the Sikhs at Sohraon, Feb. 10. 1846, while (as the commander-in-chief expressed it) "personally animating, by his dauntless example, the soldiers of her majesty's 80th regiment in their career of noble daring."

DICKONS, Mrs. (whose maiden name was Poole) was a celebrated singer, who, though not equal to Mrs. Billington, many years sustained the same cast of characters at the opera, and was regularly engaged as a principal vocalist at the oratorios. She was the pupil of Rauzzini, who also taught Braham; commenced her professional career at Covent Garden, in 1793; and retired from public life, in consequence of long-continued illness, in 1818. Died, 1833.

DICKSON, JAMES, a Scotch divine, but known chiefly as a writer on agriculture, was a native of East Lothian; and died, by a fall from his horse, in 1776. His "Treatise on the Agriculture of the Ancients" is much esteemed.

DIDEROT, DENIS, a French writer, was born at Langres, in 1713. In 1746 he published "Pensées Philosophiques," and was concerned in a Medical Dictionary, which suggested to him the idea of a Dictionnaire Encyclopédique; which, with the assistance of D'Alembert and others, he completed. While engaged in the Encyclopédie, he wrote a licentious novel, called "Les Bijoux Indiscrets," and two comedies, "Le Fils Naturel" and "Le Père de Famille." In 1749 appeared his "Letters to the Blind," the free sentiments in which occasioned his being imprisoned six months at Vincennes. He died in 1784.

DIDO or ELISSA, queen and founder of Carthage, was the daughter of Belus, king of Tyre. Died, B. C. 950.

DIDOT, FRANCIS AMBROSE, a celebrated printer, was born at Paris in 1730. He greatly raised the typographic art; improved the construction of paper-mills; and invented many curious and useful machines relative to the art of type-founding, stereotyping, and printing. At the age of 73, he read over five times, and carefully corrected, every sheet of the stereotype edition of Montaigne, printed by his sons. Died, 1804.—His brother, PIERRE FRANÇOIS (who died in 1795), as well as his sons and nephew, have each eminently contributed to the improvements of the arts of type-founding and printing. Nor were their abilities entirely confined to the mechanical part. They paid the greatest attention to correctness as well as beauty; and the elder son, PIERRE DIDOT, is known as an excellent classical scholar, and the author of several works, both prose and verse.

DIDOT, FIRMIN, the most celebrated and skilful of modern printers, and son of François Didot, (whose editions, especially of classic works, are in request all over Europe,) was born in 1764, and was carefully instructed in both the ancient and the modern languages with a view to succeeding his father. Not only, however, did he prove to be in the highest sense of the word "a learned printer," but he also made some most important improvements in the details of the art, and invented stereotyping. His editions of Sallust, the Lusiad, and the Iliad, are much sought. He was an excellent translator, and no mean original writer. Born, 1764; died, 1836.

DIEBITSCH, Count SABALKANSKY, a distinguished Russian general, was the son of a brave officer who had served under Frederic the Great, but who afterwards quitted the Prussian service for the Russian, where he obtained an important command. Through his father's influence and his own talents, young Diebitsch rose rapidly in the army. In the campaigns of 1812, 1813, and 1814, he signalled himself by his skill and bravery, and was advanced to the rank of quarter-master-general to the emperor Alexander. He displayed great courage in the battles of Austerlitz, Dresden, Eylau, and Friedland. He at length became head of the staff; and in 1829 was entrusted by the emperor Nicholas with the chief command of the Russian army in the expedition against Turkey. For his brilliant services in that campaign he was promoted to the rank of field-marshal, and rewarded with the title of count Sabalkansky (or the crosser of the Balkan), the orders of St. Andrew and St. George, a million of roubles, &c. Possessing the entire confidence of his sovereign, it was natural that, on the breaking out of the Polish insurrection, he should be selected to command the forces sent thither for its suppression; but a variety of unforeseen obstacles presented themselves, and his plans were in a great measure baffled, when that dreadful scourge, the cholera, which had carried off great numbers of his troops, attacked him, and he died in a very few hours after the first symptoms had appeared, June 10. 1831.

DIEFFENBACH, JOHANN FRIEDERICH, one of the most distinguished surgical operators that ever lived, was born at Königberg, in 1796. After studying for the church at Greifswalde, he took part in the war of liberation of Germany; and it was not till a year or two after the fall of Napoleon in 1815, that he began the study of medicine and surgery, in which he has secured undying fame. His surgical studies being finished at Vienna and Würzburg, he took up his residence at Berlin, where his operative talents soon raised him to distinction, and in 1832 he was appointed to the chair of surgery. In this capacity he published several valuable works; but his chief fame rests on the skill with which he performed the most difficult surgical operations, such as supplying artificial noses, lips, cheeks, and eyelids; and to him also the world is indebted for the recently discovered method of curing or removing the most inveterate cases of strabismus or squinting. Died, 1848.

DIEMEN, ANTHONY VAN, governor of the Dutch East India possessions, was born at Kuilenberg, of which place his father was a burgmaster. He went to India, where he was employed as accountant to the government. In 1625 he became a member of the supreme council. In 1631 he returned to Holland as commander of the India fleet, but the year following went out again as director-general; and not long after he became governor-general, greatly extending the Dutch interest in the East. In 1642 he sent Abel Tasman on a voyage to the South, the consequence of which was, the discovery of that part of New Holland called Van Diemen's Land. He died in 1645.

DIETRIC, JOHN CONRAD, a Lutheran divine, was born at Butzbach, in Wetteravia, in 1612. After studying at various universities, he became professor of Greek and history in his own country, and in 1653 removed to Giessen, where he died in 1667. He wrote "De Peregrinatione Studiorum," "Antiquitates Romanæ," "Lexicon Etymologico-Græcum," "Antiquitates Biblicæ," &c.

DIETRICH, JOHN WILLIAM ERNEST, an excellent painter, was born in 1712 at Weimar, where his father was painter to the court, and celebrated for his portraits and battle pieces. After studying under his father, he went to Dresden, and was instructed in landscape painting by Alexander Thiele. He next visited Italy, and in 1763 became professor in the academy of Dresden, and director of the school of painting at Meissen. He died in 1774. For versatility and general excellence few have surpassed him.

DIEZ, JUAN MARTIN, better known as the Empecinado of modern Spanish guerilla warfare, was the son of a peasant of Valladolid, and born in 1775. He first served in the regular army as a dragoon; but in 1808, with a chosen band of about 50 brave fellows, he commenced that harassing guerilla system, which so much contributed to the disasters of the enemy in the Peninsula; and the value of his services being properly appreciated, he was at length made a brigadier-general of cavalry. When the Duke of Wellington entered Madrid in triumph, Diez attended him, and received his commands to join the army at Tortosa, at the head of 5000 men. On the re-establishment of Ferdinand's government, the Empecinado became obnoxious to the ruling powers, who, regardless of his former great services, had him seized on a charge of conspiracy, tried, and executed, in 1825.

DIGBY, Sir EVERARD, an English gentleman, who, though born of Protestant parents, became a partisan in the Gunpowder Plot, for which he was executed in 1607.

DIGBY, Sir KENELM, son of the preceding, was born at Gothurst, in Buckinghamshire, in 1603, and educated at Gloucester Hall, Oxford. He was knighted by James I., and by Charles I. he was appointed to several offices. On one occasion, when some difference existed between England and the Venetians, he was sent with a fleet into the Mediterranean, where he attacked the fleet of the republic in the bay of Scanderoon. About 1636 he quitted the Church of England for that of Rome. At the commencement of the civil war he was imprisoned by the parliament in Winchester House, but in 1643 he regained his liberty, and went to France. When Cromwell assumed the government, he ventured to visit his native country, and paid great court to that usurper. He wrote a "Treatise on the Nature of Bodies," "On the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul," and "Peripatetic Institutions." Died, 1665.

DIGBY, JOHN, earl of Bristol, born in 1580, was gentleman of the bedchamber to James I., who sent him to Spain to negotiate a marriage between prince Charles and the Infanta, and the same year he was created earl of Bristol. When the civil wars broke out he emigrated, and died at Paris in 1653.

DIGBY, Lord GEORGE, son of the above, was born at Madrid in 1612. He received his education at Oxford, and became a member of the long parliament, wherein he at first opposed the court, but afterwards joined the royal party, and exerted himself in the service of Charles I. Died, 1676.

DIGGES, THOMAS, an astronomer and mathematician; author of "Alas sive Scæla Mathematicæ," "Perfect Descriptions of the Celestial Orbs," &c. Died, 1595.

DIGGES, Sir DUDLEY, son of the preceding, was born in 1583, and educated at Oxford. He was knighted by James I., who sent him ambassador to Russia; but in the parliament of 1621 he resisted the court measures, and so continued to do till 1636, when he was brought over by the grant of the mastership of the rolls. He died in 1639. He wrote "A Defence of Trade," "A Discourse concerning the Rights and Privileges of the Subject," &c. His son Dudley, who died in 1643, was a loyal and learned man, and wrote some tracts against rebellion.

DILLENIUS, JOHN JAMES, an eminent botanist, was born in Darmstadt, in Germany, in 1687, and educated at the university of Giessen. In 1721, he accompanied Dr. Sherrard to England, where he spent the remainder of his days. Soon after his arrival he undertook a new edition of Ray's Synopsis; and was appointed the first botanical professor at Oxford on Sherrard's foundation. He wrote "Hortus Elthamensis" and a "History of Mosses." Died, 1747.

DILLON, WENTWORTH, earl of Roscommon, was born in Ireland about 1633, and educated at Caen in Normandy, by the famous Bouchart. After dissipating his property by gaming, he was made master of the horse to the Duchess of York. He then married a daughter of the Earl of Burlington, and applied to poetry. Died, 1684.

DIMSDALE, THOMAS, a physician, who became celebrated by his successful mode of inoculating for the small-pox. In 1763 he went to Russia, and inoculated the empress and grand-duke, for which Dr. Dimsdale was created a baron of the empire, physician to her majesty, and counsellor of state. A gratuity of 12,000*l.* was given him for his journey, and a pension of 500*l.* a-year. In 1781 the baron again visited Russia, to inoculate the two sons of the grand-duke. In the year preceding he was elected into parliament for Hertford, and again in 1784, on which he quitted practice. He wrote Tracts on Inoculation, in which is an account of his first journey to Russia. Died, 1800.

DINEZ DA CRUZ, ANTHONY, an eminent Portuguese poet, was born in 1730, and died in 1798. As a writer of odes, sonnets, and lyrical pieces generally, he holds the first rank among his countrymen.

DINOCRATES, a Macedonian architect, who was employed by Alexander in building the city of Alexandria. He also rebuilt the temple of Ephesus, and proposed to cut Mount Athos into a statue of the Macedonian hero. He died in Egypt, under the reign of Ptolemy.

DIOCLETIAN, CAIUS VALERIUS, a Roman emperor, in whose reign the Christians suffered a persecution, was born of an obscure family in Dalmatia. He rose from being a common soldier to the rank of general, and on the death of Numerian, in 284, was chosen emperor. He renounced the crown in 304, and retired to Salona, where he died in 313. He was prudent, beneficent, and brave.

DIODATI, JOHN, an eminent divine, born at Lucca, in 1589, was descended from a noble family, and brought up in the Catholic faith; but he embraced Protestantism, became professor of Hebrew at Geneva, and is much celebrated for a translation of the Bible into Italian. Died, 1649.

DIODORUS, SICULUS, a native of Agrigium, in Sicily, who wrote a Universal History, of which only 15 books and a few fragments remain. He flourished about 44 B. C.

DIOGENES, surnamed the Cynic, was born at Sinope, a city of Pontus, B. C. 414. He accompanied his father to Athens, where he applied to the study of philosophy under Antisthenes, the founder of the cynics. He distinguished himself by the excessive rudeness of his manners, with which was blended a great knowledge of human nature, and a zeal for the interests of virtue, on which account Plato called him the "mad Socrates." Being on a voyage to Ægina, the vessel was taken by pirates, who sold Diogenes to a rich Corinthian citizen named Xenias, who entrusted to him the care of his sons. His famous interview with Alexander took place at Corinth, where, at the age of 90, he died.

DIOGENES, surnamed the Babylonian, was a stoic philosopher, who flourished about 200 B. C.

DIOGENES, LAERTIUS, a Greek historian, was born in Cilicia. He wrote the "Lives of the Philosophers," in 10 books, and died, 222.

DIOGENES, a Cretan philosopher; succeeded his master Anaximenes in his school of Ionia, about 560 B. C.

DION, a celebrated patriot of Syracuse, was the disciple and friend of Plato when that philosopher was at the court of Dionysius; whose daughter Arcte he married. Being accused of treason, he was banished by Dionysius, and went to Athens, where he acquired considerable popularity; which so provoked the tyrant, that he confiscated his estates, and compelled his wife to marry another man. Dion, irritated at this treatment, resolved to attempt the deliverance of his country; and with a small force he landed in Sicily during the absence of Dionysius, and entered Syracuse in triumph. After various successes he perished, the victim of a conspiracy, headed by one Calippus, an Athenian, B. C. 354.

DION CASSIUS, an historian of the third century, born at Bithynia; was twice consul; and wrote, in Greek, the "History of Rome, from the Building of the City to the Reign of Alexander Severus."

DIONYSIUS I., of Syracuse, who, from being a citizen, became commander of the forces, overthrew the government, and assumed the title of king B. C. 404.

DIONYSIUS II., the Younger, the son and successor of the above, was driven from Syracuse B. C. 343, but again returned about 10 years afterwards, and was expelled by Timoleon, on which he fled to Corinth, where he supported himself as a schoolmaster.

DIONYSIUS, an ancient geographer, who was sent by Augustus to survey the Eastern part of the world, was called PERIBETES, from his poem of "Periegesis, or Survey of the World." Died about 150.

DIONYSIUS, an historian and critic of Halicarnassus in Caria, who was invited to Rome about 30 years B. C., and there wrote his "Roman Antiquities," only 11 books of which are extant.

DIONYSIUS, the AREOPAGITE, was a native of Athens, and a member of the Areopagus, where he sat when St. Paul was brought before it, and made his famous speech respecting the "unknown God."

DIOPHANTUS, a mathematician of Alexandria, to whom is attributed the invention of algebra, is supposed to have existed at the beginning of the Christian era.

DIOSCORIDES, PEDANIUS, a physician and botanist, was born at Anazarba in Cilicia, in the 1st century of the Christian era; and distinguished himself as the author of a work on the Materia Medica, in which the medicines are nearly all taken from the vegetable kingdom.

DIPPEL, JOHN CONRAD, a German physician and celebrated alchemist, was born at Frankenstein, in Hesse, in 1672. He led a wandering kind of life, made himself obnoxious to various governments, and was often imprisoned. He pretended to have discovered the philosopher's stone, and prophesied that he would not die till 1808. He, however, falsified his prediction, by suddenly departing this life in 1734; and instead of finding the philosopher's stone, he discovered Prussian blue, and the animal oil which bears his name.

DISNEY, JOHN, an English divine and magistrate, was born in 1677 at Lincoln. He zealously distinguished himself, both by his writings and his actions, in the suppression of immorality, for which he repeatedly received the thanks of the judges on the circuits. At the age of 42 he took orders, and in 1722 obtained the living of St. Mary in Nottingham, where he died in 1730.

DISRAELI, ISAAC, the illustrious author of the "Curiosities of Literature," the "Quarrels" and "Calamities of Authors," "Illustrations of the Literary Character," was born at Enfield, 1767. He was the only child of Benjamin Disraeli, a Venetian merchant; and was originally destined for his father's occupation; but having shown a premature inclination for the muses, he was sent off first to Amsterdam, and afterwards to Bourdeaux, to be initiated into the mysteries of a mercantile life. But all in vain. Rousseau and Voltaire had superseded the ledger in his estimation; and he returned to England with such an antipathy to embark in commerce, that he at length gained a reluctant consent from his father to abandon it altogether; and he thenceforward devoted his long life to literary pursuits. Besides the works above mentioned, which have carried his name throughout the whole civilised world, he published "Commentaries on the Life and Reign of Charles I.," the "Amenities of Literature," and was for many years a contributor to the Quarterly Review and the Gentleman's Magazine. Mr. Disraeli was smitten with blindness in 1839, and the last years of his intellectual pursuits were impeded, though not interrupted, by this affliction. Few writers have been so much devoted to literature from a pure love of it for its own sake; and many a mind has been excited to literary effort by his graceful and entertaining works. Died, 1848.

DITTON, HUMPHRY, a learned mathematician, was born at Salisbury in 1675, became mathematical master of Christ's Hospital, and died in 1715. He wrote several papers in the Philosophical Transactions; but he is best known by a treatise, entitled "the Institution of Fluxions."

DOBSON, WILLIAM, an English painter, who succeeded Vandyrke in the appointments he held under Charles I., was born in 1610, and died in 1646. Some of his portraits possessed great merit.

DODD, RALPH, a civil engineer, to whom several important public works owe their origin, was a native of Northumberland, and born in 1761. He was the projector of Vauxhall Bridge, the South Lambeth Waterworks, the Gravesend Tunnel, &c.; and wrote several able works connected with his profession. He died in 1822, at Cheltenham, in consequence of an injury he had sustained by the explosion of the boiler of a steam-boat. His son, GEORGE DODD, who followed the same profession, was the planner, and for a time the resident engineer, of Waterloo Bridge. He died in 1827.

DODD, DR. WILLIAM, was born in 1729, at Bourne, Lincolnshire; and after being educated at Cambridge, entered into orders, became a popular preacher in London, and was made one of the king's chaplains. But he kept high society, and was extravagant; and finding himself unable to support an expensive establishment, he endeavoured to procure the living of St. George's, Hanover Square, by offering a bribe of 8000*l.* to the lady of the lord chancellor. She was, however, indignant at the offer, and on her informing the chancellor, Dodd was struck off the royal list. The Earl of Chesterfield, to whom he had been tutor, afterwards presented him with a living; but being pressed for money he forged a bond for 4200*l.* on his former pupil and patron, probably intending to take it up before it became due; but the fraud was soon discovered, and he was tried, convicted, and executed at Tyburn, in 1777, notwithstanding great interest was used, and the most extraordinary efforts made to obtain his pardon. He was the author of several works; the principal of which are "Sermons on the Miracles and Parables," in 4 vols., "Sermons to Young Men," 3 vols., "Poems," "Reflections on Death," "Thoughts in Prison," and "The Sisters," a novel.

DODDRIDGE, or DODDERIDGE, SIR JOHN, an English judge, and the author of several works on legal science, was born in 1555, at Barnstaple in Devonshire, and educated at Exeter College, Oxford. In 1613 he became one of the judges of the king's bench, and died in 1628. His chief works are "The Lawyer's Light," "The English Lawyer," "The Law of Nobility and Peerage," "The Complete Parson," &c.

DODDRIDGE, PHILIP, a pious and highly-gifted dissenting minister, was born in the metropolis in 1702. He was successively a minister at Kibworth, Market Harborough, and Northampton, and acquired a great and deserved reputation. Being afflicted with a pulmonary complaint, he went to Lisbon for the benefit of his health, but died there in 1751. His principal works are "The Family Expositor," 6 vols. 4to., "The Life of Colonel Gardiner," "Sermons," and "Hymns."

DODDINGTON, GEORGE BUBB, LORD MELCOMBE REGIS, a statesman, remarkable for political versatility, was born in 1691, in Dorsetshire, and educated at Oxford. In 1715 he came into parliament for Winchelsea; was soon after appointed envoy to Spain; became a lord of the treasury during Walpole's administration; and, after years of political intrigue, in which the most shameless dereliction of principle was manifested, he was raised to the title of lord Melcombe. Though servile as a politician, he was generous, witty, and hospitable in private life; and had the merit of associating with and patronising men of talent. His celebrated "Diary," published in 1784, is highly interesting, revealing, as it does, much of the art and mystery of statesmanship. Died, 1762.

DODSLEY, ROBERT, an author and bookseller, was born in 1703, at Mansfield, Nottinghamshire. His parents being poor, he was apprenticed to a stocking-weaver, which trade he left, and became footman to the Hon. Mrs. Lowther. While in this situation he published a volume of poems, entitled "The Muse in Livery," and a dramatic satire, called "The Toyshop," which being patronised by Pope, and successfully brought out on the stage, enabled Dodsley to commence business as a bookseller in Pall Mall. He still continued his literary pursuits, and produced "Cleone," a tragedy, and four light dramas; many poems; "The Economy of Human Life," &c. He also edited and published a "Collection of Old Plays," in 12 vols.; and was the projector of "The Annual Register." After a prosperous career, he retired from business, and died in 1764.

DODSON, MICHAEL, a theological writer of some eminence, was born at Marlborough, Wilts, in 1732, brought up to the legal profession, and in 1770 became a commissioner of bankrupts. His principal works are a translation of Isaiah, with notes and remarks, and a life of Judge Foster, his maternal uncle, to whose instruction he was indebted for his professional knowledge. Died, 1799.

DODSWORTH, ROGER, an English topographer, was born in Yorkshire, in 1585, and died in 1654. He collected the antiquities of his native country, in 162 folio volumes, which are in the Bodleian library, Oxford.

DODWELL, HENRY, a learned critic and theologian, was born at Dublin, in 1641, and educated at Trinity College. In 1688 he was appointed Camden professor of history at Oxford, but lost his office soon after the Revolution. He wrote several books: but the work which excited most notice was "On the Natural Mortality of the Soul." Died, 1711.—His sons, HENRY and WILLIAM, were also both distinguished by their writings; the former, who was bred to the law, by his scepticism; the latter, who was a prebendary of Salisbury, by his orthodoxy.

DOEDERLEIN, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a learned Lutheran divine, professor of theology in the university of Jena. He was the author of several works illustrative of the sacred writings, and enjoyed a high reputation for biblical knowledge. Died, 1792.

DOES, JACOB VAN DER, a Dutch painter, born in 1623, and died in 1673; he studied at Rome, and adopted the style of Bamboccio.—His sons, JACOB and SIMON, were both good artists; the former, celebrated for his historical pieces, died in 1613; the latter, who excelled in landscapes and cattle, died in 1717.

DOGGETT, THOMAS, an actor and dramatic poet, was a distinguished comic performer at Drury Lane, of which house he was joint-manager. He is now remembered for the legacy he left to provide a "coat and badge," which is rowed for annually on the 1st of August, from London Bridge to Chelsea, by six watermen. Died, 1721.

DOLABELLA, P. CORNELIUS, the son-in-law of Cicero, who attached himself zealously to Julius Cæsar, by whom he was made consul. Cassius besieged him in Laodicea, where he killed himself, in the 27th year of his age.

DOLCE, LOUIS, a Venetian writer, was born in 1508. He translated into Italian great portions of Horace, Ovid, Seneca, Euripides, &c.; but was chiefly celebrated for his heroic poem, entitled "L'Achille et l'Eneâ." He also wrote a life of Charles V. Died, 1568.

DOLCI, CARLO, a celebrated painter, born at Florence, in 1616, was remarkable for the felicitous manner in which he treated sacred subjects. His heads of madonnas and saints are inimitable. Died, 1686.

DOLGORUCKI, JOHN MICHAELOVITSCH,

a Russian noble, who greatly distinguished himself in several campaigns against the Turks and Swedes, was born in 1764, and died in 1824. Latterly he held several high offices, and he was also known as a poet of considerable merit.

DOLLOND, JOHN, an eminent optician, was born in Spitalfields, London, in 1706, and brought up as a silk-weaver; but, devoting himself to the study of astronomy, his attention became directed to the improvement of telescopes, &c.; and, in conjunction with his eldest son, Peter, he commenced business as an optician. He invented the achromatic object-glass, the application of the micrometer to reflecting telescopes, &c. Died, 1761.—His son PETER also, who died in 1820, made many valuable improvements in optical instruments, and they both enjoyed a well-deserved reputation.

DOLOMIEU, DEODATUS, a French geologist and mineralogist, was born in Dauphiné, in 1750, and entered into the order of Malta. He accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt, and on his return was taken prisoner and confined at Messina. Sir Joseph Banks obtained his release in 1801, but he died during the same year. Dolomieu had travelled, for scientific purposes, in many parts of Europe; and he was the author of many esteemed works, of which his "Mineralogical Philosophy" and a "Voyage to the Lipari Islands" are the chief.

DOMBEY, JOSEPH, one of the most eminent French botanists of the last century; born in 1742. After a life of persecution, from which his ultra-philanthropy did not protect him, he was captured by corsairs, in returning from St. Domingo, and died in the prisons of Montserrat.

DOMENICHINO, a celebrated painter, whose real name was DOMENICHO ZAMPIERI, was born at Bologna, in 1581, and was a pupil of the Caracci. Though at first his progress was so slow that his fellow-students in derision called him "the Ox," yet he rose to first-rate eminence in his art. He was also well skilled in architecture, and held the situation of architect to Gregory XV. Died, 1641.

DOMINIC, St., founder of the order of monks which bears his name, was born, in 1170, at Calahorra, in Old Castile. He was employed by pope Innocent to convert the Albigenses; but, failing in his endeavours, he commenced a horrible crusade against them; and, dying in 1221, was canonised for his zeal.

DOMINIS, MARK ANTHONY DE, a Dalmatian archbishop, who came to England, and was made dean of Windsor; but being disappointed of higher preferment, he accepted an invitation from pope Gregory XV. and went to Rome, where he abjured his "errors," in the expectation of receiving a cardinal's hat; but instead of receiving preferment, he was sent to the castle of St. Angelo, where he died in 1625. He wrote "De Republica Ecclesiastica;" and was the first who gave a true explanation of the colours of the rainbow.

DOMOTT, Admiral Sir WILLIAM, was born in Devonshire, and entered the navy under the patronage of Lord Bridport. He served several years on the West India station, and afterwards took a share in many actions under Sir Samuel Hood and Sir George Rodney; and in 1793 received the command of the Royal George, which he retained more than 7 years. He was then made a captain of the fleet, to act in the Baltic, under Sir Hyde Parker. In 1808 he was called to a seat at the admiralty board, which he resigned to act as commander-in-chief at Plymouth. In 1819 he was promoted to the rank of admiral, and died in 1828.

DOMITIAN, TITUS FLAVIUS, the second son of Vespasian, and the last of the 12 Cæsars, was born A. D. 51, and succeeded his brother Titus in 81. He was voluptuous, cruel, and malignant; and though at his accession he made some show of justice, and even of kindness to the citizens, yet the cruelty of his disposition was too deep-rooted for concealment, and he was both feared and hated for his tyranny. He was in continual dread of conspirators, and at length fell by the hands of an assassin, in the 45th year of his age, A. D. 96.

DOMITIANUS DOMITIUS, general of Diocletian's army in Egypt. He caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at Alexandria, and was put to death, in 288, two years afterwards.

DONALD V., king of Scotland, succeeded his brother Kenneth II. The ancient laws of Scotland were revised and confirmed under his authority. He died, after a reign of four years, in 864.

DONALD VI. succeeded Gregory the Great on the Scottish throne, in 894. In this reign the Danes having invaded his kingdom, he fought and defeated them. He died at Forres in 904.

DONALD VII., commonly called Donald Bane, usurped the throne in 1033. He was expelled from the throne by Duncan in 1034, but regained it again by the murder of that prince. He did not, however, long enjoy it, for he was finally dethroned by Edgar Atheling in 1038.

DONALDSON, JOSEPH, a native of Glasgow, and author of "The Eventful Life of a Soldier," and "Scenes and Sketches of a Soldier's Life in Ireland." Died on the 5th of October, 1830, at Paris.

DONATELLO, or DONATO, an eminent sculptor, was born at Florence, in 1383. His statues and basso-relievos adorn many of the Italian churches; and it is said that Michael Angelo held his works in high esteem. Died, 1466.

DONATI, VITALIANO, an Italian physician, born at Padua, in 1717; author of a "Natural History of the Adriatic Sea." He travelled to the East for scientific purposes, and died at Bassorah, in 1763.

DONDUCCI, GEORGE ANDREW, a Bolognese artist. He was born in 1575; studied under Annibale Caracci; and his pictures are remarkable for their strong contrasts of light and shade.

DONDUS, or DONDI, JAMES, a physician of Padua, who acquired the name of Aggregator, on account of the numerous medicines he made. He was also well skilled in mechanics, particularly in horology. He died in 1350.

DONNE, JOHN, an English divine and poet, was born in London, in 1573. Being the son of a Catholic, he was brought up in that faith; but after completing his studies at Oxford, he embraced Protestantism, and became secretary to the lord chancellor Ellesmere. After having lost this office, and even been imprisoned for clandestinely marrying the chancellor's niece, he took orders; when king James made him one of his chaplains, and he afterwards became preacher of Lincoln's Inn and dean of St. Paul's. He died in 1631. Donne has been termed by Dr. Johnson the founder of the metaphysical school of poetry. Though rugged in his versification, he often displays great force and originality; and his prose works, though quaint and sometimes pedantic, show deep thinking and strong powers of reasoning. His works comprise letters, sermons, theological essays, &c.

DOODY, SAMUEL, F.R.S., superintendent of the botanical garden at Chelsea, was a native of Staffordshire, and a member of the medical profession. His knowledge of botany was very extensive; he assisted in the publication of Ray's Synopsis; but he devoted his attention more particularly to the class cryptogamia, in which he made some interesting discoveries. Died, 1706.

DORAT, or DAURAT, JOHN, a French poet, born in 1507, was professor of Greek at the Royal College, and poet laureate to Charles IX. He has the reputation of greatly contributing to the revival of classical literature in France, and of having written a host of Greek and Latin verses, besides some French poems. Died, 1588.

DORAT, CLAUDE JOSEPH, a French poet, born in 1734. His works are voluminous, and embrace poetry of every class, with dramas and romances. They possess considerable merit; but, though popular at the time, are now generally neglected. Died, 1780.

DORIA, ANDREW, a Genoese naval commander of great renown, was born of a noble family at Oneglia, in 1468. Having distinguished himself in the service of different Italian states, and successfully contended against the African pirates and other enemies of his native country, he entered the French service, in the hope of counteracting the revolution that had broken out in Genoa by putting that city in possession of the French; but failing in his design, he joined with the Imperialists in endeavouring to expel them. This object being effected, the Genoese senate gave him the title of "the Father and Defender of his Country," erected a statue to his honour, and built a palace for him. His whole life was a scene of great exploits and brilliant successes; and he died, at the great age of 92, in 1560.

DORIGNY, MICHAEL, a French painter and engraver in aqua-fortis, was born in 1617, and died in 1665.

DORIGNY, NICHOLAS, a son of the foregoing, born in 1657, was the engraver of the celebrated cartoons of Raphael at Hampton Court, for which he received the honour of kighthood from George I. He died at Paris, in 1746, aged 90.

DORISLAUS, ISAAC, a Dutchman, and doctor of civil law at Leyden, from whence he came to England, and was made lecturer of history at Cambridge; but avowing republican principles, he was silenced. He next became judge advocate in the king's army, but deserted his monarch and assisted in drawing up the charges against him. In 1649 he was sent ambassador to Holland, where he was assassinated by some exiled royalists. The honour of interment in Westminster Abbey was decreed by the parliament, but at the Restoration the corpse was removed to St. Margaret's churchyard.

D'ORLEANS, PETER JOSEPH, a French historian, and one of the society of Jesuits, was the author of "A History of the Revolutions of England," 3 vols. 4to.; and "A History of the Revolutions of Spain," 3 vols. 4to. Born, 1644; died, 1698.

DORSCH, EVERARD, a celebrated engraver on gems, was born at Nuremberg in 1649, and died in 1712.

DORSET, THOMAS SACKVILLE, Earl of, the son of Sir Richard Sackville, was born in 1527, and educated at Oxford and Cambridge. He was distinguished both as a statesman and an author; having been ambassador to Holland, chancellor of Oxford, and lord treasurer. He was first created lord Buckhurst, and subsequently invested with the order of the Garter, and made earl of Dorset. He wrote the "Introduction to the Mirrour for Magistrates," and the "Complaint of Henry, Duke of Buckingham," &c. Died, 1608.

DORSET, CHARLES SACKVILLE, Earl of, was born in 1637. He was one of the distinguished wits and revellers at the court of Charles II.; but he was of an heroic turn; and while acting as a volunteer, under the Duke of York, in the Dutch war, he wrote on the eve of a battle the celebrated song, "To all you ladies now on land." At the revolution he was made lord chamberlain of the household. His poems possess considerable point and liveliness. Died, 1706.

DOSSI, DOSSO, a painter of Ferrara, some of whose works have much of the style both of Titian and Raphael. Ariosto mentions him in terms of high commendation. Born, 1479; died, 1560.

DOUCE, FRANCIS, an antiquarian, well known to the literary world by his "Illustrations of Shakspeare and of Ancient Manners." He also contributed various papers to the Archæologia, the Gentleman's Magazine, &c. and shortly before his death published a beautiful volume, illustrating the "Dance of Death," by dissertations on the claims of Holbein and Macaber. He was for many years a member of the Royal Antiquarian Society, and formerly keeper of manuscripts in the British Museum. Died, 1834.

DOUGLAS, GAWIN, a Scotch divine, and poet of some eminence, was the son of Archibald, 6th earl of Angus, and born at Brechin in 1474. After receiving a liberal education he entered the church, was made provost of St. Giles's, and eventually obtained the abbacy of Aberbrothick and the bishopric of Dunkeld. Political dissensions induced him to seek refuge in England, where he was liberally treated by Henry VIII., but he fell a victim to the plague of London, in 1522. He wrote "The Palace of Honour," and other works; but his chief performance is a translation of Virgil's Æneid.

DOUGLAS, JAMES, an eminent anatomist, was born in Scotland in 1675; settled in London, and was patronised by the celebrated Dr. John Hunter; and died in 1742. He is the author of a "Comparative Description of all the Muscles," and other works on medical science.

DOUGLAS, SIR JAMES, a renowned warrior, who on the death of Robert Bruce, king of Scotland, was commissioned to carry the king's heart to the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem; upon which errand he sailed in June, 1330. On arriving off Sluys, in Flanders, where he expected to find companions in his pilgrimage, he learned that Alphonso XI., the young king of Leon and Castile, was engaged in a war with Osman the Moor; and such was the crusading zeal of Douglas that he entered the lists against the foes of Christianity. The Moors were defeated; but Douglas, giving way to his impetuous valour, pursued them too eagerly, and throwing among them the casket which contained the heart of his sovereign, cried out, "Now pass onward as thou wert wont, Douglas will follow thee or die." The fugitives rallied, surrounded the Christian knight, who with a few of his followers perished while attempting the rescue of Sir Walter St. Clair of Roslin.

DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, brother of the preceding, was appointed regent for Scotland for king David Bruce, and fell at the battle of Halidon Hill, July 22, 1333.

DOUGLAS, WILLIAM, lord of Liddisdale, was a warrior of considerable renown in the 14th century; but whose fame was tarnished by an act of baseness and inhumanity. The brave Alexander Ramsay having taken the castle of Roxburgh from the English, was rewarded with the custody of the castle and the shrievalty of the adjoining district; and while holding his court at Howick, Douglas suddenly entered with a band of armed followers, slew several of Ramsay's attendants, and having bound him with fetters, threw him into a dungeon of Hermitage castle, and left him there to perish. Enormous as this crime was, the king pardoned him, but he was killed by the Earl of Douglas, in 1353, while hunting in Ettrick Forest.

DOUGLAS, WILLIAM, first earl of Douglas, was taken prisoner with David Bruce at the battle of Durham, but soon ransomed. He recovered Douglasdale and other districts from the English; afterwards went to France, fought at the battle of Poitiers, and died in 1384.

DOUGLAS, JAMES, second earl of that name, after performing many valourous exploits, was killed at the battle of Otterburn, in 1388.

DOUGLAS, WILLIAM, lord of Nithsdale, called "The Black Douglas," whose very name was said to be a terror to the English, married Egedia, daughter of Robert II.; and after a life of bold and successful warfare, was murdered by the Earl of Clifford, in 1390.

DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, the fourth earl of Douglas, succeeded his father Archibald in his title and estates, and married Margaret, daughter of Robert II. When Henry IV. of England laid siege to the castle of Edinburgh, in 1400, Douglas successfully defended it; but he lost an eye and was taken prisoner at the battle of Homildon. He afterwards joined Percy in his rebellion against his king, was taken prisoner at the battle of Shrewsbury, but recovered his liberty and went to France, where he was slain at the battle of Verneil, in 1424.

DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, the fifth earl of Douglas, was the ambassador to England for the release of James I. Died, 1438.

DOUGLAS, WILLIAM, the sixth earl of Douglas, is remembered on account of the tragical fate which awaited him, almost as soon as he came to his family titles and estates. Under the specious pretext that the young earl's presence was necessary at the meeting of parliament, which was about to be held at Edinburgh, after the reconciliation of Livingston and Crichton, he and his brother accepted an invitation to a royal feast at the castle. The entertainment was prolonged with unusual pomp, and every delicacy spread on the table; till at length a bull's head was suddenly placed before the two noble guests, which they knew to be the herald of death. They then hastily sprung from their seats, and made some vain efforts to escape; but a body of armed men, at a given signal, rushed in, bound their hands, and led them to instant execution. This happened in 1437.

DOUGLAS, WILLIAM, the eighth earl of Douglas, was a haughty and ambitious noble, wielding at times an uncontrolled influence over the king, and at others openly bearding his authority. He raised the power and grandeur of the house of Douglas to its loftiest height; and, not content with the sway he exercised at home, caused himself to be received at Rome and France with those honours which are only due to sovereign princes. Among other despotic acts which he committed, was his beheading Macallan of Bombie, for having refused to join the earl in his attack on Crichton, between whom and Douglas there was a deadly feud. The indignation, however, with which king James received the news of this and similar actions, determined him at length to get rid of the opposition of a subject so daring and powerful. The earl was therefore invited to attend his sovereign in parliament at Stirling, which he accepted; and while vainly remonstrating with him on the impropriety of his conduct, the king drew a dagger and plunged it into the heart of Douglas, Feb. 13. 1542.

DOUGLAS, JAMES, brother of the foregoing, and ninth and last earl of Douglas, took up arms to revenge his brother's death, and, assembling all the members of the league, brought a large army into the field. The king, however, being active, and well provided with forces, lay siege to the castle of Abercorn, the best fortified seat of the earl, and the two armies lay encamped within a short distance of each other; but without coming to an engagement, Douglas fled to Annandale, with his brothers, the Earls of Ormond and Moray. Thither they were pursued by the king's forces, under the command of the Earl of Angus; Moray slain, Ormond made prisoner, and Douglas himself driven to provide for his safety in England. Several years after, Douglas returned with Percy, earl of Northumberland, upon an expedition against his country, in which Douglas was taken prisoner; and James contented himself with sending his rebel captive to the abbey of Lindores, where he died, in monkish confinement, in 1488.

DOUGLAS, GEORGE, fifth earl of Angus, was commander of the forces that defeated the Earls of Douglas and Northumberland, when Douglas was taken prisoner, and his estates forfeited. Died, 1462.

DOUGLAS, ARCHIBALD, sixth earl of Angus, commanded the right wing of the royal army at the battle of Torwood, where James III. lost his life; and at the fatal battle of Flodden Field he endeavoured, though unsuccessfully, to dissuade James IV. from that engagement. His eldest son, George, was there slain; and the earl died in the year following.

DOUGLAS, JAMES, earl of Morton, was for some time regent of Scotland, and was a chief actor in the transactions which took place in that country during the reign of Mary, and in the minority of her son James VI. He was beheaded in 1581.

DOUGLAS, JAMES, earl of Morton and Aberdeen, was born at Edinburgh in 1707. He established the Edinburgh Philosophical Society, and in 1733 was elected president of the Royal Society of London. Died, 1768.

DOUGLAS, JOHN, a learned divine and critic, born at Pittenweem, Fifeshire, in 1721; was travelling tutor to Lord Pulteney; obtained the deanery of Windsor; was raised to the see of Carlisle in 1787; transferred to that of Salisbury in 1792; and died in 1807. Dr. Douglas was a distinguished writer, and the friend of Dr. Johnson and most of the eminent literary characters of his day. He vindicated Milton from the charge of plagiarism brought against him by Lander; entered the lists against David Hume, by publishing "The Criterion, or a Discourse on Miracles," and prepared for the press Captain Cook's second and third voyages.

DOUSA, JOHN, whose real name was VANDER DOES, was born at Noordwick, Holland, in 1545. He became eminent both as a soldier and a scholar. After being sent as ambassador to England, he was made governor of Leyden in 1574, and heroically defended it against the Spaniards: he was also the first curator of the university of that city, and died there, of the plague, in 1604. As an author, Dousa distinguished himself by his "Annals of Holland," in Latin verse, as well as by various other Latin poems and criticisms. His son JOHN, who died in his 26th year, assisted his father in the Annals, and was an eminent classical scholar and mathematician. He had also three other sons, of great classical attainments.

DOUW, or DOW, GERARD, an eminent Dutch painter, and the pupil of Rembrandt, was born at Leyden in 1613, and died there in 1674, or, as some say, in 1680. For the excellence of his colouring, delicacy of finish, and attention to every minutia of his art, this master's compositions are unrivalled; and the prices which some of his paintings have obtained are almost without parallel.

DOVER, GEORGE JAMES WELBORE AGAR ELLIS, Lord, was born in the year 1797, and completed his education at Christchurch, Oxford. In 1818 he was returned as member for Heytesbury; in succeeding parliaments he sat for Seaford, Ludgershall, and Oakhampton; and in 1830 he was appointed chief commissioner of woods and forests. But it is as a patron of the fine arts, and as a promoter of literature, that Lord Dover will be chiefly remembered; his acquaintance with the former entitling him to the character of a connoisseur, and his talents as an author being highly respectable. In 1828 he published "Historical Inquiries respecting the Character of Edward Hyde, Earl of Clarendon;" after which appeared the "Ellis Correspondence," which was followed by his "Life of Frederick the Great;" and his last literary task was that of editing the "Letters of Horace Walpole to Sir Horace Mann." He was also an occasional contributor to the Quarterly and Edinburgh Reviews, &c.; and in 1832 he was elected president of the Royal Society of Literature. Died, 1833.

DOW, ALEXANDER, was a native of Scotland, and a lieutenant-colonel in the East India Company's service. He translated several works from the Persian, was the author of two unsuccessful tragedies, and died in 1799.

DOWNMAN, HUGH, a physician and poet, born at Exeter, in 1740; studied at Oxford; and settled in his native city, where he died in 1809. He is the author of "Editha," a tragedy; "Infancy," a poem; "The Land of the Muses," &c.

DOYEN, GABRIEL FRANCIS, an eminent French painter, pupil of Vanloo. The "Death of Virginia;" "Death of St. Louis," and other works of great merit, were produced by him. He afterwards resided in Russia, and died there in 1806.

DRACO, an Athenian legislator, the extraordinary and indiscriminate severity of whose laws has rendered his name odious to humanity. During the period of his archonship, n. c. 623, he enacted a criminal code, in which the slightest offences were punished with death, no less than murder or sacrilege. Hence it was said to be "written in blood." It was abolished by Solon; and its sanguinary author was, according to tradition, smothered by the populace of Ægina, on his appearance at the theatre there.

DRAKE, Sir FRANCIS, an eminent navigator and commander, was born at Tavistock, Devon, in 1545. He first served in the royal navy under his relative, Sir John Hawkins; and distinguished himself by his valour at the unfortunate expedition against the Spaniards, in the harbour of Vera Cruz. In 1570 he went to the West Indies, on a cruise against the Spaniards, which he soon repeated with success; and in 1572, having received the command of two vessels, for the purpose of attacking the commercial ports of Spanish America, he took possession of two of their cities, and returned laden with booty. On his return he equipped three frigates at his own expense, with which he served as a volunteer, under the Earl of Essex, in Ireland, where he distinguished himself so much by his bravery, that Sir Christopher Hatton introduced him to queen Elizabeth. Drake disclosed to her his plan, and being furnished with five ships, he sailed, in 1577, to attack the Spaniards in the South Seas. In this expedition he ravaged the Spanish settlements, coasted the North American shore as far as 48° N. lat., and gave the name of New Albion to the country he had discovered. He then went to the East Indies, and having doubled the Cape of Good Hope, returned to Plymouth in 1580. The queen dined on board his ship at Deptford, and knighted him. In 1585 he again sailed to the West Indies, and succeeded in taking several places and ships. In 1587 he commanded a fleet of 30 sail, with which he entered the harbour of Cadiz, and destroyed the shipping; and, in the following year, he commanded as vice-admiral under Lord Howard, and had his share in the destruction of the Spanish armada. He died off Nombre de Dios, in 1596. Sir Francis represented Plymouth in parliament; and to him that town is indebted for a supply of water, which he caused to be conveyed to it from springs at several miles distance. His victories have been equalled, nay surpassed, by modern admirals; but his generosity has never been rivalled; for he divided, in just proportional shares among his seamen, the booty he took from the enemy.

DRAKE, FRANCIS, an eminent antiquary and surgeon at York; author of "Eboracum" or the history and antiquities of that city. Died, 1770.

DRAKE, JAMES, an English physician and political writer, was born at Cambridge in 1667, and educated at that university. In 1704 he published a pamphlet, entitled "The Memorial of the Church of England," which gave such offence, that a proclamation was issued for discovering the author, who kept concealed. He was afterwards prosecuted for the publication of a newspaper, called "Mercurius Politicus;" but though he was acquitted, it produced in him such violent excitement as to cause his death. He was also the author of a "System of Anatomy," 3 vols.; a translation of Herodotus, &c. Died, 1707.

DRAKE, Dr. NATHAN, was born at York, in 1766; graduated at Edinburgh in 1789; and settled as a physician at Hadleigh, Suffolk, in 1792, where he practised 44 years. He was an author of considerable powers, and devoted them chiefly to essays and ingenious illustrations of our standard literature. Died, June 7, 1836.

DRAPARMAUD, JAMES PHILIP RAYMOND, a French physician, and professor of natural history at the School of Medicine, was born at Montpellier, in 1772, and died in 1805. He left behind him in MS. two able works on natural history, which have since been printed.

DRAPER, Sir WILLIAM, a military officer, well known also as a controversial writer, was born at Bristol in 1721. He received his education at Eton and Cambridge. Having entered the army, he distinguished himself in the East Indies, was raised to the rank of a colonel in 1760, and in 1763 he commanded the troops at the capture of Manilla, for which he received the honour of knighthood. In 1779 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Minorca; and when that place surrendered to the enemy he preferred charges against General Murray, the governor, but which he failed to substantiate, and was commanded by the court to make an apology to him. He owes his literary celebrity to the circumstance of his having undertaken the defence of his friend the Marquis of Granby against the attacks of Junius. He died in 1787.

DRAYTON, MICHAEL, a poet, was born at Atherstone, Warwickshire in 1563, and educated at Oxford. He was indebted for a great part of his education to Sir Henry Goodere, and afterwards lived for a long time in the family of the Earl of Dorset, as it would seem, in a state of dependence. He wrote "The Shepherd's Garland," "Baron's Wars," "England's Heroical Epistles," "Polyolbion," "Nymphidia," &c., and is reckoned a standard author among the early poets. Died, 1631.

DREBEL, CORNELIUS VAN, a Dutch chemist and natural philosopher, was born at Alkmaar in 1572. With a considerable share of charlatanism, he combined real talent, and made several useful discoveries; such as the invention of the thermometer, the method of dyeing scarlet, and the improvement of telescopes and microscopes. He died at London in 1634.

DRELINCOURT, CHARLES, a French Protestant divine, was born at Sedan in 1595, and died at Paris in 1669. He was the author of several religious books, but the only one by which he is now remembered is that entitled "Consolations against the Fears of Death."

DREW, SAMUEL, M.A., the son of poor parents at St. Austell, Cornwall, was born in 1765, and at ten years of age apprenticed to a shoemaker. Though he was almost destitute of education, as he grew up he became a shrewd and subtle disputant among his shopmates; while his jocular manner and vivacious disposition led him, in early life, not only to slight the solemn truths of religion, but to ridicule those of his acquaintance who embraced them. He was at length, however, aroused to a sense of their importance by the preaching of the late Dr. (then Mr.) Adam Clarke; and, joining the Methodist society, he determined to abandon his former practices, and devote every moment he could spare to the acquirement of religious knowledge. Indefatigable in its pursuit he soon appeared as a local preacher, while he still carried on his business; not venturing before the world as an author till 1799, when he published his "Remarks on Paine's Age of Reason." This was very favourably received; but it was from his next production, entitled "An Essay on the Immateriality and Immortality of the Soul," that Mr. Drew is chiefly indebted for his reputation as a theological metaphysician.—Quitting trade, he now wrote several valuable works, among which must be noticed his "Treatise on the Being and Attributes of God;" and from the year 1819 to his death he edited the Imperial Magazine with singular ability; his knowledge extending to various branches of science, and the careful and dispassionate view he took of every subject under his review eminently qualifying him for the office of critic. He died in March, 1833.

DROUET, JOHN BAPTIST, one of the French revolutionists, was born in 1763. He was postmaster of Menchouid when Louis XVI. and his family, in 1791, passed through that town in their endeavours to escape from France; and it was owing to Drouet that they were conducted back to Paris. For this important service the National Assembly offered him 30,000 francs, which he refused. In 1792 he was nominated a deputy to the convention, in which he distinguished himself by his support of the most violent measures. He was afterwards sent a commissioner to the army of the north, and being taken prisoner by the Austrians, was exchanged in 1795, with others of his party, for the daughter of the unfortunate Louis. He subsequently became a member of the council of five hundred; and, under the consulship, sub-prefect of St. Menchouid. In 1815 he was chosen deputy from the department of Marne to the chamber of representatives; but, being excepted from the amnesty at the beginning of the following year, and condemned to exile, he returned to Macon, where he died in 1824.

DROUOT, General Count, the well-known commander of the artillery of the guard under Napoleon, was born, as he himself says, "of poor parents, who earned by the sweat of their brow the bread of a numerous family," at Nancy, 1774. Scarcely had he finished his education when the wars of the revolution broke out in 1792. The following year he was admitted into the school of artillery as sub-lieutenant, and gradually rose through the different ranks to that of general of division, which he attained in 1813. It would occupy more space than we can afford to give even an outline of the achievements of this remarkable man. In abilities as an officer of artillery, in bravery and steadiness, and above all in single-minded honesty, staunch fidelity, and unimpeachable virtue, he had no superior and but few equals in all that band of heroes who raised the emperor to his throne of glory. Nor must his fervent piety be overlooked. He always had a small Bible with him; to read this constituted his chief delight, and he did not scruple to avow the fact. His modesty was equal to his skill, and his fidelity to his courage; and he gave a striking proof of the latter by accompanying Napoleon to Elba amid the general defection that disgraced the emperor's protégés. After the defeat at Waterloo, General Drouot was included in the ordinance of proscription; but he immediately surrendered to take his trial, and having been found "not guilty," he returned to his native town, where he "gave himself up to the charms of a quiet private life." The return of the ashes of the emperor in 1840 filled him with great joy; all his last hopes and wishes were fulfilled by this event; and it should seem that from this period he longed for the moment to arrive when he should be admitted "to that everlasting dwelling, where those who have well loved and well served their country will meet their recompense." Died, 1847.

DROZ, PETER JACQUET, a skillful mechanician, was a native of Switzerland, and born in 1721. Among other curious things he made a writing automaton, the motions of whose fingers, &c. corresponded exactly with those of nature. Died, 1790.

DROZ, HENRY LOUIS JACQUET, a son of the foregoing, born in 1759, excelled even his father, by whom he was taught, in the construction of mechanical figures. At the age of 22 he went to Paris with some of the products of his ingenuity; among which was an automaton, representing a female playing on the harpsichord, which followed the notes in the music book with the eyes and head, and having finished playing, got up and made an obeisance to the company. He died at Naples, in 1791.

DRUMMOND, GEORGE, an active, enterprising, and patriotic Scotchman, was born in 1687. When the Earl of Mar reared the standard of rebellion in 1715, Mr. G. Drummond was the first to apprise the ministry of it; and, raising a company of volunteers, he joined the Duke of Argyle, and assisted at the battle of Sheriffinoor. This loyal conduct he repeated, upon the approach of the rebels in 1745, and was present at the battle of Preston. He held various offices in the excise and customs from an early age; and in 1737 he was made one of the commissioners of excise, an office which he retained during the remainder of his life. He was also lord provost of Edinburgh, and to his patriotic zeal the city is indebted for many of its improvements and most valuable institutions. He died in 1766, aged 80.

DRUMMOND, THOMAS, under-secretary of state for Ireland. Very early in life he was distinguished for his mathematical proficiency; and when he became private secretary to Lord Althorp, who was then chancellor of the exchequer, his punctuality in attendance to his official duties, and the at once tried and unpretending plainness of the various official communications which his position obliged him to make, as well to public bodies as to individuals, marked him, in the opinion of those who were best able to appreciate such qualities, and who, fortunately for the public service, had both the will and the power to reward and employ them, as the fittest possible person for the situation of under-secretary for Ireland—as difficult a post, from circumstances to which we need not allude, as any in the whole range of our civil service. But the cares of office did not prevent him from indulging his taste for study and experimental service; one of the fruits of which is the brilliant light which he invented, and which bears his name. Died, 1840.

DRUMMOND, WILLIAM, a Scotch poet, was the son of Sir John Drummond of Hawthornden, and born there in 1585. He was educated at the university of Edinburgh, and studied civil law at Bourges; but Parnassus had more charms for him than legal science, and, on coming to the family estate, the romantic beauties of Hawthornden inspired him with a love for poetry and polite literature. His poems are replete with tenderness and delicacy. He died in 1649; and his death is said to have been accelerated by grief for the tragical fate of Charles I.

DRUMMOND, Sir WILLIAM, F.R.S., a learned antiquary, a statesman, and the author of several works, classical and historical. He was a privy councillor, and at one period filled the office of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Great Britain to the king of the Two Sicilies; and at another (1801), went on an embassy to Constantinople, when he was invested with the Turkish order of the Crescent. His principal works are "A Review of the Governments of Sparta and Athens," "Herculeanensis," "Odin," a poem; and "Origines, or Remarks on the Origin of several Empires, States, and Cities." He died at Rome, in 1828.

DRYANDER, JONAS, a naturalist, by birth a Swede, who came to England, and was patronised by Sir Joseph Banks. He became librarian to the Royal Society, and vice-president of the Linnæan. Died, 1810.

DRYDEN, JOHN, one of the most celebrated English poets, was born at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, in 1631, and received his education at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge. On the death of his father, in 1654, he came to London, and acted as secretary to his relation, Sir Gilbert Pickering, who was one of Cromwell's council; and on the death of the protector, he wrote his well-known laudatory stanzas on that event. At the Restoration, however, he greeted Charles II. with a poem, entitled "Astrea Redux," which was quickly followed by a panegyric on the coronation; and from that time his love for the royal house of Stuart appears to have known no decay. In 1661 he produced his first play, "The Duke of Guise," but the first that was performed was "The Wild Gallant," which appeared in the year following. In 1667 he published his "Annus Mirabilis;" and his reputation, both as a poet and a royalist, being now established, he was appointed poet laureate and historiographer royal, with a salary of 200*l.* per annum. He now became professionally a writer for the stage, and produced many pieces, some of which have been strongly censured for their licentiousness and want of good taste. In 1681 he commenced his career of political satire; and at the express desire of Charles II. composed his famous poem of "Absalom and Achitophel," which he followed up by "The Medal" and "A Satire on Sedition." His next satire was "Mac Flecknoe;" after which appeared

"Religio Laici," a compendious view of the arguments in favour of revelation. At the accession of James II., Dryden became a Roman Catholic, and, like most converts, endeavoured to defend his new faith at the expense of the old one, in a poem called "The Hind and Panther," which was admirably answered by Prior and Montague, in "The Country Mouse and City Mouse." The abdication of James deprived Dryden of all his official emoluments; and during the 10 concluding years of his life, when he actually wrote for bread, he produced some of the finest pieces of which our language can boast. His translation of Virgil, which alone would be sufficient to immortalise his memory, appeared in 1697; and, soon after, that master-piece of lyric poetry, "Alexander's Feast," his "Fables," &c. The freedom, grace, strength, and melody of his versification have never been surpassed; and in satire he stands unrivalled; but as a dramatic writer, though he has many striking beauties, he does not generally excel. His prose essays afford a fine specimen of composition, and are replete with critical ability. He died in 1700, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

DUBOCAGE, MARIE ANNE LE PAGE, a French lady of considerable literary abilities, and a member of the academies of Rome, Bologna, &c., was born at Rouen, in 1710. She translated Pope's Temple of Fame, Milton's Paradise Lost, The Death of Abel, &c., into French; and wrote "The Columbiad," an epic poem on the discovery of America; "The Amazons," a tragedy; and "Travels through England, Holland, and Italy." Died, 1802.

DUBOIS, EDWARD, who gained a high reputation in the lighter literature of the day, was born, 1775. Educated at Christ's Hospital, he was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1809, but he took little interest in his profession, though it subsequently enabled him to fill with advantage the only two public offices he ever held, the deputy judgeship of the court of requests, and the secretaryship to the commissioners in lunacy. He commenced his literary career as the editor of the Monthly Mirror, while Thomas Hill was its proprietor, and Theodore Hook was a contributor. He at the same time filled the lighter departments of the Morning Chronicle, under Mr. Perry; and he maintained his connection with the press in his latest years. In 1808 appeared "My Pocket Book, or Hints for a ryghte merrye and conceited Tour in Quarto," written in ridicule of the books of travels manufactured by Sir John Carr. This little work, which was anonymous, ran through numerous editions. The only works published with his name were the "Wreath," "Old Nick," a satirical story, 3 vols., the "Decameron of Boccaccio, with Remarks on his Life and Writings," 2 vols., and an edition of Francis's Horace. We ought also to add, that among his anonymous writings was a work attributing the authorship of "Junius" to Sir P. Francis, with whom he was, it is said, in some way connected. M. Du Bois' powers of conversation were great, and his good-humoured pleasantry and knowledge of the world made him the idol of a large circle of friends. Died, 1850.

DUBOIS DE CRANCE, EDMUND LOUIS ALEXIS, a modern French statesman, was born at Charleville in 1747. He was one of the deputies to the states-general in 1789, and in the convention he voted for the death of the king. To him the republican army owed its first organisation, by his having procured the decree for the levy of 300,000 men, promotion according to seniority, &c. While at Lyons, whither he was sent to suppress the insurrection, he was accused of moderatism, recalled, and arrested, but recovered his liberty; and was subsequently appointed by the directory inspector-general and minister of war. He opposed Buonaparte, and was consequently deprived of his posts. He died in 1814. Dubois wrote several works connected with passing events of the revolution.

DUBOIS, WILLIAM, a French cardinal and statesman, notorious for his ambition and his vices, was the son of an apothecary, and born at Brive la Gaillard, in the Limousin, in 1656. Having obtained the situation of preceptor to the Duke of Orleans, he pandered to the passions of his pupil, and secured his attachment; till at length he became his privy councillor, and overseer of the household; and, when the duke became regent, he was appointed to the situation of minister of foreign affairs. The archbishopric of Cambrai having become vacant, Dubois, though not even a priest, had the boldness to request it, and succeeded; and by his consummate address he afterwards obtained a cardinal's hat, and was made prime minister. Died, 1723.

DUBOS, JEAN BAPTISTE, an author of merit, and secretary to the French academy, was born at Beauvois in 1670, and distinguished himself both as an historian and a writer on the polite arts. Died, 1742.

DUBY, PETER ACCHER TOBIASEN, a celebrated Swiss medallist and antiquarian, was born in 1721, and died in 1782. He was linguist to the royal library at Paris, and the author of an able and extensive work on medals.

DUCAREL, ANDREW COLTEE, an eminent antiquary and civilian, was born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1713. After receiving his education at Eton and Oxford, he became a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and held a situation in the state paper office. His principal works are "Anglo-Norman Antiquities" and "Histories of Lambeth Palace and of St. Catherine's Church." Died, 1786.

DUCASSE, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French naval officer in the reign of Louis XIV., who as governor of St. Domingo rendered himself formidable to the English, and who also had the good fortune to obtain a victory over the gallant Benbow. Died, 1715.

DUCHANGE, GASPARD, a clever French engraver, and counsellor of the Academy of Painting. Born, 1662; died, 1756.

DUCHESNE, ANDREW, geographer and historiographer to the king of France, was born in 1584, and died in 1640. So prolific a writer was he, that he published 22 works, among which were Histories of England, of the Popes, and of the Dukes of Burgundy, &c.; and he left in MS. more than a 100 folio volumes.

DUCHESNE, JOSEPH, better known by the Latin name of Querectanus, a French physician and writer; author of a "Pharmacopœia," and several medical works now very rarely referred to. In his own time he was very popular, and became physician and councillor to Henry IV. Died, 1609.

DUCHESNOIS, JOSEPHINE RUFIN, a celebrated French actress of whom it is said that she was so much attracted by the representation of Medea, which she witnessed when only 8 years of age, that she secretly began to prepare for her future career, and appeared in the part of Palmyra, in "Mahomet," when only 13. She performed at the Théâtre Français from 1802 until 1830. Born, 1777; died, 1835.

DUCIS, JEAN FRANÇOIS, a distinguished French dramatist, was born at Versailles in 1733. He took Shakspeare for his model, and the majority of his plays are free imitations of the English bard; though some of them are so altered to suit the taste of his countrymen, that the genius of Shakspeare is but dimly discoverable. He died in 1817, aged 84.

DUCK, STEPHEN, an English poet, was originally an agricultural labourer, born near Marlborough, Wilts. Some of his poetical attempts having been shown to Queen Caroline, she first granted him a small annuity, but afterwards had him ordained, and procured for him the living of Byfleet, in Surrey, where he lived several years, but, in a fit of mental derangement, drowned himself, in 1756.

DUCKWORTH, Admiral Sir JOHN THOMAS, an English admiral, was born in Surrey, in 1748, and entered the navy in 1769. He had frequent opportunities of distinguishing himself during the late war, from the memorable action of the first of June, 1794, in which he took a conspicuous part, to his destruction of the French squadron off St. Domingo, in 1806. He was appointed governor of Newfoundland, in 1810, which situation he held three years, and died in 1817.

DUCLOS, CHARLES PINEAU, a French novelist and biographer, was born at Dinant, in Brittany, in 1705; became secretary of the French academy, and on the death of Voltaire was appointed to the office of historiographer of France. All his writings are lively and satirical, descriptive of love, women, and intrigue; the principal are "Mémoires sur le Mœurs du XVIIIe Siècle," "Confessions du Comte de B." Died, 1772.

DUCREST, CHARLES LOUIS, Marquis, was a brother of Madame de Genlis. Having, in 1790, made claim for a large sum on the Duke of Orleans, who was then at the height of his popularity, and who refused to pay the debt, Ducrest sued him; but as no advocate would plead his cause, the marquis himself conducted the proceedings, and gained the suit. He published, in 1817, "Faite de la Monarchie Absolue," a work containing, among other singular propositions, one to teach the military discipline on the Lancasterian system.

DUDLEY, EDMUND, a celebrated statesman, born in 1462, who on the death of Henry VII. was sent, with Empson, to the Tower, and beheaded in 1510. While in confinement, Dudley wrote a piece entitled "The Tree of the Commonwealth."

DUDLEY, JOHN, duke of Northumberland, was a son of the preceding, and born in 1502. He was first created viscount Lisle, then earl of Warwick, and after being appointed lord high admiral, reached his dukedom in 1551. He effected a marriage between his son, Lord Guildford Dudley, and Lady Jane Grey, daughter of the Duke of Suffolk. He afterwards prevailed on the young king, Edward, to set aside his sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the succession in favour of Lady Jane, whom he caused to be proclaimed at the king's death. But an insurrection being raised in favour of Mary, she was proclaimed in London, and the duke executed as a traitor, in 1553.

DUDLEY, ROBERT, earl of Leicester, a son of the preceding, was born in 1532. Queen Elizabeth proposed him as a husband for Mary queen of Scots, but she rejected him with disdain; and in 1572 he married privately Lady Douglas, but never acknowledged her as his wife. He afterwards married the Countess Dowager of Essex, and finding Lady Douglas intractable to his proposals for a separation, is charged with having poisoned her. For a short time he held the situation of governor of the Protestant Low Countries; but returning to England by command of the queen, he was made lieutenant-general of the army assembled at Tilbury in 1588, and died during the same year.

DUDLEY, Sir ROBERT, the son of the Earl of Leicester by the Lady Douglas, was born in 1573. Having commenced a suit to prove his legitimacy, the Countess Dowager of Leicester filed an information against him for a conspiracy, on which he went to Florence, and was appointed chamberlain to the grand duchess, sister to the emperor Ferdinand II., who, creating him a duke of the Roman empire, he assumed the title of the duke of Northumberland. He drained the morass between Pisa and the sea, by which Leghorn became one of the finest ports in the world. He was the author of "Del Arcano del Mare," and other works. Died, 1630.

DUDLEY, Sir HENRY BATE, was born in 1745, educated for the church, and took orders. Much of his early life was, however, spent in political, literary, and convivial society; and, in spite of his sacerdotal calling, he was engaged in several duels. "Parson Bate," as he was familiarly called, established the Morning Post and Morning Herald daily papers; and wrote "The Woodman," "Rival Candidates," and several other dramatic pieces. His political connections eventually procured him a baronetcy and valuable church preferment. Died, 1824.

DUDLEY, the Right Hon. JOHN WILLIAM WARD, Earl of, was a man of powerful talents, but remarkable for his absence of mind and the habit of "thinking aloud," of which many ludicrous anecdotes are told.

The following is recorded as a fact. When he was secretary for foreign affairs, in Mr. Canning's administration, he directed a letter intended for the French to the Russian ambassador, shortly before the affair of Navarino; and, strange as it may appear, it gained him the highest honour. Prince Lieven set it down as one of the cleverest ruses ever attempted to be played off, and gave himself immense credit for not falling into the trap laid for him by the sinister ingenuity of the English secretary. He returned the letter with a most polite note, in which he vowed, of course, that he had not read a line of it, after he had ascertained that it was intended for Prince Polignac; but could not help telling Lord Dudley at an evening party, that he was "trop fin, but that diplomatists of his standing were not so easily caught." His lordship was born in 1781, and entered parliament first for Downton in 1802; he afterwards successively represented Worcestershire, Wareham, and Bossiney. In 1823 he succeeded to the peerage; was appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs, and sworn a member of the privy council in 1827; raised to the rank of an earl in the same year; and died in 1833.

DUFAU, FORTUNE, a native of St. Domingo, who studied under David, and became an excellent painter. His "Count Ugolino in Prison" is an admired production. Died, 1821.

DUFRESNOY, CHARLES ALPHONSO, a French painter and poet, was born in 1611. He was intended by his father for the legal profession; but the sister arts of poetry and painting were more attractive than the law, and he devoted his undivided attention to them. In 1634 he went to Italy, where he completed his well-known poem, "De Arte Graphica;" though it did not appear till after his death, when his friend De Piles published it, with annotations. It has been three times translated into English, by Dryden, Graham, and Mason. In painting, Titian and the Caracci appear to have been his models; and though he benefited but little by his artistical labours, they are now highly valued. Died, 1665.

DUFRESNY, CHARLES RIVIERE, a versatile and witty French dramatist and comic writer, was born in 1648, and died in 1724. He held a situation in the household of Louis XIV., and is said to have been a great-grandson of Henry IV.

DUGDALE, Sir WILLIAM, an eminent antiquary and herald, was born near Coleshill, Warwickshire, in 1605, and educated at St. John's College, Oxford. He was made Chester herald in 1644, accompanied Charles I. throughout the civil war; and after the Restoration, on being appointed garter-king-at-arms, received the honour of knighthood. His chief work is the "Monasticon Anglicanum;" but he also wrote "The Baronage of England," 3 vols., "The History of St. Paul's Cathedral," "Origines Juridicales," and several other works of merit. Died, 1683.

DUGOMMIER, General, was a native of Martinique, where he possessed a large estate previously to the French revolution. He espoused the republican cause, and being nominated colonel of the national guards of the island, he defended it against a body of royalist troops sent from France. He afterwards went to France, and being made commander-in-chief of the army in Italy, he gained many important advantages over the Austro-Sardinian army. He took Toulon, after a sanguinary contest, in 1793. He next commanded the army of the Eastern Pyrenees, and, in 1794, gained the battle of Alberdes, and seized the post of Montecquieu, taking 200 pieces of cannon and 2000 prisoners. He continued his career of victory till he fell in an engagement at St. Sebastian, on Nov. 17. 1794.

DUGUAY TROUIN, RENÉ, one of the most celebrated naval officers of France, was born at St. Malo in 1673. His love for a maritime life soon showed itself, and at the age of 18 he was the commander of a privateer. At 20, he maintained an action with a 40-gun ship, which he commanded, against 6 English vessels, but was captured. After a series of gallant exploits, by which he essentially served his country, and raised its naval reputation, he died in 1736.

DUGUESCLIN, BERTRAND, a renowned French warrior and statesman, who was constable of France in the 14th century, may be regarded as a model of valour, prudence, and high-minded heroism. Though deformed in person, and of an unamiable disposition in his youth, he persevered in his endeavours to eclipse these defects by the brilliancy of his actions; and mainly to him must be attributed the expulsion of the English from Normandy, Guienne, and Poitou. So highly, indeed, was he esteemed even by his enemies, that, at his death, which took place while he was besieging Randan, the governor insisted on placing the keys of the fortress on the coffin of the hero.

DUHALDE, JOHN BAPTIST, a French Jesuit, was the author of "A Geographical and Historical Description of China," which he compiled from the records of successive missionaries, and is allowed to furnish the best account ever published of that immense empire. Born, 1674; died, 1743.

DUHAMEL, JOHN BAPTIST, a French ecclesiastic and philosopher, was born at Vire, in Lower Normandy, in 1624. He studied at Caen and Paris; became a member of the Congregation of the Oratory, but left it for the living of Neuilli upon the Marne; and when the Royal Academy of Sciences was established, he was appointed secretary. In 1673 appeared his "Philosophia Vetus et Nova," 4 vols., to which were afterwards added two more volumes. In 1697 he resigned his situation in the academy, to devote himself to theology. His chief works, besides the one mentioned above, are "Regiæ Scientiarum Academiæ Historia," 4to., and an edition of the Vulgate Bible, with notes and tables, chronological and geographical. He died, 1706.

DUHAMEL DU MONCEAU, HENRY LOUIS, an eminent French philosopher and writer on agriculture, born at Paris, in 1700. His whole life was dedicated to the cultivation of useful science; and besides largely contributing to the transactions of different learned societies, of which he was a member, the following are among his separate works:—"Traité de la Culture des Terres," 6 vols., "Éléments d'Agriculture," 2 vols., "Traité des Arbres et Arbustes qui se cultivent en France en pleine Terre," 2 vols. 4to., "Physique des Arbres," 2 vols. 4to., "De l'Exploitation des Bois," 2 vols. 4to., "Traité des Arbres Fruitières," 2 vols. 4to., "Éléments de l'Architecture Navale;" besides many other treatises on various arts and manufactures. Died, 1782.

DUIGENAN, DR. PATRICK, an Irish civilian, was born of humble parents in 1735, and obtained his education as a sizer at Trinity College, Dublin. He practised as a barrister, was afterwards king's advocate, then judge in the prerogative court; till by persevering industry he raised himself to the post of vicar-general of the diocese of Armagh, with a seat in the Irish House of Commons, and the rank of a privy councillor. He was a strong promoter of the Union, and as firm an opponent of Catholic emancipation. He wrote "Lachrymæ Academicæ," and various political pamphlets. Died, 1816.

DUJARDIN, CHARLES, an eminent Dutch painter, a pupil of Berghem, was born at Amsterdam, in 1640; and died at Venice, in 1678.

DU JARRY, LAURENCE JUILLARD, eminent both for his pulpit oratory and his poetry, was born in 1653, and died in 1730. He gained the poetical prize of the French academy in 1679, and again in 1714, on which last occasion he had Voltaire for a competitor. His works consist of theological treatises, sermons, and poems.

DULAURE, M., author of the "Histoire de Paris et ses Environs." He was a member successively of the constituent assembly, the national convention, the council of five hundred, and the legislative body. Died at Paris, in his 80th year, Aug. 1835.

DULON, LOUIS, a distinguished flutist and musical composer, was born at Oranienburg, near Berlin, in 1769. He lost his sight at a very early age, but evincing a decided taste for music, he was put under the first performers, and soon arrived at singular eminence in his profession. He prepared an autobiographical work, entitled "The Life and Opinions of the Blind Flutist," which was edited by the celebrated Wieland. Died, 1826.

DULONG, a celebrated French chemist, was one of the many pupils of the Polytechnic School, who have done it honour. To him we owe the discovery of the "Chlorure d'Azote," by an explosion of which dangerous substance he lost an eye and a finger. Born, 1785; died, 1838.

DUMANIANT, JOHN ANDREW, an actor and dramatic writer, was born, in 1754, at Claremont, and died in 1828. He produced about 50 pieces, some of which possessed considerable merit, and were popular.

DUMARESQ, Lieut.-colonel HENRY, who at the time of his death was chief commissioner of the Australian company in New South Wales, entered the army as a lieutenant in the 9th foot, at the age of 16; and served in 8 campaigns, of which 6 were in the Peninsula, one in Canada, and the last that of Waterloo. He was present in the 13 battles for which medals were bestowed, and at several sieges; attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel after 9 years' service; was employed on the staff upwards of 18 years; and was twice dangerously wounded. At the battle of Waterloo he was on the staff of General Sir John Byng, and was shot through the lungs at Hougomont; but being at the time charged with a message for the Duke of Wellington, he, as if supported by the resolution to do his duty, rode up to the duke, delivered his message, and then, as Sir Walter Scott describes it, dropped from his horse, to all appearance a dying man. The ball, which was never extracted, is supposed to have eventually induced paralysis, and caused his death, March, 1838.

DUMESNIL, MARIE FRANÇOISE, a celebrated French actress, who rose to the highest eminence as a tragical performer, was born in 1713, first appeared on the stage in 1737, retired from it in 1775, and died in 1803. Like our Siddons, she surpassed all her contemporaries in parts requiring queenly dignity, deep pathos, or the vehement display of the fiercer passions.

DUMONT, GEORGE, a statistical writer, and at one time secretary to the French embassy at St. Petersburg, was born at Paris in 1725, and died in 1788. Among his works are a "History of the Commerce of the English Colonies," a "Treatise on the Circulation of Credit," &c.

DUMONT, JOHN, an eminent publicist, was a native of France, but settling in Austria, became historiographer to the emperor, by whom he was created baron of Carlsroon. He published a voluminous work, entitled "A Universal Diplomatic Code of the Law of Nations," besides "Voyages," &c. in 4 vols. Died, 1726.

DUMONT, STEPHEN, a distinguished writer on legislation, and a member of the order of Jesuits, was born at Geneva, in 1750. He resided for several years in England, and was on friendly terms with the celebrated Jeremy Bentham, who entrusted him with the manuscript of his "Traité de Législation Civile," which Dumont published in 1802. He subsequently translated and edited Bentham's "Théorie des Peines et des Récompenses," and also published his "Tactics of Legislative Assemblies." Since his death, which happened in 1829, at Milan, an interesting work by him, under the title of "Souvenirs sur Mirabeau," has been published.

DUMONT D'URVILLE, JULES SEBASTIAN CESAR, one of the most skillful and intrepid navigators that modern France, rich as she undoubtedly is in naval skill and intrepidity, can boast of. He was not merely a good sea-captain; he was a good botanist, entomologist, draughtsman, and writer, as may be seen from his interesting account of the French expedition of 1819-20 to the shores of the Archipelago and the Baeck Sea. As second in command to M. Duperré, in La Coquille, he visited Peru, China, Oceania, &c., and he brought home immense stores of both knowledge and specimens of natural history. In 1828 he was entrusted with a mission to discover, if possible, some traces of the unfortunate La Perouse. On his return he published a most interesting account, in which he pretty clearly proved that the shipwreck occurred off an island to the south of Santa Cruz. Being subsequently sent to approach as nearly as possible to the south pole, he acquitted himself with his usual skill. We have from his pen, besides the narrative already mentioned, "A Picturesque Journey round the World." This skilful and brave man was killed with his wife and child, by the fatal Versailles railway accident, May 8. 1842, aged 52.

DUMOURIER, CHARLES FRANÇOIS, an eminent French general, was born at Cambray, in 1730. He entered the army early in life, and at 24 years of age had received 22 wounds, and was made a knight of St. Louis. In 1772, Louis XV. sent him with communications to Sweden, but he was arrested, and for a long time confined in the Bastille. However, in 1789, we find him a principal director of the Jacobin Club, which was composed of all who aspired to be accounted the friends of liberty. He afterwards became a minister of Louis XVI., and he strongly advised the monarch to yield the direction of the interior affairs of the kingdom to the council of the assembly then sitting, and to declare war against the foreign foes of France. "Such a step," said Dumourier, "would cool the democratic fever now raging, would restore public confidence, and disperse all the evils which now threaten France." The advice was disregarded, and Dumourier was dismissed. Still determined to devote himself to the service of the army, he proceeded to Valenciennes, where he soon gained immortal fame by his valor and his firmness, displayed at the head of the French soldiers, having succeeded La Fayette in the command of the army of the North. Notwithstanding the success which continued to result from his superiority of military talents, the directory entertained suspicions regarding his designs, because it was known that he was desirous to spare the life of the king, and Dumourier retired into Switzerland. Finding that a reward of 300,000 francs was offered for his head, he went to Hamburg, where he lived on a small pension from the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel until 1804, when he accepted an asylum in England, wrote his own memoirs, and employed his mind in other literary pursuits, at Turville Park, near Henley-upon-Thames. He was honoured with the friendship of his late royal highness the Duke of Kent, with whom he kept up a correspondence. Died, 1823.

DUNBAR, WILLIAM, a Scotch poet of considerable merit, was born about 1465, and died in 1535. For the age in which he lived, his poems display much skill, and are not deficient either in imagination or energy. "The Thistle and Rose" and "The Friars of Berwick" are favourable specimens of his poetical vein.

DUNCAN, ADAM, Viscount DUNCAN, of Camperdown, &c., a gallant and distinguished naval officer, was a native of Dundee, and born in 1731. He went to sea when young, rose to the rank of post-captain in 1761, and steadily advanced till he became admiral of the blue, and commander of the North Sea fleet in 1795. He was with Lord Keppel at the taking of the Havannah, and had a full share in Rodney's victory over the Spaniards, the relief of Gibraltar, &c. While in command of the North Sea fleet, he had for two years the tedious duty of watching the motions of the Dutch squadron, and was at length forced to quit the station, in consequence of a mutiny breaking out among his men, during which the enemy put to sea. The gallant admiral, however, after displaying the most undaunted resolution during the mutiny, came up with the Dutch fleet off Camperdown, totally defeated them, and captured 8 sail of the line, June 11. 1797. Upon this he was created a viscount, with a pension of 3,000*l.* per annum to himself and the two next heirs of the peerage. Died, 1804.

DUNCAN, WILLIAM, a learned writer, was born, in 1717, at Aberdeen, where he was educated, and afterwards became professor of philosophy in the Marischal College. He was the author of a "Treatise on Logic," and the translator of Cicero's Orations and Cæsar's Commentaries.

DUNCOMBE, WILLIAM, born in London, in 1690, was the author of "Lucius Junius Brutus," a tragedy. He also translated Horace, and wrote various minor poems and prose pieces. He died in 1769.—His son JOHN, who was born in 1730, and died in 1786, was the author of "The Femineid" and other poems.

DUNDAS, SIR DAVID, a general in the English army, and a member of the privy council, was born at Edinburgh in 1736, and entered the military service in 1758. He became colonel of the first regiment of dragoon guards, and had the reputation of being a most able tactician. On the temporary resignation of the Duke of York, he was made commander-in-chief. His "Principles of Military Movements" and "Regulations for the Cavalry" are both acknowledged standard works in the army. Died, 1820.

DUNN, SAMUEL, a mathematician, who having acquired considerable property in the exercise of his profession, bequeathed it at his death towards the foundation of a mathematical school at his native town of Crediton, in Devonshire. He published an atlas, treatises on bookkeeping, navigation, &c.; and died in 1792.

DUNNING, JOHN, Lord ASHBURTON, a celebrated lawyer, was born at Ashburton, Devon, in 1731. After serving his clerkship in his father's office, he studied for the bar; and rapidly attaining an eminence in the profession, he became counsel for Wilkes, whose cause he conducted in such a manner as to establish his fame as a sound lawyer and adroit pleader. He became attorney-general in 1767, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster in 1782, and was raised to the peerage, but died in the following year.

DUNOIS, JOHN, count of Orleans and Longueville, an illegitimate son of the Duke of Orleans, was born in 1402. So successful was he in his military career, particularly in the share he bore in the expulsion of the English from France, that Charles VII. honoured him with the title of "Restorer of his Country." Died, 1468.

DUNS, JOHN, usually styled Duns Scotus, a theological disputant, who acquired the title of "the most subtle doctor" by his metaphysical abstractions, was born at Dunstane, in Northumberland; studied at Merton College, Oxford; and having entered the University of Paris, was soon appointed professor and regent in the theological schools. Great as was his fame, the works which obtained it are now disregarded as a mass of misapplied talent and intellectual lumber. Died at Cologne, in 1309.

DUNSTAN, ST., archbishop of Canterbury, an accomplished prelate and eminent statesman, was born at Glastonbury, in 925, in the reign of Athelstan. He took a conspicuous part in the political struggles of the day; and assumed, as was the custom of the clergy in that age, as great a share in the temporal authority of the kingdom as in its spiritual affairs. Died, 988.

DUNSTER, CHARLES, an English divine and scholar, was the son of the Rev. Samuel Dunster, who is known as the translator of the satires and art of poetry of Horace into English prose. Besides Mr. Charles Dunster's theological writings, of which "Discursive Considerations on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke" is the principal, he wrote a treatise "On the Early Reading of Milton," a commentary on Paradise Regained, and other works. He died at Petworth, Sussex, of which place he was the incumbent, in 1816.

DUNTON, JOHN, a noted London bookseller, was born at Graffham, Huntingdonshire, in 1659. He projected and carried on "The Athenian Mercury," a selection from which, under the title of "The Athenian Oracle," in 4 vols., was reprinted. He was also the author of "Athenianism," consisting of numerous treatises in prose and verse; and a curious work, entitled "Dunton's Life and Errors." Died, 1733.

DUPATY, JEAN BAPTISTE MERCIER, president in the parliament of Bourdeaux, was born at Rochelle, in 1746; and died at Paris, in 1788. He was the author of "Historical Reflections on Penal Laws," "Academical Discourses," and "Letters on Italy."

DUPATY, CHARLES, son of the president, was a celebrated sculptor, whose productions are remarkable for their classic purity. Died, 1825.

DUPERRON, JAMES DAVY, a Swiss Protestant, who, having abjured his religion, was successively promoted by Henry III. and IV., till he at length obtained the archbishopric of Sens, and was elected a cardinal. Born, 1556; died, 1618.

DUPIN, LOUIS ELLIS, an eminent French historian and ecclesiastic, was born in Normandy, in 1637. He became professor of divinity in the Royal College, but lost the professorship in consequence of his religious moderation. He was the author of an extensive and valuable work, entitled "Bibliothèque Universelle des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques," in 58 vols.; and for the freedom and tolerance of his opinions therein he was exposed to much persecution. He was also the author of various other works on church government and practical divinity. He died in 1719.

DUPLEIX, JOSEPH, was a celebrated French merchant, who, as the head of the factory at Chandernagore, had raised it to such a pitch of prosperity, that, in 1742, he was appointed governor of Pondicherry, and director-general of the French factories in India. In 1748 he successfully defended it against the English, for which he was raised to the rank of marquis; and during his whole administration he displayed first-rate talents, both civil and military. But his valuable services did not shield him from the shafts of envy; he was recalled; and the man who had been surrounded by all the splendour of an eastern court, was left to languish in poverty, vainly soliciting justice from an ungrateful government. He died, the victim of anxiety, in 1763, 9 years after his recall.

DUPLEIX, SIMO, historiographer of France, was born in 1566. He wrote "Mémoires des Gauls," a "History of France," 6 vols. folio; a "History of Rome," 3 vols. folio; "A Course of Philosophy," &c. It is asserted, that, having written a work on the liberties of the Gallican Church, which he took to the chancery to be licensed, that magistrate threw it into the fire; which so preyed upon his mind that it caused his death, in 1661.

DUPONT DE NEMOURS, PETER SAMUEL, a French political economist, was born at Paris, in 1739. Though he twice sat as president of the constitutional assembly, and held other high official situations under the revolutionary government, he invariably opposed the anarchists, and narrowly escaped becoming their victim, in 1797, by his timely retreat to America. From that country he returned in 1805, and became president of the chamber of commerce; and in 1814 he was appointed secretary to the provisional government. In the following year he finally retired to America, where he died in 1817. Dupont was the author of various treatises on different branches of political economy; he also wrote "Philosophie de l'Univers," and other works of merit.

DUPPA, BRIAN, a loyal prelate and the faithful friend of Charles I., was born at Lewisham, Kent, in 1589, and educated at Christchurch Oxford, of which he was afterwards dean. He attended the captive king in the Isle of Wight, and is said to have assisted him in his Icon Basilike. He was successively bishop of Clichester, Salisbury, and Winchester. Died, 1662.

DUPPA, RICHARD, a barrister, and as a literary character remarkable for the versatility of his talents, was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and took the degree of LL.B. at Cambridge, in 1814. He wrote many interesting works, among which are "The Life and Works of Michael Angelo Buonarrotti," "The Life of Raffaele," "Travels in Italy," &c. Died, 1831.

DUPUIS, CHARLES FRANCIS, a modern French philosopher, was born at Trie-le-Château, near Gisors, in 1742, and educated at Harcourt College. During the revolutionary era he was a distinguished politician, became president of the legislative body, and was also a member of the Institute and of the legion of honour. He was the inventor of the telegraph, and the author of a noted work, entitled "Origine de tous les Cultes, ou la Religione universelle." Died, 1809.

DUPRE DE ST. MAUR, NICHOLAS FRANCIS, a French writer, born in 1695, and died at Paris, in 1775. He translated Milton's Paradise Lost, and wrote some works on numismatics.

DUPUYTREN, BARON WILLIAM, one of the most renowned surgeons of modern times, was born of poor parents in the department of Haute Vienne in France, 1777. At the age of 3 years he was stolen from his home by a lady of rank, who wished to adopt him; but he was subsequently returned to his parents, and he owed his future elevation to the accidental circumstance of an officer seeing him in his native village, and being struck with his address, made proposals that he should go with him to Paris, where his education should be attended to. Placed by this officer in the College de la Marche, he soon evinced a great aptitude for medical science; in 1803 he took his degree of M. D., and after passing with distinction through various grades of the profession, he obtained in 1815 the chair of clinical surgery in the Hotel Dieu, the laborious duties of which he discharged with equal ability and success for 20 years. Dupuytren was equally distinguished as a physiologist and as a surgeon; and there are few among the most enlightened practitioners of France who do not acknowledge him as their master. Died in 1835.

DUQUESNE, ABRAHAM, a brave and skilful naval officer in the French service, was born at Dieppe, in 1610. He distinguished himself by numerous acts of intrepidity during a long career, and added much to the maritime character of his country. Died, 1688.

DURAND, DAVID, a French Protestant minister, who, after some perilous escapes from the dangers of death and the Inquisition, came to England, and was preacher at the Savoy chapel, London. He was the author of a "Life of Vanina," a "History of the Sixteenth Century," and a Continuation of Rapin. Born, 1681; died, 1763.

DURAND DE MAILLANE, PETER TOUSSANT, an eminent French lawyer, was born in 1729, and died in 1811. He was a member of the National Convention, and published many able works relating to the canon law.

DURANTE, FRANCESCO, a celebrated musical composer, was born at Naples, in 1693, where he died in 1755. He is principally known as the composer of vocal church music.

DURAS, Duchesse de, a French lady of considerable literary talents and accomplishments. Her father, Count Kersaint, fell a victim to his loyalty, in having voted against the regicides in the National Convention. Died, 1827.

DUREAU DE LAMALLE, JOHN BAPTIST JOSEPH RENE, a native of St. Domingo, where he was born in 1782. He was a member of the legislative body and of the Institute; and as a literary character distinguished himself by his versions of Tacitus, Sallust, and other classics. Died, 1807.

DURELL, JOHN, an eminent divine, born at Jersey, 1626; became dean of Windsor, and died in 1683. He translated the Liturgy into French and Latin, and wrote a "Vindication of the Church of England against Schismatics," &c.

DURELL, DAVID, a descendant of the preceding, was born at Jersey in 1728, and died in 1775. He was the author of various dissertations on parts of the Old Testament.

DURER, ALBERT, an eminent painter and engraver, was born at Nuremberg in 1471. His father was a goldsmith, in which profession the son had made considerable progress before he turned his attention exclusively to the arts. He was the first who in Germany taught the rules of perspective, and of the proportions of the human body, according to mathematical principles. Though particularly eminent as a painter, he also excelled as a sculptor and architect, wrote several works illustrative of those arts, and made great improvements in copper-plate and wood engraving. He was patronised by the emperors Maximilian I. and Charles V., and died at his native town, in 1528.

D'URFEY, THOMAS, a facetious poet, once highly popular, but now nearly forgotten, was the son of a French refugee, and born at Exeter in 1628. He abandoned the study of the law for the life of a dramatist, and was the author of about 30 comedies, all of which have justly become obsolete from their licentiousness. He was also a writer of songs and party lyrics, which were printed in 6 vols., under the title of "Pills to purge Melancholy;" and being the boon companion of Charles II. his society was courted by the witty and profligate frequenters of his court. Died, 1723.

DURHAM, JOHN GEORGE LAMBTON, Earl of, was the eldest son of W. H. Lambton, esq., of Lambton Castle, M. P. for the city of Durham, by Lady Anne Villiers, daughter of the Earl of Jersey. He was educated at Eton, served in the 10th hussars, and at the age of 20 married Miss Harriet Cholmondeley, by whom he had three daughters, all now deceased. In 1815 this lady died; and in the following year he formed a matrimonial alliance with Lady Louisa Elizabeth, the second daughter of Earl Grey. During the whole of his parliamentary career he denounced Tory influence, and steadily adhered to the doctrine of reform as originally propounded by his noble father-in-law; but in 1827 we find him a supporter of Mr. Canning's ministry, and on the dissolution of Lord Goderich's cabinet, in 1828, he was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Durham. On the formation of Earl Grey's government in 1830, he became a member of the cabinet, as lord privy seal; and to him is mainly attributed the great extent and liberality of the reform bill, and its eventual triumph.

He was now hailed as the great leader of the movement party, and became a popular idol; his presence was eagerly solicited at all the great radical meetings, and his admirers were on tip-toe in the expectation that he would be raised to the head of public affairs. In 1835 his lordship went to Russia as ambassador, and remained there till the summer of 1837, when he returned to England; and in the following year he went out as governor-general to Canada, entrusted with extraordinary powers; but finding himself not supported as he expected by the ministry, he returned home the same year. So opposite have been the sentiments with regard to Lord Durham's general policy and his qualifications as a statesman, that to a mind disposed to be impartial it is difficult to form a correct opinion of them; but we believe that we may safely reiterate the following encomium on him:—"From his first appearance on the field of politics to the last, no man ever thought of even doubting his rectitude and determined adherence to his conscientious convictions." Born, April 12. 1792; died, July 28. 1840.

DURIAM, Admiral Sir PHILIP CHARLES CALDERWOOD, was born at Largo, in Fifeshire, in 1763, and entered the navy in 1777, as a midshipman on board the Edgar, of 74 guns. He was afterwards acting lieutenant in the Viceroy, 104, flag-ship of Admiral Kempenfelt, whom he followed on his removing to the Royal George. When that noble ship "went down" at Spithead, Aug. 29. 1782, the subject of this memoir was officer of the watch; and his miraculous escape on that fatal day is so extraordinary and interesting, that we shall briefly relate the circumstances. Finding the ship was sinking, Lieut. Durham threw off his coat and plunged into the water, where he was seized by a drowning marine, by whom he was twice carried down; on rising the second time, he succeeded in extricating himself from the dying man's grasp by tearing off his waistcoat, and he, with one of the seamen, was eventually saved by seizing the haliards from the mizen-topmast-head, by which they reached the mast-head, from whence they were taken with great difficulty by a boat. The poor marine's body was washed on shore a fortnight afterwards, with the waistcoat by which he had caught hold of Lieut. Durham so firmly twisted round his arm, that a pencil case, bearing the lieutenant's initials, was found in the pocket, and restored to the owner. When Lieut. Durham had reached a place of temporary security, he observed the captain (Waghorn) holding by the weather mizen-top-sail-yard-arm, and sent a boat to his aid; and these two were the only officers saved. Soon after this event he was appointed acting lieutenant of the Union, 98, at the relief of Gibraltar, by Lord Howe; and after various promotions, to which his services well entitled him, he commanded the Defence, of 74 guns, at the battle of Trafalgar, Oct. 21. 1805; but, in fact, he was almost continuously employed from 1780 to 1815, when the last Buonapartean flag that waved in the West Indies struck to him. He was made vice-admiral in 1819, and full admiral in 1820. His last service was that of commander-in-chief at Portsmouth, which post he resigned in 1839. Sir Philip was M.P. for Queenborough in 1830, and for Devizes in 1835. Died, April 2. 1845.

DUROC, MICHAEL, duke of Friuli and a marshal of France, was born in 1772, and entered the army in 1792. Being subsequently appointed aide-de-camp to Buonaparte, he accompanied him to Egypt, where he eminently distinguished himself, and was severely wounded by the bursting of a howitzer. On the formation of the imperial court in 1805, he was created grand-marshal of the palace; and was afterwards employed in diplomatic missions, though he still took his full share of peril and glory in the wars of France, till the time of his death, which happened at the battle of Wurtzen, in 1813. Napoleon, who was firmly attached to Duroc, wept over him on his death-bed; and perhaps he never had to lament the loss of a more faithful friend or a braver soldier.

DUSART, CORNELIUS, a Dutch painter, who excelled in tavern scenes, revelry, &c. was the disciple of Adrian Ostade. Born, 1665; died, 1704.

DUSSAULT, JOHN JOSEPH, a French journalist and critic, was born at Paris, in 1769. He contributed largely to the Journal des D'chats, and the articles he furnished were afterwards published in 5 vols., entitled "Annales Littéraires." He also wrote various pamphlets and essays, and was, in short, a litterateur of considerable notoriety. Died, 1824.

DUSSEK, JOHN LOUIS, an eminent musical composer, was born at Czeslau, in Bohemia, in 1762, and studied at Hamburgh, under the famous Emanuel Bach. From the north of Europe he went to France, but being compelled to leave that country during the revolution, he came to London in 1796, and, in conjunction with Corri, opened a musical establishment. In 1799 he returned to the continent, and died in 1812.

DUTENS, LOUIS, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Tours in 1730. He became secretary and chaplain to the British minister at Turin, who left him there, on his return to England, as chargé d'affaires. He afterwards obtained the living of Eldson in Northumberland, and died in London, 1812. His principal works are, "An Inquiry into the Origin of Discoveries" and "Memoirs of a Traveller in Retirement."

DUVAL, ALEXANDRE VINCENT PINDER, a popular and voluminous French author. He so well understood the difficult art of constructing a dramatic piece, says a French critic, that he could naturally and gracefully introduce touching scenes even into a comedy, and that too without sinking to melodrama. He was a member of the Institute and keeper of the arsenal library. Born, 1767; died, 1842.

DUVAL, VALENTINE JAMERAI, the son of a peasant, was born at Artonay, in Champagne, in 1695. Being left an orphan at the age of 10, he was employed as a shepherd's boy, and underwent great privations; but at 18, he became keeper of the cattle belonging to the hermits of St. Anne, near Luneville, and by one of that fraternity he was taught to read. Thenceforth he displayed an earnest desire for acquiring knowledge; and being discovered by two noblemen while he was studying geography under a tree, with his maps stretched out before him, they were so pleased with his conversation, that they introduced him to the Duke of Lorraine, who sent him to college, afterwards made him his librarian, and eventually procured him the situation of keeper of the books and medals of the imperial cabinet of Vienna. He died in 1775.

DUVERNEY, JOSEPH GUICHARD, a celebrated French anatomist, was born at Feurs, in 1648; appointed professor of anatomy at the royal garden in 1679, and died in 1730. He was the author of several works illustrative of the science he professed.

DUVOISIN, JOHN BAPTIST, a French ecclesiastic, who, in 1792, suffered deportation with a great number of his clerical brethren; but, on returning in 1802, he was raised to the bishopric of Nantes, and obtained the esteem of Buonaparte, who created him a baron, and made him a member of the legion of honour. He wrote several theological works, and died at Paris in 1813.

DWIGHT, TIMOTHY, an American divine, of great reputation both as a pulpit orator and a writer, was born in Massachusetts, in 1752; became president of Yale College in 1795; and died in 1817. His "System of Theology," in 5 vols., is regarded as a work of great merit, and has been frequently reprinted.

DYER, SIR EDWARD, a poet of the Elizabethan age, was born about 1540, and educated at Oxford. He received many proofs of the royal favour after he had returned from his travels, being employed in various embassies by the queen, who conferred on him the chancellorship of the garter in 1596. His poetical pieces consist chiefly of pastoral odes and madrigals.

DYER, GEORGE, a classical scholar and miscellaneous writer, whose long life of literary toil may in some sort be exemplified by quoting from the Gentleman's Magazine the following mournful record: "The greatest labour of his life was the share he had in the production of Valpy's edition of the classics in 141 volumes, being a combination of the Delphin, Bipont, and Variorum editions. With the exception of the preface, Dyer contributed all that was original in this vast work, upon which he was engaged from the year 1819 to 1830!

He had scarcely completed this work when his eyesight gave way, and shortly afterwards left him in total blindness." The writer adds (and let us not grudge the space which the unaffected tribute occupies), "The memory of George Dyer will be ever cherished by his friends as of one who passed through the world without having contracted one blemish of worldliness; his guileless simplicity endeared him especially to his friend Charles Lamb, who would often, indeed, indulge his humorous vein at the expense of one whom he knew to be of invulnerable innocence, but who has also declared that, in doing so, it was his ambition to make familiar to the public a character which, for integrity and single heartedness, he has long been accustomed to rank among the best patterns of his species." Mr. Dyer was born in 1755; received his education at Christ's Hospital and Emanuel College, Cambridge; and died in 1841, aged 85. His writings are varied and numerous; historical, poetical, classical, and political; amongst them his "History of the University and Colleges of Cambridge," 2 vols., and "The Privileges of the University of Cambridge," &c., 2 vols., are the most important.

DYER, SIR JAMES, chief justice of the common pleas, and speaker of the House of Commons, was born in 1812, and died in 1581. Dyer's "Reports" are still highly valued by the profession.

DYER, JOHN, a poet of considerable reputation, was born at Aberglasney, Caermarthenshire, in 1700, and educated at Westminster School. He was intended for the law, which he abandoned for painting, but not arriving at excellence as an artist, he took orders, and obtained some respectable church preferment. In 1727 he published his poem of "Grongar Hill," which met with deserved success. He then made the tour of Italy, where, besides the usual study, he often spent whole days in the country about Rome and Florence, sketching those picturesque scenes that there abound; and it is very naturally imagined that the beautiful landscapes depicted in his two subsequent poems owe their existence in no slight degree to that cause. These are entitled "The Ruins of Rome" and "The Fleece." His poetry displays a lively imagination, and combines great originality with the warmest sentiments of benevolence and virtue. He died in 1758.

E.

EACHARD, JOHN, an English divine, was born in 1636. After studying at Catharine Hall, Cambridge, he was chosen master in 1675, and died in 1697. He wrote a work, entitled "The Grounds and Reasons of the Contempt of the Clergy and Religion inquired into," and was also known as the author of two dialogues, in which the system of Hobbes is attacked with satiric humour.

EADMER, an English Benedictine monk of the 12th century, who became abbot of St. Alban's. He wrote a "History of the Liberty of the Church," and various other ecclesiastical works. Died, 1124.

EARLE, JOHN, an English prelate, was born at York, and entered of Merton College, Oxford, in 1620. He became chaplain and tutor to Charles, prince of Wales, and sufferred much in the rebellion. At the Restoration he was made dean of Westminster and bishop of Worcester, from which see he was translated to Salisbury in 1638. Dr. Earle was the author of an ingenious work, entitled "Microcosmography; or, a Piece of the World characterised, in Essays and Characters." He also translated the Icon Basilike into Latin. Died, 1665.

EARLOM, RICHARD, a mezzotinto engraver, was born in London, in 1740. His taste for design is said to have been excited by inspecting the ornaments on the lord mayor's coach, which had been painted by Cipriani. He was employed by Boydell to make drawings from the celebrated collection of pictures at Houghton, which he afterwards engraved in mezzotinto—an art in which he was his own instructor. He also engraved and published two volumes of plates from Claude's Liber Veritatis; several fine flower pieces from Van Huysum; a tiger hunt, and other subjects, from Zoffany, &c. Died, 1822.

EATON, WILLIAM, an American officer, whose adventures have furnished incidents for an interesting volume, was born at Woodstock, in Connecticut, in 1764, and at the age of 16 enlisted as a soldier. Being discharged in 1783, he studied Latin and Greek, and after filling the situation of classical assistant in a school at Vermont, was appointed clerk to the house of delegates of that state. In 1792 he received a captain's commission in the American army, and in 1794 obtained the appointment of American consul at Tunis. War being declared in 1801 against the United States, by the bey of Tripoli, who was an usurper, Hamet Pacha, the ex-bey, who was then an exile at Tunis, induced Mr. Eaton to join him in the desperate attempt of recovering possession of his dominions. A series of singular events followed, which our limits prevent us from entering on; but his services were so highly valued by his countrymen, that on his return home he was received with the most flattering marks of favour; and the legislature of Massachusetts bestowed on him a tract of land consisting of 10,000 acres. Died, 1811.

EBELING, CHRISTOPHER DANIEL, a distinguished geographer, was born in 1741; died, 1817.

ECHARD, LAURENCE, an English divine and historian, was born in 1671; received his education at Cambridge; became archdeacon of Stowe, and obtained some valuable livings in his native county, Suffolk. He was a very voluminous writer: "The Roman History," "A General Ecclesiastical History," a "History of England," and a "Gazetteer," are the most prominent of his works. Died, 1730.

ECHINUS, SEBASTIAN, a Venetian nobleman, eminent for his writings, particularly on medals. Died, 1585.

ECKHARD, JOHN FREDERICK, a learned and voluminous writer on philology and bibliography, was director and librarian of the college of Eisenach; born in Saxony in 1723, and died in 1794.

ECKHARD, JOHN GEORGE, an antiquary and historian, was born in the duchy of Brunswick, in 1674, and brought up a Protestant; but abjuring his religion, he was made historiographer and keeper of the archives at Wurzburg. His principal works are, "A Body of History of the Middle Ages," "The Origin of the Families of Hapsburg and Guelf," &c. Died, 1730.

ECKHIEL, JOSEPH HILARY, a learned Jesuit, well skilled in numismatics, was born in Upper Austria, in 1736. He was keeper of the imperial cabinet of medals at Vienna, and few men possessed so extensive a knowledge of the science. His two works, entitled "Doctrina Nummorum Veterum" and "Nummi Veteres Anecdoti," are both replete with sound information on the subject. Died, 1798.

ECLUSE, CHARLES DE L', better known by the name of CLUSIUS, was born at Arras, in Flanders, in 1526, and became eminent as a physician and botanist. He travelled into various parts of Europe, in search of botanical information; was made superintendent of the imperial garden at Vienna; and ultimately accepted a professorship in the university of Leyden, where he died in 1609.

EDELINCK, GERARD, an eminent engraver, born at Antwerp, in 1649, was patronised by Louis XIV. of France, and executed many great works from historical subjects, as well as the portraits of distinguished characters. Died, 1707.

EDEX, SIR FREDERICK MORTON, a writer on statistics and political economy. His principal work is entitled "The State of the Poor, or a History of the Labouring Classes in England, from the Conquest to the present Time," 3 vols. 4to. Died, 1809.

EDEX, SIR MORTON, a diplomatist, who, after being employed as ambassador to various continental powers, at the commencement of the late war, was raised to the peerage by the title of lord HENLEY, and died in 1802.

EDGAR, one of the most distinguished Saxon kings of England, succeeded his brother Edwy in 959, at the age of 16. The moderation of his reign procured him the name of Penance. He vanquished the Scots, and laid Wales under a yearly tribute of a certain number of wolves heads, which cleared the country of those animals. He subdued part of Ireland, and maintained a large fleet, which secured his kingdom from invasion. On the death of his queen Eglfild, he sent Earl Athelwold to see whether the report of the beauty of Elfrida, daughter of the Earl of Devon, was true. The earl fell in love with the lady, gave his master a false report, and married her. He was afterwards killed while hunting, and Elfrida became the wife of Edgar, who died in 975, aged 33. Edward the Martyr succeeded him.

EDGEWORTH, RICHARD LOVELL, of Edgeworthstown, Ireland, was born at Bath, in 1744, and completed his studies at Oxford. Being possessed of a good fortune he devoted much of his time to agricultural improvements, as well as to the amelioration of the existing modes of education, by writing, in conjunction with his highly gifted daughter, many useful works. He also wrote his own "Memoirs;" and among his various mechanical inventions was a telegraph. Died, 1817.

EDGEWORTH, MARIA, the celebrated Irish novelist, whose works have had great influence in promoting the cause of education, and of social morality, was born in Oxfordshire, in 1766. She was the daughter of Richard Lovell Edgeworth above mentioned, and was 12 years old before she was taken to her paternal home. She commenced her career as an authoress about 1800; and in her early literary efforts she was greatly assisted by the advice and sound practical suggestions of her father, to whom she was in the habit of submitting the first designs of her works. The famous "Essay on Irish Bulls," the joint production of herself and her father, was published in 1801. Her "Castle Rackrent" abounds in some of those admirable sketches of Irish life and manners, for which most of her tales and novels are so much distinguished. Her "Belinda," a novel of real life and ordinary characters, is also descriptive of some of the striking traits of the Irish character. In 1804 she published her "Popular Tales," 3 vols.; and two years afterwards, "Leonora," a novel in 2 vols. In 1809 she issued 3 vols. of "Tales of Fashionable Life," of a more powerful and varied cast than any of her previous productions. Three other vols. of "Fashionable Tales" appeared in 1812, and fully sustained the high reputation which she had now attained. In 1814 her novel of "Patronage," in 4 vols., was published. Its object is to show the miseries resulting from a dependence on the great, and she paints the manners and characters of high life with her usual vigour and fidelity. In 1817 appeared two tales named "Harrington" and "Ormond;" the intention of the first of these being the removal of the prejudices entertained by many against the Jews; the other is an Irish story. In 1822, Miss Edgeworth published a work of a different kind, namely, "Rosamond," a sequel to "Early Lessons," which had been previously published, being tales for the young. In 1825 she issued 4 vols. of similar tales, under the title of "Harriet and Lucy," being a continuation of that course of moral instruction for youthful readers on which she had so ably and so successfully entered, and in which she had so few predecessors or equals. Miss Edgeworth's last work of fiction, a novel entitled "Helen," in 3 vols., appeared in 1834. It is not inferior to any of her other works. Besides those already mentioned, she also wrote "The Modern Griselda," "Frank," "Garry Owen," "Laurent le Paressoux," "Little Plays for Young People," "Moral Tales," "Parent's Assistant," "Patronage and Comic Dramas," &c. For many years, indeed, literary composition formed the chief business of her life. Originality and fertility of invention, and a power of depicting Irish manners, unequalled among modern authors, are her chief characteristics as a novelist. She especially shone, however, in her stories, which are written in a beautifully simple style, and in which the youthful mind is made first to comprehend its part in the great drama of social life. But numerous and valuable as her productions are, these were not the only service which she rendered to literature. Sir Walter Scott, with whom she lived in the closest ties of friendship, has acknowledged that to her descriptions of Irish character and manners we are indebted, in a great measure, for the "Waverley Novels." "The rich humour, pathetic tenderness, and admirable tact" of her Irish delineations, he declared, led him first to think that something might be attempted for his own country of the same kind with that which Miss Edgeworth so fortunately achieved for Ireland. In private life, Miss Edgeworth was highly beloved and respected by all who knew her; and, in her intercourse with society, she was most unaffected and agreeable. But she had long ceased to take an active part in life, or in the world of literature of which she was once so bright an ornament, her last years being passed in tranquillity at the family seat at Edgeworthstown. Died, 1849.

EDGEWORTH DE FIRMONT, HENRY ESSEX, confessor to LOUIS XVI., was born at Edgeworthstown, Ireland, in 1745. His father, who was a Protestant clergyman, became a Catholic, and went with his family to France, where Henry was educated. Being devoted to the cause of royalty, he offered personally to attend the king to the place of execution, ascended the scaffold with him, and exclaimed, as the axe fell, "Son of Saint Louis, ascend to heaven!" He succeeded in escaping to this country, in 1796, when Mr. Pitt, in the name of the king, offered him a pension, which he declined. He followed Louis XVIII. to Blankenburg, in Brunswick, and thence to Mittau, where he died in 1807.

EDMONDES, Sir THOMAS, a statesman in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I., and Charles I. He was also distinguished as a political writer. Died, 1639.

EDMONDSON, JOSEPH, a genealogist and heraldic painter, died in 1786. His principal works are, "A Body of Heraldry," 2 vols. folio; and "Baronagium Genealogicum, or the Pedigrees of English Peers," 6 vols.

EDMUND, ST., king of the East Angles, was so illustrious for his piety as to obtain a place in the Roman calendar. In 870 he was defeated and taken prisoner by the Danes under Ivar, who caused him to be fastened to a tree, and to be shot to death with arrows. His remains were interred at Bury St. Edmund's.

EDMUND I., king of England, son of Edward the Elder, succeeded his brother Athelstan in 941. He subdued Mercia, Northumberland, and Cumberland. He was killed in 948, while at a banquet, by an outlaw, named Loelf, who entered among the guests, and provoked the king to a personal attack upon him.

EDMUND II., surnamed IRONSIDE, on account of his prodigious strength, was the son of Ethelred, whom he succeeded in 1016; but being opposed by Canute, he agreed to share the crown with him. After a reign of nine months only, he was treacherously murdered, in 1017, at Oxford, by two of his chamberlains.

EDRIDGE, HENRY, an eminent landscape and miniature painter, was born at Paddington, in 1768. His earlier portraits are principally drawn on paper, with black lead and Indian ink; but in later years he produced an immense number of elaborately finished pictures, in which were combined the depth and richness of oil-paintings with the freedom of water-colour drawings. Died, 1821.

EDRISSI, ABU ABDALLAH MOHAMMED BEN MOHAMMED, a descendant of the African princes of the race of Edris, was born in Spain in 1009, and settled at the court of Roger, king of Sicily; for whom he framed an immense terrestrial globe of silver, and wrote in Arabic a geographical work to explain it.

EDWARD THE ELDER, son of Alfred the Great, succeeded his father in 901. He encouraged learning, and improved the university of Cambridge. Northumbria and East Anglia were subdued by him; and he extended his dominions by conquests in Scotland and Wales. Died, 925.

EDWARD THE MARTYR, son of Edgar, king of England, was born in 962, and crowned in 975. He was murdered by order of his stepmother Elfrida, at Corie Castle, after a reign of three years.

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR, king of England, was the son of Ethelred, and succeeded Hardekanute in 1041. He restored Malcolm to the throne of Scotland, which had been usurped by Macbeth. He caused the Saxon laws to be revised, amended, formed into one body, and translated into Latin; hence they were called his laws. He consulted William of Normandy about the choice of a successor, which furnished that prince with a plea for invading the kingdom after the death of Edward, which happened in 1065.

EDWARD I. (of the Norman line), king of England, called Longshanks, succeeded his father, Henry III., in 1272. After firmly establishing his authority at home, he led an army into Palestine against the Saracens, where he signalled his valour on many occasions; and having, on his return, conquered Wales, he created his son prince of that country, which title has from that time been given to the heir-apparent. He also brought Scotland into subjection, and took the king, John Balliol, prisoner. Edward died at Carlisle in 1307, aged 68.

EDWARD II. was the son of the preceding, and born at Caernarvon. He was governed by his favourites, Gaveston and the Spencers, which occasioned the barons to rise against him. After resigning his crown, he was confined in Berkeley Castle, Gloucestershire, where he was traitorously murdered by the contrivance of his queen, Isabella, and her favourite, Roger Mortimer, earl of March, in 1328. His deposition took place in 1327.

EDWARD III., the son and successor of the above, was one of the most celebrated heroes of his country. Being but fifteen when the crown devolved to him, the queen dowager and her infamous paramour governed during the first three years of his reign; but in 1330 the king took the reins of government into his own hands; disgraced and confined his mother; and caused Mortimer to be tried and executed for the murder of his father, and his uncle the earl of Kent. He then put himself at the head of his army, reduced the Scots, and took their king, David, prisoner. He next invaded France, laid claim to the crown, as heir to his mother, the sister of Charles the last king, who died without issue. Victorious by sea and land against France and Spain, he was elected emperor of Germany, but refused the imperial throne, and returned in triumph to England; leaving his son, Edward the Black Prince, to command the army in his absence. He died in 1377, in the 51st year of his reign, and the 65th of his age. His gallant son dying before him, he was succeeded by his grandson, Richard II.

EDWARD, Prince of Wales, surnamed the Black Prince, son of Edward III., was born in 1330; and, accompanying his father to France in 1345, took a leading part in gaining the glorious victory of Crecy in the year following. During his stay in France he performed many other acts of heroism, till at length, in 1356, he won the great battle of Poitiers, when he took king John and his son prisoners, and distinguished himself as much by his courtesy and true chivalry to his captives, as he had in the field by his unrivalled valour. He was created prince of Aquitaine by his father; and died, universally regretted, in 1376, aged 45.

EDWARD IV., son of Richard duke of York, succeeded Henry VI. in 1461. He married Lady Elizabeth Grey, which so disgusted the Earl of Warwick, commonly called the king-maker, that he joined the Lancastrian party, and defeated Edward's forces near Banbury in 1469. Soon afterwards he took Edward prisoner, who effected his escape, and obtained a victory over Warwick at Stamford Wells. That nobleman fled to France, from whence he returned with a supply of troops, and proclaimed Henry. Edward on this escaped beyond sea, and Warwick released Henry from the Tower, and set him on the throne; but Edward returned with succours, and marched to London, where he took Henry prisoner. He shortly after defeated Warwick, who was slain. Another victory at Tewkesbury secured to him the quiet possession of the throne. He died in 1483, aged 41.

EDWARD V., son of the preceding, whom he succeeded at the age of 12 years. Richard duke of Gloucester, his uncle, took the guardianship of him and his brother into his own hands, and placed them in the Tower, where they were smothered in their beds in 1483.

EDWARD VI., the only son of Henry VIII., by Jane Seymour, his third queen, ascended the throne when only nine years old; and, considering his extreme youth, displayed many qualities of the fairest promise. He promoted the Reformation, and established the service of the Church of England, in 1552, by act of parliament. He founded the hospitals of Christchurch, Bridewell, and St. Thomas; but the hopes of the nation were blighted by his untimely death in 1553, in the seventh year of his reign, and the 16th of his age.

EDWARD PLANTAGENET, earl of Warwick, the only surviving male descendant of the house of York, was kept a prisoner in the Tower several years, through jealousy, and at last beheaded in 1499, on a pretext that he entered into a conspiracy with Perkin Warbeck against Henry VIII.

EDWARDS, BRYAN, an ingenious writer, was born in 1743, at Westbury, in Wiltshire, and, on the death of his father, was taken under the care of an uncle in Jamaica. He afterwards settled in England, and was returned member of parliament for Gram-pound in Cornwall. Mr. Edwards wrote "The History, Civil and Commercial, of the British Colonies in the West Indies," 2 vols. 4to.; "The Proceedings of the Governor and Assembly of Jamaica in regard to the Maroon Negroes;" and "An Historical Survey of the French Colony in the Island of St. Domingo," 8vo. He died in 1800.

EDWARDS, GEORGE, an eminent naturalist, was born in 1693, at Stratford, in Essex. He was bred to trade, but on the expiration of his apprenticeship he went abroad, and for some years applied himself to the study of natural history, for which he had always shown a predilection. On his return to England he was appointed librarian of the college of physicians; and while holding that situation he published a "History of Birds," in 7 vols. 4to.; "Gleanings of Natural History," in 3 vols. 4to.; and a volume of Essays. Died, 1773.

EDWARDS, JONATHAN, an American, celebrated for his metaphysical knowledge, was born at Windsor, in Connecticut, in 1703. In 1722 he became a preacher at New York to a presbyterian congregation, and in 1724 was chosen tutor of Yale College. In 1726 he resigned that station, and became assistant to his grandfather, who was a minister at Northampton. Here he continued till 1750, when he was dismissed for refusing to administer the sacrament to those who could not give proofs of their being converted. The year following he went as missionary among the Indians, and in 1757 was chosen president of the college of New Jersey, where he died in 1758. He wrote a "Treatise concerning religious Affections;" the "Life of David Brainerd, a Missionary;" an "Inquiry into the modern prevailing Notion of that Freedom of Will, which is supposed to be essential to Moral Agency," &c.

EDWARDS, THOMAS, an ingenious poet and critical writer, was born in London in 1699, and bred to the bar. In 1744 he attacked Warburton's edition of Shakspeare, which being coarsely noticed by the haughty editor, was followed by a humorous publication, entitled, "Canons of Criticism, with a Glossary," which passed through several editions. He was also the author of some sonnets. Died, 1757.

EDWARDS, THOMAS, an English divine, was educated at Cambridge, where he took his degree of M. A. in 1699. He was a furious presbyterian, and wrote with equal zeal against the episcopalians and independents. When the latter party gained the ascendancy, he withdrew to Holland, where he died in 1647. His "Gangræna" exhibits a curious picture of the religious divisions of that period.

EDWARDS, WILLIAM, a self-taught architect, was born in Glamorganshire, in 1719. He was only a common mason, but by the force of genius he acquired an extraordinary skill in building bridges, the principal of which is that on the river Taafe. It is the segment of a circle, the chord of which at the surface of the water is 147 feet. His skill and success in this instance soon brought him into note, and he left many other proofs of his great abilities as a bridge-builder. Died, 1789.

EDWIN, JOHN, a comic actor of very considerable talents, was born in London, in 1750. He made his first appearance on the London boards, at the Haymarket Theatre, in 1775, and subsequently performed at Covent Garden, where he was a decided favourite. Died, 1790.

EDWY, king of England, son of Edmund I., succeeded his uncle Edred in 955. He opposed the temporal power of St. Dunstan, and called him to account for his share in the administration of the preceding reign; but the wily ecclesiastic proved too much for the monarch, and Edwy was driven from his throne, to make way for his brother Edgar. He died in 959.

EGBERT, the first king of all England, and the last of the Saxon heptarchy, was a prince of great accomplishments; but, while young, he was obliged by Brithric, king of Wessex, to withdraw to France, where he lived at the court of Charlemagne. There he acquired both the arts of war and government; and being recalled to take possession of the kingdom of Wessex, to which he was the rightful heir, he soon united all the other kingdoms under him, giving the whole the name of England. His dominions were twice afterwards invaded by the Danes with great force, but he signally defeated them on both occasions. He died in 838, and was succeeded by Ethelwolf.

EGEDE, HANS, a Danish divine, born in 1686, was the founder of the religious missions to Greenland, whither he went in 1721, and presided over the establishment there for fifteen years, gaining the confidence of the natives by his piety and benevolence. Died, 1758.

EGEDE, PAUL, son of the preceding, was his assistant in the mission, and imitated his example. He composed a dictionary and grammar of the language; translated into it a part of the Bible; and published a journal of his residence in Greenland, from 1721 to 1788. Died, 1789.

EGERTON, DANIEL, a theatrical performer, who, for many years, supported an extensive range of characters of a secondary class at Covent Garden Theatre. He was born in 1772, made his début at Birmingham in 1799; and after taking the lead at Bath for some years, came to Covent Garden in 1809, where he remained till 1832, when, in conjunction with Abbot, he embarked his money and talents in the management of the Victoria Theatre. This was an unfortunate speculation, and proved his total ruin. Died, 1835.

EGERTON, JOHN, an eminent prelate, born in London in 1721, was the son of the Bishop of Hereford; studied at Eton and Oxford; was made dean of Hereford in 1750; and afterwards successively preferred to the bishoprics of Bangor, Lichfield, and Durham, he was an eloquent preacher, and a liberal contributor to several important works in his diocese. Died, 1787.

EGERTON, THOMAS, lord chancellor of England in the reign of James I., was the natural son of Sir Richard Egerton, in Cheshire, and born in 1540. He was made attorney-general in 1592; soon after, master of the rolls; and then lord-keeper. In 1603 he was appointed lord-chancellor, with the title of baron Ellesmere; and in 1616 he was created viscount Brackley, but died the year following. His principal work is entitled "The Privileges and Prerogatives of the High Court of Chancery."

EGG, JOHN GASPAR, a Swiss agriculturist and political economist, born in 1738. He was the founder of several industrious agricultural colonies, working with common funds, in the manner of those projected by Mr. Owen of Lanark.

EGIL, SCALLEGRIK, an Icelandic warrior and poet of the 10th century, who distinguished himself by his warlike exploits in predatory invasions of Scotland and Northumberland. The son of Eric Blodæxe, king of Norway, being slain by him in combat, he was doomed to death on being subsequently taken prisoner by that prince; but having extemporaneously composed and recited a poem in praise of Eric, he obtained his life and liberty.

EGNIART, or ÆGINIARD, a celebrated historian, was a native of Germany and the pupil of Alcuin, who recommended him to Charlemagne. At first he was the emperor's secretary, and it appears that he gained his esteem and confidence; but the story of his nightly interview and marriage with Charlemagne's daughter, Imma, is now believed to be as fabulous as it is incredible. He wrote a "Life of Charlemagne," "Annals of France, from 741 to 829," and some Epistles. He became abbot of the monastery of Seligenstadt, and died there in 839.

EGINTON, FRANCIS, an artist celebrated for his paintings on glass, and to whom we are indebted for the restoration of that art, was born in 1737, and died at Handsworth, in Shropshire, in 1805.

EGLANTINE, FABRE D', was one of those misguided beings who played a conspicuous part in the French revolution. He possessed a degree of playful talent, which is portrayed in some light dramatic pieces, but his character wanted consistency; for he aimed at being a painter, an engraver, a musician, and a poet, but did not acquire excellence in any profession. At length his puerile ambition led him to become a violent revolutionist; and he tried to be loudest in the assembly of the Convention in voting for the death of Louis XVI. without appeal. Yet the same man shortly after was an acknowledged moderate, a sin for which Robespierre and Hebert persecuted him with a bitterness that brought his head to the block, at the age of 39. Eglantine suffered with Danton and others in April, 1794.

EGMONT, LAMORAL, Count of, a distinguished nobleman in Flanders, was born in 1522, and served in the armies of Charles V. with great reputation. He was made general of horse by Philip II., and distinguished himself at the battle of St. Quentin in 1557. But the Duke of Alva fearing his power, and that his designs were in favour of the Prince of Orange, caused him to be beheaded at Brussels, in 1568, together with Count Horn.

EGREMONT, GEORGE O'BRIEN WYNDHAM, Earl of, was born in 1751, and succeeded to the peerage when he was only 12 years old. This illustrious nobleman displayed throughout the whole course of his long and useful life a liberal spirit and patriotic magnificence. Though he never took a very prominent part in the discussions of the legislature, he enjoyed much political consideration; and in times of pressure and peril, his purse, his example, and his exertions were nobly devoted to his country's cause. His mansion at Petworth contained the noblest productions of genius, including one of the best libraries in the kingdom; and his patronage of British artists was unbounded. When the earl succeeded to the title and estates, the yearly rental amounted to not quite 45,000*l.* per annum, which at the time of his decease had been increased to 81,000*l.*; and in the last 60 years he had distributed in acts of charity and liberality the immense sum of 1,200,000*l.*, or about 20,000*l.* per annum! Died, 1837, aged 85.

EICHHORN, JOHN GEORGE, an eminent German divine and biblical critic, was born in 1752, and became professor of Oriental literature at Jena; from which place he went to the university of Gottingen, where he was long one of its brightest ornaments. His works are erudite and voluminous; but our limits will allow us to mention only a few of the principal. "The History of Literature from the Earliest to the Latest Times," 11 vols.; a "General Library of Biblical Literature," 10 vols.; "Repertory of Biblical and Oriental Literature," 18 vols.; "Introductions to the Old and New Testaments," each 5 vols. &c. Died, 1827.

ELBEE, GILLOT D', generalissimo of the Vendean royalists, was born at Dresden, in 1732. He entered the French army as lieutenant of cavalry; and having, at the commencement of the revolution, retired to his estate in Anjou, the insurgent peasants of La Vendée, in 1793, chose him their leader. He displayed great courage and firmness, won many victories, and was often defeated by superior numbers; at length he was wounded and taken prisoner, brought before a court-martial, and shot, January 2, 1794.

ELDON, JOHN SCOTT, Earl of, a distinguished lawyer and statesman, who for 25 years filled the office of lord high chancellor of England, was the third son of William Scott, coal-fitter, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and a younger brother of the late Lord Stowell. He was born on the 4th of June, 1751 (the birthday of his friend and master, George III.); and, after receiving the rudiments of his education at the grammar-school of Newcastle, was admitted a commoner of University College, Oxford. He was elected fellow in 1767; gained the chancellor's prize, "On the Advantages and Disadvantages of Foreign Travel," in 1771; and there was every prospect of his obtaining college preferment, had he remained single. Having, however, contracted a marriage with Miss Surtees, a young lady of Newcastle, he resolved on making the law his profession, and to that end he studied late and early. In 1773 he was admitted a member of the Middle Temple; but he resided chiefly in or near Oxford, till he was called to the bar in 1776. Years of laborious study passed away, with little encouragement to him, and he had seriously resolved to quit London, to practise as a provincial counsel in his native town; but his knowledge and application had not been unobserved by some of the brightest ornaments of the profession, who persuaded him to remain, assuring him his success was certain; and the result quickly proved the correctness of their predictions, for he shortly after became the leader on the northern circuit. In 1783, Mr. Scott came into parliament for the borough of Wobly, and attached himself to the party of Mr. Pitt, who was his personal friend. His progress towards the highest legal honours now appeared certain: he was made solicitor-general in 1788, received the honour of knighthood, and became attorney-general in 1793. In 1796 Sir John Scott was returned for Boroughbridge, as the colleague of Sir Francis Burdett; succeeded Sir James Eyre as lord chief justice of the common pleas; and in July, 1799, was raised to the peerage as baron Eldon, of Eldon, in the county of Durham. In 1801 he became lord high chancellor of England, and in the same year was elected high steward of the university of Oxford, when the degree of D.C.L. was conferred on him. In February, 1803, he resigned the great seal; but was re-appointed in April, 1807, from which period he held it until April 30, 1827, being altogether nearly 25 years. At the coronation of George IV. the lord chancellor was promoted to the dignities of viscount Encombe and earl of Eldon. His whole life was an example of unremitting diligence in the most arduous of all professions; and there are few who will dispute the character given of him by that able and upright advocate Sir Samuel Romilly, who in the House of Commons declared, "there never was a man in the court of chancery who more endeared himself to the bar, or exhibited more humane attention to the suitors: there never presided in that court a man of more deep and various learning in his profession; and in anxiety to do justice, that court had never seen, he would not say the superior, but the equal of the lord chancellor. If he had a fault, it was an over-anxiety to do justice." His politics will yet be viewed through the various lights and shades of party feeling; but no one, with due reflection, will attribute to Lord Eldon a want of integrity, or a departure from any principle which he conscientiously believed would tend to the good of his country. He died at his house in Hamilton Place, London, Jan. 13, 1838, being in his 87th year. [Lady Eldon died in 1831.]

ELÉANOR, duchess of Guienne, succeeded her father William IX. in 1157, at the age of 15, and the same year married Louis VII. king of France, whom she accompanied to the Holy Land. A separation ensued between her and Louis, and in 1153 she married the Duke of Normandy, afterwards Henry II. king of England, which occasioned a succession of wars between the two kingdoms. Her jealousy of Henry, and her conduct to Fair Rosamond, have afforded a copious subject to poets and romance-writers. She excited her sons to rebel against their father, for which she was imprisoned 16 years. On the accession of Richard I. she was released, and in his absence to the Holy Land she was made regent. Died, 1204.

ELGIN and KINCARDINE, THOMAS BRUCE, Earl of, was born in 1771, succeeded to the peerage in his childhood, and received his education at Harrow and Westminster Schools, and at the university of St. Andrew's. On many occasions the Earl of Elgin was honoured with diplomatic missions, the last of which was as ambassador extraordinary to the Sublime Porte, in 1789, where he continued till the French were finally driven out of Egypt. Being desirous of rescuing the remains of Greece also from destruction and oblivion, he availed himself of the opportunities of his station, and succeeded in forming a vast collection of statues, specimens of architecture, medals, and other valuable antiquities, which were eventually purchased by government for 35,000*l.*, and deposited in the British Museum. Much censure has been lavished by Lord Byron and others on the Earl of Elgin for removing these antiquities from Athens; but if it be true, as is asserted, that the cost, including interest of money, amounted to 74,000*l.*, the "mercantile spirit" with which he has been charged is altogether without foundation, inasmuch as he lost more than one half of that sum in endeavouring to secure these invaluable treasures. Died, 1841, aged 75.

ELIAS, MATTHEW, an eminent painter, was born at Cassel in 1658, and settled at Dunkirk, where he painted a grand altarpiece. His portraits are in high estimation. Died, 1741.

ELICAGARY, DOMINIQUE, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Bayonne in 1760; quitted France in 1791, because he would not subscribe to the new constitution of the church, but returned under the directorial government, and exercised the functions of rector of the academy. During the "hundred days" he accompanied the Duchess of Angoulême to England, as almoner. Died, 1822.

ELIO, FRANCIS XAVIER, a Spanish general, who nobly defended his country against the French, and at the restoration of Ferdinand VII. was appointed governor of Valencia; but when the revolution took place, in 1820, part of the population rose against the governor, and declaring him guilty of tyrannical acts, he was imprisoned, tried by a military commission, and sentenced to the punishment of death, which was inflicted, Sept. 3, 1822. When Ferdinand recovered his authority in 1823, the proceedings were reversed, and a pension was granted to his widow and family.

ELIOT, JOHN, an English divine, styled the apostle to the Indians, was born in 1604; went to New England in 1631; and there learned the Indian language, that he might devote himself to the conversion of the natives. In this he met with great success, and obtained a considerable influence over the various tribes. He translated the Bible into their language, and wrote several pieces of practical divinity. Died, 1689.

ELIOT, THOMAS, an English writer in the reign of Henry VIII. He was a native of Suffolk, but resided chiefly at Cambridge. He compiled a Latin and English dictionary, and died in 1546.

ELIOTT, or ELLIOT, GEORGE AUGUSTUS, lord Heathfield, was the son of Sir Gilbert Elliott, of Stobs, Roxburghshire, and born about 1718. After receiving his education at Leyden he in 1735 attached himself to the engineer corps; from which he removed, and obtained an adjutancy in the 2nd troop of horse grenadiers, with which he went to Germany, and was wounded at the battle of Dettingen. In 1759 he was appointed to raise the 1st regiment of light horse, with which he served on the Continent with great reputation; and on his recall from Germany he was sent to the Havannah, in the reduction of which he had an eminent share. In 1775, General Elliott was appointed commander-in-chief in Ireland; from whence he returned soon after, and was made governor of Gibraltar, which fortress he defended with consummate talent and persevering fortitude. He was very abstemious, his constant food being vegetables, and his drink water. He never allowed himself but four hours sleep at a time; and was so accustomed to hardness that it was become habitual. On his return to England he was raised to the peerage by the title of lord Heathfield, baron Gibraltar; and died in 1790.

ELISSE (Père), a name once of great diplomatic influence; born in 1769, died in 1817. He was surgeon to Louis XVIII., while at Hartwell, and returned to France in 1814, in his train, on the restoration. He has been accused, in conjunction with Blacas, of having contributed to the return of Napoleon from Elba, by the re-action which their ultra-royal zeal provoked.

ELIZABETH, queen of England, was the daughter of Henry VIII. by Anne Boleyn, and born in 1533. She was educated in the Protestant religion; and in the reign of Mary, in consequence of her known attachment to it, she was sent to the Tower, from whence she was afterwards removed to Woodstock. On the death of her sister in 1558, she was proclaimed queen, amid the acclamations of assembled multitudes, and to the great joy of the nation. Philip of Spain made her an offer of marriage, which she declined. The French and Spaniards having formed a league for the extirpation of heresy, Elizabeth was induced to protect the Protestants; and this she did so effectually as to separate the United Provinces from the Spanish throne. The king of Spain, in return, sent a body of troops to invade Ireland, but they were all cut off by Lord Grey, the deputy. In the mean time various offers of marriage were made to the queen, the most remarkable of which was that of the Duke of Anjou, who came to England for the purpose, but after staying some time, the affair was broken off. In 1588, Philip sent against England his famous Armada, to which the pope gave the appellation of Invincible. On this occasion the queen distinguished herself by her great presence of mind and inflexible courage. She rode on horseback in the camp of Tilbury, and inspired her people with heroism by her deportment and her speeches. The English fleet, however, assisted by the winds, prevented the Spaniards from landing, and their boasted armada was destroyed. Elizabeth combined prudence with fortitude, and judgment with vigour; but she was violent, haughty, and insatiably fond of admiration. During her reign the nation was raised to a high degree of prosperity, and its foreign enemies were effectually humbled; but her deceptive and cruel conduct in the affair of Mary, queen of Scots, has left an indelible stain on her memory. She had strong natural talent, was well versed in Greek and Latin, and gave repeated proofs of her skill in the art of governing a brave and free people. Died, 1602.

ELIZABETH PETROWNA, daughter of Peter the Great, was born in 1709. In 1741 she usurped the imperial throne, by dethroning the infant Ivan, which revolution was effected without the shedding of blood. At her accession she made a vow that no capital punishments should take place in her reign. But her humanity was equivocal, as is instanced in the shocking punishment which she inflicted upon the Countess Bestuchef and Lapookin, who were publicly knouted, and had their tongues cut out, for betraying some secrets relating to the amours of the empress. She died in 1761.

ELIZABETH, PHILIPPINE MARIE HELENE, sister of Louis XVI. was born at Versailles, in 1764, and perished by the guillotine, in 1794. When Louis fled from Paris, she accompanied him, and was brought back with him from Varennes. With the royal family she was carried into the Temple, but removed from it, May 9th, 1794, to the Conciergerie, because it had been discovered that she corresponded with the princes, her brothers. The next morning, when carried before the revolutionary tribunal, and asked her name and rank, she replied with dignity, "I am Elizabeth of France, and the aunt of your king." Though she was compelled to submit to the horrible necessity of witnessing the execution of 24 victims who were sentenced with her, she met her fate with heroic calmness, and breathed not a word against her merciless judges.

ELLENBOROUGH, EDWARD LAW, lord chief justice of the king's bench, and a distinguished lawyer, was the son of the Bishop of Carlisle, and born in 1748 at Great Salkfield, Cumberland. On the trial of Warren Hastings, in 1785, Erskine having refused to undertake the defence, he served as leading counsel, and obtained the victory. In 1801 he was made attorney-general, and next year, on the death of Lord Kenyon, became lord chief justice of the king's bench, and was created a peer. During a period of great difficulty, Lord Ellenborough filled the arduous office with great acuteness, and profound legal knowledge. It is said, that the result of the trials of Hone, who was prosecuted for impious parodies and libels (the jury having found verdicts contrary to his lordship's charges), had a great effect on his declining state of health; and though he continued to appear in court, and performed his functions with his usual energy of mind, his frame was fast sinking. Died, 1818.

ELLEY, Lieutenant-general Sir JOHN, a distinguished English officer, whose services are the more worthy of record, because, by his own sheer merit, he rose to almost the highest military rank, and to a host of other honours, from the very humble situation of a private in the royal horse guards blue. After passing through the inferior grades, and serving with great credit as a quartermaster, he, in 1791, obtained a cornetcy in the Blues. He served in the campaigns of the Low Countries in 1793 and two following years, and was present at nearly every action, including the siege of Valenciennes. By the year 1806 he had fought his way up to a lieutenant-colonelcy; in 1803 and 1809 he served as assistant adjutant-general to the cavalry in Spain, and was present at all the sanguinary affairs in that country and Portugal throughout the remainder of the Peninsular war. He subsequently served in the Netherlands, and was at the final shock of battle, "Waterloo," where he was serviceable not merely as an officer, but even as an individual trooper; for we read in Sir Walter Scott's "Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk," that several of Napoleon's cuirassiers were found cleft to the very chine by Elley's stalwart arm. In addition to his high military rank, Sir John was K. C. B., K. C. H., and governor of Galway. Died, 1839.

ELLIOTT, EBENEZER, "The Corn-Law Rhymer," was born at Masborough near Rotherham in 1781, where his father was a commercial clerk in the iron works. His early years were not marked by any of the shrewdness or ability for which he was afterwards distinguished; but his love of nature was intense, and his first publication, "The Vernal Walk," written in his 17th year, showed to what extent the scenery of his native country had impressed itself on his mind. From this period his poetic effusions were unceasing. Poem after poem succeeded each other without interruption; he contributed to the New Monthly Magazine, Tait's Magazine, and many other periodicals; and in originality, power, and beauty, his writings may vie with those of any contemporary writer. The great object of his political life was the abolition of the corn laws; and it is not too much to say that the "Corn-Law Rhymes" were as instrumental, especially in the manufacturing districts, in fanning the excitement which ultimately led to the abolition of the corn laws, as the eloquence of any member of the Anti-Corn-Law-League. But while Ebenezer Elliott courted the muses, he did not neglect the more practical business of life; and though at first unsuccessful in the iron trade, his energy and perseverance were ultimately crowned with great success. The last edition of his poems appeared in one volume in 1840. Died, 1849. Some posthumous poems have also been published, besides a not very felicitous account of his life.

ELLIS, GEORGE, a miscellaneous writer of considerable talent, was born in London in 1745, and died in 1815. He commenced his literary career as the author of various political satires and essays; and he subsequently produced "Specimens of early English Poets," "Specimens of early English Metrical Romances," &c.

ELLIS, JOHN, an English poet, was born in London in 1698, and brought up a scrivener. Mr. Ellis was the intimate friend of Dr. Johnson, and wrote several pieces in Dodsley's Collection. Died, 1791.

ELLIS, JOHN, a naturalist, was born in London in 1710, and died in 1776. His principal works are "An Essay towards a Natural History of British Corallines," and "A Natural History of uncommon Zoophytes."

ELLIS, WILLIAM, a practical agriculturist of the 18th century, who lived at Great Gaddesden, Herts, and enjoyed considerable reputation both as an inventor of farming implements, and as the author of "The Modern Husbandman," in 8 vols.

ELLISTON, ROBERT WILLIAM, an eminent comedian, was born in London in 1774. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and intended for the church; but at the age of 16 he quitted school, without the knowledge of his friends, went to Bath, and there first gratified his ambition for scenic celebrity. With the Bath company he remained one season; he then joined that of York, under Tate Wilkinson, but returned to his former quarters in 1793, where for about four years he continued to play a variety of characters in tragedy, comedy, opera, or pantomime; for such was his versatility and tact, that he appeared advantageously in all. His first bow to a London audience was made at the Haymarket Theatre, June the 24th, 1796; but though engaged occasionally for Covent Garden, it was not till 1804 that he became fixed at either of the winter houses. This occurred on Kemble's retirement from Drury Lane; and till the destruction, by fire, of that edifice in 1809, he continued to be one of its most active and efficient supporters. He then took the Circus, and having given it the name of the Surrey Theatre, he commenced performing the plays of Shakspeare, &c. under new titles, and with such ingenious alterations as brought them within the licence granted to the minor theatres. His speculation, however, turned out by no means successful; he relinquished it, and returned to Drury Lane, where for several years he maintained his ground as a decided public favourite; but becoming the lessee of that theatre in 1819, at an annual rent of 10,200*l.*, it ended in his bankruptcy in 1823. After this he was concerned in the Olympic Theatre; and, lastly, he a second time undertook the superintendance of the Surrey, which appeared to be in a prosperous state at the time of his death, which took place in 1831. No man who ever trod the stage was more at home on it; and while he excelled in a varied range of first-rate characters belonging to genteel comedy, he was more than merely respectable in tragedy; but comedy was decidedly his forte, and nature had given him a large share of those main requisites for it—buoyant spirits, mirthful hilarity, dry humour, and fervid gallantry.

ELLWOOD, THOMAS, was born at Crowell in Oxfordshire, in 1639. He was bred in the tenets of the Church of England, but was induced to join the Quakers, through which he lost the favour of his father. He became reader to Milton, which tended greatly to his improvement in learning. Ellwood suffered imprisonment for his profession, and wrote a number of books in its defence. He also edited George Fox's Journal, and published a History of the Old and New Testaments; a sacred poem on the life of David, &c. Died, 1713.

ELMSLEY, PETER, D.D., an eminent philologist and classical scholar, was born in 1773, and received his education at Westminster and Oxford. In pursuit of his philological studies he visited the principal libraries on the Continent; and in 1819, in conjunction with Sir Humphry Davy, he accepted a commission from government for the development of the Herculean papyri, but their labours proved abortive. On his return he settled at Oxford, where he obtained the Camden professorship of ancient history, and was elected principal of St. Alban's Hall. He produced editions of various classics, and contributed to the early numbers of the Edinburgh Review, and at a subsequent period to the Quarterly. Died, 1825.

ELPHINSTON, ARTHUR, Lord BALMERINO, was born in 1688. He had the command of a company of foot in Lord Shannon's regiment in the reign of queen Anne; but at the accession of George I. resigned that commission, and joined the Earl of Mar, under whom he served at the battle of Sheriffmuir. After that engagement, James's affairs being in a desperate situation, Elphinston found means to escape out of Scotland, and to enter into the French service, in which he continued till the death of his brother Alexander in 1733, when he returned home. When the Chevalier de St. George arrived in Scotland in 1744, Elphinston was one of the first that repaired to his standard, and was appointed colonel and captain of the second troop of life-guards. At the decisive battle of Culloden, Lord Balmerino (for he had succeeded to the title a few weeks preceding) was taken prisoner by the Duke of Cumberland's army. Being conducted to London, he was committed to the Tower, and brought to trial in Westminster Hall, 29th July, 1746, along with the Earls of Kilmarnock and Cromarty, both of whom pleaded guilty. The Earl of Cromarty obtained a pardon, but the other two suffered decapitation on Tower Hill, 18th August, 1746.

ELPHINSTON, JAMES, a native of Edinburgh, whose attempts to effect an imaginary reformation in the orthography of the English language, by spelling all words as they are pronounced, occupied a great part of his life, and ended, as he ought to have foreseen, in complete disappointment. In this vain pursuit he published various works, among which we may mention "English Orthography epitomised," and "Prophety's Pocket Picture." Born, 1721; died, 1809.

ELPHINSTONE, GEORGE KEITH, Viscount KEITH, born in 1747, was a distinguished naval officer. He entered the service early in life, and arrived at the rank of post-captain in 1775. During the American war he served with great credit at the attack on Mud Island, at Charlestown, &c.; he also captured L'Aigle of 40 guns and 600 men; and when the war broke out with France he was among the first who so nobly sustained the credit of the British navy. In 1793 he assisted at the reduction of Toulon; and in 1795 he commanded the fleet destined for the capture of the Cape of Good Hope, in which he not only succeeded, but compelled the Dutch, who advanced to the relief of the colony, to surrender at discretion. His services on numerous other occasions were highly valuable; and at length, after his exertions in the Foudroyant on the coast of Egypt, he was elevated to the peerage. Died, 1825.

ELPHINSTONE, Major-general GEORGE WILLIAM KEITH, C.B., was born, 1782. Early in life this distinguished, but eventually unfortunate, officer entered the service as ensign in the 24th infantry. After serving with much distinction in various parts of the globe, he was made lieutenant-colonel of the 33rd foot in 1813; and being present with that regiment at Waterloo, his services were rewarded with the distinction of C.B. He was made major-general in 1837, and was commander-in-chief of the Bengal army, when our arms received so awful and disgraceful a check in Afghanistan. He was at this period enfeebled by long service and by the climate of India, and was, moreover, almost helpless from the effects of gout, yet he was assailed by calumny, and was to have been tried by court-martial, had not death occurred while proceedings were pending, and thus proved, alas! too fatally, at once the reality of the suffering that he had endured, and the malice of his slanderers. Died, April 23, 1842, aged 60.

ELRINGTON, Dr. THOMAS, bishop of Leighlin and Ferns. In 1781 he was elected a fellow of Dublin University, and in 1794 became the first Donnellan lecturer. In 1811 he was appointed provost of Trinity College; and in 1820 was consecrated bishop of Limerick; from which he was translated, in 1822, to the see of Leighlin and Ferns. He distinguished himself by various polemical writings, and produced excellent editions of Euclid and Juvenal, which of themselves are sufficient to hand down his name as a scholar of first-rate merit. Died at Liverpool, July, 1835.

ELSTOB, WILLIAM, a learned divine, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1673, and died in 1714. He was profoundly skilled in the Saxon language and antiquities, and published a Latin translation of the Saxon Homily of Lupus; and the Homily on St. Gregory's Day, in Saxon and Latin. He also wrote "An Essay on the Affinity and Agreement between the Two Professions of Law and Divinity," &c.

ELSTOB, ELIZABETH, sister of the preceding, was born at Newcastle, in 1683. She resided with her brother at Oxford, and became the partner of his studies. She accompanied his Homily on St. Gregory with an English version and a preface, and published a Saxon grammar. After her brother's death, queen Caroline allowed her a small pension, which she lost on the death of her benefactress; but was saved from want by the kindness of the Duchess-dowager of Portland. Died, 1756.

ELSYNGE, HENRY, born at Battersea, Surrey, in 1598; held the place of clerk of the House of Commons, which he resigned in 1648; and died in 1654. He wrote an excellent book, entitled "The Ancient Method and Manner of holding Parliaments in England."

ELVIUS, PETER, a Swedish mathematician, and secretary of the royal academy of sciences at Stockholm, was born at Upsal, in 1710; and died in 1749.

ELWES, JOHN, an extraordinary miser. His family name was Meggot, which he altered in pursuance of the will of Sir Harvey Elwes, his uncle, who left him at least 250,000*l.*, and he was possessed of nearly as much of his own. At this time he attended the most noted gaming houses, and after sitting up a whole night at play for thousands, he would proceed to Smithfield to meet his cattle, where he would stand disputing with a cattle-butcher for a shilling. He would sit in wet clothes to save the expense of a fire; eat his provisions in the last stage of putrefaction; and, in short, subject himself to any privation, or be guilty of any beggarly conduct, by which a sixpence might be saved; yet, if by his personal exertions he could assist another, provided it cost him nothing but his labour, he was active and ready. In 1774 he was chosen member for Berkshire, and his conduct in parliament was perfectly independent. He died in 1789, aged about 77, leaving a fortune of 500,000*l.*, besides entailed estates.

ELZEVIUS. The name of a celebrated family of printers, residing at Amsterdam and Leyden, whose beautiful editions were chiefly published between the years 1594 and 1680.—LOUIS, the first of them, began to be known at Leyden in 1595, and was the first who made the distinction between the v consonant and the u vowel. He took for his device an eagle holding seven arrows, with the motto, "Concordia res parvæ crescunt." This he afterwards exchanged for that of a man standing, with the motto "Non solus;" and this was adopted by his successors. Their names were JOHN, DANIEL, MATTHEW, ISAAC, BUONAVENTURA, and ABRAHAM. The two latter prepared the smaller editions of the classics, in 12mo. and 16mo., which are still valued for their beauty and correctness. Although the Elzevirs were surpassed in learning, and in Greek and Hebrew editions, by the Stephenses of Paris, they were unequalled in their choice of works, and in the elegance of their typography.

EMANUEL, king of Portugal, succeeded John II. in 1495. He restored the nobility to their privileges, and greatly encouraged maritime adventures, by which means a new passage to India was discovered by Gama, and to Brazil in 1501, by Cabral. Emanuel also sent an expedition to Africa, and established a commercial intercourse with the kingdom of Congo. He died in 1521.

EMERY, JOHN, an actor of very considerable merit (particularly in rustic characters, where his perfect knowledge of the Yorkshire dialect rendered him so effective), was born at Sunderland, in 1777. For many years he drew from a London audience the most unequivocal proofs of their delight; and he will long be remembered for the power he evinced when portraying the rough nature and genuine simplicity of unsophisticated country life. Died, 1822.

EMILIANUS, MARCUS JULIUS, proclaimed emperor by the army in 253, was a native of Mauritania, who had risen by his courage to be governor of Mæsia. Like Gallus, whom he succeeded on the throne, he too was murdered by those who advanced him to it, after a reign of only four months.

EMLYN, THOMAS, a Protestant dissenting minister, memorable for the persecution he sustained in consequence of his religious sentiments with regard to the Trinity, was born at Stamford, Lincolnshire, in 1663, and studied at the university of Cambridge. In 1691 he settled at Dublin, as assistant to the Rev. Joseph Boyce, but was soon interdicted from his pastoral duties, on suspicion of Arianism. Finding himself the object of much odium and misconception, he published "A Humble Enquiry into the Scripture Account of Jesus Christ;" upon which he was arrested on the charge of blasphemy, tried, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of 1000*l.* The fine was afterwards reduced to 70*l.*, through the interposition of the Duke of Ormond and other humane persons; and after a little more than a year's confinement he was set at liberty. His character was amiable, and he was on terms of intimacy with Dr. Clarke, Whiston, and other eminent men. Died, 1743.

EMMETT, ROBERT, the son of a physician at Cork, was educated for the legal profession; but, on the breaking out of the Irish rebellion, he was drawn into its vortex, became secretary to the secret directory of United Irishmen, and in 1803 suffered the death of a traitor. His youthful ardour, eloquence, and intrepidity have been greatly extolled.

EMMETT, THOMAS ADDIS, elder brother of the preceding, was also bred to the profession of the law, but becoming involved in the Irish rebellion, he fled his country, and settled in the United States of America, where he practised as an advocate. He died at New York, in 1827.

EMPEDOCLES, a Greek philosopher, whose doctrines were nearly allied to those of Pythagoras, was born about B. C. 460, at Agrigentum, in Sicily. The sovereignty was offered him by his fellow citizens; but being a friend to pure democracy he refused it, and established a popular government. He was skilled in philosophy, poetry, and medicine. The time and manner of his death are uncertain; the story of his having thrown himself into the crater of Mount Etna being, in all probability, a fiction.

ENFIELD, DR. WILLIAM, a dissenting minister, and a writer of much judgment, was born at Sudbury, in 1741; and after filling the situation of resident tutor and lecturer on the belles lettres at Warrington Academy till the dissolution of that establishment, he died in 1797. He was one of the principal contributors to Dr. Aikin's Biographical Dictionary; and is known as the author or compiler of several useful works, viz. "The Speaker," "Exercises on Elocution," "Natural Philosophy," &c.

ENGEL, JOHN JAMES, a German writer, whose philosophical works are held in high esteem, was born in the territory of Mecklenburgh, in 1741; and, after studying at several German universities, he accepted the office of professor of morals and literature at Berlin, where he was made a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences, and wrote the greatest parts of his works. He died in 1802.

ENGELBRECHT, JOHN, a religious fanatic, was born at Brunswick, in 1599. He travelled for several years through Germany, fasting at times for a fortnight together, and not unfrequently falling into trances, during which he pretended to receive divine revelations and missions for proselytising mankind. Died, 1642.

ENGHIEN, LOUIS ANTOINE HENRI DE BOURBON, Duke of, son of the Duke of Bourbon, and a descendant of the great Condé, was born at Chantilly, in 1772. Having served with credit in the armies opposed to the French republic, he went to Baden, in 1804, married, and lived there as a private citizen. He was, however, regarded with a jealous eye, as one who might become a dangerous foe to the ambitious designs of the first consul; and an order to arrest him was accordingly issued. The situation of his house having been ascertained, it was surrounded on the night of March 17, 1804, with a body of soldiers and gendarmes. The duke at first wished to defend himself, but the force was too great to be opposed; and thus, with several friends and domestics, he was seized and carried prisoner to Strasburg. Early upon the 18th, the escort set off with the duke for Paris; but upon arriving at the gates of the capital, they received an order to conduct their prisoner to Vincennes, where he arrived exhausted by hunger and fatigue, and, just as he had dropped asleep, he was awakened, at 11 o'clock at night, to undergo his trial. The troops, which were marched to Vincennes on this occasion, were commanded by Savary, who formed a court-martial, consisting of General Huilln, the president, together with five colonels, and a captain. He was accused of having taken part in conspiracies against the life of the first consul; and though nothing was proved against him, he received sentence of death, and was led into the fosse of the castle, where he heroically and firmly submitted to it. This atrocious assassination, without even the plea of state necessity to justify it, has notwithstanding found its defenders in some of those who, with the sacred name of freedom on their lips, have done servile homage to the memory of the arch assassin.

ENGLEFIELD, Sir HENRY CHARLES, a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, to whose "Transactions" he contributed largely, was born in 1752. He was the author of a work "On the Determination of the Orbits of Comets," "A Description of the Picturesque Beauties and Geological Phenomena of the Isle of Wight," &c. Died, 1822.

ENNIUS, QUINTUS, a celebrated Latin poet of the earlier times of the republic, was born at Calabria, B.C. 239. Cato the Censor became acquainted with him in Sardinia, was his pupil, and brought him to Rome, where he soon gained the friendship of the most distinguished individuals, and instructed young men of rank in Greek. Of all his writings, nothing is extant but a few fragments. Died B.C. 269.

ENTICK, JOHN, an English divine, died in 1780. He published a "History of the War which ended in 1763," 5 vols. 8vo.; a "History of London," 4 vols. 8vo.; a well known and approved "Latin and English Dictionary," &c.

ENTINOPUS, an eminent architect of Candia in the 4th century, who may properly be styled the founder of Venice. Having fled from the ravages of the Goths to the morasses on the Adriatic coast, he built the first house there for himself, and afterwards assisted the inhabitants of Padua, who also took refuge there, in building the 80 houses which formed the first city. Died about 420.

EPAMINONDAS, a Theban general, illustrious for his talents and his virtues, was the son of Polymnis. He was the friend of Pelopidas, and by him appointed to the command of the Theban armies. He defeated Cleombrotus, and gained the battle of Leuctra; overcame Alexander, tyrant of Phœria; and fell in the moment of victory at the battle of Mantinea, B.C. 363. He was brave, patriotic, and incorruptible; and to him Cicero assigns the first place among the heroes of Greece.

EPEE, CHARLES MICHAEL DE L', a French abbé, founder of the institution in Paris for the deaf and dumb, was born at Versailles in 1712, and deserves grateful remembrance for the philanthropic occupation in which the greater part of his life was spent. He entered into holy orders, and became a Catholic priest; but his great object being to impart instruction to the deaf and dumb, he spent his whole income, besides what was contributed by benevolent patrons, in the education and maintenance of his pupils, for whose wants he provided with such disinterested devotion, that he often deprived himself of the necessaries of life, restricting himself to the plainest food, and clothing himself in the coarsest apparel. De l'Epee died in 1789, and was succeeded by the Abbé Sicard, who much improved the system of cultivating the minds of that unfortunate class for whom his predecessor had so benevolently laboured.

EPICHAARMUS, of Cos, a philosopher of the Pythagorean school, lived in the latter part of the 5th century before Christ, at Syracuse, and there wrote his celebrated comedies, all of which are now lost. He also wrote upon medical and philosophical subjects, and attained the age of 97 years.

EPICTETUS, a Stoic philosopher, who lived in the 1st century, was a native of Hierapolis, in Phrygia, and was originally a slave to Epaphroditus, one of Nero's freedmen. Having been emancipated, he gave himself up wholly to the study of philosophy, and his life afforded an example of unblemished virtue. When Domitian banished the philosophers from Rome, Epictetus settled at Nicopolis, but returned on the death of that tyrant, and was in great esteem with Adrian and Marcus Aurelius. He resided in a humble cottage, where he wrote his admirable "Enchiridion;" and such was the esteem in which he was held, that the earthen lamp which gave him light sold, at his death, for 3000 drachmas, being upwards of 90*l.* of our money.

EPICURUS, the founder of the Epicurean sect of philosophers, was born at Gargettus, B. C. 342, and studied at Athens. For a time he resided successively at Colophon, Mitylene, and Lampsacus, but finally settled at Athens, where he purchased a garden, and there expounded his system of philosophy. His doctrines became popular; and though the pursuit of pleasure was the chief aim, yet he taught nothing that administered to sensual gratification, or that was inconsistent with virtue. In short, he recommended moderation, temperance, firmness of soul, and the contempt of life. He died B. C. 271.

EPIMENIDES, a celebrated philosopher and poet of Crete, who flourished during the 6th century before Christ. He is represented as favoured with divine communications, and as an infallible prophet.

EPINAY, LOUISE, Madame d', a female of considerable talents, and notorious for her connection with Rousseau, was the wife of M. Delalive de Bellegarde, who filled the office of farmer-general. During the earlier part of her life, she formed an acquaintance with the philosopher of Geneva, to whom she gave a cottage in her park of Chevrette (afterwards the well-known hermitage), where he passed many of his days, which were rendered happy by this romantic attachment, until he became jealous of Baron Grimm, whom he had himself introduced to his mistress. She was the author of "Les Conversations d'Emilie," "Lettres à mon Fils," and "Mes Moments heureux." Died, 1783.

EPIPHANIUS, a father of the church, who displayed great zeal against the writings of Origen. He was chosen bishop of Salamis, and died in 403.

EPIPHANIUS, an heresiarch, who allowed his followers a community of wives; and after his death he was worshipped by them as a deity.

EPISCOPIUS, SIMON, a learned divine, born at Amsterdam, in 1583. In 1612 he was chosen divinity professor at Leyden; was the principal of the remonstrants, or Arminians, at the synod of Dort, which arbitrary assembly deposed him and the other deputies from their ministerial functions, and banished them the republic. He then went to Antwerp, but in 1623 he returned to Holland, and became minister to the remonstrants at Rotterdam, where he died, in 1643.

EPONINA, a Roman female, whose strength of conjugal affection is worthy of record, was the wife of Julius Sabinus, who, after being defeated in his revolt against Vespasian, took shelter in a subterranean cave, where during nine years he and Eponina lived concealed. Their retreat being at length discovered, and Sabinus being condemned to suffer death, the faithful wife having vainly implored the emperor's clemency for her husband, heroically refused to survive his loss, and died a willing martyr to her constancy. A. D. 78.

ERASISTRATUS, an ancient physician, who acquired great reputation at the court of Seleucus Nicanor, king of Syria, was one of the first who dissected human bodies, and accurately described the brain. He was decidedly averse to the practice of blood-letting; and is said to have put an end to his own existence, at an extreme old age, rather than endure the pain of an ulcer in his foot.

ERASMUS, DESIDERIUS, one of the most eminent scholars of the age in which he lived, was born at Rotterdam, in 1467. He was the illegitimate son of one Gerard, by the daughter of a physician; but his father and mother dying when he was only nine years old, he was left to the care of three guardians, who determined on bringing him up to a religious life that they might enjoy his patrimony; for which purpose they removed him from one convent to another, till at last, in 1486, he took the habit among the canons-regular at Stein, near Tergou. The monastic life being disagreeable to him, he accepted an invitation from the Archbishop of Cambray to reside with him. During his abode with this prelate he was ordained priest; but in 1496 he went to Paris, and supported himself by giving private lectures. In 1497 he visited England, and met with a liberal reception from the most eminent scholars. On his return he spent 12 years in France, Italy, and the Netherlands; and during that time he published several works of great merit. In 1506 he took his doctor's degree at Turin, and went to Bologna, where he continued some time; thence he removed to Venice, and resided with the famous Aldus Manutius. From Venice he went to Padua and Rome, where many offers were made him to settle; but having received an invitation from Henry VIII. he came to England again in 1510; wrote his "Praise and Folly," while residing with Sir Thomas More; and was appointed Margaret professor of divinity, and Greek lecturer, at Cambridge. In 1514 he once more returned to the Continent, and lived chiefly at Basle, where he vigorously continued his literary labours, and prepared his edition of the New Testament, with a Latin translation; his "Ciceronianus," and his celebrated "Colloquies," which latter gave such offence to the monks, that they used to say, "Erasmus laid the egg which Luther hatched." With Luther, however, whom he had provoked by his treatise on Free Will, he was in open hostility. In 1523 appeared his learned work, "De recta Latini Græcique Sermonis Pronunciatione," and his last publication, which was printed the year before his death, was entitled

"Ecclesiastes, or the Manner of Preaching." He died at Basle, in 1536.

ERATOSTHENES, a native of Cyrene, in Africa, B.C. 275, was librarian at Alexandria, and improved the science of mathematical geography, which he corrected, enlarged, and reduced to system. He was also a philosopher, poet, and grammarian; while he rendered much service to the sciences of astronomy and geography, by first observing the obliquity of the ecliptics, and by discovering the method of measuring the circumference of the globe.

ERCLLA Y ZUNIGA, a Spanish poet and soldier, was born in the province of Biscay, about 1530. He was brought up at the court of Charles V., and joined an expedition which was sent out to Chili against a tribe of natives called the Araucanians. Hence came his admirable epic of "La Araucana," which describes the perils and exploits of that fierce and dangerous contest: this he wrote on scraps of paper, and on bits of leather when paper could not be had, during those brief intervals which could be snatched from active duty.

EREMITA, DANIEL, a writer of the 17th century, was a native of Antwerp, and became secretary to the Duke of Florence. He was very unsettled in his religious opinions, being successively a protestant, catholic, deist, and at his death an avowed atheist. He wrote several works, the principal one being entitled "De Aulicâ Vitâ ac Civili." Died, 1613.

ERIC IX., king of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, succeeded Margaret in 1412. He married the daughter of Henry IV. of England. He made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, but was taken prisoner in Syria, and paid a large ransom for his liberty. Soon after his return the Swedes revolted, and were followed by the Danes, on which he withdrew to the Isle of Gothland. In 1439 he was formally deposed. He afterwards settled in Pomerania, where he died in 1459. He compiled a "History of Denmark to the year 1288."

ERIC XIV., son and successor of Gustavus I., king of Sweden. He courted the princess Elizabeth, afterwards queen of England, but being refused, he married the daughter of a peasant. This alienated from him the hearts of his subjects, and, together with his cruelties, occasioned a revolt. Eric was compelled to renounce his throne in 1568. He died in prison, in 1578.

ERICEIRA, FERDINAND DE MENEZES, Count, a Portuguese historian, was born at Lisbon, in 1614. He devoted himself to military service, and distinguished himself as an able general at Tangier. He wrote "The History of Tangier," "History of Portugal," &c.

ERICEIRA, FRANCIS XAVIER MENEZES, Count, great-grandson of the above, was born at Lisbon, in 1763; and died in 1713. He wrote on "Academical Studies," "Parallels of illustrious Men and Women," &c.

ERIGENA, JOHN SCOTUS, a learned man of the 9th century, was born in Scotland, though some make him a native of England, and others of Ireland. He is said to have travelled to Athens, where he acquired the Greek and Oriental languages. He resided many years at the court of Charles the Bald, king of France, with whom he lived on terms of the greatest familiarity. At the request of his patron he translated the works of Dionysius into Latin, which drew upon him the resentment of the pope, to avoid whose fury he went to England, where he was courteously received by Alfred the Great, who placed him at the head of his newly-founded college at Oxford; but after a residence there of about three years, he retired to the abbey of Malmesbury. His greatest work was the "Division of Nature, or the Nature of Things," printed at Oxford in 1681.

ERNESTI, JOHN AUGUSTUS, an eminent German critic, and professor of theology at Leipsic, was born in 1707. He published several valuable editions of Xenophon, Cicero, Suetonius, Tacitus, Homer, and Callimachus, accompanied with learned notes; and a "Theological Library," in 10 vols. Died, 1781.

ERNESTI, AUGUSTUS WILLIAM, a nephew of the preceding, was also a distinguished classical scholar, and published several learned works. Born, 1753; died, 1801.

ERSCH, JOHN SAMUEL, a German bibliographer, born in 1766, was principal librarian, and professor of geography and statistics, at the university of Halle. He wrote a "Manual of German Literature;" a "Dictionary of French Writers, from 1771 to 1805;" was joint editor with Professor Gruber of the "Universal Encyclopædia," published at Leipsic; and editor of the "Jena Literary Gazette." Died, 1828.

ERSKINE, Rev. EBENEZER, the founder of the secession church in Scotland, was born at Dryburgh, in Berwickshire, 1680. Having passed through the usual literary and theological curriculum at Edinburgh University, he was ordained minister of Portmoak, in Kinrosshire, in 1703, and soon began to take a prominent part in the religious contests of the period. In 1731 he accepted of a call to Stirling; and circumstances soon afterwards having occurred to augment the hostility he had always shown to the law of patronage, he declared the church judicatories to be illegal and unchristian, and, after some delay and discussions, was "deposed from the office of the holy ministry" in 1740. But he was soon joined by his brother Ralph, minister of Dunfermline, and other ministers; and having constituted themselves into a presbytery, they founded the Secession church of Scotland, which has since shot up into a goodly tree, and borne ample fruit. Died, 1754.

ERSKINE, Dr. JOHN, son of an eminent Scotch lawyer of the same name, was born at Cardross, in 1721, and destined for the bar; but his inclination leading him to the study of theology, he was, in 1742, licensed to preach by the presbytery of Dumblane; and in July, 1759, he and Dr. Robertson were admitted collegiate ministers of the Old Grey-Friars church there. His "Theological Dissertations" appeared in 1765; but his "Sketches and Hints of Church History and Theological Controversy" were not published till many years after. These, with a volume of sermons, are his principal works. Died, 1803.

ERSKINE, THOMAS, Lord, third son of David Henry Erskine, earl of Buchan, was born in 1750. He received his education at Edinburgh High School and St. Andrew's University; but the contracted means of his family rendering a profession necessary, he went to sea as a midshipman; but he quitted the service after four years, and entered into the royals, or 1st regiment of foot, with whom he embarked for Minorca in 1770. His friends, however, and particularly his mother, who properly appreciated his great talents, advised him to lay aside all thoughts of a military life, and embrace the legal profession. Accordingly, at the age of 26, he entered at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1777, merely to obtain a degree, to which he was entitled as the son of a nobleman; and, at the same time, became a student of Lincoln's Inn. He also placed himself as a pupil in the office of Mr (afterwards judge) Buller, then an eminent special pleader, and subsequently in that of Mr. (afterwards baron) Wood. He was called to the bar in 1778, and obtained immediate success. In May, 1783, he received a silk gown, and, the same year, was elected member of Parliament for Portsmouth, and unanimously rechosen for the same borough on every succeeding election, until raised to the peerage. In 1792, being employed to defend Thomas Paine, when prosecuted for the second part of his Rights of Man, he declared that, waiving all personal convictions, he deemed it right, as an English advocate, to obey the call: by the maintenance of which principle, he lost his office of attorney-general to the Prince of Wales. The most arduous effort, however, in his professional life, arose out of the part cast upon him, in conjunction with Mr. (afterwards Sir Vicary) Gibbs, in the trials of Hardy, Tooke, and others, for high treason, in 1794. These trials lasted for several weeks, and the ability displayed by Mr. Erskine on this eventful occasion was admired and acknowledged by all parties. He was a strenuous opposer of the war with France; and wrote a pamphlet, entitled "A View of the Causes and Consequences of the War with France;" when such was the attraction of his name, that it ran through the unprecedented number of 48 editions. In 1802, the Prince of Wales not only restored him to his office of attorney-general, but made him keeper of his seals for the duchy of Cornwall. On the death of Mr. Pitt, in 1806, when Lord Grenville received the commands of George III. to form a new administration, Mr. Erskine was created a peer, and raised to the dignity of lord high chancellor of Great Britain; but the dissolution of the administration of which he formed a part happening during the following year, he retired with the usual pension. During the latter years of his life Lord Erskine laboured under considerable pecuniary difficulties; while numerous follies and eccentricities (to use no harsher epithets) obscured the brilliancy of his former fame. He was the author of a political romance, in 2 vols., entitled "Ariata," and some pamphlets on the Greek cause. But it was at the bar that he shone with peculiar lustre. There the resources of his mind were made apparent by instantaneous bursts of eloquence, combining logic, rhetorical skill, and legal precision; while he triumphed over the passions and prejudices of his hearers, and moulded them to his will. He died in 1823.

ERXLEBEN, JOHN CHRISTIAN POLY-CARP, a German naturalist, born at Quedlinburg, in 1744. He studied physic at Gottingen, and gave lectures there on the veterinary art and natural history. His "Principles of Natural History" is particularly valuable. He died in 1777.

ESCOBAR Y MENDOZA, ANTHONY, a celebrated Spanish Jesuit, born at Valladolid, in 1589, and died in 1669. He was a popular preacher and a voluminous author. His most noted works are his "Moral Theology," and his "Cases of Conscience."

ESCOQUIZ, DON JUAN, a Spanish diplomatist and author, born in 1762. He was the confidential friend of Ferdinand VII., whom he defended zealously against the machinations of the Prince of Peace, and of Napoleon on Bayonne; yet for having advised the king to accept, at least in part, the constitution of the Cortes, he was banished on his restoration, and died in exile, in 1820. Among his works are the "Conquest of Mexico" and translations from Milton and Young.

ESMENARD, JOSEPH ALPHONSE, a French poet and political writer, was born, in 1770, at Pélissane, in Provence. During the revolution he was connected with many literary and political journals; accompanied General Leclerc to St. Domingo; and on his return became acquainted with Marmontel. His poem, "La Navigation," is highly descriptive; he also wrote the operas of "Trajan" and "Ferdinand Cortez." He died in 1811.

ESPAGNAC, JOHN BAPTIST, Baron d', a French general, born in 1713. He served under Marshal Saxe, and wrote a number of books on the military art, and a history of the marshal, in 3 vols. 4to.

ESPEJO, N., born about 1764; one of the earliest champions of Spanish South American liberty. He was massacred in 1814, with the garrison of Valencia, by the royalist general Boves, after capitulation.

ESPER, JOHN FREDERIC, a naturalist and astronomer, was born at Drossenfeld, in Bayreuth, in 1732. He published "A Method of determining the Orbits of Comets, and other celestial Bodies, without astronomical Instruments, or mathematical Calculations;" and was the first who examined and described the curious fossil remains in the subterranean caverns of Bayreuth. Died, 1781.

ESPREMENIL, JAMES DUVAL D', a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and deputy from the nobility to the states-general in 1789. He had from his youth entertained the project of restoring to France the states-general; and for the violence of his speeches on that subject he was seized and banished to the Isle of St. Margaret; but being recalled to Paris in 1789, he defended the monarchy against innovators with as much warmth as he had before opposed the despotism of the ministry. He was ultimately condemned by the revolutionary tribunal, and perished on the scaffold in 1793.

ESTAING, CHARLES HENRY, Count, a French commander, was born of a noble family in Auvergne; and commenced his career in the East Indies, under Lally, when he was taken prisoner by the English. In the American war he was employed as vice-admiral and general of the French armies on that station, where he took the island of Grenada. In 1787 he became a member of the assembly of notables, and commandant of the national guards at Versailles at the commencement of the revolution; but like many others who had promoted the revolution, he was accused of counter-revolutionary projects, and suffered, in 1793, by the guillotine.

ESTE, one of the most ancient and illustrious families of Italy, which owed its origin to those petty princes who governed Tuscany in the time of the Carolingians. In later times, they received from the emperors several districts and counties, to be held as fiefs of the empire, with the title of marquis. Of this family was Guelfo IV., who, having received the investiture of the duchy of Bavaria, founded the house of Brunswick.

ESTRADES, GODFREY, Count, a French general and diplomatist, born in 1607, and died in 1616. He served with distinction in the Netherlands, under Prince Maurice; concluded several important treaties; and for his various services was created a marshal of France.

ESTREES, GABRIELLE, duchess of Beaufort, mistress to Henry IV. of France, was born about 1571, and was descended from an ancient and noble family in Picardy. So passionately was she loved by Henry, that he intended to raise Gabrielle to the throne as his lawful consort; for which purpose he procured a divorce from Margaret of Valois. The design was strongly opposed by Sully, who often represented to the monarch the bad consequences of such a measure, and succeeded in rendering it abortive. Her death took place under very suspicious circumstances, in 1599. Having eaten an orange one day after dinner, she was suddenly seized with convulsions, and died during the same week in excruciating torments. She is described as possessing qualities of rare occurrence in one so situated, namely, gentleness, amiability, and a modest demeanour.

ETHELBERT, king of Kent in 560. He married Bertha, daughter of Caribert, king of France, by whose means he embraced Christianity, which he had permitted to be preached to his subjects by Augustine the monk, who made many converts, and was afterwards canonised. Ethelbert enacted a code of laws, and died in 616.

ETHELBERT, king of England, the second son of Ethelwolf, succeeded his brother Ethelbald, in 860. He was a virtuous prince, and beloved by his subjects.

ETHELRED I., king of England, son of Ethelwolf, succeeded his brother Ethelbert in 866. The Danes became so formidable in his reign, as to threaten the conquest of the whole kingdom. Assisted by his brother

Alfred, Ethelred drove them from the centre of Mercia, where they had penetrated; but the Mercians refusing to act with him, he was obliged to trust to the West Saxons alone, his hereditary subjects. After various successes, the invaders continually increasing in numbers, Ethelred died, in consequence of a wound received in an action with them, in 871.

ETHELRED II., king of England, the son of Edgar, succeeded his brother Edward the Martyr in 978, and, for his want of vigour and capacity, was surnamed the Unready. He paid a tribute to the Danes by a tax levied on his subjects, called Danegelt. To free himself from this oppression, he caused all the Danes in England to be treacherously massacred in one day. On this, Sweyn, king of Denmark, entered his kingdom, and compelled him to fly to Normandy, but Sweyn dying soon after, Ethelred returned and resumed the government. He died in 1016.

ETHELWOLF, king of England, succeeded his father, Egbert, in 838, and gave to his son, Athelstan, the sovereignty over Essex, Kent, and Sussex. In the year 851 the Danes invaded the kingdom in excessive numbers, and threatened its total subjugation; for, though vigorously opposed by Athelstan and others, they fixed their winter quarters in England, and next year burnt Canterbury and London. During these troubles, Ethelwolf, accompanied by Alfred, his youngest son, made a pilgrimage to Rome, where he remained a year, and, on his return, found Athelstan dead, and succeeded by his next son, Ethelbald, who had entered into a conspiracy with some nobles to prevent his father from again ascending the throne. To avoid a civil war, the king gave up the western division of the kingdom to his son, and soon after, summoning the states of the whole kingdom, solemnly conferred upon the clergy the tithes of all the produce of the lands. Died, 857.

ETIHEREDGE, Sir GEORGE, an English dramatist, and one of the wits of the court of Charles II., was born about 1636. After he returned from his travels, he studied at one of the inns of court, but soon relinquished legal science for the pursuit of that fashionable course of dissipation which characterised the era in which he lived. Notwithstanding this, he devoted considerable attention to light literature, and wrote songs, panegyrics, lampoons, and dramas; which, though tinged with licentiousness, possess humour, ease, and spirit. His comedies are entitled "The Comical Revenge, or Love in a Tub," "She Would if She Could," and "The Man of Mode." Having injured his constitution and fortune, he sought to marry a rich elderly widow, who made his acquirement of the honour of knighthood the condition of her acceptance. This, on the accession of James II., he attained, and was appointed envoy to Ratisbon, where he is said to have lost his life, in 1683, by falling down stairs when in a state of intoxication.

ETOILE, PETER DE L', a French writer, born in 1540, whose diary of events furnished the matter for the "Journal of Henry III.," in 5 vols. ; and the "Journal of Henry IV.," in 4 vols. Died, 1611.

ETTY, WILLIAM, R.A., a distinguished artist, was born at York, 1737. At a very early age he evinced a talent for drawing and colours ; and having served his apprenticeship as a printer, he abandoned that vocation for one in which he ultimately attained so eminent a position. On his arrival in London in 1805, he soon attracted the attention of Opie, Fuseli, and Sir Thomas Lawrence ; and the death of an uncle, who bequeathed him a considerable fortune, having enabled him to prosecute his studies as he pleased, he proceeded on a tour to Italy, the home of art, where he applied himself with zeal and perseverance to his profession, and imbibed that taste for Venetian art which he subsequently carried out in the numerous works that proceeded from his pencil. Many of his works were of colossal magnitude. A year before his death, a collection of them was made in the rooms of the Society of Arts, under his own superintendence ; and their dazzling brilliancy surpassed the expectations of even his most cordial admirers. His "Judith" and "Joan of Arc" may rank with the best compositions of modern times. Died at York, 1850.

EUBULIDES, a philosopher and dramatic writer of Miletus, was a disciple of Euclid, and preceptor to Demosthenes and Alexinus. He wrote some comedies, and a book against Aristotle. There was another of the same name, but of the cynic sect.

EUCLID, an eminent philosopher of Megara, and the disciple of Socrates, from whom he differed in the manner of teaching ; for, instead of instructing his pupils in morals, he confined their attention wholly to the subtleties of logic. He flourished about four centuries before the Christian era, and was the founder of the Megaric sect.

EUCLID, a celebrated mathematician of Alexandria, who flourished B. C. 300. He immortalised his name by his books on geometry, in which he digested all the propositions of the eminent geometers who preceded him, as Thales, Pythagoras, and others. Ptolemy became his pupil, and his school was so famous, that Alexandria continued for ages the great university for mathematicians. His "Elements" have gone through innumerable editions ; and though he wrote on music, optics, and other subjects, it is as a geometer that he will ever be remembered.

EUDOCIA, a learned female of Athens, whose original name was Athenais, was the daughter of Leontius the philosopher. In 421 she was married to the emperor Theodosius, who afterwards divorced her in a fit of jealousy. She then went to Jerusalem, where she built churches, and led a life of great devotion. She died in 460. This empress wrote several Greek poems, and paraphrases on some of the prophets.

EUGENE, FRANCIS, of Savoy, known as Prince Eugene, a distinguished military commander, and a grandson of the Duke of Savoy, was born at Paris, in 1663. He was intended for the church ; but his predilection for a military life was so strong, that on being refused a regiment in the French army, he entered the service of the emperor, as a volunteer against the Turks ; where his bravery attracting notice, he was soon appointed to the command of a regiment of dragoons. He was afterwards placed at the head of the army of Hungary ; and so highly did Louis XIV. think of his abilities, that he offered him a marshal's staff, a pension, and the government of Champagne ; but these he indignantly refused. He was the companion in arms of the great Duke of Marlborough, and participated in the victories of Blenheim, Oudenarde, &c. He likewise saved Turin, expelled the French from Italy, reduced Lisle, and, in short, raised his name to the very pinnacle of military renown by repeated demonstrations of skill and bravery. He routed the Turks at Peterwaradin, in 1716, and compelled Belgrade to surrender, after inflicting on them another ruinous defeat. After the peace in 1718 he retired to private life, and spent his time in cultivating and patronising the arts, till he was again, in 1733, called into the field as commander on the Rhine : this service, however, was unproductive of any remarkable action. He died, aged 72, in 1736 ; and, independently of his military renown, he left behind him a character in private life worthy of imitation.

EUGENIUS, an obscure man, who from being a grammarian, was proclaimed emperor in Dauphiné by Count Arbogastus, after the death of Valentinian the Younger, in 392. He crossed the Alps, and made himself master of Milan ; but in 394 he was defeated and slain by the emperor-Theodosius.

EULER, LEONARD, a celebrated mathematician, born at Basle, in 1707, and was a pupil of John Bernouilli. He was one of the literati invited to St. Petersburg by Catharine I., and for a time sustained the whole weight of the mathematical department in the new university, with great talent and industry. In 1741 he accepted an invitation from Frederick the Great, and remained at Brienne till 1766, when he returned to the Russian capital, where he died in 1783. Though he had been blind for many years before his death, he still continued his literary labours ; and in that state he produced his "Elements of Algebra" and his "Theory of the Moon." His writings, which are numerous, are able and original, both in metaphysics and philosophy ; and, in fact, he may justly be regarded as one of the greatest mathematicians of the age.

EULER, JOHN ALBERT, CHARLES, and CHRISTOPHER, three sons of the preceding, were each eminent in their respective walks of life.—The eldest, JOHN ALBERT, an able mathematician, was born at St. Petersburg, in 1734, and died there in 1800. He was a counsellor of state, and secretary of the Imperial Academy of Sciences ; and wrote many treatises on astronomy, optics, &c.—CHARLES, the second son, who was born at St. Petersburg, in 1740, was physician to the court, and a member of the Imperial Academy of Sciences. He died in 1766 ; and to him is attributed an able treatise on the motion of the planets.—CHRISTOPHER, the youngest son, was born at Berlin, in 1743 ;

besides being eminent as a mathematician, he was an excellent astronomer, and was one of the persons selected to observe the transit of Venus in 1769. He first held a commission in the Prussian artillery service, and afterwards in that of Russia; but the time and place of his death are unknown.

EUMENES, a celebrated general under Alexander the Great, after whose death he became very powerful, the government of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia being assigned to him; but he was at last conquered by Antigonus, and put to death B.C. 316. He was a man of strict probity, and of a mild and generous nature.

EUNAPIUS, a writer and physician of the 4th century, who wrote a book of the Lives of the Philosophers and Sophists, in which he speaks rancorously of Christianity. He also composed the history of the Cæsars, which is lost, but the substance of it may be seen in Zosimus.

EUPHORION, a Greek poet and historian, born at Chalcis in Eubœa, B.C. 274. Only a few fragments of his poems are extant.

EUPIRANOR, an Athenian painter and sculptor, who lived about 352 years B.C. He wrote some books on the arts which he professed, but they are lost.

EUPOLIS, a comic poet of Athens, who lived about 435 B.C. Alcibiades is said to have caused him to be cast into the sea for writing a play against him, but Ælian says that he died at Egina. Some fragments of his remain.

EURIPIDES, a Grecian tragic poet, was born in the island of Salamis, B.C. 480. He studied at Athens under Anaxagoras the philosopher, and Prodicus the rhetorician; but left that city in disgust, on account of the rivalry of Sophocles and the raillery of Aristophanes, and went to the court of Archelaus, king of Macedon. He wrote an immense number of tragedies, nineteen of which are extant. As he was walking one evening in a wood, he was attacked by the king's hounds and torn in pieces. He was then in his 75th year.

EUSDEN, LAURENCE, an English poet, was born in Yorkshire. In 1718 he obtained the laureateship, which raised him several enemies, particularly Pope, who placed him in the Dunciad. He became rector of Coningsby, in Lincolnshire, where he died in 1730. His poems are in Nichols's collection.

EUSEBIUS, PAMPHILUS, an ecclesiastical historian, was born in Palestine about 270. In the persecution by Diocletian, he assisted the suffering Christians by his exhortations, particularly his friend Pamphilus, whose name out of veneration he assumed. Eusebius was chosen bishop of Cæsarea about 313. He was at first the friend of Arius, because he considered him as persecuted, but on perceiving the dangerous extent of his opinions, he abandoned him, and assisted at the council of Nice, which he opened with an address. He was also at that of Antioch. The emperor Constantine had a particular esteem for him, and showed him several tokens of favour. He died about 338. He wrote an "Ecclesiastical History," the "Life of Constantine," and other works, the principal of which is "Evangelical Preparation."

EUSTACHIUS, BARTHOLOMEW, an eminent Italian physician of the 16th century. He settled at Rome, where he formed his anatomical tables, and made several important discoveries, among which is the passage from the throat to the internal ear, called the Eustachian tube. Boerhaave published this author's Opuscula Anatomica in 1707. He died in 1570.

EUSTATHIUS, an eminent critic and archbishop of Thessalonica, was born at Constantinople, and lived in the 12th century. He wrote commentaries on Homer and Dionysius the geographer; displaying, in the former more especially, profound philological learning.

EUTROPIUS, FLAVIUS, a Latin historian of the 4th century. He was secretary to Constantine the Great, and served under Julian in his Persian expedition. He wrote an epitome of the history of Rome, of which numerous editions have been printed.

EUTYCHIES, an ecclesiastic of the 5th century, from whom the sect of Eutychians sprung, was a man of strict piety, but who, in opposing the doctrines of Nestorius, fell into the opposite extreme, and denied the human nature of Christ. For this he was excommunicated; but he had many followers, and the sect existed for a long period after his death.

EVAGORAS, a Greek writer in the time of Augustus. He wrote a History of Egypt, the Life of Timagenes, "De Artificio Thucydidis Oratorio," &c.

EVANS, ABEL, commonly called Dr. Evans, the epigrammatist, was one of the Oxford wits, and intimate with the most eminent poets of the age. He was a member of St. John's College, and vicar of St. Giles, Oxford. He took his degree of D.D. in 1711.

EVANS, ARISE, an astrologer of the 17th century, was a native of Wales, and educated at Oxford. He removed to London, where he taught the mathematics, practised astrology, and had the reputation of a necromancer.

EVANS, CALEB, was an eminent Baptist minister at Bristol, and the author of "Sermons on the Scripture Doctrine of the Son and Holy Spirit," "Christ Crucified, or the Scripture Doctrine of the Atonement," &c. He died in 1791.

EVANS, CORNELIUS, an impostor, was born at Marseilles, but his father was a Welshman. In 1648 he came to England, and pretended to be the prince of Wales, to whom he bore a great resemblance. After carrying on this farce a few weeks he was sent to Newgate, from whence he effected his escape, but what became of him afterwards is not known.

EVANS, JOHN, a general Baptist minister, and theological writer, was born at Uske, in Monmouthshire. Having completed his studies at the universities of Aberdeen and Edinburgh, in 1792 he became pastor of a congregation in Worship Street, London, and subsequently opened an academy for youth at Hoxton, which he removed to Islington, and finally relinquished it in 1825. He wrote and compiled several works, but is chiefly known as the author of "A Brief Sketch of the several Denominations into which the Christian World is divided." Died, 1827.

EVANSON, EDWARD, a divine, was born at Warrington, in Lancashire, in 1731, and educated at Cambridge. He obtained the rectory of Tewkesbury, but having adopted Socinian doctrines, he was compelled to quit his living, and afterwards settled at Mitcham, in Surrey. He wrote the "Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists," "A Letter to Bishop Hurd on the Grand Apostasy," "Reflections on the State of Religion in Christendom," and some other works. Died, 1805.

EVELYN, JOHN, was the son of Richard Evelyn, esq., of Wotton, Surrey, where he was born in 1620. Throughout life he evinced a love for the liberal and useful arts; and having at an early period been induced to leave England on account of the civil war, he added greatly to his stock of knowledge by the good use he made of his time while travelling in France and Italy. He returned home in 1651, and made some efforts in favour of the royal cause; on which account he was much favoured by Charles II. after his restoration. On the foundation of the Royal Society, he was nominated one of the first fellows; soon after which he published his most celebrated work, entitled "Sylva, or a Discourse of Forest Trees," &c. In 1664, Evelyn was appointed one of the commissioners of sick and wounded seamen; also a commissioner for rebuilding St. Paul's cathedral; and he afterwards had a place at the board of trade. In the reign of James II. he was made one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord privy seal, and after the Revolution he was appointed treasurer of Greenwich Hospital. Evelyn has the honour of being one of the first who improved horticulture, and introduced exotics into this country. Of his garden at Sayes Court, a curious account may be seen in the Philosophical Transactions. Besides his "Sylva," he wrote "Terra, a Philosophical Discourse of Earth," "Numismata, or a Discourse of Medals," "Sculptura," "Acetaria," &c. His "Memoirs," comprehending a curious Diary and Correspondence, have been published; besides an interesting "Memoir of Mrs. Godolphin" (which he left in MS.), edited by the present Bishop of Oxford; and still more recently a "History of Religion." Died, 1706.

EVELYN, SIR GEORGE AUGUSTUS WILLIAM SHUCKBURGH whose original name was Shuckburgh, but having married the daughter of James Evelyn, esq., of Faldridge, Surrey, heiress of the Evelyn estates, he took that name. He was M.P. for Warwick, and a member of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies; to the "Transactions" of the former of which he was a valuable contributor. Born, 1751; died, 1804.

EVERARD, JOHANNES SECUNDUS, son of Nicholas Everard, president of the council of Holland, was born at the Hague in 1511, and became Latin secretary to the emperor Charles V., whom he accompanied to the siege of Tunis. He was the author of "Basia," a collection of Latin poems, elegant in language, but licentious in principle; it is therefore to be lamented that they have been translated into most modern European languages. Johannes Secundus, as he is usually called, died in 1536.

EVERDINGEN, ALDER VAN, a Dutch painter, celebrated both for landscapes and sea pieces, was born in 1621. The date of his death is unknown.

EVREMOND, ST., CHARLES MARQUETEL DE ST. DENIS, Lord of, was born in 1613, and became one of the most lively and amusing writers of his time. He studied the law, but subsequently entered the military service, and obtained the rank of general under the Prince of Condé; but he lost his commission for having indulged his propensity for satire at the expense of the prince. He then got embroiled with Cardinal Mazarin, was imprisoned in the Bastille, and afterwards escaped a second arrest only by flying to England. He was well received at the gay court of Charles II.; and, after indulging in a life of ease and enjoyment, died in 1703.

EWALD, JOHN, an eminent Danish poet, was the son of a clergyman, and born at Copenhagen, in 1743. Having lost his father while young, and disliking the clerical life, he left his home when but 15 years of age, and enlisted in the Prussian army. Deserting to the Austrian service, he was made a serjeant, but not being able to obtain his discharge when he wished, he deserted again and returned to Denmark. His youthful follies being now at an end, he pursued a literary life with great ardour, and produced several very excellent works; but that one to which he owed his earliest distinction as a poet, was an "Elegy on the Death of Frederic V." His "Songs of the Scalds," and other pieces after the manner of Ossian, gave him great reputation; and he may be said to have surpassed all preceding Danish poets in spirit and originality. Died, 1781.

EWING, JOHN, an eminent American divine, natural philosopher, and mathematician, was born in Maryland, in 1732. He was pastor to the first Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia; and on visiting Great Britain in 1778, he received from the university of Edinburgh the diploma of D.D. In 1776 he returned home; and in a few years afterwards was made provost of the university of Philadelphia. He also became one of the vice-presidents of the American Philosophical Society; and was justly esteemed as a mathematician of distinguished reputation. Died, 1802.

EXMOUTH, EDWARD PELLEW, Viscount, was descended from a Cornish family of respectability, and born at Dover in 1757. At the age of 13 he entered the navy as a midshipman on board the Juno frigate; and during the American war we find him in the Blonde frigate, contending for naval supremacy on Lake Champlain, where he attracted the notice of his superiors by his bold and matchless daring. Continuing to signalise himself in various ways, during the American contest, he was at length sent home with dispatches, and strong recommendations for promotion; and having obtained it, he proved, by repeated successes, how much he deserved it. At the commencement of the war with France in 1793, his services were called into immediate action as captain of the Nymph, a 36-gun frigate, which he manned chiefly with Cornish miners; and meeting the Cleopatre, of 40 guns, a "crack ship of France," he had the good fortune to make her his prize, after sustaining one of the most gallant fights on record. This being the first frigate captured after the commencement of hostilities, he was graciously received at court, and had the honour of knighthood conferred on him. He was now appointed to the command of the Arethusa of 44 guns, and hence followed many gallant exploits, while cruising in the Channel with Sir J. B. Warren's squadron. After this he commanded the Indefatigable, and his devotion and energy continued to be rewarded with his usual success. But it was not merely by beating the enemies of his country that Sir Edward distinguished himself: many acts of self-devotion, courage, and presence of mind were displayed by him in saving human life: for one of which, namely, the preservation of the crew of the Dutton, which was shipwrecked, he was created a baronet, and received for an honourable augmentation to his arms a stranded ship for a crest. From 1796 to 1798 a series of daring enterprises well sustained his hourly increasing reputation. In 1799 he removed into L'Impetueux, of 74 guns; and in 1800 was dispatched, with a squadron, to assist General Maitland in co-operating with the French royalists at Quiberon. During the short peace he was elected to represent Barnstable in parliament; but on the resumption of hostilities he hoisted his flag on board Le Tonnant, of 80 guns. Soon after this he was advanced to the rank of rear-admiral, and proceeded to the East Indies, as commander-in-chief on that station, which he held till 1809. He had not long returned to this country before he received the command of the fleet in the North Sea; and a year afterwards succeeded Sir Charles Cotton in the more important command of the Mediterranean fleet. For a long period he was incessantly engaged in upholding the patriot cause on the eastern coast of Spain, and in co-operating with the British forces there. His valuable services were properly appreciated, and on his return he was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Exmouth, with a pension of 2000*l.* per annum. In March, 1816, his lordship proceeded to the Barbary States, and concluded a negotiation for the liberation of all Christian slaves in those dominions; but he had scarcely been welcomed home before it was discovered they had violated all their engagements; and he returned to Algiers with a force sufficient to carry into effect the object of his former mission. He drew up his fleet in order of battle, and sent in a flag of truce; but no answer being returned, it was followed by one of the fiercest and most destructive bombardments ever known. The result of this was, that the terms prescribed by the British government, for the total abolition of Christian slavery, &c. were unconditionally submitted to. Lord Exmouth was now created a viscount, and on the death of Admiral Duckworth, in 1817, he was appointed to the chief command at Plymouth, where he continued till 1821, when he finally retired from the active duties of his profession, but obtained the high station of vice-admiral of England, in 1832. Few men in the naval service of this country, eminently distinguished as many have been, ever bore so prominent a part, or evinced more determined courage and coolness in discharge of their arduous duties, than did this gallant, humane, and active officer. He seemed to be the very beau idéal of a British sailor; his undaunted courage and enterprise was strikingly denoted in his manly aspect; and, though a perfect disciplinarian, his hearty and encouraging expressions produced a magic effect on his officers and men, while they always felt the fullest confidence in his skill and intrepidity. He died in January, 1833.

EYCK, HUBERT and JOHN VAN, brothers, both eminent as painters, were born at Maaseyk, in Holland; the former in 1366, the latter in 1370. HUBERT is regarded as the founder of the Flemish school; and JOHN, who from his place of residence is known as John of Bruges, was certainly the first who brought the art of painting in oil to perfection. He also made great improvements in the art of perspective; and is allowed to have excelled all others in painting on glass, delicately blending his colours, and yet so firmly fixing them that obliteration was impossible. He died in 1441.

EYRE, FRANCIS, a gentleman of the Roman Catholic persuasion, and a public advocate of its principles, was descended from a respectable family in Northamptonshire, many years resident at Warkworth Castle. He engaged in a theological controversy with Mr. Churton, and wrote "Remarks on the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," &c. Died, 1804.

F.

FABER, BASIL, a learned German Protestant, who published in 1571, a work, entitled "Thesaurus Eruditionis Scholasticæ," since improved by Cellarius and others into 2 vols. folio. He was a native of Sorau, and died in 1576.

FABER, JOHN, a German divine, was born at Heilbron in 1500. His works were printed at Cologne, in 3 vols. folio. There was another of this name, termed Malleus Hereticorum, or the Crusher of Heretics, who wrote several publications against the Protestants, for which he was raised to the archbishopric of Vienna. Died, 1542.

FABERT, ABRAHAM DE, a French military commander of great reputation, was born at Metz in 1599. When only 13 years old, his father procured him a commission in the army; and such was his skill and ardour for the service, that he rose to the first rank in his profession, and distinguished himself by a series of exploits which have had but few parallels in modern warfare. He refused the cordon bleu, which was offered to him by Louis XIV., and to which none but those of ancient descent were properly entitled, because, said he, "I will not have my mantle decorated by a cross, and my name dishonoured by an imposture." In fact, so highly was he esteemed for his sense of honour, that Mazarine declared, "If Fabert can be suspected, there is no man living in whom we can place confidence." Died, 1662.

FABIAN, ROBERT, an English chronicler of the 15th century. He was a tradesman of London, and served the offices of alderman and sheriff. His "Chronicle of England and France" was first printed at London in 1516.

FABIUS, MAXIMUS RULIANUS, an illustrious Roman. In 303 B. C. he served the office of censor, and obtained the name of Maximus for lessening the power of the populace in elections. He triumphed over seven nations, and served the office of dictator a second time, B. C. 287.

FABIUS MAXIMUS, QUINTUS, surnamed Verrucosus, was a lineal descendant of the above. He was employed against Hannibal, in opposition to whom he adopted a harassing and protracted mode of warfare, instead of risking the fortunes of Rome upon the event of a single battle; and thus the Fabian manner of conducting a campaign has become an adage. He distinguished himself by his prudence, valour, and generosity. He was consul the first time B. C. 233, when he gained a great victory over the Ligurians. In his advanced years he was superseded by Scipio, yet his death was lamented by the people as a common loss. Died B. C. 203, aged near 100.

FABIUS PICTOR, the first writer of the Roman history, who flourished B. C. 225. There is a work extant under his name, but it is a manifest forgery.

FABRE, JOHN CLAUDIUS, a French writer of some note, was born at Paris in 1668, and died about the middle of the last century. He wrote a Continuation of Fleury's Ecclesiastical History, a French and Latin Dictionary; and translated Virgil, Phædrus, &c.

FABRE, JOHN, a native of Nismes, whose name deserves to be handed down to posterity as a noble instance of filial piety. At a period when the spirit of persecution was rife in France, his father was condemned to the galleys for having made one of a Protestant congregation. The son was no sooner informed of the cruel sentence than he solicited to be exchanged for him, and was accepted. Though compelled to herd with the vilest of mankind, he remained in this degrading state of slavery upwards of 6 years, having refused to purchase his liberty on the condition of prevailing upon the Protestant pastor to quit the kingdom. Born, 1729; died, 1797.

FABRETTI, RAPHAEL, an Italian antiquarian of great merit. His principal works are "De Aquis et Aquæductibus veteris Romæ, Dissertationes Tres;" "De Columna Trajana," and "Inscriptionum Antiquarum Explicatio." Born, at Urbino, 1620; died, at Rome, 1700.

FABRI, HONORIUS, a learned Jesuit, was born in 1607 at Bellay, and died at Rome in 1688. He wrote "Physica seu Rerum Corporearum Scientia," 6 vols. 4to.; "Synopsis Optica," 4to.; "De Plantis, de Generatione Animalium, et de Homine," 4to. &c. He is said by some to have discovered the circulation of the blood before Harvey.

FABRICIUS, CAIUS (surnamed Luscinus), a Roman general, who was twice consul, and gained several victories over the Samnites and Lucanians. He was a pattern of virtue, in his integrity and contempt of riches. When consul, he discovered to Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, a plot formed to poison him by his physician; and in gratitude for so noble an act, Pyrrhus released the Roman prisoners without ransom. He died in poverty about 250 B. C.

FABRICIUS, DAVID, a German astronomer and divine, who is chiefly remembered for his attempting to reconcile the Ptolemaic system with the observations of Kepler. He is also the author of a Chronicle of East Friesland, of which country he was a native, and where he died in 1579.

FABRICIUS, JOHN, son of the foregoing, was also an astronomer, and the first who, by means of refracting telescopes, discovered the spots on the sun's disk, before, as it appears, they were noticed by Galileo. Died, about 1625.

FABRICIUS, OF FABRIZIO, JEROME, an Italian physician, usually called Aquapendente, from the place of his birth. He was a pupil of Fallopius, and professed anatomy with extraordinary reputation at Padua 40 years. He died in 1619. His works on anatomy and surgery form 2 vols. folio.

FABRICIUS, JOHN ALBERT, a learned critic and divine, was born at Leipsic in 1668. He became professor of eloquence at Hamburg, where he died in 1736; leaving behind him a justly-acquired fame for profound and comprehensive erudition. He is the author of "Bibliotheca Latina," 2 vols. 4to.; "Bibliotheca Græca," 14 vols. 4to.; "Codex Apocryphus Novi Testamenti," 3 vols. 8vo., and many other learned works.

FABRICIUS, JOHN CHRISTIAN, a distinguished entomologist, and the friend and pupil of Linnaeus, was born at Tundern, in Sleswick, in 1742, and died at Copenhagen in 1807. He was counsellor to the king of Denmark, and professor of rural and political economy; on both of which subjects he wrote; but his life was mainly devoted to the pursuit of his favourite science, and for the purpose of improving it he visited most of the museums in Europe. His "Systema Entomologiæ," and other works on entomology, are in high repute.

FABRIS, NICHOLAS, an Italian mechanician, was born at Chioggia in 1739, and was made counsellor to the bishop of that city in 1801. He was of the clerical profession, but studied mathematics and music with singular ardour and success. He made a pianoforte, which, while it played, wrote down the music; also a time-piece, which at the same time marked the French and Italian hours, minutes, and seconds, with the equinoxes and solstices; besides various other curious instruments.

FABRONI, ANGIOLO, a learned Italian, was born at Marradi, in Tuscany in 1732. He is generally known by his biographies of Italian literati of the 17th and 18th centuries, of which work he published 18 volumes, and left another ready for the press. He also wrote the lives of Lorenzo and Cosmo de Medici, and of Leo X.; besides editing a literary journal, which extended to 110 volumes. Towards the close of his life he retired to Pisa, became curator of that university, and there died in 1802.

FABRONI, GIOVANNI, an Italian writer of great celebrity, whose works on political economy, agriculture, and physical science are alike remarkable for the sound maxims they contain, and the extensive views in which they abound. He was director of bridges and highways (under the imperial government) for the department beyond the Alps, and held many honourable situations connected with literature and science. Born, 1752; died, at Florence, 1823.

FABROT, CHARLES ANNIBAL, a learned jurist, was professor of jurisprudence at Aix, in Provence, where he was born in 1581. His principal work, entitled "Basilicon," in 7 vols. folio, is a translation of the basilics or laws of the Eastern empire; but he wrote several professional works, and edited many of the Byzantine historians. Died, 1650.

FABRY, JOHN BAPTIST GERMAIN, secretary to Fouché, duke of Otranto, Buonaparte's minister of police. He was the author of "Le Spectateur Français au 19me Siècle," 12 vols., and many other works. Born, 1780; died, 1821.

FACCIOLATI, JAMES, an Italian philologist, was born at Torreglia, near Padua, in 1682. He devoted great attention to reviving the study of ancient literature; and having conceived the idea of a Latin lexicon, in which every word, with all its significations, should be contained and illustrated by examples from the classical writers, this immense undertaking occupied for nearly 40 years both him and his pupil Forcellini. Died, 1769.

FACINI, PETER, a native of Bologna, who was first a pupil, and afterwards the rival, of Annibal Caracci. He was extensively employed in ornamenting churches and mansions; but his works being painted in fresco, few of them are preserved. Born, 1561; died, 1602.

FADLALLA, an oriental historian in the 13th century, was the son of a physician of Hamadan, in Persia; and, on being appointed vizier to the sultan Cazan, who reigned at Tauris, was ordered by him to write a history of the Moguls; which having performed, he afterwards added to it a civil and geographical description of all the territories and people of the Moguls and Tartars.

FAGE, RAIMOND DE LA, a French artist, celebrated for the extraordinary facility and beauty of his pen-and-ink drawings, some of which have been engraved and published. Died, 1690.

FAGEL, GASPAR, an eminent Dutch statesman, born at Haerlem, in 1629, was grand pensionary of Holland, and distinguished himself not more by the firmness with which he opposed Louis XIV., when he invaded his country, than by the activity with which he supported the Prince of Orange in his plans for the expulsion of James II. from England. Died, 1688. He was never married; but the name has been well kept up by his nephews and great nephews, five of whom have filled the most important offices in the state; and one of them, FRANCIS NICHOLAS, was a renowned military commander. He greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Fleurus, 1690; the defence of Mons, 1691; the siege of Namur, and the capture of Bonn, 1703; in Portugal and Flanders; and at the great battles of Ramillies and Malplaquet. He died in 1718.—HENRY, the last of the Fagels, who has figured as a statesman, signed the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the Netherlands, in 1814, and has at all times shown a devoted attachment to the House of Orange.

FAGIULOLI, JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian poet, celebrated for the facetiousness and drollery of his writings, was born at Florence, in 1660, and died in 1742. He wrote seven volumes of comedies, two volumes of burlesque poetry, and one of miscellanies in prose.

FAHRENHEIT, GABRIEL DANIEL, an experimental philosopher, whose arrangement of the thermometer and barometer which bear his name, was a work of great utility. He was a native of Dantzic; born in 1686, and died in 1736.

FAIPOULT, GUILLAUME MARIE, was a French republican statesman, born of a noble family in Champagne, in 1752. For ten years he was prefect of the department of the Scheldt; he subsequently held the office of minister of finance under Joseph Buonaparte in Spain, and on his return to France in 1813, he was sent on a mission to Italy by Napoleon. On the second restoration he was made prefect of the department of Saone and Loire. Died, 1817.

FAIRFAX, EDWARD, was the son of Sir Thomas Fairfax, of Denton, in Yorkshire, and is regarded as one of the great improvers of English versification. Settling at Newhall, in Knaresborough Forest, he led the life of a retired country gentleman, devoted to literary pursuits. His chief reputation as a poet rests on his translation of Tasso's "Godfrey of Bouillon," which is written in the same stanza with the original, and combines fidelity to the sense of the author, with striking harmony of style. He also wrote Eclogues, and a prose work on Demonology, in which he was, it seems, a believer. He died about 1632.

FAIRFAX, THOMAS, Lord, a distinguished commander in the civil wars, and one of the leading characters of that turbulent period, was the eldest son of Lord Fairfax, to whose title and estates he succeeded in 1647. When the disputes between Charles I. and the Parliament terminated in open rupture, Fairfax warmly espoused the cause of the latter, and joined his father in making active preparations for the approaching contest. In the earlier part of his career, he suffered various checks from the royalist forces, but he retrieved his character at Marston Moor, and was appointed general-in-chief when Essex resigned. He was afterwards victorious at Naseby, reduced the west to obedience, and compelled Colchester to surrender. But he was hostile to the execution of the dethroned monarch; and considerable jealousy appears to have been entertained of him by Oliver Cromwell. At length he resigned the command of the army, and retired for awhile from public life. At the Restoration he crossed over to Holland for the purpose of congratulating Charles II. on his accession, and was formally reconciled to that monarch. He devoted his leisure hours to the encouragement and cultivation of letters, and left behind him a volume of poems and miscellanies, including an interesting sketch of his own life. Died, 1671.

FAITHORNE, WILLIAM, an English engraver and painter of the 17th century, whose works, though numerous and popular in his day, seldom rise above mediocrity. Died, 1691.

FALCONER, THOMAS, an ingenious scholar, and the author of "Chronological Tables," &c., was born at Chester, in 1736, and died in 1792.

FALCONER, WILLIAM, an English poet and writer on naval affairs, was born at Edinburgh, about 1730. When very young, he went to sea in the merchant service, and had risen to the situation of second mate, when the vessel to which he belonged was cast away. Thus furnished with the incidents of his "Shipwreck," it was published in 1762, and dedicated to Edward, duke of York, by whose patronage the author was appointed a midshipman on board the Royal George, and next a purser in the Glory. In 1769, he was appointed purser of the Aurora, which ship was never heard of after she quitted the Cape of Good Hope, in December, 1769, and was therefore supposed to have foundered at sea, and all her crew to have perished. Besides "The Shipwreck," he wrote some minor poems, and a "Marine Dictionary."

FALCONER, WILLIAM, a skilful physician, residing at Bath, was an able writer on chemical and medical subjects; and many able treatises owe their existence to his professional skill and industry. To him belongs the discovery of the properties of carbonic gas, which has been erroneously attributed to Dr. Priestley. Born, 1743; died, 1824.

FALCONET, STEPHEN MAURICE, a celebrated French sculptor, was born at Paris, in 1716. Although, owing to his humble origin, he had been apprenticed to a cutter of barber's blocks, he became an excellent modeller, and, assisted by Lemoine, the sculptor, rose to eminence as an artist; while, owing to his persevering application, he also shone as an author. In 1766 he was invited to Russia, to execute the colossal statue of Peter the Great, and there he resided 12 years. His writings on the fine arts form 6 vols. 8vo. Died, 1791.

FALCONETTO, JOHN MARIA, an Italian architect, was born at Verona, in 1458. He built palaces, and much improved the style of architecture in the Venetian states; and a building of his at Padua is said to have suggested to Palladio the idea of the famous Villa Capra, which served as the model of Lord Burlington's villa at Chiswick. He died in 1534.

FALCONIA, PROBA, a Christian poetess, born in Etruria, who flourished in the reign of the emperor Honorius, in the 4th century.

FALIERI, MARINO, a Venetian noble, succeeded Andrew Dandolo as doge of Venice, in 1354. He had previously commanded the troops of the republic at the siege of Zara, in Dalmatia, where he gained a brilliant victory over the king of Hungary; and was afterwards ambassador to Genoa and Rome. When he succeeded to the office of doge, he was 76 years of age, and had a young and beautiful wife. Jealous of Michael Steno, he quarrelled with and was insulted by him at a masquerade; but Steno being sentenced to no more than a month's imprisonment for his offence, Falieri, burning with revenge, entered into a conspiracy with the plebeians to overturn the government and massacre the patricians. On the night before it was to be carried into effect, the plot was discovered, and Falieri suffered decapitation, April 17, 1355. His character is delineated with historical truth by Lord Byron, in one of his noblest tragedies.

FALK, JOHN DANIEL, was the son of a poor wig-maker at Dantzic, who would scarcely allow him to be taught even to read and write before he employed him in his trade; but his love of knowledge was sufficient to overcome the difficulties that lay in his way of attaining it, and all his little savings were laid out at the circulating library. Having thus obtained a tolerable education, he published some admirable satires, but afterwards wrote principally upon religious subjects. Born, 1770; died, 1826.

FALK, or FALCK, JOHN PETER, a Swedish naturalist and traveller, and a pupil of Linnæus. Having finished his studies at Upsal, he went to St. Petersburg, and was engaged by the Imperial Academy of Sciences to assist in exploring the Russian dominions. After some years spent in this employment, he was afflicted with hypochondria to such a degree, that, while at Kasan, in 1774, in one of his paroxysms, he put a period to his existence with a pistol. His travels were afterwards published in 3 vols.

FALKENSTEIN, JOHN HENRY, a voluminous writer, was born in Franconia, in 1682. He wrote the "Antiquities of Nordgau," 3 vols. folio; and other works of a similar kind. He died at the court of the Margrave of Anspach, in 1760.

FALKLAND, HENRY CARY, Viscount, son of Sir Edward Cary, master of the jewel office to queen Elizabeth and to James I., was made comptroller of the king's household, and elevated to the (Scotch) peerage of Falkland in 1617. Subsequently he was made lord deputy of Ireland, but did not long hold the office, the Catholic party being much opposed to him. He was a man of considerable literary talent, and published "Letters to the Duke of Buckingham," "A History of that unfortunate Prince, Edward II.," &c. Died, 1633.

FALKLAND, LUCIUS CARY, Viscount, son of the preceding. His course is a strong and painful proof that the best intentions may lead to fatal results, if not guided by solid judgment. He was much favoured by Charles I., and was one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber to that monarch. Yet, unaware of the extremities to which the (so called) patriots of the day desired to proceed, he warmly supported them. It is true that when he did perceive the real intentions of the parliamentarians he decidedly embraced the cause of the king. But he had done immense mischief by lending the weight of his high character, social, intellectual, and moral, precisely at the time when the weight of that character would most have benefited the cause of social order. Learned, and the patron of learning, he was also as brave as he was gentle; and when he discovered the error of his opposition, he fought boldly and zealously for his king; and died honourably at the battle of Newbury, in the 34th year of his age, 1643.

FALKLAND, HENRY LUCIUS CARY, Viscount, son of the above, died young. He is said to have been a man of talent, but the only proof we have of it is a play, called "The Wedding Night." Died, 1663.

FALKNER, THOMAS, was originally an English surgeon, but afterwards a Jesuit, and employed as a missionary in Paraguay. After the suppression of the order to which he belonged, he returned to England, and passed the remainder of his life in retirement. He wrote a "Description of Patagonia," &c. Died, 1780.

FALLOPIUS, GABRIEL, an eminent anatomist and physician, was born at Modena; studied at Ferrara and Padua; was professor of anatomy for three years at Pisa; and, lastly, filled the chair of anatomy and surgery at Padua, where he remained till his death, in 1563. He was the first who accurately described the vessels and bones of the fetus; and his account of the Fallopian tubes has served to perpetuate his name. His chief work is entitled "Observationes Anatomice."

FALLOWS, FEARON, was a distinguished mathematician and astronomer, who in 1821 was appointed to the office of astronomer royal at the Cape of Good Hope. During the two following years, though furnished with but few instruments, he formed a catalogue of 273 stars belonging to the southern hemisphere; nor is there a doubt but that, had his life been spared for a few years, and his observatory made complete, he would have succeeded in making the catalogues of the stars in the southern hemisphere equal in accuracy to those of the northern. He died in 1831.

FANSHAWE, Sir RICHARD, a statesman and poet, was born at Ware Park, Herts, in 1608, and educated at Cambridge. In 1635 he was sent ambassador to Spain, whence, in 1641, he returned, and acted steadily for the royal cause. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and closely confined for a considerable time; but at last recovered his liberty, and went to Breda, where he was knighted by Charles II., in 1653. At the Restoration he was made master of requests, and sent to Portugal to negotiate the marriage with the king and the Infanta Catharine. In 1664 he was sent ambassador to Spain, and died there in 1666. He translated into English the Pastor Fido, or Faithful Shepherd, of Guarini; also the Lusid by Camoens. His letters during his embassies in Spain and Portugal were printed in 1702.

FANTIN-DESODOARDS, ANTOINE ETIENNE NICOLAS, a French historian and political writer, was born, in 1738, at Pont de Beauvoisin, in Dauphiné. He was originally an ecclesiastic; but becoming acquainted with Danton and Robespierre, he employed his pen in defending the revolutionary career of his cotemporaries. He was the author of several extensive works, but his "Histoire Philosophique de la Révolution Française," in 6 vols. 8vo., is sufficient of itself to attest his principles.

FARE, CHARLES AUGUSTUS, Marquis de la, a French poet, and captain of the guards to the Duke of Orleans, was born in 1644, and died in 1712. According to Voltaire, Fare did not begin to write poetry till he was nearly 60. His compositions are remarkable for sweetness and elegance. He was also the author of "Mémoires sur le Règne de Louis XIV.," a work containing satirical reflections on cotemporary characters.

FAREL, WILLIAM, a Protestant divine, and one of the associates of Calvin in the reformation of the church, was born at Gap, in Dauphiné. While at the university of Paris, he greatly distinguished himself by his philosophical and classic attainments; but being invited by the Bishop of Meaux to preach in that city, he propagated the principles of the Huguenots, and was consequently soon compelled to seek safety in flight. He found an asylum at Strasburg, whence he removed to other parts of Germany, exercising his talents as a preacher, with great zeal and success. It seems, however, that he was intemperate and bigoted; and, though defended by Calvin, the portrait drawn of him by Erasmus places him in a very unfavourable light. He wrote some theological treatises; but the cause of the reformed church was more promoted by his preaching than by his writings. He died at Neuchâtel in 1535.

FAREY, JOHN, an eminent surveyor and geologist, was born at Woburn, Bedfordshire, in 1766. He made a survey of the county of Derby, which was published in 2 vols.; but his great merit consists in the pains he took to examine the relative position of the strata throughout Britain, and to collect mineral specimens to illustrate this useful branch of science. Died, 1826.

FARIA Y SOUSA, MANUEL DE, a Portuguese historian and poet, was born at Souto, in Portugal, about 1590, and for some time secretary to the Marquis of Castel Rodrigo, ambassador of Rome. He wrote various historical works relative to Portugal and its distant possessions, 7 volumes of poems, &c. Died in 1649.

FARINATO, PAUL, an eminent painter of Verona, whose numerous works were distinguished by freedom of design, boldness of colouring, and great facility of execution. Born, 1522; died, 1606.

FARINELLI, a Neapolitan singer of great eminence, whose real name is said to be CARLO BROSCHI, was born at Naples, in 1705. He studied under Porpora, and went from Rome to Vienna, where the emperor, Charles VI., loaded him with rich presents. In 1734 he came to London, and, by the magic of his singing, so delighted the public, that Handel was obliged to dismiss a rival company over which he presided, in spite of all his powers and popularity. Many extraordinary stories are related of his vocal skill, and his command over the feelings and sympathies of his audience appears to have been unrivalled.

FARINGTON, GEORGE, an historical painter, and a pupil of West. In 1780 his painting of the incantation scene in Macbeth was rewarded with a gold medal by the Royal Academy. Died at Arcot in the East Indies. Born, 1754; died, 1788.

FARINGTON, JOSEPH, brother of the preceding, and eminent as a landscape painter. He made many drawings for the "Britannia Depicta," and left behind him several good pictures of lake and landscape scenery. Died, 1818.

FARMER, HUGH, a dissenting minister, was born in 1714, near Shrewsbury; studied under the celebrated Dr. Doddridge; and was pastor of a congregation at Walthamstow, where he died in 1787. He was the author of several theological tracts; "On Miracles," "On the Temptation in the Wilderness," "On Demoniacs," "On the Worship of Human Spirits by the Heathens," &c.

FARMER, RICHARD, a divine and antiquary, was born at Leicester in 1735, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. In 1767 he took the degree of B.A., and became one of the preachers at Whitehall. He subsequently became vice-chancellor and librarian of the university; and also obtained prebends at Lichfield and Canterbury, the latter of which he exchanged for a canonry at St. Paul's. In his "Essay on the Learning of Shakspeare," which is a work of great critical merit, he proved that all the knowledge of ancient history and mythology possessed by the immortal bard, was drawn from translations. Died, 1797.

FARNABY, or FARNABIE, THOMAS, an eminent schoolmaster, was born in London about 1575, and admitted a servitor of Merton College, in 1590. Hence he was drawn away by a Jesuit, whom he accompanied to Spain; but being disgusted with his new connection, he escaped, and entered on board the English fleet; after which he served as a soldier in the Low Countries. On his return to England he kept a school at Martock, in Somersetshire, whence he removed to London, and gained great reputation as a teacher. From London he removed with many of his pupils to Sevenoaks, in Kent; in the neighbourhood of which town he purchased an estate, still in the possession of the family, which has been raised to the baronetage. He wrote various school books; and his Commentaries on Juvenal, Persius, Martial, and other classic authors, are clear, comprehensive, and erudite. Died, 1647.

FARNESE; the name of an illustrious family in Italy, many of the members of which filled the highest situations in church and state.—ALEXANDER, the son of Peter Louis the first grand-duke of Parma and Placentia, was born in 1520, and created a cardinal by his grandfather, pope Paul III. He was dean of the sacred college, and distinguished himself highly by his learning and his virtues; while as a statesman his talents were such as to obtain for him the office of nuncio to the courts of Vienna and Paris. Died, 1589.—ALEXANDER, nephew of the preceding, was the third Duke of Parma, and highly distinguished as a military commander under Philip II., who sent him to Flanders, where the situation of the Spaniards was becoming desperate. He recovered several cities, and succeeded in reconciling the Catholic part of the population to the Spanish government. He afterwards invaded France, and compelled Henry IV. to raise the siege of Rouen. On his return from that expedition, he received a wound in his arm before Caudebec, in consequence of the neglect of which he died, at Arras, in 1592, aged 46.

FARNEWORTH, ELLIS, an English divine, was born in Derbyshire, and educated at Jesus College, Cambridge. In 1762 he obtained the rectory of Carsington in Derbyshire, where he died the year following. He translated the Life of Pope Sixtus V. from the Italian, 1754, folio; Davila's History of the Civil Wars of France, in 1757, 2 vols. 4to.; the works of Machiavel, 1761, 2 vols. 4to.; and Fleury's History of the Israelites, 12mo.

FARQUHAR, GEORGE, a comic writer was born at Londonderry, in Ireland, in 1678, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin, from which he either eloped or was expelled for irregular conduct, and repaired to London with his friend Wilks the actor, where he commenced his career of dramatic authorship. His first production was "Love in a Bottle," performed at Drury Lane Theatre with success in 1698, about which time he attracted the favour of Lord Orrery, who procured him a lieutenancy in his own regiment. In 1700 he added to his reputation by "The Constant Couple," a comedy in which, under the character of Sir Harry Wildair, he exhibited a lively picture of the foppish fine gentleman of the end of the 17th century. He died in 1707, at the premature age of 29, and during the run of his last and best play, "The Beaux Stratagem." Farquhar's wit is genuine and spontaneous, his characters are obviously drawn from nature, and his incidents well arranged. His libertinism of language and sentiment are, however, highly reprehensible; but it was the vice of the age rather than of the author, whose offence may be extenuated on the ground of its being less glaring than in many of his cotemporaries.

FARRANT, RICHARD, an English musician. He held situations in the Chapel

Royal and St. George's Chapel, Windsor, from 1564 to 1580, and is remarkable for the devout and solemn style of his compositions.

FARREN, ELIZA, countess of DERBY, was the daughter of a surgeon at Cork, who failing in his profession, became a provincial actor, and died young, leaving his family in destitute circumstances. Eliza was born in 1759; made her first appearance at Liverpool, when 14 years of age; and, in 1777, appeared at the Haymarket Theatre, London, as Miss Harcastle, in "She Stoops to Conquer." She afterwards played at Drury Lane and Covent Garden; and eventually succeeded Mrs. Abington in her principal characters, which she played with great eclat, and established her theatrical fame. At this period she was much noticed by persons of distinction, and conducted the private theatricals at the Duke of Newcastle's house in Privy Gardens, where Lord Derby, Lord Henry Fitzgerald, Charles Fox, Lord John Townshend, the Hon. Mrs. Damer, and others, assumed the principal characters. An honourable attachment for the accomplished actress was soon after formed by Lord Derby; and, in 1797, on the death of Lady Derby, from whom his lordship had been for some years separated, he raised Miss Farren to the rank of a countess. Died, 1829.

FASTOLF, Sir JOHN, the supposed prototype of Shakspeare's Falstaff, was a native of Norfolk. Adopting the profession of a soldier, he served with some distinction in Ireland, under Sir Stephen Scrope, deputy to the lord lieutenant, and married his widow, who was an heiress; through the acquisition of whose property he obtained the honour of knighthood, and the order of the garter. He was wounded at the battle of Agincourt, and rewarded for his bravery; but at the battle of Patay he shamefully tarnished his laurels by fleeing, panic-stricken, from Joan of Arc. Died, 1469.

FATIO DE DUILLIER, an ingenious mathematician, was born at Basle, in 1654; settled in London in 1687, and distinguished himself as a geometrician and astronomer; but, becoming a zealous partisan of a fanatical sect, called the French prophets, he was tried and put in the pillory. Many inventions in the mechanical arts owe their existence to him; among others, was the jewelling of watches.

FAUCHET, CLAUDE, a French historian and archaeologist in the 16th century, and historiographer to Henry IV. He wrote various antiquarian works, of which his "Antiquités et Histoires Gauloises et Francoises" is the chief. Died, 1601.

FAUCHET, CLAUDE, a native of Dorne, France, was grand-vicar to the archbishop of Bourges and preacher to the king. Just previous to the French Revolution he joined the sect of the Illuminati, and became one of their chiefs; and during the popular commotions in Paris, he took an active part, appearing sword in hand at the head of the mob which attacked the Bastille. In 1791 he was elected constitutional bishop of the department of Calvados, and chosen a member of the legislative assembly. He continued to distinguish himself by his revolutionary furor till the trial of Louis XVI., for whose imprisonment he voted instead of his death; and having joined the Girondists, he was persecuted by the opposite party. At last he was condemned to death on the unfounded charge of being an accomplice of Charlotte Corday in the assassination of Marat, and suffered by the guillotine in October, 1793.

FAUJAS DE ST. FOND, BARTHOLOMEW, an eminent French geologist, was born at Montelimart, in 1750; became professor at the Museum of Natural History; and wrote various works connected with his favourite pursuit; among which are "The Mineralogy of Volcanoes," "A Natural History of Dauphiné," "A Journey in England, Scotland, and the Hebrides," &c.

FAULHABER, JOHN, an ingenious mathematician, and the friend of Descartes, was born at Ulm, in Suabia, where he died, in 1635.

FAUQUE, a French authoress, known in England by the name of Madame de Vaucluse, was born at Avignon, at the beginning of the 18th century. She had been forced by her parents to become a nun against her will; and having obtained a dispensation from her vows, she retired to England, where she supported herself by writing for the press. Among her productions are "Dialogues Moraux et Amusans" and "Histoire de Madame de Pompadour." Died, 1777.

FAUST, or FUST, JOHN, one of the three artists to whom the invention of printing has been ascribed, was the son of a goldsmith at Mentz. The other two were Guttemberg and Schæffer; to the former of whom the invention of printing with wooden blocks is attributed; and to the latter, who married the daughter of Faust, is allowed the honour of having invented punches and matrices, by means of which this grand art was carried to perfection. It has been pretended that, when Faust went to Paris to sell a second edition of his Bible of 1462, he was arrested on the supposition that he effected the printing of them by magic; but this story appears to be a mere fiction. There is reason to believe that he died of the plague in 1466.

FAUST or FAUSTUS, Dr. JOHN, who lived in the beginning of the 16th century, was born at Knittlingen, in Suabia. After receiving an education at Wittemberg, he went to Ingoldstadt, where he studied medicine, astrology, and magic; and occupied himself in alchemical experiments. That he was a man of great scientific acquirements there is little doubt; and, according to legendary tradition, he made use of his power in a manner calculated to inspire his countrymen with a firm belief that he had familiar dealings with the devil. The supernatural feats performed by him and his servant, Mephistopheles, have been immortalised by the genius of Goethe.

FAVART, CHARLES SIMON, a dramatic poet, to whom the comic opera in France is greatly indebted, was born in 1710. At an early period he devoted himself to poetical pursuits, continuing, with little intermission, to write for the stage till his death, which happened in 1792.

FAUVEL, —, an eminent French antiquary, chiefly known for his researches, at first alone in Greece, and subsequently in the East with M. de Choiseul-Gouffier, whom he aided in valuable researches. M. Fauvel is well-known in connection with the "Voyage Pittoresque de la Grèce." Born, 1753; died, 1838.

FAVIER, —, an eminent French statesman, was born at Toulouse, in the beginning of the 18th century; and at the age of 20 he succeeded his father as secretary general to the states of Languedoc. He afterwards sedulously applied himself to the study of politics, and was employed on several secret missions in Spain and Russia, under the ministry of the Duke de Choiseul; but engaging in certain covert transactions of the French government at the instigation of the Count de Broglie, he became involved in difficulties, and was obliged to quit France. He was subsequently arrested at Hamburg, and taken to Paris; but procured his liberation in 1773, and on the accession of Louis XVI. obtained a pension. He was the author of several political treatises, some of which have been collected and published by M. Segur; and he was one of the principal contributors to, and conductors of, the Journal Etranger. Died, 1784.

FAVORINUS, a Platonic philosopher and rhetorician of the 2nd century, was a native of Arles, in Gaul, and taught at Athens. Being once on a visit at Rome, in the reign of Adrian, and being reproached with having meanly submitted to the emperor, with whom he was disputing on some literary topic, he ironically exclaimed, "Would you have me pretend to be wiser than the commander of thirty legions?"

FAVRAT, FRANCIS ANDREW, a Prussian general, so remarkable for his strength, that he is said to have once lifted up a horse and its rider, and to have often carried a cannon on his shoulder with as much apparent ease as a soldier carries his firelock. He was governor of Glatz, and wrote "Memoirs of the History of the War of the Polish Revolution from 1794 to 1796."

FAWCETT, JOHN, an eminent theatrical performer, was the son of an actor of humble pretensions at Drury Lane, and was born in London, in 1769. At the age of 15 he was apprenticed to a linendraper, but clandestinely left the shop for the Margate Theatre, where, under the name of Foote, he made his first appearance. He afterwards joined Tate Wilkinson on the York circuit; and in 1791 made his bow to a London audience, at Covent Garden, as Caleb, in "He would be a Soldier." His dramatic reputation was at length fixed by his representation of Dr. Pangloss, Ollapod, Caleb Quotem, and Job Thornberry. In 1798 he joined the Haymarket company, and became acting manager, in 1800, of that theatre. In 1813 he appeared at the English Opera, and in 1816 rejoined the Haymarket. He afterwards became manager of Covent Garden Theatre, which situation he held till his retreat from the stage in 1836. In private life his conduct was irreproachable, but there was a bluntness in his manners, which, to a stranger, often appeared like intentional rudeness. Died, 1837.

FAWCETT, SIR WILLIAM, a distinguished military officer, was a native of Yorkshire.

Entering young into the army, he served under General Elliot, with reputation, in the German wars of George II., and was made aide-de-camp to the Marquis of Granby. He was soon after promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the guards, and continued to rise gradually till he became a general in the army, a knight of the Bath, and governor of Chelsea Hospital. Sir William wrote some useful "Rules and Regulations," and translated the "Reveries of Marshal Saxe." Born, 1723; died, 1804.

FAWKES, FRANCIS, an English poet and divine, was born in Yorkshire about 1721, and educated at Jesus College, Cambridge. On entering into orders he settled at Bramham in his native county, but afterwards he obtained the vicarage of Orpington in Kent, which he exchanged for the rectory of Hayes, where he died in 1777. He published a volume of poems and translations of Anacreon, Sappho, Bion, Moschus, and Theocritus. His poetry, though not of first-rate talent, is elegant and correct.

FAY, CHARLES FRANCIS DE CISTERNAI DU, the son of an officer of the French guards, was born in 1698; and though he first embraced the military profession, soon quitted it for pursuits more congenial to his nature, the study of chemistry and natural philosophy. He was a member of the Academy of Sciences, and distinguished himself by his researches concerning the phosphoric light in the mercurial vacuum of the barometer, the magnet, and the nature of electricity, which he divided into two kinds, the vitreous and the resinous, answering to the positive and negative electricities of Franklin. Died, 1739.

FAYDIT, ANSELM, a troubadour of the 13th century, patronised by Richard Cœur de Lion, whose praises he celebrated in a funeral elegy.

FAYETTE, MARIE MADELEINE DE LA VERGE, Countess of, a female of great literary attainments, wife to the Count de la Fayette, in the reign of Louis XIV. She was in habits of friendly intimacy with many of the most distinguished men of letters; and her romances of "Zaide" and "The Princess of Cleves" afford ample testimony that the fame she acquired for delicacy of sentiment and graceful description was not exaggerated. She wrote also "Memoirs of the Court of France." Died, 1693.

FAZIO, BARTHOLOMEW, an historian and biographer of the 15th century, was by birth a Genoese, and patronised by Alphonso, king of Naples, at whose instance he translated Arrian's History of Alexander into Latin; but his most important work is entitled "De Viris Illustribus," containing brief accounts of the most famous of his cotemporaries.

FEARNE, CHARLES, a writer on metaphysics and jurisprudence, was born in London, in 1749, and educated at Westminster School. He became a student at the Inner Temple, and attained a first-rate reputation as a chamber counsel and conveyancer. He was the author of "An Essay on Contingent Remainders," &c. Died, 1794.

FEATLEY, DANIEL, an eminent English divine of the 17th century, was born at Charlton Kings, Oxfordshire, in 1582; studied at Corpus Christi College, where he obtained a fellowship; and was afterwards presented with the rectory of Lambeth by Archbishop Abbot. Soon after this he distinguished himself by maintaining a public dispute with two Jesuits, for which he was rewarded by the archbishop with the livings of All Hallows, Bread Street, and Acton, Middlesex. He was the author of "Clavis Mystica, a Key opening divers difficult Texts of Scripture," &c.; and among his controversial tracts is one bearing the quaint title of "The Dipper dipt, or the Anabaptist plunged over Head and Ears, and shrunk in the Washing."

FECKENHAM, JOHN DE, the last abbot of Westminster, was born in a village of that name in Worcestershire. When the Reformation commenced, he opposed it with spirit, and was sent to the Tower, where he continued till the accession of queen Mary, when he was made abbot of Westminster. Died, 1585.

FELTH, RHYNVIS, a modern Dutch poet, was born at Zwolle in 1753. He studied law at Leyden, and, returning to his native city, was made burgomaster, and afterwards receiver at the admiralty college; but he did not relinquish the art of poetry. He wrote "Inez de Castro," and several other good tragedies; many poems, hymns, and odes, remarkable for feeling and elevated sentiment; and his "Grave" stands foremost among the best didactic poems in the language. Died, 1824.

FELTHIUS, EVERARD, a Protestant philological writer of the 6th century, was a native of the Netherlands, who, flying into France to escape the persecution of the Spanish government, then dominant in his own country, is supposed to have been assassinated at Rochelle in 1500. He wrote "Antiquitates Homericae," a useful work, descriptive of the sacred and profane rites and customs of the Greeks, &c. in the heroic ages.

FELIBIEN, ANDREW, a writer on and encourager of the fine arts, was born at Chartres, France, in 1619. He studied at Paris; after which he went as secretary to the French embassy at Rome, where he formed an intimacy with the celebrated painter, Nicholas Poussin, which naturally heightened and matured his taste for the works of art. On his return to France he was appointed superintendent of the royal buildings, and of arts and manufactures. His works, which are much esteemed, illustrate the principles of painting, architecture, and sculpture. Died, 1695.

FELIBIEN, JOAN FRANCIS, eldest son of the foregoing, succeeded to the offices held by his father, and wrote a work on the lives and writings of the most celebrated architects. Died, 1733.

FELIX I. succeeded pope Dionysius in 269. He suffered death in 274, and was canonised. An epistle by him against Sabellius and Paulus Samosancus is extant.—FELIX II., antipope. He was placed in the papal chair in 355 by the emperor Constans, during the exile of Liberius, on the return of whom he was expelled. Constans would have had the two popes reign together, but the people exclaimed, One God, one Christ, and one bishop! Felix was then exiled, and died in 365.—FELIX III. succeeded Simplicius in 483. He had a violent dispute with the emperor Zeno in behalf of the Western church, and died in 492.—FELIX IV., a native of Beneventum, ascended the chair after John I. in 526. He governed the church with zeal and piety, and died in 530. He introduced extreme unction.

FELL, JOHN, a dissenting minister, was born at Cockermouth, in Cumberland, in 1735, and bred a tailor; which occupation he followed in London for some time; but his turn for literary pursuits, and his natural talent being too obvious to escape notice, he was enabled by a friend to pursue his studies at an academy, after which he became in succession pastor of a congregation at Beccles, near Yarmouth, Thaxted, and Homerton. He wrote "An Essay on the Love of One's Country," "Genuine Protestantism," "A Letter to Mr. Burke on the Penal Laws," "An Essay towards an English Grammar," &c. Died, 1797.

FELL, SAMUEL, dean of Christchurch, was born in London in 1594, and educated at Westminster School, whence he proceeded to Christchurch, Oxford, in 1601. During the civil wars he was a staunch adherent of the royal cause, on which account he was ejected in 1647, from the office of vice-chancellor of the university; and he died in the following year. The news of the execution of Charles I. is said to have broken his heart.

FELL, Dr. JOHN, bishop of Oxford, son of the preceding, was born at Longworth, in Berkshire, in 1625, and educated at Christchurch, Oxford, of which his father was dean. In the rebellion he was, like his father, ejected from the college for his loyalty. At the Restoration he was made canon and dean of Christchurch, and 10 years after he had obtained the deanery he was raised to the see of Oxford. He was a learned prelate, and a liberal benefactor to his college, the magnificent tower of which, called the "Tom Gate," he built. Several valuable works from his pen are extant; among others, a Latin translation of Wood's "History and Antiquities of Oxford," in 2 vols. folio; "In Laudem Musices Carmen Sapphicum," a "Paraphrase on St. Paul's Epistles," &c. Died, 1686.

FELLENBERG, EMANUEL DE, whose labours in the cause of education have earned for him immortal fame, was born at Berne in Switzerland, in 1771. His father was of patrician rank, and a member of the government of Berne; his mother, a great granddaughter of the celebrated Dutch admiral Van Tromp. After a somewhat desultory education at home and under different masters, young De Fellenberg repaired to the university of Tübingen in 1790, to complete his studies in civil law; but these he soon abandoned for the more congenial pursuits of politics and philosophy. In order to acquaint himself with the moral state of his countrymen, he spent much of his time in travelling through Switzerland, usually on foot, with his knapsack on his back, residing in the villages and farm-houses, mingling in the labours and occupations and partaking of the rude lodging and fare of the peasants and mechanics, and often extending his journey to the adjacent countries. Immediately after the fall of Robespierre in 1795 he visited Paris. During his sojourn there he perceived the storm which was impending over Switzerland from the schemes of the French Revolutionists, and hastened back to warn his countrymen of their danger, and to concert measures to avoid it. But his predictions were disbelieved, and his warnings disregarded. Berne was consequently taken, and the cause lost, before any efficient force could be organised; and Fellenberg, who had taken an active part in raising and leading on the levy en masse to resist the invaders, was proscribed, a price was set upon his head, and he was compelled to fly into Germany. He was, however, soon afterwards recalled to Switzerland, and sent on a mission to Paris, to remonstrate against the rapacity and oppressive conduct of the agents of the French republic; but the want of faith and public spirit which he found on the part of his own government confirmed his disgust with public life, and he resolved to exchange the tortuous paths of political career for the more peaceful pursuits of agriculture and education. To promote the object so dear to his heart, he became a member of the council of education at Berne, but was soon convinced that nothing adequate could be accomplished on this subject through the medium of legislative commissions; and having come into possession of an ample fortune, he resolved to devote this to his great object, and to form on his own estate, and on an independent basis, a model institution, in which it should be proved what education could accomplish for the benefit of humanity. In pursuance of his great design, he purchased, in 1799, the estate called Hofwyl, two leagues from Berne; and his life forms, henceforward, an important page in the records of benevolent enterprise. But it would be impossible within our limits to give even an outline of the various schemes for the improvement and diffusion of education that emanated from M. de Fellenberg during the long period of forty-five years that followed; of the skill and tact with which he defeated the combinations of interested and jealous opponents; and the success which ultimately crowned his labours. Died, Nov. 21st, 1844.

FELLER, FRANCIS XAVIER, born at Brussels in 1735; author of an "Historical Dictionary," "Remarks on the Newtonian Philosophy," &c. Died, at Ratisbon, 1802.

FELLER, JOACHIM, a German poet, was born at Zwickaw in 1638; chosen professor of poetry at Leipsic in 1661; and became librarian to that university in 1676. His death, which happened in 1691, was occasioned by his falling from a window, in a fit of somnambulism. His talent for poetry was very early developed, and his compositions were chiefly in Latin.

FELLER, JOACHIM FREDERIC, son of the foregoing, was secretary to the Grand-duke of Weimar; a situation he filled during 20 years; travelling a considerable part of the time, under his patron's auspices, for the purpose of examining the principal libraries of Europe. He wrote a valuable work, entitled "Monumenta varia Inedita," and some others. Died, 1726.

FELLOWES, ROBERT, LL.D., a writer chiefly on religious and political subjects, was born in Norfolk, 1770. He was educated at St. Mary Hall, Oxford, where he attained the degree of M.A. in 1801; and was ordained in 1795; but he gradually relinquished the doctrines of the Church of England, and at length adopted the opinions maintained in the work which he published in 1836, under the title of "The Religion of the Universe." He was the intimate friend of Dr. Parr and the Baron Maseres: the former presented him to queen Caroline, whose cause he espoused with great zeal; and the latter left him nearly 200,000*l.*, which enabled him at once to gratify his own tastes for literature, and to benefit his fellow-creatures. He entered with much spirit into the project of establishing a university in London, supporting it both by his counsel and his purse; and on recovering from a tedious illness, to indicate his gratitude to Dr. Elliotson in a way which he thought would be most agreeable to that gentleman, he founded two annual gold medals, called the Fellowes medals, for the greatest proficient in clinical science. Died, 1847.

FELTHAM, OWEN, was born about the middle of the 17th century in Suffolk. Little more is known of him than that he resided many years in the family of the Earl of Thomond, during which period he published a work of great merit, entitled "Resolves, Divine, Political, and Moral," which went through 12 editions before the year 1709. Died, about 1678.

FELTRE, HENRY JAMES WILLIAM CLARKE, Duke of, was born in 1765, at Landrecies, where his father was a keeper of the public stores. In 1781 he entered the military school at Paris; in 1790 he went to London with the French embassy, and afterwards served in the infantry and cavalry, until he was suspended, and imprisoned as a noble. He was subsequently employed by Carnot; and the directory, in 1795, created him general of division. In 1807 he was made minister of war, and shortly after created duke of Feltre. Though indebted to Buonaparte for his dukedom, he contributed towards the restoration of the Bourbons, and held office under the government at his death, which took place in 1818.

FENELON, FRANCIS DE SALIGNAC DE LA MOTTE, archbishop of Cambrai, was born in 1651, at the château Fenelon, in Perigord, of a family illustrious in church and state. He studied at Cahors and Paris, where he made such astonishing progress in the most difficult studies, that, in his 15th year, he preached with great applause. At the age of 24, Fenelon took holy orders, and commenced his regular ministerial functions in the parish of St. Sulpice. He was afterwards appointed chief of a mission for the conversion of heretics in Saintonge and Aunis; and on his return he became known to the public as a writer, by a work, "Sur le Ministère des Pasteurs," and a treatise, "De l'Education des Filles." In 1689, Louis XIV. entrusted to him the education of his grandsons, the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri. Fenelon was successful in forming the mind of the young Duke of Burgundy, heir presumptive to the throne of France, and sowed the seeds of every princely virtue in his heart; but his premature death blasted the pleasing anticipations entertained respecting him. In 1694, Fenelon was created archbishop of Cambray; soon after which, a theological dispute with Bossuet, his former instructor, respecting the devotional mysticism of the celebrated Madame Guyon, whose opinions Fenelon favoured, terminated in his condemnation by pope Innocent XII., and his banishment to his diocese of Louis XIV. From this time he lived in his diocese, sustaining the venerable character of a Christian philosopher, and scrupulously performing his sacred duties. His works in the departments of philosophy, theology, and the belles lettres, have immortalised his name. He was familiar with the best models of ancient and modern times, and his mind was animated by a mild and gentle spirit of benevolence. In person and manners Fenelon was one of the most engaging of men, joining to a noble manner a distinguishing politeness, and adding to a flowery eloquence the power of making himself understood upon the most abstruse subjects. He wrote many excellent works; among the chief of which may be reckoned his "Dialogues of the Dead," "Dialogues on Eloquence," "Letters on different Religious and Metaphysical Subjects," &c. But his most celebrated production, and the one which for ages will survive, is his "Adventures of Telemachus," in which he endeavoured to exhibit a model for the education of a prince; and more pure and elevated maxims were never vewn into a tale either of truth or fiction. His death was accelerated by the overturning of his carriage, which brought on a fever, and the amiable and virtuous prelate expired in Jan. 1715.

FENESTELLA, LUCIUS, a Roman historian, who flourished during the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. Died, A. D. 20.

FENN, Sir JOHN, an antiquary of great research, was born in 1739, at Norwich; educated at Caius College, Cambridge, and died in 1794. He published two volumes of an interesting collection of letters, written by members of the Paston family, with which he was proceeding when his death took place.

FENTON, ELIJAH, a poet of considerable talent, was born in 1683, at Shelton, near Newcastle, in Staffordshire. Having received a classical education, the Earl of Orrery, in 1710, made him his private secretary, and placed his eldest son under his care. He afterwards lived with Lady Trumbull as tutor to her son, and died at her seat in Berkshire, in 1730. He became acquainted with most of the wits of the age, and assisted Pope in his translation of the Odyssey. Besides this, he published "Mariamne," a tragedy, and the lives of Milton and Waller.

FENTON, Sir GEOFFREY, an English writer, was born in Nottinghamshire, and died at Dublin, in 1608. He translated Guicciardini's History of the Wars of Italy.

FERAUD, JOHN FRANCIS, a French grammarian, and a professor of rhetoric and philosophy at Besançon, was born in 1725, and died in 1807. He wrote "A Grammatical Dictionary of the French Language," 2 vols. 8vo., and "A Critical Dictionary," 3 vols. 4to.

FERBER, JOHN JAMES, a Swedish mineralogist of note, was born at Carlserona, in 1743; and died in Switzerland, while on a scientific tour, in 1790. He wrote "Letters from Italy," which are much esteemed; and his other works are all more or less descriptive of mines and minerals in different parts of Germany.

FERDINAND V., king of Arragon, surnamed the Catholic, on account of the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, was the son of John II. of Arragon, and born in 1453. By his marriage with Isabella, queen of Castile, he founded the union of the different Spanish kingdoms; overcame Alphonso, king of Portugal, at the battle of Toro, in 1476; totally subjugated the Moorish power in Spain, which had for so many centuries baffled all the efforts of his ancestors; and brought under his rule a large proportion of the Neapolitan dominions. But the most extraordinary feature in his reign is the discovery of America by Columbus, which opened to him and his successors the sovereignty of a new hemisphere. He died in 1516; having, by a course of sinister policy, lost the respect of his contemporaries, although the splendour of his arms placed him at the head of European princes.

FERDINAND I., emperor of Germany, succeeded his brother, Charles V., in 1558, at which time Ferdinand was king of the Romans, and of Hungary and Bohemia. — FERDINAND II. was the son of the Archduke of Styria; elected king of Bohemia in 1617, and of Hungary in 1611. Soon afterwards he succeeded Mathias as emperor. He died in 1637. — FERDINAND III., surnamed Ernest, was the son of the preceding, and born in 1608; made king of Hungary in 1625, of Bohemia in 1627, and succeeded his father in 1637. He died in 1657.

FERDINAND, king of Naples and of Sicily, succeeded Alphonso in 1458. He died in 1494, aged 70, detested for his debaucheries and cruelties; yet he enacted many good laws, and restored the university of Naples.

FERDINAND OF CORDOVA, a learned scholar and accomplished cavalier of the 15th century, whose attainments in every art and science that can adorn the mind, or add a dignity to manhood, have been handed down for the admiration of posterity. That he was possessed of great and versatile abilities may fairly be supposed; but the accounts related of him are so extravagant as to stagger the belief of the most credulous.

FERDINAND I., king of the Two Sicilies, was born in 1751, and succeeded his father Charles III. on the throne of Naples, in 1759, on the accession of the latter to that of Spain. During his minority, the government was conducted by a council of regency; and at that time Ferdinand was a great favourite with the people, in consequence of the familiarity of his demeanour. In 1768

he married Maria Caroline, daughter of the empress Maria Theresa, who soon acquired such a decided influence over him, that he consulted her upon all occasions. His faithful minister, Tanucci, who had been the president of the council of regency, having lost the favour of Charles III. of Spain, gave in his resignation in 1777, and was succeeded by the Marquis Sambuca. This minister, observing that the influence of the queen over her husband was unbounded, attempted to alienate the king from her, by means of a beautiful English woman, who had married a Frenchman named Goudar, at Naples; but the queen discovered the plot; M. and Mme. Goudar were banished from Naples, and Sambuca thought it prudent to retire. Acton, his successor, followed implicitly the wishes of the queen; and the cabinet of Madrid now lost all influence in that of Naples, which became more closely united with that of Austria and Britain. But a new era was approaching. The French revolutionary government demanded that Naples should renounce all connection with Britain, and enforced its demand by sending a fleet into the bay of the Neapolitan capital. On the death of Louis XVI., however, Ferdinand joined the coalition against France, and took part in the general war from 1793 to 1796. After two years of peace, the victory of Nelson at Aboukir again engaged Ferdinand against the French, who, on the defeat of the Neapolitans under General Mack, took possession of the whole kingdom, and proclaimed the Parthenopean republic, in 1799. But, during the same year, the capital again fell into the hands of the royalist army, under Cardinal Ruffo, and many adherents of the republic were executed. In this way, under the imbecile rule of Ferdinand, Naples continued to change sides, according to the power and influence of the two great belligerent nations, until the Congress of Vienna, in 1814, finally re-established him in all his rights as king of the Two Sicilies. Unfit as this monarch was to wield the sceptre, all agree that he felt a strong sympathy for the sufferings of his subjects, that he was a patron of charitable institutions, and decidedly good-natured. He died Jan. 24. 1825.

FERDINAND VII., king of Spain and the Indies, son of Charles IV. and Maria Louisa of Parma, was born at St. Ildefonso, in 1784. He was recognised prince of Asturias when 6 years old. It was at this epoch, in 1790, that the deputies of the Spanish provinces demanded the re-establishment of the Cortes, which Charles IV. had abolished; but after some difficulties the claim was abandoned. The Duke of San Carlos and Don Juan Escoiquiz were appointed governors of the young prince, who is said to have made brilliant progress in mathematical studies. Spain was at that time governed by Godoy (Prince of Peace) with little short of absolute royal power. This minion saw an insurmountable obstacle to his ambition in the heir apparent to the crown, and aimed at obtaining the same influence over Ferdinand as he had obtained over his parents; but the design was defeated by his two governors, who succeeded in inspiring him with a disgust and dread of Godoy. Finding he could not succeed, he sought to thwart him in all his designs and wishes. In 1801, Ferdinand married Maria Antonia, a princess of Naples, who was highly accomplished, possessed great independence of character, and attracted all hearts by her beauty and talents. The envy of the queen-mother, thus excited, was speedily converted into hatred; and the princess from that time was subjected to the most cruel persecutions; nay, it is even alleged that she was despatched by poison given to her in a cup of coffee, in 1806. The designs of Napoleon on Spain now began to operate. Beauharnois, the French ambassador at Madrid, was instructed to open a secret conference with Ferdinand, to detach him from the projects of Godoy, and induce him to connect himself with the Buonaparte family by marrying the eldest daughter of Lucien Buonaparte. Ferdinand assented by letter to this overture. Godoy was informed of it, and, trembling for his interest, hastened to detail the secret transaction to Charles IV., taking care to paint it in the most odious colours, and accusing Ferdinand of a design to possess himself of the throne. The king was so enraged, that he immediately ordered the prince to be imprisoned at the Escorial, and his papers to be seized. On the 30th of October following, a decree was addressed to the council of Castile, declaring Ferdinand, and all those who had abetted his design, traitors to the state. This extreme measure was the work of Godoy; but, with his usual hypocrisy, he opened negotiations with Ferdinand, offering to act as mediator between him and his father. He induced him to write a letter of unconditional submission to the king, and the consequence was a public reconciliation of the parties. But astonishment succeeded to the expressions of public joy caused by this event, when it was now for the first time learned that the French army had crossed the frontiers, and was marching directly on Madrid. The king then gave out that he was on the point of setting out for Andalusia. The mob rose at Aranjuez and elsewhere, proceeding to violence, and asserting a determination not to allow the king to quit the kingdom; but it was against Godoy, and with a view to his dismissal, that the public indignation was chiefly excited. Alarmed at these popular tumults, Charles abdicated his throne; and Ferdinand, being proclaimed his successor, began his reign by reducing taxes, and issuing a decree for devoting the crown lands to public purposes. Meanwhile, the French advanced towards Madrid, and all parties (including the new king) were ignorant that this proceeding was the result of a treaty concluded between Godoy and Napoleon at Fontainebleau. Ferdinand sent the latter a deputation requesting the preservation of amity; to which Napoleon replied, that Charles IV. was his ally and friend, and that he could not recognise the rights or pretensions of any other claimant to the throne. Murat, then advancing on Madrid, returned a similar answer, and was in actual possession of that capital when Ferdinand made his public entry. Being apprised by Murat and the Duke of Rovigo that Napoleon was coming to Bayonne, the former persuaded Ferdinand to meet Napoleon there, with a view to separate him from his subjects. On his arrival he was not long before he was made aware of the snare into which he had fallen. After dining with Napoleon, who treated him with cordiality, he was apprised by Savary that Napoleon claimed the title of disposing of the Spanish crown, and absolutely demanded his renunciation of it. Napoleon afterwards proposed to give him one of his nieces in marriage, and make him king of Etruria; but Ferdinand refused to assent, and was from that time, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his minister Cevallos, treated with the rigour of a prisoner. Godoy shortly after arrived with Charles IV. and the queen. The latter instantly reclaimed the crown of Ferdinand, who then made a public resignation of it to his father. Meanwhile, the Spaniards, stimulated by the junta left by Ferdinand at Madrid, with powers to convoke the Cortes, were rising in arms in all directions; and Napoleon, alarmed, now induced the whole of the royal family of Spain to go to Bourdeaux, and there make a formal cession of the crown. He immediately proclaimed his brother Joseph king, and placed Ferdinand in confinement at Valençay, where he and his family were kept under the rigorous surveillance of the police, and remained in custody till December, 1813; when Napoleon, after his disasters in Russia, found it impossible to retain possession of Spain, and a treaty of peace was signed at Valençay between him and Ferdinand; by which the latter was restored to the exercise of his royal powers. Thus released from a captivity of six years, the young monarch reached the Catalonian frontier, March 24. 1814. He was received every where with the distinctions appertaining to royalty by the retiring French army, and with the warmest testimonies of affection by the people. But he constantly refused to sign the constitution established by the Cortes during his absence, although he had promised to do so before quitting Valençay. On arriving at Madrid he dissolved the Cortes, and assumed all the odious privileges of absolute power. The old institutions were replaced, and the inquisition was re-established. These causes of dissatisfaction were long producing their effects, but at length, in 1820, Riego, a lieutenant-colonel, placed himself at the head of a party at Cadiz, and, although supported by a very trivial force, proclaimed the constitution of 1812, established by the Cortes; and Ferdinand, compelled to yield, convoked the Cortes on the 7th of March, and shortly after swore fidelity to the constitution of 1812. But from this time the noblesse and the dignitaries of the church set themselves secretly and openly to oppose the march of the revolution, and perpetual shocks and collisions occurred between them and the popular party. Popular tumults occurred, which were instantly pleaded against the cause of the constitution. Protests were made by Russia against the continuance of this revolutionary anarchy; France was prompted to adopt a pretended ordonnance sanitaire, with an obvious intention to seize the first opportunity of invading Spain; mutual charges and recriminations were made between the Spanish and French ministers; and England's voice, as an umpire, was appealed to, but was scarcely heard. At length France declared war; and the Duke d'Angoulême entered Spain, with an avowed design of putting down the constitutionalists, and restoring Ferdinand to absolute power. It is not our place in this biography to detail the events of the campaign. It is sufficient to record that Ferdinand was restored, at its termination, to the exercise of an unmitigated arbitrary tyranny, which he indulged in, without compunction, till his death. In 1816, Ferdinand married Maria Theresa, a princess of Portugal, for his second wife; in 1819, Maria-Josepha Amelia, a princess of Saxony, for his third. She died in 1828; and in 1829 he married Maria Christina, the daughter of Francis I., king of Naples, mother of the present queen of Spain. Died, 1833.

FERDINANDI, EPIPHANIUS, a physician of Otranto; author of several professional treatises—"De Vita Propaganda," "De Peste," &c. Born, 1563; died, 1638.

FERDUSI, or FERDOUSI, a celebrated Persian poet, whose talents having attracted the notice of Mahmoud, the reigning sultan, he gave him a distinguished reception at his court, and employed him to write a metrical history of the Persian sovereigns. This work, which is called the Schahnameh, contains 60,000 stanzas, and occupied him 30 years, during which long period the enemies of Ferdusi succeeded in prejudicing Mahmoud against him. Instead of being rewarded, according to promise, with 60,000 pieces of gold, the same number of the smallest silver coin was sent to him, which the poet indignantly distributed among the menials, wrote a severe satire on the sultan, and fled to Bagdad. Born, 916; died, 1020.

FERGUSON, ADAM, an eminent historian and moral philosopher, was born, in 1724, at Logierait, Perthshire, of which parish his father was minister. He was educated at Perth, St. Andrew's, and Edinburgh; was chaplain to the 42nd regiment, in Flanders, till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle; and, on his return to Edinburgh, was chosen professor of natural philosophy, which chair he subsequently resigned for that of moral philosophy. In 1767 appeared his "Essay on Civil Society," which procured him the degree of LL.D. In 1773 he accompanied the Earl of Chesterfield on his travels; and, in 1776, having replied to Dr. Price on Civil Liberty, he was appointed to the secretaryship of a reconciliatory mission sent out to America in 1778. On his return he resumed his professional duties, and composed his "History of the Roman Republic," in 3 vols. 4to. Several years after this appeared his "Treatise on Moral and Political Science," 2 vols. 4to.; and "Institutes of Moral Philosophy." Died, 1816.

FERGUSON, JAMES, an experimental philosopher, astronomer, and mechanist, was the son of a labourer, and born, in 1710, at Keith, in Banffshire, Scotland. His extraordinary genius quickly displayed itself, as he learned to read in infancy by hearing his father teach one of his brothers; and when only 8 years of age he constructed a wooden clock. When old enough to work, he was placed out as a servant to a farmer, who employed him in keeping sheep; in which situation he acquired a surprising knowledge of the stars; and his abilities being discovered by some neighbouring gentlemen, one of them took him to his house, where he learnt decimal arithmetic and the rudiments of algebra and geometry. From a description of the globes in Gordon's grammar, he made one in three weeks sufficiently accurate to enable him to work problems; and, having a taste for drawing, began to draw portraits with Indian ink, by which he supported himself creditably some years. In 1743 he came to London, where he published some astronomical tables and calculations, and gave lectures in experimental philosophy, which he repeated with success throughout the kingdom. In 1754 he published a brief description of the solar system, with an astronomical account of the year of our Saviour's crucifixion, 8vo.; also an idea of the Material Universe, deduced from a Survey of the Solar system. But his greatest work is his "Astronomy explained upon Sir Isaac Newton's Principles, and made easy to those who have not studied Mathematics." On the accession of George III., who had attended his lectures, he received a pension of 50*l.* a year; and he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. He published numerous works on astronomy, mechanics, drawing, electricity, &c., all of which were successful; and he died possessed of considerable property—the sole result of a persevering industry in the application of those talents with which nature had so liberally endowed him. In his manners he was meek and unassuming; in his religious principles, sincerely devout. Died, 1776.

FERGUSON, ROBERT, a poet, was born at Edinburgh in 1750. He was educated for the ministry, but a love of poetry and dissipation disqualified him for that profession, and he obtained a place in the sheriff-clerk's office at Edinburgh. His conversational powers rendered his company highly attractive; and the excesses into which he was led are said to have impaired his naturally feeble constitution, and rendered him an inmate of the Edinburgh lunatic asylum, where he died in 1774. His poems, written in the Scottish dialect, have considerable merit, but those in English are often below mediocrity.

FERISHTA, MOHAMMED CASEM, an Indian historian, who flourished in the 16th and 17th centuries, was born at Ahmednagar, in the Deccan. He was liberally patronised by the sovereign of Visapour, under whose auspices he published his "History of India under the Mussulmans," a work of acknowledged merit for impartiality and truth.

FERMAT, PETER DE, an eminent mathematician, civilian, and poet, was born at Toulouse, in 1590, and died in 1664. He was a good scholar, and wrote poetry in the Latin, French, and Spanish languages. His prose works were collected and published under the title of "Opera Varia Mathematica."

FERNANDEZ, JUAN, a Spanish pilot and navigator, who, in 1572, discovered the island which bears his name.

FERNANDEZ XIMENES DE NAVARETTE, JOHN, a celebrated Spanish painter, and a pupil of Titian, was born, at Logrono, in 1526, and surnamed El Mudo, in consequence of being deaf and dumb. He was appointed painter to Philip II.; and died in 1579.

FERRACINO, BARTHOLOMEW, a self-taught genius of Padua. He was born in 1695, and bred a sawyer. His first invention was a saw worked by the wind. He made curious clocks and hydraulic engines, but his greatest work is the bridge over the Brenta, which is remarkable for the boldness of the design, and its firmness. He died about 1764.

FERRAND, ANTHONY, a French counsellor, who died at Paris in 1719; author of various songs, epigrams, and madrigals.

FERRANDO, GONSALVO, a native of Oviedo, in Spain; author of a tract on the virtues of the Lignum Guaiacum, which he brought from America at the close of the 15th century, and introduced into Europe for its valuable medical properties.

FERRAR, ROBERT, an English prelate of the 16th century, was born at Halifax, Yorkshire, and became prior of the monastery of St. Oswald, which he surrendered on the dissolution in 1540, and, embracing the principles of the Reformation, was made bishop of St. David's by Edward VI. But, neglecting some form admmissive of the king's supremacy, he was fined beyond his ability to pay, and imprisoned. On the accession of Mary he was brought before Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, tried, and declared guilty of heresy, and burnt at Caermarthen in 1555.

FERRARI, the name of a Milanese family, many of whose members, during the 16th and 17th centuries, were distinguished by their scholastic attainments. OCTAVIAN FERRARI, born in 1518, professor of politics and ethics successively at Milan and Padua, translated the works of Athenæus into Latin, and wrote two treatises on the works of Aristotle, &c. He died in 1586.—FRANCISCO BERNARDINO FERRARI, born in 1577, was a doctor of the Ambrosian college of Milan, and celebrated throughout Europe for his intimate acquaintance with books and literature in general. His collection of rare books formed the foundation of the celebrated Ambrosian library; and his own writings, several of which are yet extant, display great erudition. Died, 1669.—OCTAVIO FERRARI, born in 1607, was professor of rhetoric and historiographer at Milan. He afterwards settled at Padua, where the fame of his learning brought him numerous scholars, and the patronage of crowned heads. Among these were Christina of Sweden and Louis XIV., from the latter of whom he enjoyed a pension of 500 crowns. Distinguished as he was by his great talents, he was not less remarkable for suavity of manners and disposition, universally acquiring thereby the appellation of Pacificator. He followed Scaliger in an able work, entitled "Origines Linguae Italica," and wrote various treatises on ancient manners, customs, &c. Died, 1682.

FERRARI, GAUDENZIO, an eminent painter, was born at Valdugia, in 1484, and assisted Raffaele in ornamenting the Vatican. Died, 1550. — GIOVANNI ANDREA, celebrated as well for his paintings of fruit and flowers, as for his landscapes and historical pieces, was born at Genoa, in 1599, and died in 1669.

FERRARI, LOUIS, an Italian mathematician, was born, in 1552, at Bologna, where he became professor. He was a pupil of Cardan, and the discoverer of the method of resolving biquadratic equations.

FERRARIS, JOSEPH, Count de, an Austrian general, distinguished as a geographer and skilful engineer. He was born at Luneville, in 1726; entered the army in 1741, and in 1776 was appointed director-general of artillery for the Netherlands, at which time he undertook and completed the 25 sheet map of that country, which bears his name. He served against the French in the campaign of 1793; afterwards became vice-president of the aulic council of war at Vienna; was made a field-marshal in 1808; and died in 1814.

FERRARS, EDWARD, a native of Warwickshire; author of some tragedies and comedies. Died, 1564.

FERRARS, GEORGE, a lawyer and poet, was born in 1512, near St. Alban's; educated at Oxford; and studied at Lincoln's Inn. He was in great esteem with Henry VIII., who gave him a large grant of lands in Hertfordshire. He wrote some pieces inserted in the Mirror for Magistrates, published in 1559; and the History of Queen Mary, in Grafton's Chronicle. One event of his political life is, however, more memorable than his personal history, as it records the recognition of a valuable parliamentary privilege. While attending his duty as a member of the House of Commons, he was arrested and sent to prison for debt, which the Commons no sooner heard of than they demanded his release. This was refused, and their serjeant had his mace broken while defending himself in an affray with the officers of the Compter. The case was referred to the lords, who judged the contempt to be very great; and although the city magistrates at length submitted to the authority of Parliament, their tardy obedience did not exempt the parties from punishment; for the sheriffs, and the plaintiff at whose suit Ferras was arrested, were committed to the Tower, and the clerks to Newgate; and an act of parliament passed, discharging Ferrars from liability for the debt. Died, 1579.

FERREIRA, ANTONIO, a poet ranked by the Portuguese as one of their classic authors, was born at Lisbon, in 1528. He carried to perfection the elegiac and epistolary style, and his "Ines de Castro" is the second regular tragedy that appeared after the revival of letters in Europe. Died, 1560.

FERRERAS, JOHN DE, a learned Spanish historian and ecclesiastic, was born at Labanza, in 1652, of a poor but noble family, and completed his studies at Salamanca. He wrote several works in philosophy, theology, and history, the most considerable of which is his "History of Spain," in 10 vols. 4to. He also assisted in the compilation of the great Spanish Dictionary. Died, 1735.

FERRETI, or FERRETO, an historian and poet of Vicenza, was born about 1296, and contributed greatly to the restoration of polite literature in Italy.

FERRIAR, JOHN, a physician and miscellaneous writer, was born at Chester, in 1764; took his medical degree at Edinburgh, and settled at Manchester, where he was chosen physician to the infirmary and lunatic asylum, and became an efficient and active member of the Literary and Philosophical Society. He wrote many professional tracts, published under the title of "Medical Histories and Reflections;" also "Illustrations of Sterne," which display much research in tracing that eccentric author's literary obligations to Burton, Hall, and other satirical moralists; besides other works, in verse and prose. Died, 1815.

FERRI, CIBO, an eminent Italian painter and architect, was born at Rome in 1634. He was a pupil of Pietro de Cortona, to whose style his pictures bear a strong resemblance. Died, 1689.

FERRIER, ARNOLD DU, an eminent French lawyer and diplomatist, was born at Toulouse, in 1506. Having a strong predilection for the Protestant religion, although brought up a Catholic, he at length openly avowed his opinions, and availed himself of the patronage of the King of Navarre, who made him his chancellor. Father Paul was greatly indebted to Ferrier for his assistance in compiling the History of the Council of Trent, where he had attended in his capacity of advocate, and been distinguished for the boldness of his language. Died, 1585.

FESCH, JOSEPH, senior priest-cardinal of the sacred college, and archbishop of Lyons, and brother of Lætitia Ramolini, mother of Napoleon Buonaparte, was born at Ajaccio, in Corsica, in 1764, educated in France, and was in that country when the revolution broke out. Young and ardent, he instantly became attached to the new state of things, threw off the clerical attire of the seminary at which he was studying, and entered the army at Montesquieu, in Switzerland, in the capacity of a store-keeper. In 1796 we find him commissary-general to the army of Italy, which was then commanded by his nephew, Buonaparte. Having in this capacity realised a princely fortune, he retired from the army, resumed his clerical studies and profession, and in 1802 was consecrated archbishop of Lyons. Early in the following year he received a cardinal's hat, and went to Rome as ambassador from France. There he was received with peculiar distinction; but it would seem that the cardinal's hat, any more than the monk's hood, does not always cover true piety. His luxurious way of living, and a certain air of the camp that appeared both in his mien and in his conversation, gave considerable scandal to the graver Romans; and that scandal was especially increased by his obstinately persisting in giving concerts at his palace, even in Lent, in defiance of a particular and very strict order to the contrary. In 1804 the cardinal accompanied Pius VII. to Paris, and assisted in the consecration of Napoleon; by whom, in the following year, he was made grand almoner of France, a principal officer of the legion of honour, and a member of the senate. As president of the council of Paris, he opposed his self-willed nephew in many of his unjust schemes, and both boldly and constantly, though ineffectually, protested against the violence with which he insulted the unfortunate pope. Napoleon, who was as incapable of sympathising with such true greatness of mind as he was of practising it, showed how deeply he felt his uncle's opposition, by depriving him of his succession to the arch-chancellorship, and nominating in his stead Eugene Beauharnois, with the title of grand-duke of Frankfort. When his disgrace with the emperor was thus published, he retired at first to Lyons, and subsequently to Rome, where, with Madame Buonaparte, he lived a quiet but most luxurious life. His library and picture gallery were the finest that even Rome, that city of the arts, could boast. Died, 1839.

FEUILLEE, LOUIS, an eminent naturalist, geographer, and mathematician, was born at Provence, about the middle of the 17th century. Louis XIV. sent him to South America to make researches in natural history and philosophy, of which he wrote a "Journal," in 2 vols. 4to. He was afterwards employed in an expedition to the Canary Islands, to ascertain the relative position of the meridian of Ferro, which, having satisfactorily performed, he was rewarded with a pension and the situation of botanist to the king. Died, 1732.

FEVRE, GUY LE, a French poet, was born, in 1541, at La Boderie, in Lower Normandy. He was the author of several works relating to oriental literature, besides several poems, which obtained for him considerable reputation. Died, 1598.

FEVRE, ANTHONY LE, a brother of the preceding, an eminent statesman, was ambassador at Brussels in 1597, when he discovered the conspiracy of Marshal Biron against his master, Henry IV. He was twice ambassador to England, and died in 1615.

FEVRE, or FABER, TANAQUIL, a classical scholar, of great eminence, was born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1615. Cardinal Richelieu procured him a pension of 2000 livres, with the office of inspector of works printed at the Louvre. He was subsequently professor of classical literature at Saumur, and died there in 1672. His works, which are very numerous, chiefly consist of commentaries on, and translations from, the Greek and Latin authors. The celebrated Madame Dacier was his daughter. Died, 1672.

FEYJOO Y MONTENEGRO, BENEDICT JEROME, a Spanish Benedictine monk of the last century, who published his thoughts on a vast variety of topics, in the form of essays designed for popular use, whence he has been sometimes styled the Spanish Addison. His "Teatro Critico Universal," and his "Cartas eruditas y curiosas," both works of merit, are devoted to a common object—the refutation of error, and the removal of prejudice. A selection from his essays and discourses was translated into English, and published in 4 vols. in 1780.

FICHTE, JOHN THEOPHILUS, a celebrated German philosopher and metaphysician, was born, in 1762, in Upper Lusatia; studied at Wittenberg and Leipsic; and was successively professor of philosophy at Jena, Erlangen, and Berlin. In most of his writings he unfolds the doctrines of transcendental idealism, representing the life of the mind as the only real life, and all the reality in the universe being expressed in what he called the "absolute I." His works have been translated into English. Died, 1814.

FICINUS, or FICINO, MARSIUS, an eminent scholar of the 15th century, and one of the revivers of a taste for Platonic philosophy in Europe, was born at Florence, in 1433. His father was physician to Cosmo de Medici, and was himself patronised by Cosmo, Peter, and Lorenzo. He was such an enthusiastic admirer of the writings of Plato, that he not only made a Latin version of them, but decanted upon them in an academy, and even preached their doctrines from the pulpit. Died, 1499.

FIDDES, RICHARD, a clergyman of the Church of England, and author of several works, was born at Hunmanby, Yorkshire, in 1671; educated at University College, Oxford; and obtained the rectory of Hailsham. While there he contracted an illness, which ever after nearly deprived him of utterance, and this led him to devote himself to literature. Among his various works are, "A Body of Divinity," 2 vols. folio; "Fifty-two Practical Discourses;" and a "Life of Cardinal Wolsey;" the last evidently a party work, written to favour the views of the Pretender and of popery. Died, 1725.

FIELD, RICHARD, a learned divine, was born in 1561, at Hemel Hampstead, Herts, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1598, being then a D. D., he was made chaplain in ordinary to Queen Elizabeth, and afterwards a prebendary of Windsor. He was a great favourite of James I., who bestowed upon him the deanery of Gloucester, and proposed sending him into Germany to compose the differences between the Lutherans and Calvinists; but for some reason this appointment did not take place. He gained great reputation by a work, entitled "Of the Church;" and he commenced "A View of the Controversies in Religion," which he did not live to finish. Died, 1616.

FIELDEN, JOHN, M.P., whose exertions in behalf of the labouring classes deserve honourable mention, was originally himself a labouring man, but gradually worked his way up to competence, influence, and authority; and when through the medium of his combined industry and intelligence he had become a master, his fidelity to his caste made him the earnest and untrusting champion of the rights of his fellow toilers. He sat in parliament for Oldham, from 1832 to 1847. His exertions in regard to the memorable ten hours' bill will not speedily be forgotten. Died, 1849.

FIELDING, HENRY, an English novelist and a political writer, pre-eminently distinguished for genuine humour and a knowledge of the world, was the son of Licutgeneral Fielding, of Sharpham Park, Somerset, where Henry was born, April 22. 1707. He was first sent to Eton, whence he removed to Leyden; but the straitened circumstances of his father shortened his academical studies, which, added to a love of gaiety and dissipation, led him to turn his attention to the stage. His first piece, which came out in 1727, was entitled "Love in several Masks," and its success induced him to persevere. Some of his dramatic efforts were, however, failures; though neither wit, humour, nor sprightliness is generally wanting in them. In his 27th year, he married Miss Craddock, a lady of some fortune; and, at the same time, by the death of his mother, became possessed of a small estate in Dorsetshire. Unfortunately, instead of husbanding these resources, he immediately set up for a country gentleman, on a scale which, in 3 years, reduced him to greater indigence than ever, with a young family to support. He then, for the first time, dedicated himself to the bar as a profession, and, for immediate subsistence, employed his pen on various miscellaneous subjects, "The History of Jonathan Wild" being among the early fruits of his literary industry. In 1742 appeared his first novel, "Joseph Andrews," in which the Cervantic style of humour is admirably imitated. It immediately received the attention to which it was entitled; but success as a novel-writer was not very likely to advance his practice at the bar; nor was the emolument attached to it sufficient for a manner of life never sufficiently regulated by the rules of prudence. He was further impeded in his profession by repeated attacks of the gout; added to which, his domestic affliction was greatly increased by the death of his wife. Neither disease nor grief, however, paralysed the efforts of his pen. In rapid succession he brought forth 4 periodical papers, called "The Champion," "The True Patriot," "The Jacobite Journal," and "The Covent Garden Journal," "Essays on Conversation, and on the Knowledge and Characters of Men," "A Journey from this World to the Next," and the novels of "Tom Jones" and "Amelia." During the rebellion of 1745, he lent the assistance of his literary talents to the government, and was rewarded with the then not altogether reputable office of a Middlesex justice. To the credit of Fielding, however, he did much to render it more respectable by the prevention of crimes, and the improvement of the police. Ill health at length obliged him to try the milder air of Lisbon, and a Narrative of his Voyage to that place was the last of his works. He, unhappily, received no benefit from the change, but died in the Portuguese capital, in 1754. Notwithstanding the lapse of a century, and the change in manners, the inimitable wit of Fielding is still relished, and his accurate knowledge of character universally admitted.

FIELDING, Sir JOHN, half-brother of Henry, and his successor as a justice for Middlesex. Though blind from his childhood, he discharged his office with great credit, and in 1761 received the honour of knighthood. He published some tracts on the penal code, and a miscellaneous collection, entitled "The Universal Mentor." Died, 1780.

FIELDING, SARAH, the third sister of Henry Fielding, was born in 1714, lived unmarried, and died at Bath, in 1768. She was a woman of talent, and wrote several novels, &c., of which "David Simple" is the principal. She also translated from the Greek "Xenophon's Memoirs of Socrates."

FIENNES, WILLIAM, lord Say and Sele, was born in 1582, and educated at New College, Oxford. In 1624 he was made a viscount; yet, like many others who had experienced the favours of the court, he joined the parliamentarians. He, however, concurred in the Restoration, and was made lord privy seal and chamberlain of the household. He died in 1662.

FIENNES, NATHANIEL, second son of the above, was born in 1608, and educated at New College, Oxford, after which he went to Geneva. He was a considerable leader of the independent party, and commanded at Bristol when that city was taken by Prince Rupert, and would have suffered death for his disloyalty, but for the influence of his father. Died, 1669.

FIESCO, JOHN LOUIS, count of Lavagna, a Genoese of an illustrious family, and a victim of unsuccessful ambition, was at the head of the conspiracy which was formed against the celebrated Andrew Doria and his nephew. On the evening of the 1st of January, 1547, Fiesco, who had prepared a galley under pretence of a cruise against the corsairs, waited upon Doria to request permission to depart from the harbour early in the morning. Having succeeded in lulling his intended victims into a false security, he sallied forth in the night at the head of 500 men; and dispatching parties to take possession of different posts, himself proceeded to the dock, where the galleys lay; but in passing on a plank from one galley to another, he fell into the water, and, owing to the weight of his armour, was unable to rise again. His confederates failed in their attempt on Andrew Doria, though Giannettino, his nephew, fell beneath their swords; and the family of Fiesco were made to pay the penalty of his ambition by ruin and proscription.

FIESOLE (so called from the monastery to which he belonged) was one of the most celebrated restorers of painting in Italy. His family name was Santi Tosini. Born, 1387; died, 1584.

FIGUEROA, BARTHOLOMEW CARASCOSA DE, a Spanish poet, was a native of Logrono, and studied at the university of Salamanca. Born, 1510; died, 1570.

FILANGIERI, GAETANO, a celebrated writer on political economy and legislation, was born at Naples, in 1752. He was at first intended for the army, but being of studious habits, he was allowed to gratify his inclination for a literary life. His great work, entitled "The Science of Legislation," notwithstanding it was never completed according to his original design, attracted great attention, from its bold and original views, and the liberality of its sentiments; and places him in the rank of a first-rate writer upon one of the most difficult and important subjects that can engage the mind of man. In 1787 he was made a member of the supreme council of finance, and died in 1788.

FILICIAIA, VINCENZO DA, an eminent Italian poet, was born at Florence, in 1642, and studied at Pisa. His "Canzoni," commemorating the deliverance of Vienna by John Sobieski, fully established his poetical fame, and obtained for him from the Duke of Tuscany the title of senator, while more solid rewards awaited him in being appointed governor, first of Volterra, and afterwards of Pisa. Died, 1707.

FILMER, Sir ROBERT, an English writer, was born in Kent, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He wrote "The Anarchy of a limited and mixed Monarchy," "Patriarcha," in which he contends that government was monarchical in the patriarchal ages; and "The Freeholder's Grand Inquest." He was a man of talent, but a more bigoted champion of absolute monarchy has seldom appeared; and it was to refute the doctrines of Filmer that Locke wrote his Treatises on Government. Died, 1747.

FINCH, HENEAGE, first earl of Nottingham, was the son of Sir Heneage Finch, recorder of London. He was born in 1621, and educated at Westminster School, from whence he removed to Christchurch, Oxford, and afterwards to the Inner Temple. Charles II. made him solicitor-general, and created him a baronet. He was returned to parliament for the university of Oxford, in 1661. In 1670 he was appointed attorney-general, and soon after lord-keeper, with the rank of a peer. In 1675 he was made lord chancellor, and in 1681 created earl of Nottingham. His powers as an orator were highly rated; and Dryden has handed down his portrait to posterity in his poem of "Absalom and Achitophel," under the character of Amri. Died, 1682.

FINCH, DANIEL, eldest son of the preceding, was born in 1647, and finished his education at Christchurch, Oxford. In 1680 he was appointed first lord of the Admiralty, and in 1692 succeeded his father as the earl of Nottingham. On the death of Queen Anne, he was one of the lords justices for the administration of affairs, and soon after was made president of the council; but in 1716 he was dismissed, on account of a speech which he made in behalf of the Scottish lords condemned for high treason. He devoted his remaining years to the enjoyment of retirement and literary leisure, the fruits of which appeared in an eloquent reply to Whiston, on the subject of the Trinity. Died, 1730.

FINCH, ROBERT, an ingenious antiquary, was born in London, in 1783; educated at St. Paul's School and Balliol College, Oxford; and entered into holy orders. He travelled through the south of Europe and Palestine; and died at Rome, in 1830; bequeathing to the Ashmolean Museum, at Oxford, his valuable library, medals, coins, pictures, and antique curiosities.

FINET, Sir JOHN, a man of wit in the court of James I. and Charles I., was born near Dover, in 1571, and died in 1641. He was the author of "Fineti Philoxenus, or Observations touching the Reception, Pre-cedency, &c. of Foreign Ambassadors in England."

FINGAL, celebrated in the poems of Ossian his son; was prince of Morven, a province of ancient Caledonia, and was born about the year 282. He constantly struggled with the Romans, who at that time ruled in England; and frequently made expeditions to Sweden, the Orkney Islands, and Ireland. Fingal's character, as sketched by Ossian, is that of a noble hero, the father of his people.

FINGUERRA, TOMMASO, a celebrated sculptor and goldsmith, to whom is ascribed the invention of copperplate printing. He lived at Florence, about the middle of the fifteenth century, and practised the art called niello, which consisted in encasing dark metallic substances into cavities worked on gold or silver, and fixing them by fusion. Died, 1475.

FINLAY, JOHN, a modern Scotch poet, was born at Glasgow, in 1782, and educated at the university of that city. He was the author of "Wallace of Ellerslie," a "Life of Cervantes," and the edition of "A Collection of Scottish Ballads, historical and romantic," in 2 vols. Died, 1810.

FIRENZUOLA, ANGELO, an Italian dramatic poet, born at Florence in 1493. He was originally bred to the bar, but left it for the church, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. Died, 1545.

FIRMIAN, CHARLES, Count de, administrator of the Austrian government at Lombardy, was born in 1718. So exemplary was his love of justice, and his zeal for the happiness of the people, that the Austrian government rewarded him with the highest honours; while he employed his wealth and influence in the encouragement of literature and the arts, of which he was a liberal and discriminating patron. Died at Milan, 1782.

FIRMIN, THOMAS, a distinguished philanthropist, was born at Ipswich, in 1632, and brought up to business in London, as a linen-draper, which he carried on with good success. Although he had adopted anti-trinitarian opinions, in consequence of having formed an intimacy with the persecuted Socinian, John Biddle, whose necessities he relieved; yet his upright conduct, piety, and liberality were so conspicuous, that Archbishop Tillotson and other eminent prelates were proud of his friendship. Having established a linen manufactory for the purpose of giving employment to those who would otherwise have been vagrants, he published, in 1678, "Some Proposals for the Employment of the Poor, and especially in and about the City of London, and for the Prevention of Begging," &c. His charity was extended to all sects and parties, and his useful life terminated in 1697.

FISCHER, JOHN BERNARD, an eminent German architect, born at Vienna, in 1560. He erected the palace of Schoenbrunn, the church of St. Boromeo, and a number of other fine edifices at Vienna; and was appointed chief architect to Joseph I., who created him baron d'Erlach. Died, 1724.

FISH, SIMON, a native of Kent, and a member of the legal profession, who, having acted a part in a play written for the purpose of ridiculing Cardinal Wolsey, was obliged to flee to the Continent. He there wrote a satire upon the Popish clergy, entitled "The Supplication of the Beggars," which was answered by Sir Thomas More in his "Supplication for Souls." Fish was ultimately recalled home by Henry VIII., but died of the plague soon after his return, in 1531.

FISHER, JOHN, bishop of Rochester, a learned divine, was born at Beverley, in Yorkshire, in 1459. He became vice-chancellor of Cambridge; and being appointed confessor to Margaret, countess of Richmond, it was through his influence that she founded St. John's and Christ's colleges. In 1504, he was unexpectedly promoted to the see of Rochester, and subsequently declined translation to a more valuable bishopric; styling his church his wife, and declaring that he would never exchange her for one that was richer. Deeply prepossessed in favour of the ancient faith, he opposed with zeal and perseverance the principles of Luther and his followers; and having denied the supremacy of Henry VIII. as head of the church, he was convicted of high treason, and beheaded on Tower Hill, in 1535.

FISHER, JOHN, bishop of Salisbury, was born at Hampton, Middlesex, in 1748; educated at St. Paul's School, and at Peterhouse, Cambridge; became a fellow and tutor of St. John's; and subsequently was appointed tutor to Prince Edward, the late duke of Kent. In 1803 he was raised to the bishopric of Exeter, and had the honour of superintending the education of the late princess Charlotte of Wales, which he performed with equal ability and success. In 1807 he was translated to the bishopric of Salisbury, which diocese he continued to hold till his death in 1825.

FISHER, PAYNE, a poet of the 17th century, chiefly memorable for having held the office of laureate under Oliver Cromwell. He was a native of Dorsetshire, studied at Oxford and Cambridge; and served on the royalist side in the civil wars; but on the decline of the king's affairs he joined the republicans, and celebrated their successes in several Latin poems. He also wrote a "Synopsis of Heraldry," and various poems. Died, 1693.

FISHER, THOMAS, F. S. A., a gentleman whose love of literature and antiquarian research rendered him a most acceptable contributor to many periodical works, was a native of Rochester, and for many years held the situation of searcher of records in the service of the East India Company. To the Gentleman's Magazine, Mr. Fisher was a contributor for nearly 50 years. He was also a contributor to the Asiatic Journal, and one of the first projectors of the Congregational Magazine. He was also a director of the London Missionary Society, of which the knowledge he had obtained of the East made him a valuable member. Few persons, indeed, were more earnest in their endeavours to extend the empire of Christianity generally, or who were better acquainted with its progress and success; nor was he ever known to shrink from assisting, to the utmost of his ability, in a pecuniary way, any cause which could plead for its object religious instruction, or Christian benevolence. Born, 1772; died, 1836.

FITZGERALD, EDWARD, Lord, a misguided and unfortunate political partisan, was the son of the Duke of Leinster, and born on the 15th of October, 1763. At a time when the revolutionary spirit was at its height in Ireland, he joined the malcontents, became the object of proscription, and met with his death in the following manner. Having disguised himself as a countryman, and taken refuge in a house in Thomas Street, Dublin, a party commissioned to apprehend him arrived, headed by the two town majors, Sirr and Swan, and a Captain Ryan. Swan and Ryan entered the room together, and summoned Lord Edward to surrender; but he made a bold attempt to escape, and closing with Captain Ryan, killed him with a dagger on the spot. Before, however, he could well disengage himself from the dying man, Swan threw himself upon him, and pinioned him round the body; and Sirr, who had been standing at the door during the conflict, shot him through the body with a pistol. He was instantly removed to a place of security, where, after lingering for a day or two in extreme agony, he died, 1798. He had before attracted considerable notoriety, not merely from the rashness of his political conduct, but from having married the celebrated Pamela, the protégé and supposed natural daughter of the Duke of Orleans and Madame de Genlis.

FITZGERALD, Lady EDWARD, wife of the preceding, (commonly called Pamela), was supposed to be the daughter of Madame de Genlis, by the Duke of Orleans (Egalité). But according to the statement of Madame de Genlis, she was the daughter of a man of high birth, named Scymour, who married, in spite of his family, a young woman of the lowest class, called Mary Syms, and went off with her to Newfoundland, on the coast of America, where he established himself at a place called Fogo. There Pamela was born, and received the name of Nancy. Her father died, and the mother returned to England with her child, then 18 months old. As her husband was disinherited, she was reduced to great misery, and forced to work for her bread. She had settled at Christchurch, and a Mr. Forth having been commissioned by the Duke of Orleans to send him a young English girl, he saw Pamela, and obtained her from her mother. "When I began," continues M. de Genlis, "to be really attached to Pamela, I was very uneasy lest her mother might be desirous of claiming her by legal process; that is, lest she might threaten me with doing so to obtain grants of money it would have been out of my power to give." She at length got over this difficulty, by the mother's acceptance of 25 guineas, and signing an agreement not to claim her child till she had paid M. de Genlis all the expense she had been at for her maintenance and education. Pamela's arrival at the Palais Royal, however, had occasioned odd conjectures. She was educated with the princess and princesses, as a companion and friend: she had the same masters, was taken equal care of, partook of their sports; and her astonishing resemblance to the duke's children would have made her pass for their sister, were it not for her foreign accent. Whilst Pamela and the young princesses were pursuing their studies in the delightful retreat of Belle-chasse, the revolution broke out. The Duke of Orleans and his two sons, the Dukes of Chartres and Montpensier, warmly supported its principles. Madame de Genlis was then an admirer of the constituent assembly; Pamela participated in her enthusiasm for liberty; and every Sunday the distinguished members of that assembly met at Belle-chasse. When the constituent assembly had terminated its labours, Madame de Genlis proceeded to England with Mademoiselle d'Orleans and Pamela, and attended by two deputies, Petion and Voidel. It was then Lord Edward Fitzgerald first saw Pamela. The brilliancy of her beauty, the graces of her mind, and the free expression of her feelings of liberty, made a deep impression on the young Irishman; and when Madame de Genlis, alarmed at the turn things were taking in France, retired with her pupils to Tournay, where the presence of Dumouriez and the duke assured them a safe asylum, Lord Fitzgerald accompanied them, and soon became the husband of Pamela. A few years after his unhappy fate, she married a Mr. Pitcairn, an American, and consul at Hamburg; from whom she was subsequently divorced. She then resumed the name of Fitzgerald, and lived in great retirement in one of the provinces, until the revolution of 1830 placed the associate of her childhood upon a throne. Lady Fitzgerald was, in consequence of this event, tempted to visit Paris; but she received little notice from Louis Philippe, or any of his family. She died in indigence, at Paris, Nov. 1831.

FITZGIBBON, JOHN, first earl of Clare, and lord chancellor of Ireland, was born in 1749; and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and at Oxford. He rapidly rose in the legal profession, till he became a chancellor, in 1789, with the title of baron Fitzgibbon; and in 1795 was raised to the peerage as the earl of Clare. He was an eminent lawyer, and a decided promoter of the Union. Died, 1802.

FITZHERBERT, SIR ANTHONY, an able and learned judge in the reign of Henry VIII., was born at Norbury, in Derbyshire, and educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to one of the inns of court. In 1523, he was made a judge in the court of common pleas, and died in 1538. He wrote "The Grand Abridgment," a "Collection of Law Cases," "The Office and Authority of Justices of the Peace," "The Office of Sheriffs," "Natura Brevium," &c. He is also supposed to have written a book on the Surveying of Lands, and another on Husbandry, though some have ascribed these to his brother, John Fitzherbert.

FITZHERBERT, NICHOLAS, grandson of the preceding, was born about the middle of the 16th century; was educated at Oxford; went to Italy, and held the situation of secretary to Cardinal Alan, whose life he wrote; and is said to be the author of a treatise on the "Antiquity and Duration of the Roman Catholic Religion in England." He was accidentally drowned in 1612.

FITZHERBERT, SIR WILLIAM, a descendant of the same family as the preceding, was born in 1748, and received his education at Cambridge. Though called to the bar, he did not practise as a counsellor, but employed himself in writing on professional subjects. He held the office of gentleman usher to the king, who created him a baronet in 1784. Died, 1791.

FITZHERBERT, MARIA ANNE, a lady who at one period of her life occupied a prominent place in the history of this country, was the sister of the late Walter Smythe, esq., of Bambridge, near Winchester, and was married in 1775 to Edward Weld, esq., of Lulworth Castle, uncle to the late Cardinal Weld. Her husband died, without issue within a twelvemonth after their marriage, and she was soon after united to Thomas Fitzherbert, esq., who also died, leaving no offspring, in 1781. Having found it necessary to allude to Mrs. Fitzherbert, at some length, in our memoir of George IV., we shall here merely observe, that, attracted by the beauty and fascination of the blooming widow, the prince urgently pressed his suit, and a marriage, according to the forms of the Catholic Church, is believed (but never was thoroughly ascertained) to have taken place about 1787. She naturally became the object of great public and political interest; but the influence she possessed was always exercised for the honour of him to whom she was united; and she found, after her retirement from the meretricious splendour that had once surrounded her, ample means for the employment of her mind in acts of unostentatious benevolence. Died, March, 1837.

FITZJAMES, EDWARD, Duke of, was the great-grandson of the Duke of Berwick, who was natural son of James II. of England, by a sister of the Duke of Marlborough. At the time of the French revolution, the name of the Duke of Fitzjames was placed on the list of proscription, in consequence of his having emigrated; but, at the restoration of the Bourbon family, he returned to France, and became aide-de-camp and first nobleman of the chamber to the Count d'Artois, afterwards Charles X. In the chamber of peers he was remarkable for the constancy yet moderation with which he upheld the monarch. After the revolution of 1830, he was no less a favoured person than before it, having readily sworn allegiance to the new state of things. He is chiefly noticeable as being in some sort a member of our ill-fated Stuart family. Died, 1839.

FITZSTEPHEN, WILLIAM, a learned English monk of the 12th century, and the friend of Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, whose life he wrote. Prefixed to this life is a "Description of the City of London, and of the Manners and Customs of its Inhabitants," which is curious on account of its being the earliest account of London extant, and has been preserved by being printed at the end of Stowe's Survey. Died, 1191.

FITZWILLIAM, the Right Hon. WILLIAM WENTWORTH FITZWILLIAM, Earl, was born in 1748; commenced his education at Eton, finished it at Oxford, and took his seat in the House of Peers in 1769. Inheriting a good fortune from his father, and coming into possession, on the death of the Marquis of Rockingham, of the fine domain of Wentworth and other large estates, his lordship was naturally looked up to as a nobleman of influence and high connections, which his marriage with Lady Charlotte Ponsonby had of course extended. Up to the period of the French Revolution, Earl Fitzwilliam acted with the Whigs; but when Mr. Fox held up the Gallic system of liberty and equality as a model for imitation, and the levelling principle was spreading far and wide throughout the kingdom, the warning voice of Edmund Burke was not lost upon him; and seeing the necessity of sacrificing the attachments of party to the general good, like many others of the hereditary nobility, he joined the Duke of Portland and Mr. Pitt, thus giving strength to the ministry and confidence to the nation. This was an extraordinary period of popular clamour and discontent; and at this critical juncture Earl Fitzwilliam was appointed to the government of Ireland. Finding that the Catholic party there was all powerful, and dreading the propagation of revolutionary principles at the very time the French fleet was hovering on the island, his lordship favoured those who were seeking "emancipation," and endeavoured to conciliate, rather than punish, the disaffected; but his measures were not approved of by the ministry, and he was recalled, to make room for Earl Camden. In 1798 he was appointed lord lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire; and on Mr. Pitt's death, in 1806, he became president of the council, which he retained until the fall of the Grenville administration in the following year. After this he gradually retired from public life; and on the 8th of February, 1833, he died, aged 84.

FLACCUS, CAIUS VALERIUS, was a Roman poet of the 1st century, who lived at Padua, and died young. He wrote an epic poem, entitled "Argonautica," of which seven books, and part of the eighth, were completed by himself, and the others supplied by Apollonius.

FLAMINIO, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, whose family name was Zarrabini, was a Genoese, and born in 1464. He was a teacher of the belles lettres in the university of Bologna, wrote the lives of Albertus Magnus and St. Dominic, and was also the author of various poems. Died, 1536.

FLAMINIO, MARC ANTONIO, son of the preceding, was born, in 1498, at Seravale, educated by his father, and distinguished himself by the extent and variety of his erudition. He was secretary to the cardinals Pole and Farnese, at the council of Trent, and died, at Rome, in 1550. He was the author of "Carmina Sacra," and other poetical works in Latin, which are admired for their sweetness and purity.

FLAMSTEED, JOHN, an eminent astronomer, was born at Denby, in Derbyshire, in 1646, and received his education at the free-school of Derby. He was led to the study of astronomy by perusing Sacroboscus's work, "De Sphæra;" and he prosecuted his studies with so much assiduity, as to be inferior only to Sir Isaac Newton, his contemporary, who, in fact, availed himself of some of Flamsteed's calculations in his "Principia." He was appointed astronomer-royal, and the observatory at Greenwich was erected for him, where, during the remainder of his life, he assiduously cultivated the sublime science. His principal work is entitled "Historia Cœlestis Britannica." Died, 1719.

FLAVEL, JOHN, a nonconformist divine, was born in Worcestershire, and educated at University College, Oxford. In 1650 he settled at Dartmouth, in Devonshire, where he wrote his "Navigation Spiritualised." He was ejected from his living in 1662, but continued to preach privately. At the accession of James II. he returned to Dartmouth. He died suddenly at Exeter, in 1691. He was a man of exemplary piety and conduct, and his works are highly esteemed by all who hold Calvinistic sentiments.

FLAXMAN, JOHN, an eminent sculptor, whose father was for many years employed by Roubillac, was born at York, in 1755; and was admitted a student of the Royal Academy, in 1770. Having made considerable progress in his own country, he visited Italy, and, during a seven years' residence there, executed several important works in sculpture, besides making drawings for the illustration of Homer, Æschylus, Hesiod, and Dante. This established his fame as an artist of classical taste, and he was elected a member of the academies of Florence and Carrara. In 1794 he returned to England; and from that period till his death, he was almost uninterruptedly employed in works of first-rate character. Among them may be named, Lord Mansfield's monument in Westminster Abbey; and those of Collins, the poet; Lord Nelson, Earl Howe, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and the Baring family. He also finished a set of drawings and a model for the shield of Achilles, as described in Homer's Iliad. In 1810 he was appointed professor of sculpture to the Royal Academy; and died in 1826.

FLECHIER, ESPRIT, a famous French bishop, was born in 1632, at Pernes, in the county of Avignon. He was greatly admired as a preacher at Paris, and his funeral orations set him on a level with Bossuet. In 1679 he published his "History of Theodosius the Great." In 1685 he was made bishop of Lavaur; on which the king said, "I should have rewarded you much sooner, but that I was afraid of losing the pleasure of hearing your discourses." Shortly after he was promoted to the see of Nîmes; and died in 1710. His entire works were published after his death, in 10 vols. 8vo.

FLECKNOE, RICHARD, an English poet and dramatic writer, whose name is now more remembered on account of its having been held up to ridicule by Dryden, in his invective against Shadwell, than for the value of his own compositions. Died, 1678.

FLEETWOOD, CHARLES, a parliamentary general in the civil wars, was the son of Sir William Fleetwood, who belonged to the household of Charles I. He entered the army, and, on the breaking out of the civil wars, declared against the king; commanded a regiment of cavalry in 1644; and at the battle of Worcester bore the rank of lieutenant-general. Becoming allied to the family of the protector, by marrying his daughter, on the decease of her first husband, Ireton, he was sent as lord deputy to Ireland; but, on the death of Cromwell, he joined in inducing his son Richard to abdicate; thus hastening the restoration of Charles II., an event which he did not long survive.

FLEETWOOD, WILLIAM, an English lawyer, and recorder of London in the reign of Elizabeth, was born in Lancashire. He received his education at Oxford, from whence he removed to the Inner Temple. He wrote the history of Edward V., Richard III., Henry VII. and VIII.; the "Office of a Justice of Peace," &c. He was a great favourite of Dudley, earl of Leicester; and his professional writings were much esteemed. Died, 1593.

FLEETWOOD, WILLIAM, an eminent prelate, was born in London, in 1656, and educated at Eton and Cambridge. Soon after the Revolution he became chaplain to William and Mary, and fellow of Eton. In 1702 he obtained a canonry of Windsor, and in 1706 he succeeded Bishop Beveridge in the see of St. Asaph, from whence, in 1714, he was translated to Ely. He wrote "Inscriptionum Antiquarum Sylloge," "Chronicon Preciosum, or an Account of the English Money, the Price of Corn," &c. 8vo., "A plain Method of Christian Devotion," 8vo., "An Essay on Miracles," &c. Died, 1723.

FLEMING, a poetical writer and translator of the Elizabethan age. He was the author of numerous poems, chiefly devotional, translated some of the classic authors, and was the editor of Hollinshed's Chronicle.

FLEMING, ROBERT, a Scotch Presbyterian minister, who retired from his pastoral charge at Cambuslang on the establishment of prelacy, and went to Rotterdam, and is known as the author of a work, entitled "The Fulfilling of the Scriptures." Born, 1630; died, 1694.

FLEMING, ROBERT, son of the preceding, accompanied his father to the Continent, and was a member of the universities of Leyden and Utrecht. He was for some years minister to the Scotch church at Amsterdam; but on coming to England he was chosen pastor to the Scotch church at Lothbury, and lecturer at Salter's Hall. He is principally known by his work entitled "Christiology," a "History of Hereditary Right," and a discourse on the rise and fall of Popery, in which are many passages that correspond remarkably with the early events in the French revolution. Died, 1716.

FLEMING, or FLEMMYNGE, RICHARD, an English prelate, was born at Croston, in Yorkshire. He received his education at University College, Oxford, and in 1403 obtained a prebend in the cathedral of York. He founded Lincoln College, and died in 1431.

FLETCHER, ANDREW, a Scottish political writer, was the son of Sir Robert Fletcher of Saltoun, and born in 1653. When a child, he had been placed under the tuition of Dr. Gilbert Burnet, and he acquired from him that attachment to free principles of government which distinguished him through life. Having given offence to the Scottish parliament, of which he was a member, he was outlawed; but in 1683 he came over to England to concert with others who were opposed to the designs of James II.; and in 1685 joined the enterprise of the Duke of Monmouth. While on this expedition, having killed in a quarrel another partisan of the same cause, the duke dismissed him. He then repaired to Spain, and afterwards to Hungary, where he distinguished himself in a war against the Turks. When the revolution took place, he resumed possession of his estate, and opposed the Scottish union. As a political writer he possessed great powers; and as he wrote with great boldness on the popular side, his readers were generally willing converts to his opinions. Died, 1716.

FLETCHER, JAMES, author of a "History of Poland," a volume of poems, &c., was born in 1811, and filled the situation of assistant in a school at St. John's Wood, London; which, in consequence of the success of his work on Poland, he relinquished; but shortly after meeting with unexpected pecuniary disappointments, he committed suicide, in a fit of temporary insanity, in 1832; being then only 21 years of age.

FLETCHER, RICHARD, an English prelate, was born in Kent, and educated at Cambridge. In 1883 he was made dean of Peterborough, and in 1586 he attended Mary, queen of Scots, at her execution, with a view of converting her to the Protestant religion, but failed. He was raised to the see of London, and died in 1596.

FLETCHER, JOHN, an eminent English dramatic poet, was the son of the Bishop of London, and born in 1576. He received his education at Cambridge, and wrote several plays in conjunction with Beaumont. In this dramatic partnership, it is said that Fletcher found fancy, and Beaumont judgment. He died of the plague at London in 1625, and was buried in St. Saviour's church, Southwark. The principal piece of his own writing is a dramatic pastoral, entitled "The Faithful Shepherdess," and there is no doubt it suggested the idea of Milton's "Comus." Edward Phillips, the nephew of Milton, classes him with Shakspeare and Ben Johnson, as one of the "happy triumvirates" of the age.

FLETCHER, GILES, brother of Dr. Richard Fletcher, in the reign of Elizabeth, was a native of Kent, and finished his education at Cambridge, where he acquired the reputation of being a good poet. In 1588 he was sent ambassador to Russia, of which country he published an account on his return, but it was quickly suppressed, lest some strictures on the brutal tyranny of Ivan Basilovitch should offend the reigning prince. He enjoyed some civic offices, and was treasurer of St. Paul's. Died, 1610.

FLETCHER, GILES, son of the preceding, was born in 1588; educated at Cambridge; and died at his living of Alderton, Suffolk, in 1623. He was the author of a fine poem, entitled "Christ's Victory and Triumph in Heaven and Earth, over and after Death."

FLETCHER, PHINEAS, brother of the foregoing, was born about 1582, and educated at Eton and Cambridge. In 1621 he obtained the living of Hilgay, in Norfolk, where he died in 1650. He is best known by a poem, entitled "The Purple Island," which is an allegorical description of man, in 12 books, written in Spenserian verse. He also wrote "Piscatory Dialogues," "Poetical Miscellanies," and a work in prose, entitled "De Literatis Antiquæ Britannis."

FLEURIEU, CHARLES PIERRE CLARET, Count de, a French naval officer, and one of the most learned hydrographers of modern times, was born at Lyons, in 1738. Having turned his attention to nautical studies, he invented the sea-chronometer. In 1790 he was made minister of the marine; but the revolution obliged him to discontinue his public occupations, and he was committed to prison in 1793. Having, however, survived the reign of terror, he was nominated by Buonaparte, in 1799, a member of the council of state; and he was also made intendant of cavalry and governor of the Tuileries, which offices he resigned in 1805, and died in 1810.

FLEURY, ANDRE HERCULE DE, a cardinal and prime minister of France, under Louis XV., was born at Lodève, in Languedoc, in 1653. Coming to court, he won general favour by his pleasing person and fine understanding; became bishop of Frejus; and, through the interest of Madame Maintenon, was appointed instructor to Louis XV. In 1726 he was made cardinal, placed at the head of the ministry, and from his 73rd to his 90th year, he administered the affairs of his country with great success. Died, 1743.

FLEURY, CLAUDE, a French historian and divine, was born in 1640. He was educated as an advocate, and became a counsellor of the parliament of Paris in 1668; but subsequently took orders, and acquiring a great reputation for learning, was appointed preceptor to the Princes of Conti, and afterwards associated with Fenelon in the task of educating the young Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berri. He subsequently obtained the priory of Argenteuil, where he resided till 1716, when he left it to become confessor to Louis XV. His most important works are "Ecclesiastical History," "Manners of the Israelites," and "Manners of the Christians." Died, 1723.

FLINDERS, MATTHEW, an eminent English navigator, was born at Donnington, Lincolnshire, and entered early into the merchant service, from which he removed into the royal navy, as a midshipman, in 1795. In 1801 he was appointed to the command of an expedition of discovery to New Holland, having previously distinguished himself by the discovery of Bass's Straits; and after exploring a considerable part of the coast, his vessel was wrecked on a coral reef, and he was obliged to return to Port Jackson. On his passage homeward, in 1803, having touched at the Mauritius, he was detained by General Decaen, the governor, who, notwithstanding he had passports from the French government, thought proper to make him a prisoner. There he was kept till 1806, when, through the intercession of the Royal Society of London and the National Institute of France, he was set at liberty, and had his vessel restored. He died in 1814, having prepared an account of his researches, under the title of "A Voyage to the Terra Australis," &c., which was published after his decease.

FLORIAN, JEAN PIERRE CLARIS DE, a popular French writer, was born in 1755. He was recommended by Voltaire as page to the Duke of Penthièvre, who gave him a company in his own regiment, and on discovering his talents and literary tastes, ultimately treated him as a confidential friend, and afforded him the means of pursuing a literary career. Among his earliest works were "Galatea," "Estelle," and "Numa Pompilius." He also produced some admirable "Fables," and various dramatic pieces. During the tyranny of Robespierre he was arrested and imprisoned for having affixed to his Numa some verses in praise of Maria Antoinette; and while in confinement he composed the first book of his "Guillaume Tell." His life was distinguished by a spirit of benevolence and moral feeling; and such, indeed, is the characteristic sentiment of all his writings. Died, 1794.

FLORIDA BLANCA, FRANCIS ANTONY MONINA, Count de, a Spanish statesman, distinguished as an opponent of the French revolution, but who, becoming unpopular, was dismissed from office in 1792, and subsequently committed to the castle of Pampeluna. He was, however, speedily released; and, after several years of seclusion, chosen president of the cortes in 1808, in which year he died, aged 80.

FLORIO, JOHN, the descendant of a family of Italian refugees in England, was born in London, in the reign of Henry VIII.; taught French and Italian at Magdalen College, Oxford; and on the accession of James I. was appointed tutor to Prince Henry, and clerk of the closet to the queen. His works are, "First Fruits," "Second Fruits," and the "Garden of Recreation," besides a "Dictionary, Italian and English." Died, 1625.

FLORIS, FRANCIS, a Flemish painter, who acquired the title of the Raphael of Flanders, was born at Antwerp, in 1520, and died there in 1570.

FLORUS, LUCIUS ANNEUS, a Latin historian of the same family as Seneca and Lucan. He is the author of a "Compendium of Roman History," in four books, which is concise and elegant. He lived in the reigns of Trajan and Adrian.

FLOWER, BENJAMIN, a political writer, who, while engaged in commercial pursuits in 1783, lost the whole of his property by a speculation in the funds. He afterwards became a printer at Cambridge, where, in 1793, he commenced the publication of a weekly newspaper, called "The Cambridge Intelligencer," which he conducted for some time successfully; but the freedom of his remarks subjected him to a prosecution for a libel, and he was imprisoned. His paper henceforth declining, he went to Harlow, in Essex, where he commenced a periodical journal, called "The Political Review," which was continued monthly for some years. He was the author of many political tracts; and died, aged 74, in 1829.

FLOYER, Sir JOHN, an eminent physician, was born at Hinters in Staffordshire, in 1649; settled at Lichfield; was knighted; and died in 1734. His works are, "The Touchstone of Medicines, 2 vols.," "The Virtues of Cold Water," 2 vols., "The Physician's Pulse Watch," 2 vols.; "The Galenic Art of Preserving Old Men's Health," &c.

FLUDD, ROBERT, an English philosopher, was the son of Sir Thomas Fludd, and born at Milgate, in Kent, in 1574. His writings are wholly on alchemy, and the mysticism of the Rosicrucians. Died, 1637.

FOGLIETTA, UBERTO, an historian and orator of Genoa, from which city he was banished and his property confiscated, for censuring the nobles, in a book entitled "Della Repubblica di Genova." He wrote several works of merit during his exile. Born, 1518; died, 1581.

FOIX, GASTON DE, the nephew of Louis XII. of France, was born in 1489. He had the command of the army, and on account of his daring exploits was denominated the thunderbolt of Italy. After performing prodigies of valour, he was killed at the battle of Ravenna, in 1512.

FOIX, LOUIS DE, a French architect in the employ of Philip II., of Spain, who was engaged in the erection of the Escorial, near Madrid. On his return to France he constructed the canal of the Adour, and built the tower of Cordouan.

FOIX, PAUL DE, archbishop of Toulouse, was born in 1528, and distinguished himself as much for his diplomatic abilities as for his virtuous and tolerant conduct as a churchman. He was employed on embassies in England, Scotland, Venice, and Rome; and died in 1584.

FOLARD, JOHN CHARLES, an eminent military tactician, was born at Avignon, in 1669, and entered the army early in life. He served with distinguished reputation under Vendome, in Italy, during the war of succession. In 1714, he volunteered his services, and assisted in the defence of Malta against the Turks; and fought under Charles XII. of Sweden till the death of that prince, when he returned to France and obtained the command of a regiment. His system of tactics was allowed to be very judicious, and the works he published were held in considerable repute. Died, 1752.

FOLCZ, JOHN, a barber of Nuremberg, born at Ulm, in the 15th century, was a celebrated German poet, belonging to the class called Mastersingers,—a class which sprung up in Germany in the 14th century, after the extinction of the Minnesingers, or Suabian bards. These Mastersingers belonged to the humbler sort of artisans, who met at taverns, where they established clubs for the cultivation of this branch of literature. Their great merit was that of being able to invent some new and difficult species of metre, subject to certain rhythmical laws laid down for this species of composition; and Folcz distinguished himself by the invention of a number of them. The earliest of his pieces was printed at Nuremberg, in 1474.

FOLENGO, THEOPHILUS, an Italian burlesque poet, who wrote under the name of Merlin Coccaia, was born near Mantua, in 1491; became a monk of the Benedictine order, which he quitted for several years, and wrote Macaronic verses; and died in 1554.

FOLEY, Sir THOMAS, a veteran admiral, was descended from a respectable family in Wales, and served as lieutenant in the Prince George, of 98 guns, at the time his majesty, William IV., was a midshipman in that ship. In 1790 he was promoted to post rank; and, at the commencement of the war in 1793, he had the command of the St. George, and assisted in the recapture of the St. Jago, a Spanish ship of immense value. He also bore a part in capturing the Ca Ira, of 80 guns, and the Censeur, of 74, when engaged, under Admiral Hotham, with the Toulon fleet. At the memorable battle off Cape St. Vincent, as well as at the Nile, Captain Foley displayed great skill, having, on the latter occasion, the honour to lead the British fleet into action; and again, with his friend the gallant Nelson, he shared in the danger and glory of the conflict before Copenhagen. In 1812 he was advanced to the rank of vice-admiral; and in 1830 received the appointment of commander-in-chief at Portsmouth, in which station he died, January, 1833.

FOLKES, MARTIN, an English philosopher and antiquary, was born at Westminster in 1690, and educated at Clare Hall. At the age of 23 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1741 he succeeded Sir Hans Sloane as president of that learned body, and was elected a member of the royal academy of sciences at Paris. Mr. Folkes wrote, besides a number of papers in the Philosophical Transactions, a "Table of English Silver Coins, from the Norman Conquest to the Present Time." Died, 1754.

FOLLETT, Sir WILLIAM WEBB, an eminent lawyer, was born at Topsham, Devon, in 1798. His education commenced under Dr. Lempriere, at the Exeter Grammar School, and was completed at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1818 he became a member of the Inner Temple, commenced practice as a special pleader in 1823, and in the following year he was called to the bar. His legal abilities were of the first order, and his rise to eminence was rapid, his superiority as an advocate on the western circuit being universally admitted. Sir William aspired to parliamentary honours in 1832, but he did not succeed till three years later, when he was returned for the city of Exeter. On Sir R. Peel's accession to place as prime minister, in 1834, Sir W. Follett was appointed solicitor-general; but upon Sir Robert's resignation in 1835, he also quitted office, and was knighted. At the general election of 1837, and again in 1841, he was re-elected member for Exeter. On Sir Robert Peel's resumption of office, he was once more appointed solicitor-general. On Sir F. Pollock's elevation to the judicial bench in 1844 he succeeded him as attorney-general. The health of Sir W. Follett had never been robust in his youth, and it was unequal to the exertions necessary to fulfil the duties of his extensive practice. After repeated attacks of illness in previous years, and occasional relaxations from his professional labours, he at length sought to restore his health by a residence on the Continent: it was thought that he had received benefit from the change; but he had not long returned to his native country, and engaged again in the busy scene of his former activity, before the hand of "the Destroyer" was upon him. Died, June 28, 1845.

FONBLANQUE, JOHN DE GRENIER, an eminent barrister, was descended from a noble family in the south of France, some of whom, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, came to England, and founded the celebrated house of agency, into which they subsequently admitted as a partner, Mr. Thelluson, originally their book-keeper, but who afterwards realised that prodigious fortune which has since so often occupied public attention, through its singular testamentary disposition. John Fonblanque, the subject of this article, was born in 1759; received his education at Harrow and Oxford; and in 1783 was called to the bar. In 1790 he acted as leading counsel for the London merchants, in opposition to the Quebec bill, at the bar of the House of Commons. In 1793 appeared his celebrated "Treatise on Equity," which went through several editions, and is regarded by the courts as an authority on the subject. In 1802 he was elected M. P. for Camelford, and continued a member until the dissolution in 1806. In 1804 he obtained a silk gown with a patent of precedence, and for many years enjoyed an extensive equity practice. He was an able advocate of the Whig party, and a personal friend of the Prince of Wales, for whom he now is supposed to have written the celebrated letters to the king, on the subject of his royal highness's exclusion from the army, which were generally attributed to Lord Moira. He died, Jan. 4, 1837.

FONESCA, ELEANORA, Marchioness de, a lady of great beauty and talents, was born at Naples, in 1768. She cultivated the study of botany, &c. with success, and assisted Spallanzani in his philosophical investigations. She warmly espoused the cause of the French revolution, and when the French invaded Italy, she engaged in intrigues against that court, though less perhaps from principle than from her having formerly been dismissed from her situation of attendant on the queen. During the triumph of the republican party she was in the zenith of her fame, and edited a paper called "The Neapolitan Monitor;" but the royal cause again succeeding, she was ultimately arrested and hanged, in 1799.

FONTAINE, JOHN DE LA, the inimitable fabulist, was born in 1621, at Château Thierry, where his father was overseer of the forests. His taste for poetry was first aroused by hearing one of Malherbe's odes recited; but to the patronage of the Duchess of Bouillon, who invited him to Paris, and encouraged him to write his Tales, he owed much of the distinction in literature he afterwards acquired. For 35 years he lived in Paris, residing successively with the Duchesses of Bouillon and Orleans, Madame de Sabliere, and Madame d'Hervart; and was in habits of intimacy with Moliere, Boileau, Racine, and all the first wits of the French capital, by whom he was much beloved for the candour and simplicity of his character. Yet, with this simplicity, which amounted almost to stupidity, he united the talent of making severe, shrewd, and sensible observations on human life, and decorating his verse with touches of exquisite grace and delicacy. Besides his "Tales" and "Fables," La Fontaine was the author of "Les Amours de Psyche," "Anacreontiques," two comedies, &c. Died, 1695.

FONTAINE, NICHOLAS, a voluminous French writer, of the Jansenist connection, was born at Paris, in 1625, and died at Melun, in 1709.

FONTANA, CHARLES, an Italian architect, and the author of various architectural works, among which are descriptions of the Vatican and the Amphitheatre of Vespasian, was born in 1634, and died in 1714.

FONTANA, DOMINIC, an eminent Italian architect, was born, in 1543, at Mili, on the lake of Como. He was employed by popes Sextus V. and Clement VIII., and afterwards appointed to the situation of first architect to the two kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. Among the many edifices he built, no one is more remarkable than the Egyptian obelisk in front of St. Peter's at Rome. Died, 1607.—JOHN FONTANA, his brother, was distinguished as a hydraulic architect, and performed some extremely important works in that department of the art. Born, 1540; died, 1640.

FONTANA, FELIX, an eminent philosopher and naturalist, was born at Pomarolo, in the Tyrol, in 1730. He was appointed professor of philosophy at Pisa by the Grand-duke of Tuscany; and afterwards invited to Florence by Leopold II., who made him his physician, and employed him to form a cabinet of natural history. To this he added a variety of anatomical figures in coloured wax, most exquisitely finished, which, with other objects of interest and curiosity, together form at present one of the attractions of the Florentine capital. He was the author of some important works on chemistry, physics, and physiology. He died in 1805.

FONTANA, GREGORY, a mathematician, and brother of the preceding, was born in 1735. He filled the office of mathematical professor at Pisa for more than thirty years, was elected a member of the Cisalpine republic in 1796, and died in 1805.

FONTANA, FRANCIS, a Neapolitan astronomer of the 17th century, to whom the invention of the telescope has been erroneously attributed, first studied jurisprudence and received the degree of doctor of laws, but afterwards devoted himself to astronomical and mathematical researches, and made improvements in several instruments. Died, 1656.

FONTANA, FRANCIS LOUIS, an Italian cardinal, who adhered to pope Pius VII., whom he accompanied to Paris, and was afterwards imprisoned in the castle of Vincennes. Died, 1822.

FONTANA, GAETANO, an astronomer of Modena, who corresponded with Cassini, and was regarded by him as one on whose accuracy he could ever depend. He died, aged 74, in 1719.

FONTANELLE, JOHN GASPAR DUBOIS, a popular French writer; author of "Aventures Philosophiques," "Naufrage et Aventures de Pierre Viaud," "Cours de Belles Lettres," several plays, &c. Born 1737; died, 1812.

FONTANES, LOUIS DE, an eminent French writer, was born in 1761. At the commencement of the revolution he edited a journal, called "The Moderator," and after the fall of Robespierre joined La Harpe and others in the publication of another, called "The Memorial," which with many others was suppressed by the National Convention in 1797, and the proprietors, editors, &c. included in one common sentence of banishment and confiscation of property. When the amnesty was granted on the elevation of Buonaparte to the consulship, he took a share in the management of the "Mercure de France," and soon after obtained a seat in the legislative assembly of which he became the president. He afterwards attained the rank of senator, and was one of the first in 1814, to propose the recall of Louis XVIII., who made him a peer and a privy-councillor. He died in 1821, having acquired the reputation of being a good orator and political writer, and a poet of no mean rank.

FONTENAY, PETER CLAUDE, a French Jesuit; author of a "History of the Gallican Church," 11 vols. Born, 1683; died, 1742.

FONTENELLE, BERNARD LE BOVIER DE, a nephew of the great Corneille, and an author of great and varied talents, was born at Rouen, in 1657. He studied the law at the request of his father, who was an advocate; but soon devoted himself exclusively to literature. At the outset of his career he met with little encouragement in his poems and dramas, but on the appearance of his "Dialogues of the Dead," and his "Conversations on the Plurality of Worlds," his fame was at once fully established. In 1699 he was made secretary to the Academy of Sciences, which post he held forty-two years, and of the proceedings of which body he published a volume annually. He continued to write on general subjects, agreeably combining a taste for the belles lettres with more abstruse studies, with little intermission, till he had almost reached the patriarchal age of 100 years. He died in 1757.

FOOTE, Sir EDWARD JAMES, a British vice-admiral, was the son of a clergyman in Kent, and entered the naval service when a boy. In 1799 he took charge of the blockade of the bay of Naples, by order of Lord Nelson; and whilst engaged on that service, in conjunction with Cardinal Ruffo, he signed a treaty with the insurgents. This was disapproved of and annulled by Nelson, and the circumstance gave rise to much animadversion at the time; some considering that Captain Foote had been the dupe of the cardinal, and others blaming the British admiral for having greatly exceeded his authority. He was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral in 1812, and vice-admiral in 1821. Died at his residence, Highfield House, near Southampton, 1833, aged 66.

FOOTE, SAMUEL, a comic writer and actor (whose satiric wit and imitative powers, though perhaps never surpassed, were often indecent and personally offensive), was born, in 1721, at Truro, Cornwall; educated at Worcester College, Oxford; and intended for the bar. After a course of dissipation, to which his small fortune fell a sacrifice, he turned his attention to the stage, and appeared in "Othello," but having little success, he struck out an untrodden path for himself in the double character of dramatist and performer. In 1747, he opened the Haymarket Theatre with some very humorous imitations of well known individuals; and thus, having discovered where his strength lay, he wrote several two-act farces, and continued to perform at one of the winter theatres every season, usually bringing out some pieces of his own, and regularly returning to his summer quarters. In 1766, he was thrown from his horse, and fractured his leg in such a manner, that amputation was rendered necessary. He soon, however, recovered his health and spirits, and even improved the incident to the suggestion of characters for his own acting. This accident also proved of service to his fortune, as it induced the Duke of York to procure for him a patent for life of the Haymarket Theatre. In 1777, having been charged with an infamous crime by a discarded manservant, he was tried for the crime, and, though fully acquitted, it had such an effect upon his mind and health, that he died in a few months after. He wrote twenty-six dramatic pieces, all replete with wit, humour, and satire; but "The Mayor of Garrat" is the only one which at present keeps possession of the stage.

FOPPENS, JOHN FRANCIS, a learned Flemish divine and critic, was born about 1689, and died in 1761. He was professor of divinity at Louvain, and canon of Malines; compiler of the "Bibliotheca Belgica," 2 vols. 4to., containing an account of Flemish writers; and the author of various works, historical and theological.

FORBES, Sir CHARLES, bart., an eminent Indian merchant, was born in Aberdeenshire, 1773. He was for more than 40 years the head of the first mercantile and financial house in India; and his name stood in the highest repute in the commercial world for ability, foresight, and rectitude of character. He was returned to parliament in 1812 for Beverley; and during five parliaments, from 1818 to 1832, he sat for Malmesbury. Connected from early youth with India, and devoted to the welfare of its people, he was ardent in his advocacy for "justice to India;" and he had the happiness to see many of his benevolent schemes for the well-being of his numerous clients completely realised. On returning from India he was presented by the natives with a magnificent service of plate; and 27 years after his departure from Bombay, a statue from the chisel of Chantrey was erected to his honour in the town hall of Bombay. But it was in his private charities that the character of Sir C. Forbes was peculiarly manifested: they were distributed without reference to any other consideration than the necessities of the recipient; and so unostentatiously were they administered, that almost literally it ought to be said of him, that his right hand knew not what his left bestowed. He was created a baronet in 1823. Died, 1849.

FORBES, DUNCAN, an eminent Scottish judge, was born at Culloden, in 1685; studied at Paris, Utrecht, and Edinburgh; and rose to the rank of president of the court of session, discharging the functions of his high office with zeal, ability, and patriotism. It was mainly owing to his exertions that the rebellion of 1745 was prevented from spreading more widely among the clans; but so ungratefully was he treated by the government, that he was never able to obtain repayment of the various sums he had expended to uphold it. He was the author of "Thoughts on Religion," &c. Died, 1747.

FORBES, PATRICK, bishop of Aberdeen, descended of a noble family, was born in 1564, took orders in 1592, and was raised to the episcopal bench by James VI. in 1618. He was a munificent patron to the university of Aberdeen, which owes to him the revival of the dormant professorships of theology, medicine, and civil law. He was the author of an elaborate "Commentary on the Apocalypse." Died, 1613.

FORBES, ROBERT, an eccentric Scotchman, was born at Peterhead, about the year 1725. He completed his education at King's College, Aberdeen, where he took the degree of A. M. He was soon after appointed schoolmaster of the parish of Peterculber, where he continued for some time, but found it expedient to leave, on account of an intrigue, which he has humorously described in a well-known local poem, called the "Dominie Deposed," written in the Buchan dialect, published about 1750. He then removed to London, where he commenced the business of a hosier, in a shop on Tower Hill. Here he composed that celebrated travesty on "The Speech of Ajax to the Grecian Chiefs," also in the Buchan dialect, beginning with "The Grecian chiefs upo' their doups sat down,

A rangel o' the common folk in bon-racks a'
Steed ronn," &c.

The MS. having been shown to Ruddiman, the grammarian, he pronounced it the best he had ever seen on any subject. It was printed at Edinburgh, in 8vo., in 1754. Forbes is supposed to have died about the year 1783.

FORBES, WILLIAM, the first bishop of Edinburgh, to which see he was raised on its foundation in 1633, was born at Aberdeen in 1585; and died three months after he came to his episcopal dignity, early in 1634.

FORBES, ALEXANDER, lord Forbes of Pittsligo, commanded a troop of horse in the rebellion of 1745; and after the battle of Culloden he fled to France, but returned to Scotland in 1749, and died in 1762. He was the author of "Moral and Philosophical Essays," and is said to have been the prototype of the Baron of Bradwardine in the novel of Waverley.

FORBES, SIR WILLIAM, born at Pittsligo, in 1739, was the founder, in conjunction with Sir James Hunter Blair, of the first banking establishment in Edinburgh. Although born to an ample fortune, he devoted himself to the commercial prosperity of his country, though without neglecting the study of elegant literature, to which he was greatly attached. He was an early member of the celebrated literary club, which numbered, amongst its illustrious associates, the names of Johnson, Reynolds, Garrick, and Burke. Some time previous to his death, which happened in 1806, he published an account of the life and writings of Dr. Beattie, which exhibits throughout sound judgment and discriminating taste. The support and encouragement of all public concerns excited much of his attention; and in public and private charity his liberality was at once exemplary and unostentatious.

FORBIN, CLAUDE, Chevalier de, a distinguished French naval commander, born in 1656. In 1685 he accompanied the French ambassador to Siam, where he remained two years, as high admiral, general, &c. to his Siamese majesty; and on his return to Europe he signalled himself on several occasions. In 1708 he was entrusted with conveying the Pretender to Scotland, but owing to the vigilance of Admiral Byng he could not effect a landing. Died, 1733.

FORCELLINI, GILES, an eminent critic and lexicographer, was born at Treviso, in the Venetian States, in 1688, and died there in 1768. He was associated in his literary labours with Facciolati; jointly producing, among others of less note, that important work, "Lexicon totius Latinitatis."

FORD, JOHN, an English dramatic author of the 17th century, was born, in 1586, at Ilington, in Devonshire, where his father was a justice of the peace. He became a member of the Middle Temple in 1602, and died about 1639. His first tragedy, "The Lover's Melancholy," was printed in 1629; and he was the author of many other plays, besides some which he wrote in conjunction with Drayton and Decker.

FORD, SIR JOHN, was born at Harting, Sussex, in 1605; educated at Oxford; and knighted by Charles I., after having served the office of sheriff for his native county. During the civil wars he commanded a regiment of horse, and suffered much in the royal cause, being imprisoned on suspicion of aiding the king's escape from Hampton Court; but owing to the interest of Ireton, whose sister he had married, he obtained his release. He was a man of considerable mechanical ingenuity; and at the request of the citizens of London, he contrived machinery for raising the Thames water into all the high streets, which machinery was afterwards used to drain mines and lands in other parts of the country. He projected various other beneficial improvements, and died in 1670.

FORDUN, JOHN DE, a Scotch historian of the 14th century; author of a history of Scotland, entitled "Scotichronicon," which would be a valuable document, were it not disfigured by much that is absurd and fabulous.

FORDYCE, DAVID, an ingenious writer, was born at Aberdeen, in 1711. He was educated at that university, and became professor of moral philosophy in Marischal College. In 1750 he made a tour to Italy, and on his return the following year, was drowned on the coast of Holland. He wrote "Dialogues concerning Education," 2 vols. 8vo.; "The Elements of Moral Philosophy," &c.

FORDYCE, JAMES, brother of the preceding, was born, in 1720, at Aberdeen, and educated at that university. His first settlement, as a minister, was at Brechen, from whence he removed to Alloa; and having obtained the degree of D.D. from the university of Glasgow, he came to Monkwell Street Chapel, London, where he drew crowded audiences by his eloquence and the beauty of his sermons. In 1782 he resigned his situation, and went to live first in Hampshire, and next at Bath, where he died in 1796. He published "Sermons to Young Women," 2 vols.; "Addresses to Young Men," 2 vols.; "Addresses to the Deity;" a volume of poems; and some single sermons.

FORDYCE, GEORGE, an eminent physician, nephew of the preceding, was born in 1736; educated at the university of Aberdeen, and obtained the degree of M. A. at the age of 14. The year following he was placed with his uncle, who was a surgeon and apothecary at Uppingham, in Rutlandshire. He went from thence to Edinburgh, and next to Leyden, where, in 1758, he took his doctor's degree. In 1759 he settled in London, and commenced lecturer on the materia medica and practice of physic, in which he acquired an unrivalled reputation. In 1770 he was chosen physician to St. Thomas's Hospital, and in 1776 a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1787 he was elected, speciali gratia, a fellow of the College of Physicians. Dr. Fordyce is known by his "Dissertations on Fever," a "Treatise on Digestion," "Elements of the Practice of Physic," &c. He was also an excellent experimental chemist, and published "Elements of Agriculture and Vegetation." He died in 1802.

FOREST, JOHN, painter to the king of France, was born at Paris in 1636, and died in 1712. His landscapes are much admired.

FORESTI, or FORESTA, JAMES PHILIP, usually called Philip of Bergamo, an Augustine monk, and author of a "Chronicle from the earliest Period to 1203," &c. Died, 1520.

FORKEL, JOHN NICHOLAS, an eminent writer on the history and theory of music, and director of music in the university of Gottingen, was born in 1749, and died in 1819. His "General History of Music," 2 vols. 4to., is reckoned the most valuable of his numerous works. He was also a composer and a good pianist, and a man of general and extensive knowledge.

FORSKAL, PETER, a young Swedish naturalist, the scholar and friend of Linnæus, who, after completing his studies at Upsal, travelled into the East with Niebuhr, but died at Djerim, in Arabia, during the 2nd year of his travels, and before he had attained his 28th year. On Niebuhr's return he published, in 3 vols. 4to., Forskal's remarks on the productions of the countries through which he had passed.

FORSTER, GEORGE, an English traveller, was in 1782 engaged in the civil service of the East India Company. He was well acquainted with the oriental languages, which rendered him a fit person to undertake a journey from Bengal to Persia, and thence through Russia to England. A full narrative of this was published in 1798, in 2 vols. 4to. Died at Allahabad, in 1792.

FORSTER, JOHN REINHOLD, an eminent naturalist and geographer, was born, in 1729, at Dirschau, in Polish Prussia; educated at Berlin and Halle; and officiated as minister of Dantzic, and afterwards at Nas-senhuben. He then came to England, as teacher of the French and German languages, and natural history, at the dissenting academy at Warrington. In 1772 he accompanied Captain Cook in his second voyage round the world, as naturalist to the expedition, and took his son with him as a companion. On his return, in 1775, the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of LL.D., and he seemed on the high road to preferment; but he was appointed professor of natural history, &c. at Halle, in Saxony, to which place he retired; and died in 1798. Besides his "History of Voyages and Discoveries in the North," he wrote several other original works, and translated many into German. He united great penetration and quick apprehension with astonishing powers of memory. He spoke or wrote 17 living and dead languages, and was well-acquainted with almost every department of literature; while in history, botany, and zoology, he stands among the first investigators of the last century.

FORSTER, JOHN GEORGE ADAM, son of the preceding, was born in 1754; accompanied his father in the voyage round the world; was professor of natural history in Hesse Cassel, and afterwards at Wilna. He subsequently settled at Mentz as a bookseller, and entered warmly into the revolutionary principles of France; on which account he was nominated a deputy to the Rhenish convention, and sent to Paris, but Mentz being besieged and taken by the Prussians, Forster was obliged to remain at Paris, where he died in 1794, while preparing, as it is said, for a voyage to Hindostan and Thibet. He was the author of several works on geography, natural history, philosophy, and politics.

FORSTER, NATHANIEL, a learned divine and writer, was born, in 1717, at Plymstock, Devon; educated at Eton and Oxford; obtained a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Bristol, and the vicarage of Rochdale, in 1754; in the following year elected F. R. S., and appointed one of the royal chaplains; and died in 1757. He was the author of "Reflections on the Antiquity, Government, Arts, and Sciences in Egypt," "A Dissertation on Josephus's Account of Jesus Christ," and a "Hebrew Bible without points."

FORSYTH, ALEXANDER JOHN, A. M.,

LL.D., "the discoverer of the percussion principle," was born 1st of January, 1769. He was the son of the Rev. James Forsyth, minister of Belhelvie, near Aberdeen, and Isabel Syme, daughter of the Rev. Gilbert Syme, minister of Tullynessle. (A son of Mr. Syme married a daughter of Principal Robertson, of Edinburgh, whose only daughter, Eleonora Syme, was married to Henry Brougham, esq., of Brougham Hall, Westmoreland, and was the mother of Henry, lord Brougham and Vaux.) He completed his education at the university of King's College, where he took the degree of A. M. He succeeded his father in the pastoral charge of the parish of Belhelvie, 24th of August, 1791. Soon after his settlement, he commenced for his amusement, a series of chemical experiments, principally on fulminating powders, and other explosive compounds. In the year 1805, he was called to London, to make experiments for the government on the percussion principle, which he had about two years previously discovered. His stay in London was prolonged to nearly a twelvemonth, and he had all but succeeded in convincing the officials at the ordnance office of the propriety of adopting the percussion lock, when a change of ministry, and the bustle of new appointments, or the contempt for every thing done or proposed by predecessors, led to an order to him to remove from the Tower, where he had been experimenting, and take his "rubbish" with him. That "rubbish" consisted of beautiful and ingenious applications of the percussion principle; a principle which, now after nearly half a century has elapsed, is partially, and will soon be generally, used in the British army, as it has long been in the armies of our continental neighbours. About a year previous to his death, his claims were acknowledged by government, who gave him an annuity of 200*l.* As a parish clergyman he was much esteemed, and by the gentleness and modesty of his demeanour secured for himself the warm attachment of a wide circle of friends and acquaintance. He died suddenly, 11th June, 1843, aged 74.

FORSYTH, WILLIAM, an able horticulturist, was born at Old Meldrum, Aberdeenshire, in 1757. He was a pupil of the celebrated Philip Miller, and succeeded him at the physic-gardens of the apothecaries' company at Chelsea. In 1784 he was made superintendent of the royal gardens at Kensington and St. James's, and died in 1804.

FORTESCUE, SIR JOHN, an eminent judge and writer on the law, was a son of Sir Henry Fortescue, lord chief justice of Ireland. He studied at Lincoln's Inn, was called to the bar, and in 1442 was made chief justice of the court of king's bench. He was a principal counsellor in the court of Henry VI., and for his devotion to that monarch he was attainted by the Parliament under Edward IV.; and in 1463 he fled, with Queen Margaret and her suite, to Flanders, where he remained in exile several years; during which time he wrote his well-known work, "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ." Returning to England, to join in the struggle for the restoration of the house of Lancaster, he was taken at the battle of Tewkesbury; but obtained his pardon from Edward, and was allowed to retire to his seat in Gloucestershire, where he died, in his 90th year.

FORTESCUE. See ALAND.

FORTIGUERRA, NICHOLAS, an Italian prelate and poet, was born at Pistoia in 1674, and died in 1735. He was the author of a burlesque poem, entitled "Ricciardetto," a lively and elegant production, in which the style of Ariosto and Pulci is by turns very happily imitated.

FOSBROOKE, Rev. THOMAS DUDLEY, F.S.A., a learned and industrious antiquary and archæologist, was born in 1770, and received his education at St. Paul's School, London, and Pembroke College, Oxford. Mr. Fosbrooke commenced his literary career in 1796, with a poem entitled "The Economy of Monastic Life;" and in 1799 he produced his "British Monachism," 2 vols. 8vo., having previously applied himself with extraordinary diligence to the study of the Saxon language. His next great work was the "History of Gloucestershire," in 2 vols. 4to.; and in 1819 appeared his "History of the City of Gloucester." These were followed by the "Wye Tour," "Ariconensia," and the "Berkeley Manuscripts." In 1824 he published his most important work, the "Encyclopedia of Antiquities, and Elements of Archæology," 2 vols. 4to.; and, in 1828, a kind of sequel to it, called "Foreign Topography." "The Tourist's Grammar," and several other works, also appeared from his pen; and he was for many years a prolific contributor to the "Gentleman's Magazine." Mr. Fosbrooke's church preferment was as scanty as his literary industry was great. For 16 years he officiated as curate of Horsley, in Gloucestershire; during the next 20 years he was curate at Walford (on the banks of the Wye); and for the last 12 years of his life he was its vicar. Died on New-year's-day, 1842.

FOSCOLO, UGO, a distinguished Italian writer, was born at sea, in 1776, in a Venetian frigate, lying near Zante, of which island his father was governor. He was educated at Padua, and produced his tragedy of "Thyestes" before he was 20. He was soon after employed as secretary to Battaglia, who was sent ambassador to Buonaparte, to endeavour to preserve the independence of the Venetian republic. The embassy was unsuccessful, and Foscolo retired into Lombardy, where he produced his celebrated "Letters of Ortis," which established his fame. Having enlisted in the 1st Italian legion that was formed, he was shut up in Genoa during the famous siege of 1799, with General Massena, and while there he composed two of his finest odes. He remained in the Italian army till 1805, when he was sent to Calais with the troops professedly destined for the invasion of England; but he soon after quitted the service. He was appointed professor of literature at Pavia, in 1809; when the bold language of his introductory lecture is said to have offended Buonaparte, and the professorship was immediately suppressed. In 1812 he produced his tragedy of "Ajax," which was represented at the theatre Della Scala, at Milan; but it being supposed to convey a satire on the character of Buonaparte, he found it necessary to withdraw to Florence. He is said to have subsequently engaged in a conspiracy to expel the Austrians from Italy; but a discovery taking place, he was obliged to decamp, first to Switzerland, from whence he shortly after removed to England, where he was well received by the most eminent literati, and noticed by people of distinction. Besides publishing his "Essays on Petrarch," "Disputations and Notes on Dante," &c., he contributed to the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other reviews; and he might have enjoyed an easy competence, if he had not unnecessarily involved himself in pecuniary difficulties. Died, 1827.

FO SSE, CHARLES DE LA, an eminent painter, was born at Paris, in 1640. He became successively professor, director, and chancellor of the academy of painting, and died in 1716.

FO SSE, ANTHONY DE LA, sieur d'Aubigny, nephew of the preceding, was born at Paris, in 1653. He was secretary to the Duke d'Aumont, but he devoted considerable time to literary pursuits, and wrote several successful tragedies, of which the best is entitled "Manlius Capitolinus." Died, 1708.

FOSTER, HENRY, a naval officer who accompanied Sir Edward Parry in his voyages to the arctic regions; and, in 1828, had the command of the Chanticleer sloop of war, to prosecute a voyage of scientific research in the southern regions of the globe. After having visited various islands in the Pacific and Atlantic oceans, in order to determine points relative to the figure of the earth, meridians, &c., he was drowned, by falling out of a canoe which he had used in ascending the river Chagres, Feb. 5, 1831.

FOSTER, JAMES, D.D., an eminent dissenting minister of the sect called Independents, was born at Exeter, in 1697; and commenced preaching there in 1718. He afterwards removed to Trowbridge, in Wiltshire, where he turned Baptist; and in 1724 was chosen successor to Dr. John Gale, of the chapel in Barbican, London, where he acted as a pastor nearly 20 years, and also as a lecturer at a meeting-house in the Old Jewry. He was so eloquent a preacher that crowds flocked to hear him, and Pope has made honourable mention of him in his satires. In 1746 he attended Lord Kilmarnock to the scaffold, which is said to have made so strong an impression upon his own spirits as to afflict him with a settled melancholy, from which he never entirely recovered. He wrote a "Defence of Revelation," in reply to Tindal; "Tracts on Heresy," "Discourses on Natural Religion and Social Virtue," &c. Died, 1753.

FOSTER, JOHN, a learned divine, was born in 1731, at Windsor, and educated at Eton, from whence he was sent to King's College, Cambridge. He was for a time head-master at Eton, and was appointed to a stall at Windsor, in 1772; but died in 1773 at Spa, whither he had gone for his health. He published an "Essay on the Nature of Accent and Quantity," &c.

FOSTER, Rev. JOHN, one of the most able writers and original thinkers of modern times, was born in Yorkshire, 1770. At an early age he entered the Baptist college at Bristol, and on the completion of his theological studies, was successively settled as a preacher at various places, the last of which was Downend, near Bristol; but he afterward relinquished his pastoral duties, and the last 20 years of his life were chiefly devoted to literary pursuits. He was a frequent contributor to the "Eclectic Review" (some of his articles have been collected and published separately); but his chief reputation is founded on his "Essays," which have gone through numerous editions, and whose popularity seems to increase with the lapse of time. Died, 1843.

FOSTER, Sir MICHAEL, an eminent lawyer, was born at Marlborough in Wiltshire, in 1689, entered the Middle Temple, and in regular course was called to the bar. In 1735 he was chosen recorder of Bristol; and, in 1745, appointed one of the justices of the king's bench, on which occasion he received the honour of knighthood. He published a tract against Bishop Gibson's Codex on Church Power, and a Report of the Trials of the Rebels in the year 1746. He was an independent and fearless asserter of the liberty of the subject.

FOTHERGILL, GEORGE, an eminent divine, was born in Westmoreland, in 1705, and educated at Kendal School, from whence he removed to Queen's College, Oxford, where he became fellow and tutor. In 1751 he was elected principal of Edmund Hall, and presented to the vicarage of Bramley in Hampshire. He wrote 2 vols. of sermons, which were highly esteemed. Died, 1760.

FOTHERGILL, JOHN, an eminent physician, was born in 1712, at Carr End, in Yorkshire, his parents being highly respectable members of the Society of Friends. He served his time to an apothecary, after which he went to Edinburgh, where, in 1736, he took his doctor's degree. In the same year he became a pupil in St. Thomas's Hospital, and in 1740 made a tour of the Continent. On his return he settled in London; and in 1748 acquired much reputation, by a tract entitled "An Account of the Sore Throat attended with Ulcers." In 1754 he became a member of the Edinburgh College of Physicians, and in 1763 a fellow of the Royal Society. For 30 years he may be said to have stood at the head of the medical profession, and died in 1780. His works, consisting chiefly of medical pieces, have been printed in 3 vols. 8vo., with his life prefixed.

FOUCHE', JOSEPH, duke of Otranto, was the son of a captain of a merchant ship, and born at Nantes in 1763. It was intended he should follow the same profession as his father, but he adopted that of the law, and the events of the Revolution soon brought him into notice. He headed a popular society at Nantes, by which he was sent, in 1792, as their deputy to the National Convention; and on the trial of Louis XVI. he voted for his death. In 1793 he was sent to Lyons with Collot d'Herbois, and the cold-blooded cruelties he there committed are recorded in his own letters and reports. Returning to Paris, he joined in the destruction of Robespierre, merely from the fear of becoming one of his victims. He, however, had several narrow escapes during the turbulent times that followed; but circumstances at length placed him at the head of the Parisian police, in which office he was a useful instrument in the hands of Buonaparte, who thought it might be easy, through Fouché, to hazard a political stroke without compromising his own character. To the superintendence of police Buonaparte added the management of the interior, and in 1805 he made him duke of Otranto. He then opened his drawing-room to the ancient nobility, many of whom he employed as spies; but the emperor grew suspicious of this minister, and after his second marriage he resolved on dismissing him, for which an opportunity soon offered. As they felt no confidence in each other, both employed a secret agent at the English court; which agents, not being known to each other, had no means of concerting measures together; consequently their communications did not agree, and the English minister concluded, from the want of coincidence in their proposals, that France was merely trifling, and complained loudly of the insult. This led to some investigation, when the contractor Ouvrard was proved to have been secretly employed by the Duke of Otranto. Immediately upon this, the Duke of Rovigo was made prefect of the interior, and Fouché was required to deliver up his papers. He was then sent into a sort of honourable exile, with the empty title of governor of Rome. In 1814 he returned to France, and was well received by the restored government. When Napoleon re-appeared in France, Fouché was suddenly called to the ministry, and filled his post with skill. After the battle of Waterloo he was appointed president of the provisional government, when he appeared as negotiator between the emperor and the allied powers; and seeing the uselessness of Paris offering a defence, he acted honourably in advising Napoleon to abdicate. Louis XVIII. continued Otranto as one of his ministers, until by the law of the 6th of January, 1816, he was obliged to quit France. After travelling some time in Germany, he took up his residence at Trieste, where he died in 1820. He was certainly one of the most celebrated, and, perhaps, the most designedly wicked of all the French revolutionists. One of his countrymen has summed up his character in this short sentence. "Fouché effected some good, and a great deal of evil."

FOULIS, ROBERT AND ANDREW, two eminent printers in Glasgow, distinguished for the beauty and accuracy of their books, particularly the Latin and Greek classics. They continued for 30 years to carry on business with great success; but having endeavoured to establish an academy for the instruction of youth in painting and sculpture, their resources were unequal to the undertaking, and it ultimately ruined them. Andrew died in 1774, and Robert in 1776.

FOUNTAIN, SIR ANDREW, an English antiquary, was born at Narford, in Norfolk, and educated at Christchurch, Oxford, where he studied the Anglo-Saxon language, and wrote a piece inserted in Dr. Hickes's Thesaurus, entitled "Numismata Anglo-Saxonica et Anglo-Danica." King William conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and in 1727 he was appointed warden of the mint. Died, 1753.

FOUQUIER TINVILLE, ANTHONY QUENTIN, one of the most execrable monsters of the French revolution, was born in 1747. As director of Robespierre's revolutionary tribunal in 1793, he boasted of pronouncing only one word—"Death." It was he that accused Marie Antoinette of incest with the dauphin; to which infamous accusation she replied, "I appeal to all mothers whether the charge is possible." He called the guillotine the coining machine of the revolution; and to such a state of savage fury had his thirst for blood risen, that its repeated gratification appears to have produced a real insanity. At length, after the fall of Robespierre, in 1795, this human demon was denounced by Freron in these appropriate words, "I demand that Fouquier Tinville may wear off the remains of his drunken surfeit of blood in hell." Being tried and condemned to the guillotine, the people used his own death-dealing phrase as he went to execution, while he replied with hoarse curses and distorted gesticulations to their execrations, but his courage failed him at the foot of the scaffold, and he died like a coward.

FOUQUIERES, JAMES, a Flemish painter, was born at Antwerp in 1580. He was the disciple of Velvet Breughel, and became so excellent in painting landscapes, as to be ranked with Titian. Died, 1659.

FOURCROY, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS DE, an eminent French chemist and natural philosopher, was born at Paris, in 1755; and, having adopted the profession of medicine, he applied himself closely to the study of the sciences connected with it, especially to chemistry. In 1784 he was appointed professor of chemistry at the Jardin du Roi; and about this period he became associated with Lavoisier, Berthollet, &c. in researches which led to vast improvements and discoveries in chemistry, and, in conjunction with them, he drew up the new "Méthode de Nomenclature Chimique." When the Revolution took place, he engaged in politics, and was chosen a deputy from Paris to the National Convention. In 1794 he became a member of the committee of public safety, and, next year, passed into the council of ancients. In 1799, Buonaparte gave him a place in the council of state, when he was entrusted with the management of all affairs relating to public instruction, and acquitted himself in a manner highly meritorious. He was the author of many valuable works on chemical science and natural philosophy. Died, 1809.

FOURCROY, CHARLES RENÉ DE, an eminent French officer and engineer, who served with distinction in various campaigns, and attained the rank of marchal de camp. Born, 1718; died, 1791.

FOURIER, CHARLES, the son of a Besançon clothier, is known as the author of the co-operative system, in which he proposed a division of profits proportioned to the labour, talent, and capital employed. He has left several works bearing on his favourite views, which, under the names of Socialism and Communism, have since taken such deep hold of the French character, that it is to be feared nothing will eradicate them until the tremendous ordeal through which they must pass in the experiment shall prove them to be impracticable. Born, 1772; died, 1837.

FOURMONT, STEPHEN, an eminent linguist, was born, in 1683, at Herbelai, near Paris. He was member of many learned societies, and held the situation of secretary to the Duke of Orleans. Died, 1746.

FOURNIER, PIERRE SIMON, a Parisian type founder and engraver; author of "Manuel Typographique," and other works illustrative of his art. Born, 1712; died, 1768.

FOUVIER, Baron, a secretary of the Academy of Sciences at Paris; who had been a priest of the Oratory, but devoted himself to the study of mathematics. He accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt, but afterwards lost his favour, as he also did that of the Bourbon family; neither of the governments reposing confidence in his services. He published some discussions in the journal of the Polytechnic School, &c. Died, 1830.

FOWLER, EDWARD, a learned English prelate, was born, in 1632, at Westerleigh, Gloucestershire. Though at first a non-conformist, he was afterwards distinguished for his attachment to the Church of England; and, after enjoying several livings, he was raised to the see of Gloucester for his refusal to read the famous declaration of James II. in 1668, and his subsequent exertions in favour of the Revolution. He was the author of various theological tracts, and died in 1714.

FOX, EDWARD, an eminent English prelate and statesman in the 16th century, was born at Dursley, Gloucestershire; educated at Eton, and King's College, Cambridge, at which latter he became provost; and was sent by Cardinal Wolsey on a mission to Rome, in conjunction with Gardiner, to procure the divorce of Henry VIII. from queen Catharine. He was subsequently engaged in embassies to France and Germany; and, in 1535, he was promoted to the see of Hereford. He is said to have secretly promoted the cause of the Reformation; but though he might have used his influence in that cause as a politician, as a divine he never openly espoused it. Died, 1536.

FOX, GEORGE, founder of the society of Friends, or Quakers, was born at Drayton, Leicestershire, in 1624, and apprenticed to a grazier. At the age of 19 he persuaded himself that he had received a divine command to devote himself solely to religion. He accordingly forsook his relations, and wandered from place to place, leading a life of itinerancy, in which he fasted much, walked abroad in retired places, studying the Bible, and sometimes sat in a hollow tree for a day together. In 1648 he began to propagate his opinions, and commenced public preacher. At Derby, his followers were first denominated Quakers, in consequence of their tremulous manner of delivery. He was taken up in 1635, and sent a prisoner to Cromwell, who, being satisfied with his pacific intentions, set him at liberty.

In fact, he was more than once indebted to the Protector for his freedom, when committed to prison by the country magistracy for his frequent interruption of ministers while performing divine service. In 1666 he was liberated from prison by order of Charles II., and immediately commenced the task of forming his followers into a formal and united society. In 1669 he married the widow of judge Fell, and soon after went over to America, for the express purpose of making proselytes. On his return he was again thrown into prison, but was soon released, and went to Holland. Returning to England, and refusing to pay tithes, he was cast in a suit for the recovery of them, and again visited the Continent. His health had now become impaired by the incessant toil and suffering he had endured, and he again revisited his native land, living in a retired manner till his death, in 1690. He was sincere in his religious opinions, and a rigid observer of the great moral duties. His writings consist of his "Journals," "Epistles," and "Doctrinal Pieces."

FOX, SIR STEPHEN, a statesman, was born at Farley, Wilts, in 1627. From his attachment to Charles II., he was at the Restoration made clerk of the green cloth, and paymaster of the forces. By opposing the bill for a standing army, he lost the favour of King William, but was replaced in the reign of Anne. He built a new church at Farley, founded some almshouses, and was the first who projected Chelsea College as a military asylum. He was twice married, being father by his first wife to the first Earl of Ilchester, and by the second to the first Lord Holland, the subject of the following paragraph.

FOX, HENRY, the first Lord Holland, an eminent statesman, was born in 1705, and educated at Eton. After filling lower offices in the state, he was in 1746 appointed secretary at war; retired in 1756, to make way for Mr. Pitt, afterwards Earl of Chatham, but returned to office the following year as paymaster of the forces; and in this situation his public conduct has been much admired upon. In 1763 he was created Baron Holland of Foxley, and died in 1774.

FOX, CHARLES JAMES, the second son of the preceding, was born Jan. 13th, 1748; and received his education at Westminster, Eton, and Oxford, where his proficiency in classical literature attracted considerable notice. It was the intention of his father, who had a high opinion of his capacity, that he should occupy a prominent station in the political world, and he accordingly procured for him a seat in parliament for the borough of Midhurst when he was only 19. He, however, prudently remained silent till he had attained the legal age of a member, and then we find him, in 1770, aiding the ministry, who rewarded him with the office of one of the lords of the admiralty; but he resigned that situation in 1772; and, in 1773, was nominated a commissioner of the treasury, from whence he was suddenly dismissed, in consequence of some disagreement with Lord North. Mr. Fox now entered the lists of opposition, and throughout the whole of the American war proved a most powerful antagonist to the ministers of that period. On the downfall of Lord North he was appointed, in 1732, one of the secretaries of state, which situation he resigned on the death of the Marquis of Rockingham; when the Earl of Shelburne, afterwards Marquis of Lansdowne, was appointed to succeed him. On the dissolution of that short-lived administration, he formed the coalition with Lord North (a coalition which was odious to the great mass of the people), and resumed his former office. He now brought in his India bill, which, after having passed the House of Commons, was unexpectedly thrown out by the House of Lords, and occasioned the resignation of the ministry, of which he formed a part. Mr. Pitt then came into power; while Mr. Fox placed himself at the head of the opposition, and a long contest took place between these illustrious rivals. Worn out, and perhaps disgusted, with public business, he, in 1788, repaired to the Continent, in company with Mrs. Fox, and after spending a few days with Gibbon, the historian, at Lausanne, entered the classic regions of Italy. In consequence, however, of the sudden illness of the king, and the necessity of constituting a regency, he was soon recalled. The regency, the trial of Mr. Hastings, and, above all, the French revolution, and its relative effects on this country, gave ample scope to display his talents and eloquence, both of which he continued to exert against the administration of Mr. Pitt; inveighing against the war with France, and denouncing the measures of his great rival on every subject of importance. However men may differ as to the soundness of Mr. Fox's political views, no one denies that he was a sincere friend to the freedom and best interests of mankind, or that in private life a more amiable and pleasant companion could not be found. In the senate he was argumentative, bold, and energetic; in the domestic circle, no one was more ingenuous, bland, or courteous. His literary abilities were of the first order; and had he lived in less stirring times, there is every probability his country would have benefited by his writings. As it was, he left little behind him for our admiration but his eloquent speeches, and "The History of the early Part of the Reign of James II." On the death of Mr. Pitt he was again recalled to power, and set on foot a negotiation for peace with France, but did not live to see the issue of it. He died in the 59th year of his age, on the 13th of September, 1806.

FOX, JOHN, a celebrated church historian and divine, was born, in 1517, at Boston, Lincolnshire, and educated at Oxford. Applying himself closely to the study of theology, he became a convert to the principles of the Reformation, was expelled his college on a charge of heresy, and suffered great privation. A short time before the death of Henry VIII., he was employed as tutor in the family of the Duchess of Richmond, to educate the children of her brother, the Earl of Surrey, then a state prisoner. In the reign of Edward VI. he was restored to his fellowship; but when Mary ascended the throne he found it prudent to retire to the Continent, where he gained a livelihood as corrector of the press for an eminent printer at Basle. On Elizabeth's accession he returned to his native country, and settled in the family of his former pupil, the Duke of Norfolk, where he remained till his death; and he also received a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Salisbury. He was the author of many controversial and other works; but the only one which now obtains perusal is his "History of the Acts and Monuments of the Church," commonly called "Fox's Book of Martyrs." There is scarcely any book in existence, perhaps, concerning which such opposite opinions have been entertained; but, while we are ready to admit that a recital of horrid cruelties practised by persecuting bigots is repulsive to the feelings of humanity, and calculated to perpetuate the animosities arising from religious feuds, rather than to promote peace and good-will, these "Acts and Monuments" are in general too veracious in their details to be regarded as the fictions of a zealot. Fox died in 1587, aged 69.

FOX, RICHARD, an English prelate and statesman, was born about 1466, at Ropesley, near Grantham, and educated at Oxford and Cambridge. He was in high favour with Henry VII., who employed him on various missions; and successively made him bishop of Exeter, Bath and Wells, Durham, and Winchester. But in the following reign he found himself supplanted by Wolsey, whom he had introduced and fostered; he therefore retired to his diocese, and passed the remainder of his days in acts of charity and munificence. He was a patron of learning, and the founder of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and of the free-schools of Taunton and Grantham. Died, 1528.

FOY, MAXIMILIAN SEBASTIAN, General, was a native of Ham, in Picardy, where he was born in 1775. He entered the army at 15 years of age, and made his first campaign under Dumouriez in 1792. He displayed his military talents to great advantage in Italy, Germany, and Portugal; and succeeded Marmont, as commander-in-chief after the battle of Salamanca; where he conducted a skilful retreat to the Douro. He received his 15th wound on the field of Waterloo, but refused to quit his post until the close of that engagement. He was afterwards employed as inspector-general of infantry; and in 1819 was elected a member of the chamber of deputies at Paris; when he distinguished himself as an orator, and was a great public favourite. He died in 1825; and having left his widow and family in destitute circumstances, a most liberal subscription was immediately entered into, to provide for them, and to erect a monument to his memory. From his MSS. a "History of the Peninsular War" has been published by his widow.

FRA DIAVOLO, a Neapolitan robber, whose real name was Michael Pozzo, was born about 1769. He was at first a stocking-maker, afterwards a friar, and in the latter capacity united himself as leader to a gang of outlawed banditti in Calabria. In his double character of robber and priest, he offered his services, in 1799, to Cardinal Ruffo, who headed the counter-revolutionary party in favour of the Bourbons of Naples. For his services, although a price had been previously set on his head, he obtained pardon, distinction, and a pension of 3600 ducats, with which he retired to an estate which he purchased. On Joseph Napoleon becoming king, the expelled government again set him in motion. He made a descent in 1806, with a large body of banditti and recruits, at Sperlonga, threw open the prisons, and was joined by numerous lazzaroni; but, after a severe action, he was defeated and taken prisoner, condemned by a special commission, and executed. He died with disdainful indifference. He often, like Robin Hood, restored their liberty and property to captives who interested him, especially females, even making them presents, and affecting to protect the poor.

FRAMERY, NICHOLAS STEPHEN, an eminent French musician and dramatist; born at Ronen in 1745. He was the composer both of the poetry and music of several operas; wrote many critical tracts, &c., and for a time conducted the Journal de Musique. Died, 1810.

FRANCIA, FRANCESCO, an eminent painter, was born at Bologna in 1450. He had been a goldsmith and an engraver of medals, but afterwards applied wholly to painting. Being employed by Raphael to place a picture of his in a church at Bologna, it is said that he was so struck with its beauty, and convinced of his own inferiority, that he fell into a desponding state. Died, 1518.

FRANCIA, DR. JOSE GASPAR RODRIGUEZ, the celebrated dictator of Paraguay, was the son of a small French proprietor in the country, and born at Assumption, in 1757. His mother was a Creole. Arrived at the proper age, he was sent to the university of Cordova, with a view to entering the church; but his plans underwent a change while he was still a student, and on his return to his native town with the degree of doctor of laws, he began his public career as a barrister. His high reputation for learning, but still more for honesty and independence, procured him an extensive practice; and he devoted himself to legal pursuits for thirty years, varying his professional avocations with a perusal of the French Encyclopedian writers, and with the study of mathematics and mechanical philosophy, to which he remained addicted throughout his life. In 1811, soon after the revolution of the Spanish possessions of South America became general, Dr. Francia, then in his 54th year, was appointed secretary to the independent junta of Paraguay; and such was the ability he displayed in this capacity, that on the formation of a new congress, called in 1813, he was appointed consul of the republic, with Yegros for his colleague. From this moment the affairs of his country underwent a favourable change; the finances were husbanded; peace was obtained in Paraguay, while the rest of the South American continent was a prey to anarchy; and the people's gratitude to their deliverer was characteristically exhibited in conferring upon him, in 1817, unlimited despotic authority, which he exercised during the remainder of his life. Died, 1840.

FRANCIS I., king of France, ascended the throne in 1515, at the age of 21. He was the son of Charles of Orleans, and of Louisa of Savoy, grand-daughter to Valentine, duke of Milan, in right of whom he laid claim to that duchy. The Swiss opposed his passage through their territories, and were defeated at the battle of Marignano. Francis then entered the Milanese, and forced Maximilian Sforza to relinquish the sovereignty. A war afterwards broke out between him and the emperor Charles V., in which Francis lost a considerable part of his territories, was made prisoner, and conveyed to Madrid. In 1526 he regained his liberty, after renouncing his claim to Naples, the Milanese, Flanders, and Artois. In 1535 he marched again into Italy, and possessed himself of Savoy; but a peace was hastily made up, which was soon after broken, and Francis again lost a considerable part of his own dominions. He died in 1547. He was the patron and friend of literature, and possessed a generous and chivalric spirit; and had he been content to reign in peace, France might have been happy under his rule. He founded the Royal College of Paris, and furnished a magnificent library at Fontainebleau, besides building several palaces, which he ornamented with pictures and statues, to the great encouragement of the fine arts. He is frequently termed "the Great," and "the Restorer of Learning;" and though, perhaps, not entitled to these appellations in their strictest sense, he may be fairly considered as one of the most distinguished sovereigns that ever swayed the sceptre of France.

FRANCIS, of Lorraine, emperor of Germany, was born in 1708, and married in 1736 Maria Theresa, daughter of Charles VI. On the death of her father in 1740, Maria Theresa appointed her husband to the administration of the government, and on the death of Charles VII. in 1745, he was elected emperor. Died, 1765.

FRANCIS, ST., or FRANCIS OF ASSISI, the founder of the order of Franciscan friars, was born at Assisi, in Umbria, in 1182. He was the son of a merchant, and said to be of dissolute habits; but on recovering from a dangerous illness he became enthusiastically devout, and devoted himself to solitude, joyfully undergoing every species of penance and mortification. Thinking his extravagance proceeded from insanity, his father had him closely confined; and at length, being taken before the bishop of Assisi, in order formally to resign all claim to his paternal estate, he not only assented to it, but literally stripped himself. He was now looked upon as a saint; and great numbers joining him in his vow of poverty, he drew up rules for their use, which being sanctioned by pope Innocent III. the order of Franciscans was established. So rapidly did they increase, that in 1219 he held a chapter, which was attended by 5000 friars. After having made a fruitless effort to convert the sultan Meleddin, he returned to Assisi, where he died in 1236, and was canonised by pope Gregory in 1230.

FRANCIS OF PAULO, a Romish saint, born at Paulo, in Calabria, in 1416. He was brought up in a Franciscan convent; and in order to exceed the preceding saint in austerity of life, he retired to a cell on the desert part of the coast, where he soon obtained followers, built a monastery, and thus commenced a new order, called Minims. He enjoined on his disciples a total abstinence from wine, flesh, and fish; besides which they were always to go barefoot, and never sleep on a bed. He died in France, aged 91, in 1508, and was canonised by Leo X.

FRANCIS DE SALES, another saint of the Roman calendar, was born of a noble family at the castle of Sales, near Geneva, 1567. He obtained great praise for the success which attended his missions for the conversion of his Protestant countrymen. He was ultimately made bishop of Geneva; and he performed the duties of his station with exemplary diligence and charity. He died in 1622, and was canonised in 1635.

FRANCIS, PHILIP, son of the dean of Lismore, was a poet and dramatic writer, though much more celebrated for his translation of Horace and other classic authors, than for his original compositions. He was educated at Dublin; and having taken orders, first settled at Esher, Surrey, where he kept an academy, and had Gibbon the historian among his pupils. He afterwards held the living of Barrow, Suffolk, and was chaplain to Chelsea Hospital. He wrote "Eugenia" and "Constantia," two tragedies, some controversial tracts, &c. Died, 1773.

FRANCIS, Sir PHILIP, a political character of some distinction, and a son of the preceding, was born at Dublin in 1740, and received his education at St. Paul's School. He entered into public life as a clerk in the secretary of state's office; after which he went out as secretary to the embassy to Portugal; and, in 1773, he became a member of the council of Bengal. He remained in India till 1780, during which time he was the constant and strenuous opponent of the measures of Governor Hastings; and his opposition savouring too much of personal hostility, a duel was the result. On his return to England he was chosen member for the borough of Yarmouth, in the Isle of Wight; and, joining the opposition, he took a prominent part in most of their measures, particularly in the impeachment of Mr. Hastings. He published many political pamphlets and speeches, all of which are imbued with considerable spirit and party feeling. The celebrated "Letters of Junius" have been attributed to him, and many circumstantial proofs are brought forward to support the opinion; he, however, always disavowed the authorship; the supposition therefore rests only on strong conjecture, founded on certain events of his life and a supposed similarity of style between them and his acknowledged productions. He died in 1818.

FRANCIS I., JOSEPH CHARLES, emperor of Austria, king of Lombardy, &c., was born in 1768, and succeeded his father, Leopold

II., in 1792. At that time he was styled emperor of Germany, by the name of Francis II.; but, in 1804, when France had been declared an empire, he assumed the title of hereditary emperor of Austria; and, on the establishment of the confederation of the Rhine in 1806, he renounced the title of Roman emperor and German king, and resigned the government of the German empire. At the age of 20 he accompanied his uncle, the emperor Joseph II., on a campaign against the Turks. From his position, he necessarily became a most important pivot upon which the mighty affairs of Europe turned during the continuance of the wars arising out of the French revolution. France declared war against him in 1792; and Prussia, though at first his ally, concluded a separate peace with the republic; but the emperor Francis continued the war with energy. In 1794 he put himself at the head of the army of the Netherlands, and defeated the French at Cateau, Landrecy, and Tournay. In 1797 he procured a temporary repose by the peace of Campo Formio; but in 1799 he entered into a new coalition with Russia and England against France; which was dissolved by Austria and Russia being compelled to conclude the peace of Luneville in 1801. War again broke out between France and Austria in 1805; but, after the battle of Austerlitz, the terms of an armistice and basis of a treaty were settled in a personal interview between Francis and Napoleon, at the bivouac of the latter. This peace lasted till 1809, when the restless ambition of the French emperor induced Francis to declare war against him once more. A disastrous campaign followed; but a favourable peace was obtained, and, by the marriage of his eldest daughter, Maria Louisa, to Napoleon, a strong tie seemed to be formed between the two imperial houses. This family tie, however, was not sufficient to appease the aggrandising ambition of his son-in-law. In 1813, Francis found himself again compelled to enter into an alliance with Russia and Prussia against France; and, to the close of the contest, he was present with the allied armies. He died, March 3. 1835, leaving a more extensive empire to his successor than any of his ancestors ever possessed.

FRANCKLIN, Dr. THOMAS, was the son of the printer of the celebrated anti-ministerial paper called The Craftsman, and born in 1721. He was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge; became Greek professor at Cambridge; obtained successively the livings of Ware, Thundridge, and Brasted, and was made king's chaplain, and died in 1784. He translated Lucian, Sophocles, and other classic authors; wrote a "Dissertation on Ancient Tragedy," four volumes of Sermons, "The Earl of Warwick," and various other dramas; and left behind him the character of a learned but eccentric man.

FRANCKS, or FRANKEN, FRANCIS. There were two eminent Dutch painters of this name, father and son; distinguished for the beauty of their scriptural pieces. The elder Francks died in 1616; the other in 1642.

FRANCO-BARRETO, a Portuguese poet, soldier, and churchman, was born in 1606, and died in 1664. After fighting against the Dutch in Brazil, he returned to Portugal, entered the church, and became vicar of Barrelo.

FRANCOIS DE NEUFCHATEAU, NICHOLAS, was born in 1750, at Neufchateau, in Lorraine. He was bred to the law, and sent as attorney-general to St. Domingo in 1782; but returning at the commencement of the revolution, he espoused its principles, and obtained a seat in the legislative assembly. In 1797 he was chosen one of the five directors; and under the reign of Napoleon he became a count, a senator, and grand officer of the legion of honour. He was a man of great ability, both as a statesman and an author; and left various works in different branches of polite literature.

FRANK, PETER, a German physician, born in 1735; was director-general of the hospitals of Lombardy; but quitted Italy in 1795, to become clerical professor at Vienna. He afterwards went to Russia as imperial archiater, but ill health compelled him to return; and after having refused to visit France, whither he was invited by Napoleon, he died in 1821. Professor Frank's most important works are, "Système de Police Médicale," 11 vols. 8vo.; "Choix d'Opuscules appartenant à la Médecine," 12 vols. 8vo.; and "De l'Art de Traiter les Maladies," 9 vols. 8vo.

FRANKLIN, BENJAMIN, an eminent philosopher and politician, was born at Boston, in the United States, in 1706. His father, who had emigrated from England, was a tallow-chandler; and Benjamin, the fifteenth of seventeen children, was apprenticed to his elder brother, a printer and publisher of a newspaper at Boston. His early passion for reading, which he had always manifested, was now gratified; and he was able also, through the medium of the newspaper, to try his powers at literary composition. Some political articles in this journal having offended the general court of the colony, the publisher was imprisoned, and forbidden to continue it. To elude this prohibition, young Franklin was made the nominal editor, and his indentures were ostensibly cancelled. After the release of his brother, he took advantage of this act to assert his freedom, and thus escaped from a severity of treatment which he thought savoured more of the rigorous master than the kind relation. He therefore secretly embarked aboard a small vessel bound to New York, without means or recommendations; and not finding employment there, he set out for Philadelphia, where he arrived on foot with a penny roll in his hand, and one dollar in his purse. Here he obtained employment as a compositor, and having attracted the notice of Sir William Keith, governor of Pennsylvania, was induced by his promises to visit England, for the purpose of purchasing types, &c., to establish himself in business. Upon reaching London, in 1725, he found himself entirely deceived in his promised letters of credit and recommendation from governor Keith; and being, as before, in a strange place, without credit or acquaintance, he went to work once more as a compositor. While he was in London (a period of about eighteen months) he became a convert to deistical opinions, and wrote a "Dissertation on Liberty and Necessity, Pleasure and Pain;" wherein he endeavoured to show that there was no difference between virtue and vice. This he afterwards regarded as one of the grand errors of his life. In 1726 he returned to Philadelphia; soon after which he entered into business as a printer and stationer; and in 1728 he established a newspaper. His habitual prudence, combined with activity and talents, soon raised him to the rank of a highly respectable tradesman; and, chiefly by his exertions, a public library, an insurance company, and other useful institutions were established in Philadelphia. In 1732, he published his "Poor Richard's Almanack;" which became noted for the concise and useful maxims on industry and economy with which it was sprinkled. In 1736 he was appointed clerk to the general assembly at Pennsylvania, and, the year following, post-master of Philadelphia. In the French war, in 1744, he proposed and carried into effect a plan of association for the defence of that province; which merits notice, as it served to unfold to America the secret of her own strength. About the same time he commenced his electrical experiments, making several discoveries in that branch of philosophy, the principal of which was the identity of the electric fire and lightning; and as practical utility was, in his opinion, the ultimate object of all philosophical investigation, he immediately applied his discoveries to the invention of iron conductors for the protection of buildings from lightning. In 1747 he was chosen a representative of the general assembly, in which situation he distinguished himself by several acts of public utility. By his means a militia bill was passed, and he was appointed colonel of the Philadelphia regiment. In 1757 he was sent to England as agent for Pennsylvania. At this time he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, and honoured with the degree of doctor of laws by the universities of St. Andrew's, Edinburgh, and Oxford. In 1762 he returned to America; but two years afterwards he again visited England, in his former capacity, as agent; and it was at this period that he was examined at the House of Commons concerning the stamp act. In 1775 he returned home, and was elected a delegate to the congress. He was very active in the contest between England and the colonies; and was sent to France, where, in 1778, he signed a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, which produced a war between that country and England. In 1783 he signed the definite treaty of peace, and in 1785 returned to America, where he was chosen president of the supreme council. He died in 1790. Besides his political, miscellaneous, and philosophical pieces, he wrote several papers in the American Transactions, and two volumes of essays, with his life prefixed, written by himself. He was a man of much practical wisdom, possessing a cool temper and sound judgment; and though never inattentive to his own interest, he united with it a zealous solicitude for the advancement of the general interests of mankind.

FRANKLIN, ELEANOR ANNE, the wife of Captain Franklin, the celebrated navigator, but known as an authoress as Miss Porden, was the youngest daughter of Mr. Porden, an architect; and born in 1795. In early youth she exhibited great talent and a strong memory, and acquired a considerable knowledge of Greek and other languages. Her first poem, "The Veils," was written when she was seventeen. Her next was "The Arctic Expedition," which led to her acquaintance with Captain Franklin; but her principal work is the epic of "Cœur de Lion." She died in 1825, a few days after her husband had sailed from England on his second expedition.

FRAUENHOFER, JOSEPH VON, professor of philosophy in the Royal Bavarian Academy, was the son of a glazier at Straubing, and apprenticed to a glass-cutter. After struggling with many difficulties, he acquired a knowledge of the theory of optics and mathematics, constructed a glass-cutting machine, and ground optical glasses. His subsequent discoveries and inventions in optics, the excellence of the telescopes which he manufactured, and his "Researches concerning the Laws of Light," printed in Gilbert's Annals of Physics, all contributed to establish his fame; and he died in 1826, after having been raised to deserved celebrity as a man of science.

FREDERIC I., surnamed BARBAROSSA, emperor of Germany, born in 1121, was the son of Frederic, duke of Suabia, and succeeded his uncle Conrad on the imperial throne in 1152. His principal efforts were directed to extend and confirm his power in Italy, but the events of the war, which lasted almost twenty years, were not particularly favourable for him. Saladin having retaken Jerusalem from the Christians, the pope preached a new crusade, and Frederic, with an immense army, undertook it. The Greek emperor had secretly entered into an alliance with Saladin, and attempted to prevent the march of the Germans through his dominions; but Frederic, after gaining two great battles, penetrated into Syria, where he met his death in 1190, by being drowned while bathing. Independent of his military prowess, this monarch deserves notice for his political capacity and literary talent.

FREDERIC II., the grandson of the preceding, and son of Henry VI., was born in 1194; elected king of the Romans in 1196, and emperor in 1210, in opposition to Otho. He afterwards went to the Holy Land, and concluded a truce with the sultan of Babylon, which so provoked pope Gregory IX. that he anathematized him. On this, Frederic returned to Europe and laid siege to Rome, which occasioned the famous parties of the Guelphs and the Ghibelines. Gregory was obliged to make peace, but in 1236 he again excommunicated Frederic, and the war was renewed, which proved unsuccessful to the emperor. He was brave, bold, and generous; possessed enlightened views of government; and, for the age in which he lived, was highly accomplished. Died, 1250.

FREDERIC WILLIAM, generally called the great elector, was born in 1620, and at the age of 20 years succeeded his father as elector of Brandenburg. He is considered as the founder of the Prussian greatness; and from him is derived much of that military spirit which is now the national characteristic. By affording protection to the French Protestant refugees, he gained, as citizens of the state, 20,000 industrious manufacturers, an acquisition of no slight importance to the north of Germany; and he also gave great encouragement to agricultural improvements. He founded the library at Berlin, and a university at Duisburg; and at his death he left to his son a country much enlarged, and a well supplied treasury. Died, 1688, aged 69.

FREDERIC WILLIAM I., king of Prussia, son of Frederic I., and father of Frederic the Great, was born in 1688, and ascended the throne in 1713, having previously married a daughter of the elector of Hanover, afterwards George I. of England. His habits were entirely military; and his constant care was to establish the strictest discipline among his troops. But he had such a ridiculous fondness for tall soldiers, that, in order to fill the ranks of his favourite regiment, he would use force or fraud, if money would not effect his object, in order to obtain the tallest men in Europe. Being void of science and ornamental literature, he treated their professors with every kind of discouragement. He was rigorous in his punishments, and always showed an inclination to aggravate rather than mitigate them. He died in 1740, leaving an abundant treasury, and an efficient army of 66,000 men.

FREDERIC II., king of Prussia, commonly called the Great, and sometimes erroneously styled Frederic III., was born in 1712. He obtained but a scanty education, owing to his father's predilection for military discipline, and his determination to check the strong inclination which he perceived in the heir-apparent to cherish literature. This led him, in 1730, to attempt an escape from Prussia; but the scheme being discovered, the prince was confined in the castle of Custrin, and his young companion, Katte, executed before his face. After an imprisonment of some months, a reconciliation was effected; and in 1733 he married the Princess of Brunswick Wolfenbuttel, in obedience to his father's command; but it is said the marriage was never consummated. In 1740 he succeeded to the throne, and it was not long before he added Lower Silesia to his dominions. In 1744 he took Prague, with its garrison of 16,000 men. In 1745 he defeated the Prince of Lorraine at Freidburgh, and then marched into Bohemia, where he defeated an Austrian army. Shortly after he took Dresden, laid it under heavy exactions, and there concluded a highly favourable peace. During the ten years of comparative tranquillity that followed, Frederic employed himself in bringing his troops into a state of discipline never before equalled in any age or country. He also encouraged agriculture, the arts, manufactures, and commerce, reformed the laws, and increased the revenues; thus improving the condition of the state, and rendering it more than a match for foreign enemies. Secret information of an alliance between Austria, Russia, and Saxony gave him reason to fear an attack, which he hastened to anticipate by the invasion of Saxony, in 1756. This commenced the seven years' war, in which he contended single-handed against the united force of Russia, Saxony, Sweden, France, Austria, and the great majority of the other German states; till at length, after various changes of fortune, he was left, in 1763, in the peaceful possession of all his paternal and acquired dominions. He now entered into a league with his former enemies, which in 1772 was cemented by the partition of Poland, an act which was then, as it is now, denounced by every lover of freedom and national security. The remainder of his life, with the exception of a short demonstration of hostility towards Austria, which was terminated by the mediation of Russia, was passed in the tranquillity of literary leisure, and in an unreserved intercourse with learned men; among whom Voltaire and Maupertuis were for a long time his especial favourites. His own literary attainments were far above mediocrity, as may be seen by his "History of his own Times," "The History of the Seven Years' War," "Considerations on the State of Europe," "Memoirs of the House of Brandenburg," poems, &c. Frederic, on ascending the throne, found in his states a population of only two millions and a quarter, and left it with six millions, a result to which nothing but his talents as a general and a legislator contributed. His talents, his army, and his treasure were his sole means of government. His habits were singularly simple and unostentatious; he rose constantly at five, when he employed himself in reading despatches and reports, all of which were addressed to himself in person, and to each of which he marked an answer in the margin, consisting generally of no more than a single word; at eleven he reviewed his regiment, and dined at twelve; the remainder of the day was passed in literary pursuits, and in the enjoyment of musical performances; and at ten he invariably retired to rest. He was an avowed sceptic in matters of religion, yet he encouraged the observance of it among his subjects; and though he is justly chargeable with immoderate ambition; by which his subjects were continually involved in war, yet his vigorous understanding and undaunted courage rendered him equal to his position; while the splendour of his reign endeared him to the people, and they willingly accorded to him the epithet of "the Great." He died in 1786, aged 75.

FREDERICK-WILLIAM III., king of Prussia, was born in 1770, and ascended the throne, on the death of his father, in 1797. It is rather the province of history than of biography to describe the events, important though they be, which distinguish the reign of a monarch: we shall therefore observe generally, that during all the extraordinary vicissitudes to which he and his country were subjected by the successes of Napoleon, his conduct ensured for him the confidence of his army and the regard of his subjects; though an impartial biographer feels himself called on to state, that the convulsions which shook the Prussian throne to its foundations in 1848 may in no small degree be traced to his refusal to grant those constitutional privileges which had long been promised to his people, and which they were well fitted to exercise. Died, June 7. 1840.

FREDERICK, Colonel, son of the unfortunate Theodore, commonly called King of Corsica, of whose misfortunes and impudence he partook. He obtained the rank of colonel, with the cross of the order of merit, from the Duke of Wirtemberg, for whom he acted as agent in England. Being greatly reduced in circumstances, he shot himself in the portal of Westminster Abbey, in 1796. He wrote "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Corse," a "Description of Corsica," &c.

FREELING, Sir FRANCIS, bart., secretary to the general post-office, was born at Bristol, in 1764, and commenced his official career in the post-office of that city. On the establishment of the new system of mail coaches by Mr. Palmer, in 1785, he was selected by that gentleman, on account of his superior ability and intelligence, to assist him in carrying his improvements into effect, and was introduced into the general post-office, in 1787, where he successively filled the offices of surveyor, joint secretary, and sole secretary, for nearly half a century. The unremitting attention which he bestowed upon the duties of his office, the skill with which he managed its most difficult transactions, and the unbounded confidence which he enjoyed both of his sovereign and the highest functionaries in the state, together with his unimpeachable character, enabled him to effect improvements of the highest importance and value to the interests of commerce and the prosperity of the country. The honour of a baronetcy was conferred upon him in 1828, and was the spontaneous act of George IV., from whom, as well as from his royal father, he had received many flattering testimonials of approval. Sir Francis was a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and one of the original members of the Roxburgh Club. He died July 10. 1836, aged 72.

FREEMAN, WILLIAM PEERE WILLIAMS, Admiral, entered the service in 1757, and was, at the time of his death, the senior officer in the British navy. Though he distinguished himself in the American war, he was not employed during the late war with France, owing to his political principles being opposed to those of the Pitt ministry; but on the accession of William IV. to the throne, the situation of admiral of the fleet became vacant, and his majesty appointed him to it. He died in 1832, aged 90.

FREIND, JOHN, a learned physician and writer on medical science, was born in 1675, at Croton, in Northamptonshire. In 1703 he distinguished himself by an able work on diseases peculiar to females, which raised him to eminence as a physiologist. The next year he was appointed chemical professor at Oxford; and in 1705 he accompanied the Earl of Peterborough in his expedition to Spain, as physician to the army. On his return in 1707 he published a vindication of the earl's conduct in Spain, which gained him considerable reputation. He then obtained his diploma of M.D., and in 1709 published his "Lectures on Chemistry." In 1711 he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and the same year he accompanied the Duke of Ormond in his expedition to Flanders. In 1716 he was elected a fellow of the college of physicians, and in 1722 he was brought into parliament for Launceston. The year following he was sent to the Tower on suspicion of being concerned in Aterbury's plot, but was soon released on bail. While in confinement, he wrote an epistle to his friend Dr. Mead, "De quibusdam Variolarum Generibus." He also formed the plan of his greatest literary undertaking, which he afterwards published, under the title of "The History of Physic," &c. At the accession of George II. he was appointed physician to the queen. Died, 1728. — Dr. ROBERT FREIND, his brother, was master of Westminster School, and died in 1754, aged 83.

FREINSHIEM, or FREINSHIEMIUS, JOHN, a learned German, was born at Ulm, in 1608, and became professor of rhetoric in the university of Upsal, and librarian to queen Christina of Sweden; but returned to Germany in consequence of ill health, and died at Heidelberg, in 1660. He showed himself a profound scholar, particularly by his celebrated supplements to the lost books and passages of Curtius and of Livy.

FREMINET, MARTIN, chief painter to Henry IV. and Louis XIII., was born at Paris, in 1567, and died in 1619.

FRENICLÉ DE BESSY, BERNARD, a French mathematician, celebrated for his skill in solving mathematical questions without the aid of algebra. He kept his method a secret during his life, but a description of it was found among his papers, and is called the method of exclusion. Died, 1675.

FRERE, Right Hon. JOHN HOOKHAM, a gentleman distinguished for his diplomatic talents, was born in 1709, and was educated at Eton, where, in conjunction with Canning, &c., he appeared as one of the youthful writers of the Microcosm. He entered parliament in 1796 as member for West Looe; in 1799 succeeded his friend Mr. Canning as under-secretary of state for foreign affairs, and subsequently filled various diplomatic missions in Spain, Portugal, and Prussia. Mr. Frere was a good scholar, and a man of great and varied talents; but most of his writings were of a fugitive kind, and have not been published in a collected form. He had resided at Malta many years, and there he died, of apoplexy, Jan. 7. 1846.

FRERET, NICHOLAS, a French writer, was born at Paris, in 1688, and abandoned his profession of law to devote himself to the study of history and chronology. His treatises and controversies on these subjects, among others with Newton, compose a great part of the memoirs of the academy at that time. His first work, "On the Origin of the French," wounded the national vanity so deeply, that it occasioned his imprisonment in the Bastille. Died, 1749.

FRERON, ELIE CATHERINE, a French critic, was born at Quimper, in 1719, and was originally a Jesuit, but quitted the society at the age of 20. In 1749 he commenced his "Letters on certain Writings of the Times," which extended to 13 vols.; and, as he freely criticised the works and actions of others, it procured him some powerful enemies, among whom was Voltaire. He then began his "Année Littéraire," which he continued till his death, in 1776. Besides the above works, he wrote Miscellanies, "Les Vrais Plaisirs," "Opuscules," &c.

FRERON, LOUIS STANISLAUS, son of the preceding, was one of the most violent of the French revolutionists. In 1789 he commenced an incendiary journal, called "L'Orateur du Peuple," associated himself with Marat, and was guilty of many enormities at Toulon and elsewhere. Born, 1757; died, 1802.

FRESNEL, AUGUSTINE JOHN, an experimental French philosopher, distinguished by his admirable experiments on the inflection and polarisation of light; was born at Broglie, in 1788, and died in 1827.

FRESCOBALDI, GIROLAMO, an eminent musician and composer, born at Ferrara, in 1601, and appointed organist at St. Peter's, Rome, in 1624. He is the first Italian who composed in fugue for the organ, which is a German invention; and is considered as the father of that species of organ playing known in England by the name of "voluntaries."

FRISCH, JOHN LEONARD, a German naturalist and divine, was born in Sulzbach, in 1666. He was the founder of the silk manufactory in Brandenburg, and was the first who cultivated mulberry-trees in that country. He was the author of a "German and Latin Dictionary," a "Description of German Insects," &c. Died, 1743.

FRISCHLIN, NICODEMUS, a German writer, who distinguished himself by his classical attainments, and still more by his poetical satires. He was born at Baltingen, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, in 1547; studied at the university of Tübingen, where he obtained a professorship at 20 years of age; and wrote a critical work, entitled "Strigil Grammatica," which involved him in much angry controversy. Having written an abusive letter to the Duke of Wirtemberg, for refusing to grant him some pecuniary favour, he was arrested, and sent to the prison of Aurach; from which he attempted to escape, but fell down a frightful precipice, and was dashed to pieces. This happened in 1590.

FRISI, PAUL, a mathematician and philosopher, was born at Milan, in 1727; obtained professorships in several colleges; and ultimately was placed by the government at the head of the architectural department in the university of his native city. He was the author of many useful treatises on electricity, astronomy, hydraulics, &c. Died, 1784.

FROBENIUS, or FROBEN, JOHN, a learned printer, was born at Hammelburg, in Franconia, in 1460. He established a press at Basle, at which Erasmus, who was his intimate friend, and lodged in his house, had all his works printed. Died, 1527.

FROBISHER, Sir MARTIN, a celebrated English navigator, was born near Doncaster, Yorkshire, and brought up to a maritime life. The discovery of a north-west passage to the Indies excited his ambition; and, after many fruitless attempts to induce merchants to favour his project, he was enabled, by the ministers and courtiers of queen Elizabeth, to fit out a private adventure, consisting only of two small barks and a pinnace. In this enterprise, he explored various parts of the arctic coast, and entering the strait which has ever since been called by his name, returned to England with some black ore, which being supposed to contain gold, induced queen Elizabeth to patronise a second, and even a third voyage, but all of them proved fruitless. In 1585, Frobisher accompanied Drake to the West Indies; and, at the defeat of the Spanish Armada, was honoured with knighthood for his bravery. In 1590 and 1592, he commanded squadrons successfully against the Spaniards; and in 1594, being sent with four ships of war to the assistance of Henry IV. of France, he was wounded in attacking fort Croyzan, near Brest, and died on his return home.

FROISSART, JOHN, an early French chroicler and poet, was born at Valenciennes, in 1337. He was originally destined for the church; but his inclination for poetry was soon apparent, and was accompanied by a great passion for the fair sex, and a fondness for feasts and gallantry. In order to divert his mind from the chagrin attendant on an unsuccessful love-suit, or, what is more likely, a desire to learn from their own mouths the achievements of his cotemporary warriors, induced him to travel; and he visited England, where he was kindly patronised by Philippa of Hainault, queen of Edward III., whose court was always open to the gay poet and narrator of chivalric deeds. In 1366 he accompanied Edward the Black Prince to Aquitaine and Bourdeaux. On the death of his protectress, Philippa, Froissart gave up all connection with England; and, after many adventures as a diplomatist and soldier, he became domestic chaplain to the Duke of Brabant, who was a poet as well as himself, and of whose verses, united with some of his own, he formed a kind of romance, called "Meliodor." On the duke's death, in 1384, he entered the service of Guy, count of Blois, who induced him to continue his chronicles. He paid another visit to England in 1395, and was introduced to Richard II., but on the dethronement of this prince he returned to Flanders, where he died, in 1401. His historical writings strikingly exhibit the character and manners of his age, and are highly valuable for their simplicity and minuteness.

FRONTINUS, SEXTUS JULIUS, a Roman author, of a patrician family. He was thrice consul, and commanded the Roman army in England as pro-consul. He died in the reign of Trajan, early in the 2nd century.

FRONTO, MARCUS CORNELIUS, an orator and teacher of eloquence at Rome. He was a native of Crete, and received his education at Cirta, a Roman colony in Numidia. He lived in the reigns of Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus, both of whom he instructed in oratory, and the former in ethics. All his works, except a few grammatical fragments, were supposed to have been lost, till so lately as 1815, when Angelo Maio, librarian of the Ambrose library at Milan, found several, and then first published them. A critical edition of his works, by Niebuhr, was published in 1816.

FRUGONI, CHARLES INNOCENT, a celebrated Italian poet, born at Genoa, in 1692. He originally belonged to one of the monastic orders, but obtained leave to quit it, settled at Parma, and was appointed court poet. He was a fertile and elegant writer, and his works include almost every variety of poetical composition. Died, 1768.

FRUMENTIUS, ST., usually called the Apostle of Ethiopia, was a native of Tyre, flourished in the 4th century, and established numerous churches throughout the empire.

FRY, Mrs. ELIZABETH, whose active exertions and pious zeal in administering to the moral and spiritual wants of the wretched will hand down her name to posterity as a benefactor of mankind, was the wife of Joseph Fry, esq., of Upton, Essex, and sister to Joseph Gurney, esq., of Earlham Hall, near Norwich; also sister to Lady Buxton, widow of Sir Fowell Buxton. Mrs. Fry has been emphatically called "the female Howard;" and although she did not confine her sphere of observation to the unhappy inmates of the prison alone, but dispensed her blessings to the poor and helpless wherever found, her main object through life was the alleviation of the sorrows of the captive. "She took the gauge of misery, not as a matter of curiosity and philosophical speculation, but with the hope of relieving it. The lips that had been seldom opened but to blaspheme their Maker, were taught to praise him; the hands hitherto employed in theft were employed in honest labour. Infants, in a doubly-lamented sense, born in sin and bred in vice, were snatched from a destruction which had appeared inevitable, and put into a train of improvement. The gloomy mansion, which had lately been a scene of horror only to be exceeded by those more dreadful future mansions to which it was conducting them, changed its face. The loathsome prison, which had witnessed nothing but intoxication and idleness, and heard no sounds but those of reviling and of imprecation, gradually became a scene of comparative decency, sobriety, and order." Died, Oct. 12. 1845, aged 65.

FRYE, THOMAS, an artist, born in Ireland, in 1710. He is said to have been the first manufacturer of porcelain in England, but the heat of the furnaces having injured his health, he adopted the profession of a portrait painter and mezzotinto engraver. Died, 1762.

FRYTH, JOHN, a martyr to the Protestant religion, in the reign of Henry VIII. He was the son of an inn-keeper at Sevenoaks, in Kent, and educated in King's College, Cambridge. Thence he removed to Oxford, where he became acquainted with William Tyndale, a zealous Lutheran, who converted him to Lutheranism. Avowing his opinions publicly, he was apprehended, examined, and confined to his college. After undergoing various hardships, he was apprehended for making proselytes, and sent to the Tower. Refusing to recant, he was burnt in Smithfield, July 4. 1533.

FUCA, JUAN DE, whose real name was Apóstolos Valerianos, was a native of Cephalonia, and died at Zante, in 1632. For upwards of forty years he acted as a pilot in the Spanish American possessions; and, in 1592, he was sent by the viceroy of Mexico to explore the west coast of North America for an inlet which might lead to a communication with the Atlantic. But the account of his discovery was mingled with such romantic tales, that it remained disbelieved in modern times, until the trading vessels which frequent this coast, in the fur trade, having approached the shore from which Captain Cook had been driven by contrary winds, discovered the inlet mentioned by De Fuca between the 48th and 49th parallels. This strait was thoroughly explored by Vancouver, in 1792.

FUCHS, or FUCHSIUS, LEONARD, a Bavarian physician and botanist, was born in 1501, at Wemdingen, and educated at Ingoldstadt. He settled at Tubingen, where he practised for 35 years, and was ennobled by the emperor Charles V. Besides works on medicine and anatomy, he was the author of "Historia Plantarum," and his name has been perpetuated by being applied to a genus of plants, of which the scarlet fuchsia is a well-known species.

FUCHS, THEOPHILUS, a German poet, born at Leppersdorf, in Upper Saxony, was the son of a poor peasant, whose labours he shared till he was 18. He afterwards studied theology at Leipsic, became a country clergyman, and wrote many lyrical pieces. Died about 1810.

FUENTES, DON PEDRO HENRIQUEZ D'AZEVEDO, Count of, a Spanish general and statesman, born at Valladolid, in 1560. He served his first campaign in Portugal, under the Duke of Alva, and greatly distinguished himself; as he also did in the Low Countries, under Alexander Farnese. He was afterwards sent on important embassies to foreign courts. In the reign of Philip III. he was made governor of Milan, and rendered himself formidable to the Italian states, by causing them to feel the superiority of the Spanish power. In 1643, when Spain wished to take advantage of the death of Louis XIII., and the minority of his successor, Fuentes, then 82 years of age, was sent with an army into Champagne. He laid siege to Rocroy; but the young and brave Duke d'Enghien (afterwards the great Condé) attacked the besiegers with inferior forces, and, falling with his cavalry upon the Spanish infantry, destroyed nearly the whole army. The old general, who at the time was severely afflicted with the gout, caused himself to be carried, in a chair, into the midst of the fight, and there perished by the sword.

FUESSLI, JOHN GASPARD, a Swiss artist, born at Zurich, in 1706; author of a "History of the Artists of Switzerland," in 5 vols. &c. He died in 1781, leaving three sons:—RODOLPH, afterwards librarian to the emperor of Germany; HENRY, the eminent painter, better known by the name of FUSELI [which see]; and CASPAR, a skilful entomologist, who resided at Leipsic, and published several works on his favourite science.

FUGER, FREDERIC HENRY, an eminent painter, and director of the imperial picture-gallery in Belvidere, at Vienna, was born at Heilbron, in 1751. He began by painting miniatures while a mere child; but as he grew up, his passion for historical subjects led him to emulate the great masters in that branch of the art. In 1774 he went to Vienna, and was sent as a pensioner to Rome by the empress Maria Theresa. After a diligent study of seven years there, he went to Naples, and resided two years in the house of the imperial ambassador, Count Von Lamberg, where he had a fine opportunity of exerting his talents. On his return to Vienna in 1784, he was appointed vicedirector of the school of painting and sculpture at Vienna. He painted many large portraits, miniatures, and historical pieces; some of which are highly esteemed. His "St. John in the Wilderness," painted for the imperial chapel, in 1804, is a masterpiece, and for it he received 1000 ducats. Died, 1818.

FUGGER. The name of a rich and noble family, whose founder was John Fugger, a weaver, residing in a small village near Augsburg. His eldest son, John, likewise a weaver, obtained, by marriage, the rights of a citizen of Augsburg, and carried on a linen trade in that city, then an important commercial place. He died in 1409. His eldest son, Andrew, acquired such great wealth, that he was called the rich Fugger. He died without issue; and his three nephews, Ulrich, George, and James, married ladies of noble families, and were raised to the rank of nobles by the emperor Maximilian. Under the emperor Charles V. this family rose to its highest splendour. When Charles held the memorable diet at Augsburg, in 1530, he lived for a year and a day in Anthony Fugger's splendid house near the wine market. The emperor derived considerable pecuniary aid from him, and in return raised him and his brother Raimond to the dignity of counts and bannerets, invested them with the estates of Kirchberg and Weissenhorn, and granted them letters giving them princely privileges, and the right of coining money. Anthony left at his death 6,000,000 gold crowns, besides jewels and other valuable property, and possessions in all parts of Europe and the Indies. It was of him that the emperor Charles, when viewing the royal treasure at Paris, exclaimed, "There is at Augsburg a linen weaver, who could pay as much as this with his own gold." And it was he also who did one of the most graceful and princely courtesies on record, as the following anecdote will show:—When Charles V. returned from Tunis, and paid Anthony a visit, the latter produced the emperor's bond for an immense sum of money with which he had supplied him; and on a fire made of cinnamon wood, which had been lighted in the hall, he nobly, though somewhat ostentatiously, made a burnt-offering of it to his imperial visitor. "This noble family," says the Mirror of Honour, "contained, in five branches (1619), 47 counts and countesses, and, including the other members, young and old, about as many persons as the year has days." Even while counts, they continued to pursue commerce, and their wealth became such, that, in 94 years, they bought real estate to the amount of 941,000 florins, and in 1762 owned 2 counties, 6 lordships, and 57 other estates, besides their houses and lands in and around Augsburg. They had collections of rich treasures of art and rare books. Painters and musicians were supported, and the arts and sciences were liberally patronised by them. Their gardens and buildings displayed good taste, and they entertained their guests with regal magnificence. But while the industry, the prudence, the honours, and the influence of the Fugger family is mentioned, we ought also to state that these were equalled only by their unbounded charity and their zeal to do good. In acts of private benevolence, and in the foundation of hospitals, schools, and charitable institutions, they were unrivalled.

FULDA, CHARLES FREDERIC, a Protestant divine, born at Wimpfen, in 1722; author of several learned treatises, viz. "On the Goths," "On the Cimbrri," "On the Ancient German Mythology," &c. Died, 1788.

FULLER, THOMAS, an eminent historian and divine of the church of England, in the 17th century, was born at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, in 1608, and educated at Queen's College, Cambridge. His first clerical appointment was that of minister of St. Bennet's parish, Cambridge, where he acquired great popularity as a preacher. He was afterwards collated to a prebend in Salisbury Cathedral, and obtained the rectory of Broad Winsor, Dorsetshire. His first literary production was entitled "David's heinous Sin, hearty Repentance, and heavy Punishment." In 1640 he published his "History of the Holy War;" soon after which he removed to London, and was chosen lecturer at the Savoy church, in the Strand. On the departure of Charles I. from London, previously to the commencement of hostilities, Fuller delivered a sermon at Westminster Abbey, on the anniversary of his majesty's inauguration in 1642, from 2 Samuel, xix. 30.—"Yea, let them take all, so that my lord the king return in peace;" which greatly offended the popular leaders of the day, and endangered the safety of the preacher. About this time he published his "Holy State." In 1643 he went to Oxford, and joined the king, became chaplain to Sir Ralph Hopton, and employed his leisure in making collections relative to English history and antiquities. In 1650 appeared his "Pisgah Sight of Palestine," and his "Abel Redivivus;" but it was not till after his death that his principal literary work was published, entitled "The Worthies of England"—a production valuable alike for the solid information it affords relative to the provincial history of the country, and for the profusion of biographical anecdote and acute observation on men and manners. In 1648, he obtained the living of Waltham, in Essex, which in 1658 he quitted for that of Cranford, in Middlesex; and at the Restoration he was reinstated in his prebend of Salisbury, of which he had been deprived by the parliamentarians. He was also made D. D. and chaplain to the king. Dr. Fuller's writings possess much learning, wit, and humour, with an elaborate display of quaint conceit—a quality highly esteemed at the time he wrote, and one which appears quite natural to him. Many extraordinary stories are told respecting his prodigiously retentive memory, which we omit; but the following punning anecdote, old as it is, and though not strictly biographical, we take the liberty of here introducing. The "worthy" Dr. Fuller was, it seems, an inveterate punster; but once attempting to play off a joke upon a gentleman named Sparrowhawk, he met with the following retort:—"What is the difference," said the Dr. (who was very corpulent), "between an owl and a sparrowhawk?" "It is," replied the other, "fuller in the head, fuller in the body, and fuller all over."

FULLER, ANDREW, an eminent Baptist minister, and secretary to the Baptist Missionary Society, was born at Wicken, in Cambridgeshire, in 1754. His father was a small farmer, who gave his son the rudiments of education at the free school of Soham; and though principally engaged in the labours of husbandry till he was of age, yet he studied so diligently, that in 1775 he became, on invitation, the pastor of a congregation, first at Soham, and afterwards at Kettering. In the establishment of the Baptist Missionary Society, by Dr. Carey and others, Mr. Fuller exerted himself with great energy, and the whole of his future life was identified with its labours. He was also an able controversialist. His principal works are, a treatise "On the Calvinistic and Socinian Systems compared as to their Moral Tendency," "Socinianism Indefensible," "The Gospel its own Witness," "Discourses on the Book of Genesis," &c. Died, 1815.

FULTON, ROBERT, an American engineer and projector, of considerable celebrity, was born in Little Britain, Pennsylvania, in 1765. Having acquired some knowledge of portrait and landscape painting, he came to England, and studied under his distinguished countryman, West, with whom he continued an inmate several years; and, after quitting him, he made painting his chief employment for some time. He afterwards formed an acquaintance with another fellow-countryman, named Rumsey, who was well-skilled in mechanics, and hence he ultimately adopted the profession of a civil engineer. He also became acquainted with the Duke of Bridgewater, so famous for his canals, and with Earl Stanhope, a nobleman celebrated for his attachment to the mechanic arts. In 1796, he published a treatise on "Inland Navigation;" and after making public some clever inventions and useful contrivances, in spinning, sawing, &c. Mr. Fulton went, in 1797, to Paris, where he lived seven years, and studied the higher mathematics, physics, chemistry, and perspective. It was there, in 1800, that he projected the first panorama ever exhibited; and there also that he perfected the plan for his submarine boat, or torpedo. Returning to America in 1806, he immediately engaged in building a steam-boat, of what was then deemed very considerable dimensions, and which began to navigate the Hudson river in 1807, its progress through the water being at the rate of five miles an hour. He had meditated on this experiment since 1793, and was the first who applied water-wheels to the purpose of steam-navigation; and though he claimed the invention, he certainly was not the real inventor—that credit being due to Mr. Miller, of Dalswinton, Dumfries-shire. [See the Scots Magazine, for Nov. 1788.] It is said that vexation at being denied the merit of this discovery, and prevented from deriving the whole benefit of it, preyed on his mind, and hastened his death.

FUNES, GREGORIO, a patriot of La Plata, in South America. He was dean of the cathedral church of Cordova, in which station he employed all his influence in support of the revolution. In 1810 he was sent as a deputy from Cordova to the congress of Buenos Ayres, and on various subsequent occasions he took a prominent part in the political transactions of his country. He was also distinguished as an historical writer, especially by his "Essays de la Historia Civil del Paraguay, Buenos Ayres, y Tucuman." Died, 1829.

FURETIERE, ANTHONY, abbot of Chalivoy, was a French philologist, born in 1620. He distinguished himself by various literary productions, and was a member of the French academy, but was expelled from it on a charge of having pillaged the unpublished lexicographical labours of his colleagues to enrich a dictionary of his own; and his expulsion gave rise to a virulent paper war between him and his former associates. Besides this "Dictionary," which served as the basis of the "Dictionnaire de Trevoux," he published "Gospel Parables," "Five Satires," "Le Roman Bourgeois," &c. Died, 1683.

FURIETTI, JOSEPH ALEXANDER, a cardinal, born at Bergamo, in 1685; author of a treatise on the mosaic art of painting. Died, 1764.

FURIUS, FREDERIC, surnamed Coriolanus, was a learned Spaniard, whom the emperor Charles V. sent into the Netherlands, and placed with his son Philip, who made him his historian, and with whom he remained during his life. He wrote some esteemed works, and died in 1592.

FURNEAUX, PHILIP, a Nonconformist divine, born at Totness, Devon, in 1726. In 1753 he was appointed pastor of the congregation at Clapham, where he continued till 1777, when he retired in consequence of an illness, which ended in mental derangement, and he died in 1783. He was the author of "An Essay on Toleration."

FURST, WALTER, was a native of Altorf, Switzerland, by whose means, aided by the heroic William Tell and Arnold of Melthal, the liberty of his country was established, in 1307.

FURSTEMBERG, FERDINAND DE, an eminent prelate, born at Bilstern, in Westphalia, in 1626. He was raised to the bishopric of Paderborn in 1661, by pope Alexander VII., who afterwards made him apostolical vicar of all the north of Europe. He collected a number of MSS. and other monuments of antiquity, and published them under the title of "Monumenta Paderbornensia;" he also published a valuable collection of Latin poems. Died, 1683.

FUTRADO, ABRAHAM, a French Jew, who was one of the leading members of the Sanhedrim, convoked by Buonaparte in 1808, at Paris. He wrote several works, and is said to have possessed great eloquence. Born, 1759; died, 1817.

FUSELI, HENRY, or FUESELLI, the more correct way of spelling the family name, was the second son of Gaspard Fuessli, and born at Zurich, about 1739. He was originally intended for the church; but he had employed himself, while under his father's roof, in making copies from the works of Michael Angelo and Raphael, and this had inspired him with an insurmountable desire to devote himself to the profession. While at the Humanity College, in Zurich, he formed an intimate friendship with the celebrated Lavater, and became enamoured with literature. He studied English, read the best authors in that language, and translated the tragedy of Macbeth into German. In 1763, Fuseli came to England; he was then in his 22nd year; and on his showing his specimens of painting to Sir Joshua Reynolds, the latter expressed himself in terms of high commendation, and advised him to go to Rome. This he did; and after eight years spent in studying the Italian masters, he returned to England. Having suggested to Alderman Boydell the idea of forming his "Shakspeare Gallery," for which he painted eight of his best pictures, that splendid design was accordingly executed. In 1790, Fuseli became a royal academician; and during the next nine years he painted a series of 47 pictures, afterwards exhibited as the "Milton Gallery." In 1799 he was appointed professor of painting, and, in 1804, keeper of the Royal Academy. Fuseli was an excellent scholar, and enjoyed the friendship of his most eminent literary cotemporaries. His imagination was lofty and exuberant; but, in aspiring to the sublime, which he often reached, he occasionally fell into extravagance and distortion. His anatomical knowledge was extensive; and so predominant is it in some of his paintings, that while admiring the grandeur of his conceptions, the thoughts of the spectator are involuntarily carried to the dissecting-room. Fuseli experienced the unchanged attachment of the late Mr. Conntz, the banker, who was on all occasions his sincere and generous friend; and the artist was on a visit to Lady Guildford, when he was seized with his short, but fatal illness; and he died at her house, Putney Hill, on the 16th of April, 1825, in the 84th year of his age.

FUSS, NICHOLAS VON, a distinguished mathematician and natural philosopher, born at Basle, in 1755. He first studied under Bernouilli, then professor of mathematics at the university of that place, who procured him a situation, when he was 17, with his friend, the celebrated Euler, at St. Petersburg, who wished to obtain a young man of talent in the prosecution of his philosophical inquiries. Here he soon obtained distinction and preferment. In 1776 he was appointed adjunct of the Academy of Sciences for the higher mathematics. In 1784, Catharine II. gave him a professorship in the corps of noble land cadets; and in 1792 he was appointed secretary to the free economical society. In 1800 he was raised to the dignity of a counsellor of state; in 1805 he was constituted one of the council for the organisation of military schools; and, continuing to advance the interests of science in the various honourable stations to which he was promoted, he was rewarded with the order of Vladimir and a pension. He was a regular contributor to the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences at Petersburg during a period of 50 years, and published various works, chiefly on mathematics and astronomy. Died, 1826.

FUX, JOHN JOSEPH, a celebrated musical composer during the reigns of the emperors Leopold I., Joseph I., and Charles VI., was born in Styria, about the year 1660, and held the office of imperial chapel-master for about 40 years. He composed several operas, and had great influence on the musical taste of his time. His Musical Gradus and some of his sacred pieces are still highly esteemed. Died, 1750.

FUZELIER, LOUIS, a French dramatic poet; born, 1672; died, 1752. He wrote a number of operas, light comedies, and other theatrical pieces, some of which are still occasionally performed.

FYOT DE LA MARCHE, CLAUDE, Count de Bosjan, almoner to Louis XIV., and an honorary counsellor of the parliament of Dijon, was born in 1630, and died in 1721. He was abbot of the collegiate church of St. Stephen, at Dijon, of which abbey he wrote a history, and founded and endowed a seminary for the education of young ecclesiastics there.

FYT, JOHN, a Dutch painter, born at Antwerp, in 1625. His pencil was so prolific, that almost every important collection of paintings has some of his productions. His subjects are chiefly game, beasts, birds, fruit, and flowers; and they are remarkable for their fidelity to nature in the drawing, and for their rich and glowing colours. The year of his death is unknown.

G.

GABBIANI, ANTONY DOMINIC, an Italian painter; born at Florence in 1652, and accidentally killed by falling from a scaffold, while employed in painting the large cupola of Castello, in 1726.

GABRIEL, SEVERUS, a Greek bishop in the 16th century, born at Monembasia in the Peloponnesus. He was consecrated bishop of Philadelphia, and was afterwards bishop of the Greek church at Venice.

GABRIEL, SIONITA, a learned Maronite, and professor of the Oriental languages at Rome and at Paris, where he died in 1648. He assisted Le Jay in his Polyglot Bible, and published a translation of the Arabic geography, with the title of "Geographia Nubiensis."

GABRIELLI, JULIO, a Catholic prelate and a cardinal, who held the office of pro-secretary of the holy see, during the period of discussion between the pope and Buonaparte, and was driven into exile by the latter. He returned to Rome in 1814, and attained his 74th year, dying in 1822. An interesting account of the proceedings, which were conducted by Cardinal Gabrielli, are to be found in "Correspondance authentique de la Cour de Rome avec la France."

GACON, FRANCIS, a French satirist, who wrote against Bossuet, Rousseau, and Le Motte. He was born at Lyons, in 1666, and became a priest of the Oratory; gained the prize for poetry of the academy in 1717, and died at his priory of Baillon in 1725.

GADBURY, JOHN, an astrologer, who, in the latter part of the 17th century, attracted considerable notice. He was originally a tailor; afterwards became an assistant to Lilly the fortune-teller (the Sidrophel of Butler); and, like his master, he published astrological almanacs and other works of a similar description. He was a Roman Catholic, and having made some ambiguous remarks in his almanacs, he was taken up as an accomplice of Titus Oates, but afterwards liberated. He is said to have perished by shipwreck, in a voyage to Jamaica.

GADD, PETER ADRIAN, a Swedish chemist and natural philosopher; professor of chemistry in the university of Abo, in Finland. He wrote several treatises on geology, &c.; and died about the end of the 18th century.

GADDESSEN, JOHN OF, an English physician of high repute in the 14th century. He was appointed physician to Edward III., and was the first Englishman that held that office. He wrote a work on the practice of physic, entitled "Rosa Anglica," which is replete with absurdities and superstitious ceremonies, proving how low medical science in this country must have been at that time; yet it appears he was acquainted with the mode of procuring fresh water from salt by distillation; a process supposed to have been a modern discovery.

GAELÉN, ALEXANDER VAN, a Dutch painter, was born in 1670, and died in 1728. He settled in London, and painted some battle pieces, particularly one of the Boyne.

GAERTNER, JOSEPH, an eminent German naturalist, was born at Calu, in Suabia, in 1732. Having graduated in the university of Göttingen, he travelled through a great part of Europe in the pursuit of his botanical studies. In 1759 he went to Leyden, where he attended the botanical lectures, and applied himself to vegetable anatomy. With this view he visited England, and communicated some interesting papers to the Philosophical Transactions. In 1768 he went to Petersburg, and was appointed professor of botany and natural history. After filling that place with great credit, and exploring the Ukraine for botanical discoveries, he returned to his native place in 1770. Died, 1791.

GAFFARELLI, JAMES, a French writer, who applied himself to the study of the Hebrew language and rabbinical learning, was born at Maunès, in Provence, about 1601. He adopted the doctrines of the Cabala, in defence of which he wrote a quarto volume in Latin. He became librarian to Cardinal Richelieu, who gave him several preferments. He died at Sigonce, of which place he was then abbot, in 1681. Besides the above, he wrote a book, entitled "Unheard-of Curiosities concerning the Talismanic Sculpture of the Persians, the Horoscope of the Patriarchs, and the Reading of the Stars."

GAFFURIO, FRANCHINO, an eminent Italian composer and professor of music, was born at Lodi in 1451. He was in orders, and became head of the choir in the cathedral of Milan, where also he was appointed musical professor. He died about 1520. His works are, "Theoricum Opus Musicæ Disciplinæ," "Practica Musicæ utriusque Cantus," "Angelicum et Divinum Opus Musicæ," "De Harmonica Musicorum Instrumentorum," &c. His works were highly esteemed at the time, and his rules generally adopted.

GAGE, THOMAS, a native of Ireland, who, travelling into Spain, assumed the tonsure in a convent of Dominican monks, whence he was sent as a missionary to the Philippines, in 1625. He contrived to amass a good property during his journey; and on his return to Europe, he settled in England, abjured the Romish religion, and obtained the living of Deal, in Kent. In 1651 he published "A Survey of the West Indies."

GAGER, WILLIAM, a dramatist of the 16th century, and vicar-general to the diocese of Ely. His dramatic works are written in Latin.

GAGNIER, JOHN, a celebrated orientalist, was a native of Paris. He was bred a Roman Catholic, entered into holy orders, and became a canon in the church of St. Genevieve; but turned Protestant and settled in England. He was patronised by Archbishop Sharp and many other eminent persons, and received the degree of M. A. at Cambridge and Oxford. In 1706 he published an edition of Ben Gorion's History of the Jews, in Hebrew, with a Latin translation and notes.

In 1723 he edited Abulfeda's Life of Mohammed, in Arabic, with a Latin translation and notes, folio. He succeeded Dr. Wallis in the Arabic professorship at Oxford; and died in 1740.

GAILLARD DE LONJUMEAU, bishop of Apt, in Provence, was the first who projected a universal historical dictionary, and employed Mereri, who was his almoner, to execute the work. Died, 1695.

GAILLARD, GABRIEL HENRY, a French historian, born at Ostel, near Soissons, in 1728, and died in 1806. He was the author of "Histoire de Charlemagne," "Rhétorique Française," "Histoire de Francis I.," and many other works of a similar character.

GAILLARD, JOHN ERNEST, a musical composer of considerable merit, was born at Zell, in 1687, and became a pupil of Farinelli. He came over to England with George, prince of Denmark, the husband of queen Anne, and was appointed chapel-master to the queen dowager. At that time the whole musical world was occupied with the rivalry between Handel and Buononcini, and Gaillard was glad to enter into an agreement with Rich, the manager of the theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, to compose the music for his operatic and pantomimic entertainments, some of which were very popular. Died, 1749.

GAINSBOROUGH, THOMAS, a celebrated landscape painter, was born at Sudbury, in Suffolk, in 1737. He was self-taught, and used to entertain himself by drawing landscapes from nature, in the woods of his native county. From Sudbury he came to London, and commenced portrait painter, in which line he acquired great eminence. His chief excellence, however, was in landscape, in which he united the brilliancy of Claude with the precision and simplicity of Ruysdael. He was highly esteemed by Sir Joshua Reynolds, who bestowed on him a high but well-merited compliment in one of his academical discourses. Died, 1788.

GALAS, MATTHEW, one of the greatest generals of his time, was born at Trent in 1589. He served in Italy and Germany, and rendered eminent services to the emperor Frederic II. and Philip IV. king of Spain. He was deprived of the command, after being defeated by the Swedes near Magdeburg, but was restored, and died at Vienna in 1647.

GALATEO, ANTONIO, a learned physician, was descended from a Greek family, and born, in 1444, at Galatino, in the territory of Otranto. He was appointed physician to the king of Naples, and died at Lecce, in his native province, in 1516. He wrote "De Situ Iapygiæ," "De Situ Elementorum," "De Situ Terrarum," "De Mari et Aquis," &c.

GALATIN, PETER, a Franciscan monk, who flourished about 1530. He wrote "De Arcanis Catholicæ Veritatis," a work of considerable reputation.

GALBA, SERVIUS SULPICIUS, emperor of Rome, was descended from the ancient family of Sulpicii. He was successively prætor, proconsul of Africa, and general of the Roman armies in Germany and Spain. He retired to avoid the jealousy of Nero; but the tyrant having issued an order for his death, Galba revolted against the emperor; and Gaul declaring for him, Nero put a period to his own existence. Galba gave himself up to the government of 3 obscure men, whom the Romans called his school-masters; and he was slain by the prætorian band, who proclaimed Otho in his stead, A. D. 69.

GALE, JOHN, an eminent Baptist divine, was born in London, in 1680. At the age of 17 he was sent to Leyden, where he received the degrees of master of arts and doctor of philosophy. The History of Infant Baptism by Mr. Gale, published in 1705, attracting his notice, he wrote a reply to it; which, however, did not appear till 1711. About this time he was chosen minister of the Baptist congregation in Barbican, where he continued till his death, in 1721. His sermons, in 4 volumes, were subsequently published.

GALE, THEOPHILUS, an eminent nonconformist divine, was born, in 1628, at King's Teignton, in Devonshire, and in 1647 entered as a student of Magdalen College, Oxford. He commenced as a preacher at Winchester to a congregation of Independents, from which he was ejected in consequence of the act of uniformity, in 1661. He then became tutor to the sons of Lord Wharton, with whom he went to Caen in Normandy. In 1665 he returned to England, and was pastor of a dissenting congregation, and master of a seminary at Newington. He died in 1678. He wrote many works, the principal of which is his "Court of the Gentiles," 3 vols. 4to.; in which he proves that the theology and philosophy of the pagans were borrowed from the scriptures.

GALE, THOMAS, a learned English divine, was born in 1636 at Scruton, in Yorkshire. He was educated at Westminster School, and elected to Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow. In 1666 he was chosen Greek professor, and in 1672 master of St. Paul's School. In 1697 he was promoted to the deanery of York, where he died in 1702. He published a collection of the Greek Mythologists, "Historiæ Poeticæ antiqui Scriptores Græcæ et Latine," "Herodoti Hælicarnassensis Historiarum," "Historiæ Britannicæ, Saxonicæ, Anglo-Danicæ," &c. Dr. Gale corresponded with some of the most eminent scholars on the Continent, by whom his abilities were highly esteemed.

GALE, ROGER, the eldest son of the preceding. He published some valuable books, the principal of which was an edition of his father's Commentary on Antoninus. Died, 1744.—SAMUEL, his brother, was also eminent for his knowledge of antiquities. Died, 1754.

GALEANO, JOSEPH, a physician of Palermo, was born in 1605, and died in 1675. Besides several works on medical subjects, he published a collection of the Sicilian poets, in 5 vols.

GALEN, CHRISTOPHER BERNHARD VAN, the warlike bishop of Munster, first entered the military service, which he afterwards left for the church. In 1660 he was chosen prince-bishop of Munster, but was obliged to besiege the city on account of the opposition of the citizens; he, however, conquered it, and built a citadel to secure his power. In 1664

he was appointed one of the leaders of the imperial army against the Turks in Hungary. He afterwards fought against the Dutch, first in alliance with England, and then with France, taking from them several cities and fortresses. After this he joined the Danes against the Swedes, and made new conquests; and in 1764 he formed an alliance with Spain, and again gave battle to his old enemies the Dutch. He was a man of extraordinary enterprise, one of the greatest generals of his time, and an adroit diplomatist. Died, 1678, aged 73.

GALEN, CLAUDIUS, one of the most celebrated physicians of ancient times, was born at Pergamus in Asia, in 131. After studying philosophy and general literature, he travelled through Egypt and other countries in the East for the purpose of acquiring medical and anatomical knowledge. On his return, he practised 4 years in his native city, and then went to Rome, but was driven from thence by the intrigues of his jealous rivals, who attributed his success to magic. From Rome he returned to Pergamus; but was recalled by an especial mandate of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, who, on quitting Rome to make war on the Germans, confided to Galen the care of the health of his son Commodus. The place and time of his death are uncertain; but he is supposed to have died at Rome, in about the 70th year of his age. A part only of his very numerous writings has been preserved; but even that part forms 5 folio volumes, and affords undoubted proofs of his practical and theoretical skill.

GALERIUS, CAIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS, a Roman emperor. Entering the army as a common soldier, he rose to the highest ranks by his bravery, and was adopted by Dioclesian, who gave him his daughter in marriage. He ascended the imperial throne in 305, and died in 311. He was naturally of a cruel disposition, and during his reign the Christians suffered great persecution.

GALILEI, GALILEO, an illustrious astronomer, mathematician, and philosopher, was the son of a Florentine nobleman, and born at Pisa, in 1564. He was intended by his father for the medical profession; but his love for mathematical studies was so decidedly evinced, and his aversion for the other so strong, that he was allowed to pursue the former, which he did with such unwearied diligence, that at the age of 24 he was appointed mathematical professor at Pisa. There he was constantly engaged in asserting the laws of nature against the Aristotelian philosophy, which raised up such a host of enemies against him, that, in 1592, he was obliged to resign his professorship. He then went to Padua, where he lectured with unparalleled success, and students flocked to hear him from all parts of Europe. After remaining there 18 years, Cosmo III. invited him back to Pisa, and soon after called him to Florence, with the title of principal mathematician and philosopher to the grand duke. Galileo had heard of the invention of the telescope by Jansen; and making one for himself, a series of most important astronomical discoveries followed. He found that the moon, like the earth, has an uneven surface; and he taught his scholars to measure the height of its mountains by their shadow. A particular nebula he resolved into individual stars; but his most remarkable discoveries were Jupiter's satellites, Saturn's ring, the sun's spots, and the starry nature of the milky way. The result of his discoveries was his decided conviction of the truth of the Copernican system; though the blind and furious bigotry of the monks charged him with heresy for it, and he was twice persecuted by the Inquisition, first in 1615, and again in 1633. On both occasions he was compelled to abjure the system of Copernicus; but it is said, that in the last instance, when he had repeated the abjuration, he stamped his foot on the earth, indignantly muttering, "yet it moves!" The latter years of his life were spent at his own country-house near Florence, where he devoted himself to the perfecting of his telescope; and he died, at the age of 78, in 1642, the year in which Newton was born.

GALL, JOHN JOSEPH, the celebrated phrenologist, was born, in 1758, at Teifenbrunn, Wirtemberg. He studied medicine under Professor Shermann, and settled in Vienna, where he attracted much attention by his "Anatomical and Physiological Inquiries respecting the Brain and Nerves," on account of the principles it contained, that certain talents and tendencies depend on the formation of certain parts of the head,—that, in fact, each faculty of the mind has a separate organ in the brain, and that those organs are marked externally by elevations or protuberances on the cranium. He afterwards travelled through the north of Germany, Sweden, and Denmark, delivering lectures; and, in 1807, established himself in Paris, thinking France the most likely part in which to circulate his doctrines. Prince Metternich consulted him as his physician, and, in 1810, guaranteed the expense of publishing the work of Gall and Spurzheim on phrenology. Dr. Gall died at Paris in 1828. He directed that no clergyman should attend his funeral, and that his head should be dissected and placed in the museum he had collected.

GALLAND, ANTHONY, an able orientalist, was born, in 1646, at Rollot, in Picardy. He was employed to travel on account of the French government; and his zeal and industry are evinced by several treatises, which he published on his return, illustrative of the manners and customs of the Mohammedan empire and religion. He is now principally known by his "Mille-et-un Nuits," a curious collection of eastern romances, translated into all the languages of Europe, and known to us as the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments." Galland was Arabic professor to the college of France, and antiquary to the king. Died, 1715.

GALLIANI, FERDINAND, an Italian abbé, celebrated for his writings, was born at Chieti, in the province of Abruzzo, Naples, in 1728. He made a rapid progress in his studies, and was no less remarkable for playful wit than for more solid acquisitions. Having made a collection of specimens of the various volcanic productions of Vesuvius, he sent them to the pope in a box, thus labelled, "Beatissime Pater fac ut lapides isti panes fiant"—"Holy Father, command that these stones be made bread," which the pope virtually attended to by giving him the canonry of Amalfi, worth 400 ducats per annum. One of his earliest productions was a volume written on the death of the public executioner, in order to ridicule the academical custom of pouring forth lamentations, in prose and verse, on the death of great personages. In 1759 he was appointed secretary to the French embassy, and soon took a lead among the wits and literati in Paris. He wrote a number of able works; among which are a "Treatise on Money," "Annotations upon Horace," "Dialogues on the Corn Trade," "On the Reciprocal Duties of Neutral and Belligerent Princes," &c. He held several important offices under the Neapolitan government, and died, greatly esteemed, in 1787.

GALLIENUS, PUBLIUS LICINIUS, a Roman emperor, who reigned in conjunction with Valerian, his father, for seven years, and became sole ruler in 260. In his youth he gave fair promise to become an excellent sovereign, but he grew indolent and sensual; and was at length assassinated, at Milan, in 268.

GALLOIS, JOHN, a French critic of the 17th century, celebrated for the universality of his knowledge. He was one of the projectors of the "Journal des Savans," and its conductor for many years. Died, 1707.

GALLOWAY BEY, second son of Alex. Galloway, esq., engineer of London. This young man had devoted his talents and energies in the service of the pacha of Egypt, whose chief engineer he had been for 12 years; and in reward for his services, and as a high token of his esteem, the pacha was pleased to confer on him, in 1824, the title of bey. Died, July, 1836.

GALLUS, CAIUS VIBIUS TREBONIANUS, emperor of Rome, was an African by birth; but holding a command in Massia, under Decius, at the time that monarch was slain in a battle with the Goths, he was proclaimed emperor by the army, in 251. He proved unworthy of his station, and he fell by assassination in 253.

GALLUS, CORNELIUS, a Roman poet, was born, B. C. 70, at Forum Julii, and was intimate with Virgil, whose tenth eclogue is inscribed to him. He was employed by Augustus in his war with Antony, and rewarded for his services with the government of Egypt. He was there guilty of excessive tyranny; and being charged with peculation and conspiracy, he was condemned to exile; upon which he committed suicide, aged 42. His works are lost.

GALT, JOHN, a voluminous author on a great variety of subjects, but chiefly known as a novelist, was born in Ayrshire, 1779. The scene of his novels is in general laid in Scotland, and his intimate acquaintance with every light and shadow of Scottish life, makes them really important to all who would know Scotland—especially the Scotland of middle and lower life—as it really is. The list of his works is formidably long; perhaps the best of them are, "The Entail,"

"The Annals of the Parish," "The Ayrshire Legatees," and "Ringan Gilhaize." Independent of his numerous novels, he published tragedies, minor poems, voyages, and travels, and several biographies. He was for some time editor of the Corrier newspaper, and it is asserted that he gave up that appointment rather than allow the insertion, though at the request of a minister, of an article which he considered objectionable. For several years previous to his death he suffered very severely from paralysis of the limbs. Died, 1839.

GALUPPI, BALDESSARO, a distinguished composer, was born near Venice, in 1703. His operas, about 50 in number, are almost all of the comic kind, and had, at one time, the chief run throughout Italy. He died in 1785.

GALVAM, ANTHONY, a Portuguese, who in 1527 was appointed governor of the Moluccas. With 500 men he defeated a native army of 20,000. He governed well, and used his efforts to convert the natives; but on his return to Portugal, in 1540, he was treated with such ingratitude, that he sunk into abject poverty, and died in the hospital of Lisbon, in 1557.

GALVANI, LOUIS, an Italian physiologist, celebrated as the discoverer of galvanism, was born at Bologna, in 1737. He studied medicine under Galeazzi, whose daughter he married. In 1762 he became lecturer in anatomy at Bologna, and obtained a considerable reputation. By experiments on frogs, he discovered, that all animals are endowed with a peculiar kind of electricity; and he followed up this discovery with so much perseverance and success, as to give his name to a system of physiology, which has excited universal attention. His first publication on this subject was in 1791, and entitled "Aloysii Galvani de Viribus Electricitatis in Motu Musculari Commentarius." Upon this system the famous Volta made vast improvements. Galvani, on the death of his wife, in 1790, fell into a state of melancholy; and died in 1798. Besides the above work, he wrote several memoirs upon professional subjects.

GAM, DAVID, a native of Wales, and an officer in the army of Henry V. Having returned from reconnoitring the enemy on the evening preceding the battle of Agincourt, he reported, that there were enough of the enemy to be killed, enough to be taken prisoners, and enough to run away. He was killed defending his sovereign, who was exposed to imminent danger, and was knighted by him on the field.

GAMA, VASCO or VASQUEZ DE, an illustrious navigator, was born at Sines, in Portugal, of a noble family; and to him belongs the merit of having discovered the route to the East Indies by sea. Having under his command 4 vessels, manned with 160 marines and sailors, Gama set sail, July 9th, 1497; in the beginning of the next year reached the eastern coast of Africa, and, holding his course straight towards the coast of Malabar, arrived in May, at Callicut, a city inhabited by Hindoos, where the ruler over the country, called the zamorin, or king, had his residence. He returned to Lisbon in two years and two months from the time of his setting out; and the result of this expedition promised such great advantages, that, in 1502, he went out with 20 ships, but he was attacked by an opposing fleet on the part of the zamorin, which he defeated, and returned the following year with 13 rich vessels which he had captured in the Indian Seas. John III. of Portugal appointed him viceroy of India; on which he went there a third time, and established his government at Cochin, where he died in 1525. The Luslad of Camoens, who accompanied Gama, is founded on the adventures of his last voyage.

GAMBARA, VERONICA, an Italian poetess, born of a noble family in 1485. On the death of her husband, Gilberto, lord of Correggio, whom she survived many years, she devoted much of her time to the cultivation of literature; and her poems possess originality and spirit. Died, 1550.

GAMBIEB, the Right Hon. JAMES, LORD, a British admiral, was born, in 1756, at the Bahama Islands, his father being at that time the lieutenant-governor. He entered the naval service at an early age, was actively engaged on various occasions, and was rewarded by different gradations of rank, till he reached that of post-captain, with the command of the Raleigh, of 32 guns, in 1788. In this frigate he was engaged in repelling the French in their attempt upon Jersey, in 1781; he afterwards served on the American coast, was present at the reduction of Charlestown, and captured the Miffin, an American ship of war, mounting 20 guns. When hostilities commenced with France in 1793, Captain Gambier was appointed to the Defence, of 74 guns, and had the merit of sharing in Earl Howe's celebrated victory. On the first anniversary of that battle (June 1. 1795), he was advanced to the rank of rear-admiral. Passing over minor events, we find him, in 1807, entrusted with the command of the fleet sent to Copenhagen to co-operate with Lord Cathcart in demanding possession of the Danish navy; which, though at first resisted, ended in the surrender of 19 sail of the line, 23 frigates, sloops, &c. For his share in this important service, his lordship was created a baron of the united kingdom, and offered a pension of 2000*l.*, which he declined. He was next appointed to the command of the Channel fleet; and in 1809, in conjunction with Lord Cochrane, who commanded the fire-ships, an attack was made on a French squadron in the Aix Roads, which, though successful to a considerable extent, was considered by Lord Cochrane, as inefficiently performed, and caused a serious misunderstanding between them. A court-martial on Lord Gambier, and his honourable acquittal, were the results of this disagreement. His lordship occupied a seat at the admiralty for many years, and on the accession of William IV. he was advanced to the rank of admiral of the fleet. He was pious and benevolent; and is memorable for his zeal in inculcating moral and religious principles among the seamen. Died, April, 1833.

GANDOLPHY, PETER, a Catholic priest, greatly distinguished as a preacher, was born about 1760. He was a controversialist, and published "A Defence of the Ancient Faith," in 1811; and "A full Exposition of the Christian Religion," in 1813; but a sermon "On the Relations between Spiritual and Temporal Authority" exposed him to the censure of his diocesan, in 1816. He appealed to Rome, and made an able defence of his opinions; but the affair caused him to quit his situation as missionary at the Catholic chapel in Lincoln's Inn Fields. He died at East Sheen, Surrey, in 1821.

GANDON, JAMES, an eminent English architect, and the first who received the architectural gold medal of the Royal Academy. His reputation was much enhanced by his editorial labours in producing the "Vitruvius Britannicus;" after which he went to Ireland, and remained there till he died, in 1824, aged 84. He designed the custom house, the four courts, and many other elegant structures in Dublin.

GARAMOND, CLAUDE, a celebrated French engraver and letter-founder, was born at Paris towards the close of the 15th century. He brought the art of letter-founding to such perfection, that all parts of Europe were supplied with his types. Among his works are some beautiful specimens of Greek, and it was he who brought the Roman character to perfection. Died, 1561.

GARASSE, FRANCIS, a French Jesuit, born at Angoulême, in 1585. He became a very popular preacher, but is chiefly remembered for the wit and asperity of his controversial writings. His principal work was entitled "A Theological Summary of the Truths of the Christian Religion," which was condemned by the Sorbonne. He died of the plague which he caught at Poitiers, while attending a person afflicted with that disorder, in 1631.

GARAT, D. J., a French metaphysician and philosopher. He was one of the best-intentioned men of the revolution, and yet, such was the force of circumstances, appearing to sanction its worst crimes, and acting with men whom his heart abhorred. He succeeded Danton as minister of justice. He was ennobled by Buonaparte, on becoming emperor; but his liberal steadiness gave offence, and he did not re-appear on the political stage till the hundred days. He was in consequence dismissed from the academy by the Bourbons. He is the author of "Mémoires sur M. Suard." Born, 1760; died, 1821.

GARAY, JOHN DE, a brave Spanish officer, born at Badajoz, in 1541. He went to America, as secretary to the governor of Paraguay; where he displayed so much enterprise and talent, that he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general and governor of Assumption. He founded Santa Fé, rebuilt and fortified Buenos Ayres, and endeavoured by kindness to civilise the Indians. He was killed on the banks of the Parana, about 1592.

GARAY, DON MARTIN DE, a Spanish statesman, who acted a conspicuous part in the management of public affairs from 1808 till the restoration of Ferdinand VII. He was made minister of finance in 1816, dismissed in 1818, and died in 1822.

GARCIA, MANUEL, a distinguished musical performer and composer, was born at Seville, in Spain, in 1782. He showed great proficiency at an early age, and appeared as a public singer at the opera-houses of Madrid, Paris, Rome, Naples, Turin, and London. He was engaged as principal male singer at the king's theatre, London, in 1824; and his abilities attracted much attention, both as a vocalist and as an actor. His dramatic compositions are too numerous for insertion here, and many of them possess great merit. Madame Malibran de Beriot was his daughter. Garcia died in 1832.

GARCIA DE MASCARENIAS, BLAISE, a Portuguese, who figured both as a soldier and poet, was born in 1596, at Avo. In 1614 he entered into the military service, and went to Brazil, where he remained twenty-six years, and on his return to Lisbon was appointed governor of Alfayates. Having been falsely charged with treason and imprisoned, and being denied the use of pens and ink, he composed a letter in verse to the king, in the following ingenious manner:—he procured a printed book, cut out the words he wanted, and pasted them on a blank leaf; this he threw from his window to a friend, who delivered it, and it procured his liberation. Died, 1656.

GARCIAS LASSO, or GARCILASO DE LA VEGA, called the prince of Spanish poets, was born at Toledo, in 1503. He was early distinguished for his wit and fancy, wrote several pathetic pastorals and sonnets, and did much towards reforming that taste for bombast, which, at the period in which he flourished, disfigured the productions of his countrymen. Garcilaso followed the profession of arms, and attended Charles V. in many of his expeditions, and fell in battle, in 1536.

GARCILASO DE LA VEGA, surnamed the Inca, because, by his mother's side, he was descended from the royal family of Peru, was born at Cusco, in that country, in 1530. Philip II. dreading the influence of Garcilaso among the natives, summoned him to Spain, where he died. He wrote an interesting and faithful History of Peru, and also a History of Florida.

GARDEN, ALEXANDER, an eminent botanist and zoologist, was born in Scotland, in 1730, and educated at the university of Edinburgh. He went to America, and settled as a physician at Charlestown, South Carolina, where he engaged in botanical researches, and was very successful in the discovery and verification of new species among the animal and vegetable tribes of North America. He opened a correspondence with Linnæus, which was attended with many reciprocal advantages. After a residence of 20 years in America, he returned to England, where he died in 1791.

GARDINER, JAMES, a Scotch military officer in the reign of George II., distinguished for his bravery and his piety. He was born, in 1688, at Carriden, Linlithgowshire; entered the army when only 14, and obtained a commission in the Dutch service. He afterwards distinguished himself at the battle of Ramillies; and at the breaking out of the rebellion, he commanded a regiment of dragoons, and fell at the battle of Preston Pans, being cut down by a blow from a Lochabar axe, in sight of his own house, Sept. 21. 1745. Dr. Doddridge, his biographer, says, that in his youth he was very gay and licentious, but the accidental perusal of a book, entitled "Heaven taken by Storm," made him serious, and from that time he became as distinguished for his piety as he had before been for the absence of all religion and a course of vice. It is also said that he received a supernatural intimation of his own approaching death.

GARDNER, STEPHEN, a celebrated prelate and statesman, was born at Bury St. Edmund's in Suffolk, in 1483. He was the illegitimate son of Dr. Woodville, bishop of Salisbury, and brother of Elizabeth, queen of Henry IV. He was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge; from whence he went into the family of the Duke of Norfolk, and afterwards into that of Cardinal Wolsey, who made him his secretary. In this situation he acquired the confidence of Henry VIII., to whom he was serviceable in procuring his divorce from Queen Catharine; he also defended the king's supremacy, and for these services he was promoted to the see of Winchester. Gardner drew up articles accusing Henry's last queen, Catharine Parr, of heresy; but the queen avoided the storm, and he fell into disgrace. At the accession of Edward VI. he opposed the Reformation, and was committed first to the Fleet, and afterwards to the Tower, where he was a prisoner during the remainder of the reign. He was also deprived of his bishopric; but on the accession of Mary he was restored to his see, and appointed chancellor of England. His conduct towards the Protestants was cruel and sanguinary. He died in 1555. He was a learned man, but artful, dissembling, ambitious, and proud.

GARDNER, WILLIAM, an Irish engraver, of talents rarely excelled, born in 1760; who, after a life of great vicissitude and distress, during which he had been alternately jockey, bookseller, painter, priest, and actor, wrote a paper on the miseries of life, and destroyed himself in 1814.

GARDNER, ALAN, Lord, an English naval officer. At the age of 13 he became a midshipman, and, passing through various promotions, was made post-captain in the Preston, of 50 guns, in 1766. In the action with the French fleet on the 12th of April, 1782, he commanded the Duke, of 98 guns, in which ship he first broke the French line. In 1793 he was raised to the rank of rear-admiral, and appointed commander-in-chief on the Leeward Island station; and in the action of the 1st of June, 1794, he so ably supported Lord Howe, that he was rewarded with a baronetcy and further promotion. During the mutiny of the fleet at Portsmouth, it was with difficulty that he escaped with his life, in consequence of his endeavours to quell it by severe measures. In 1800 he was created an Irish peer, and in 1807 succeeded Earl St. Vincent in the command of the Channel fleet. He sat in three successive parliaments, was finally raised to the English peerage, and died in 1809.

GARNERIN, JAMES ANDREW, a celebrated French aeronaut, to whom belongs the merit (if it can be called such) of first making the daring experiment of descending in a parachute. His first attempt was made at St. Petersburg, in 1800; and he successfully repeated it in England on the 21st of September, 1802. Died, at Paris, 1823.

GARNET, HENRY, an English Jesuit, memorable for being concerned in the Gunpowder Plot. He was executed in 1606.

GARNET, THOMAS, an English physician, was born in 1766, at Casterton, in Westmoreland; received his education at Sedburgh, in Yorkshire; and went to Edinburgh, where he took his degree of M. D. He commenced professional practice at Bradford, removed to Knaresborough, and afterwards to Harrogate; but his practice being small, he went to Liverpool, with a view of emigrating to America. From this scheme he was diverted at the request of some of his friends, who persuaded him to commence a course of lectures on chemistry and natural philosophy. He repeated this course at Manchester; after which he was chosen Anderson's lecturer in the university of Glasgow. On the foundation of the Royal Institution in 1800, he was chosen professor of chemistry, but was obliged to resign the situation on account of ill health, and he died, in 1802, aged 36. Dr. Garnet was the author of "An Analysis of the Mineral Waters at Harrogate," a "Tour through Scotland," 2 vols. 4to.; "Outlines of Chemistry," several papers and essays on medical and physical subjects; and "Zoonomia," which was published after his death.

GARNIER DE LANDE, born in 1770. As deputy to the National Convention, he voted for the death of Louis XVI.; joined the Girondists; vainly tried to save Danton; and, in the sitting of the 9th Thermidor, 1795, when Robespierre, being impeached, could not speak through fear and rage, he addressed that falling tyrant with the words, "It is Danton's blood which suffocates you!" He retired into private life when Buonaparte abolished the republic.

GARNIER, Count GERMAIN, a French statesman, was born, in 1721, at Auxerre. He became prefect of the department of Seine and Oise, and president of the senate; and was known as the translator of Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, and other English works on political economy. Died, 1821.

GARNIER, JEAN JACQUES, historiographer of France, was born in 1729, at Goron-sur-Maine, and at the breaking out of the revolution was professor of Hebrew in the university of Paris. He was the author of "The Man of Letters," 2 vols.; a treatise on "The Origin of the Government of France," a "Continuation of Velly's History of France," a treatise on "Civil Education," &c. During the reign of terror he fled from the French capital to Boujival, where he died in 1795.

GAROFALO, BENVENUTO, an artist of Ferrara, born in 1481. During his stay in Rome he formed an intimacy with Raphael, and frequently assisted him. His works unite the grace and clearness of Raphael with the rich colouring of the Lombard school, and his Madonnas and angels are full of beauty and expression. Died, 1559.

GARRICK, DAVID, the most celebrated actor that ever appeared on the English stage, was descended from a French family, who, being Protestants, fled to England on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. His father, Peter Garrick, was a captain in the army, and generally resided at Lichfield; but being on a recruiting party at Hereford, David was born there in 1716. He received his education partly at the grammar school at Lichfield, and partly under Dr. Johnson, with whom he first came to London, in 1736, and prepared himself for the study of the law. The death of his father, however, disturbed this arrangement; and having been left 1000*l.* by his uncle, he went into partnership with his brother in the wine trade. A love for the stage had long been deeply rooted in his mind, and, abandoning the wine trade, he resolved on being an actor. His first attempt was at Ipswich in 1741, under the assumed name of Lyddal; and the applause he met with induced him to make his appearance at the theatre, Goodman's Fields, in the character of Richard III. The effect of this was immediate and decisive. The other theatres were quickly deserted, and Goodman's Fields became the resort of people of fashion, till that theatre was shut up. Garrick then formed an engagement with Fleetwood, the patentee of Drury Lane, where his reception was equally flattering. In the summer of 1743 he visited Dublin; and in 1747 he became joint-patentee of Drury Lane Theatre. In 1749 he married Mademoiselle Violette, a sketch of whose life forms the subject of our next article. The remainder of his career was a long and uninterrupted series of success and prosperity until its close, which took place in 1776, when he determined upon a retreat, and sold his moiety of the concern for 37,000*l.* The last part which he performed was Don Felix, in "The Wonder," for the benefit of the theatrical fund. At the conclusion of the play, he addressed a brief farewell to the audience. The general feeling with which this was delivered and received, rendered it truly impressive; and few persons ever quitted the stage with plaudits so loud and unanimous. In 1769 he projected and carried into effect the famous Stratford Jubilee, a striking proof of his enthusiasm for Shakspeare. It occupied three days there, and its representation at the theatre lasted for 92 nights. He died, Jan. 20th, 1779, his remains being interred, with great pomp, in Westminster Abbey. As an actor, Garrick seems never to have been equalled for truth, nature, variety, and facility of expression, though perhaps surpassed by some of his contemporaries in the enunciation of calm, sentimental eloquence. He wrote or adapted for the stage nearly 40 pieces, besides producing a great number of prologues and epilogues. The style of acting introduced by Garrick was the very opposite of that formal declamation practised before his time; it was natural, vigorous, and impassioned; the plays of Shakspeare grew into greater repute; and a reform both in the conduct and licence of the drama, honourable to his taste and genius, was effected by his example.

GARRICK, EVA MARIA, wife of the preceding, was born at Vienna, in 1725. Her maiden name was Viegel, which she changed to that of Violette, by command of the empress-queen, Maria Theresa, whose notice she had attracted as an opera dancer. In 1744 she arrived in England, bringing with her a recommendation from the Countess of Stahrenberg to the Countess of Burlington, who received her, on her obtaining an engagement at the opera-house, as an inmate of Burlington House, and ever after treated her with maternal affection. A mutual attachment having been formed between her and Garrick, their nuptials were celebrated June 22, 1749, and the Earl of Burlington gave the bride a marriage portion of 6000*l.* From this circumstance a notion prevailed that she was the earl's natural daughter; such, however, was not the fact. Died, 1822, aged 97.

GARTII, Sir SAMUEL, an eminent physician, and a poet of no mean rank, was a native of Yorkshire, and educated at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where, in 1691, he took his degree. He was admitted a fellow of the college of physicians in the following year, and soon attained the first rank in his profession. His taste for general literature, his companionable talents, and his attachment to the principles of the house of Hanover, acquired him patrons of rank and influence; and on the accession of George I. he received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed physician-in-ordinary to the king, and physician-general to the army. His principal poem is "The Dispensary," which contains much lively and polished satire. Died, 1718.

GARTII, THOMAS, an English general, and colonel of the 1st regiment of dragoons. From the year 1762 to that of 1814, when he attained the rank of general, this officer was employed in active service. It had long been whispered that he was the husband of one of the royal princesses of England, though the circumstance was never made public during his life; but certain unfortunate events which occurred in 1830 caused the subject to be much alluded to. Died, 1829, aged 85.

GARZI, LOUIS, a painter, was born at Rome in 1640. He was a disciple of Andrea Sacchi, and considered by many as equal, if not superior, to Carlo Maratti. Died, 1721.

GARZONI, THOMAS, an Italian writer, born in 1549, at Bagnacavallo, near Ferrara, and died in 1589. He was the author of several works; the chief of which is entitled "La Piazza universale di tutti le Professioni del Mondo;" a work of great labour, and one of infinite utility at the time it was written.

GASCOIGNE, GEORGE, a poet of the Elizabethan age, was the son of Sir John Gascoigne, of Walthamstow, Essex, and is said to have been disinherited by his father. He studied at Cambridge, from whence he removed to Gray's Inn, which he soon left for a military life in Holland, where the Prince of Orange gave him a captain's commission; but having a quarrel with his colonel, he resigned it soon afterwards. On his return to England he became an attendant at court, and accompanied the queen in some of her progresses, during which he wrote masques for her entertainment. Besides his original and translated dramas, he wrote "The Steel Glass," a satire, and other poems. Till of late, when it became the fashion to search after the relics of old English literature, the works of Gascoigne were quite neglected, but his poems will repay perusal. Died, 1577.

GASCOIGNE, Sir WILLIAM, an eminent judge in the reigns of Henry IV. and V. He was born at Gawthorpe, in Yorkshire, in 1350; became serjeant-at-law in 1398; and on the accession of Henry IV. was appointed one of the justices of the common pleas, and afterwards made chief justice of the king's bench. In this high office he distinguished himself on many occasions, particularly for refusing to pass sentence upon Archbishop Scroop as a traitor, by the king's commandment, as being contrary to law; and still more remarkable by committing the Prince of Wales, afterwards Henry V., to prison, for striking him when on the bench. Like many other prominent events in English history, this has furnished Shakspeare with materials for a most effective scene. Sir William died in 1413.

GASCOIGNE, WILLIAM, an ingenious natural philosopher of the 17th century, was born in 1621, and is considered as the inventor of the micrometer, though the merit of that invention was claimed long after his time by M. Azout. Gascoigne was killed while fighting in the royalist army at Marston Moor, July 2. 1644.

GASPARINI, FRANCESCO, one of the ablest musical composers of the last century, was a native of Lucca, and born in 1650. His works are not numerous, but possess much merit. Died, 1724.

GASSENDI, PETER, a celebrated French philosopher and mathematician, was born, in 1592, at Chantersier, in Provence. Before he was 20 years of age he became professor of philosophy at Aix; but he soon resigned the chair, and gave himself up wholly to his scientific pursuits. In 1645 he was appointed professor of mathematics in the college-royal of Paris, and his lectures were exceedingly popular. In fact, he was distinguished as an astronomer, naturalist, theologian, and mathematician. Gassendi combated the metaphysics of Descartes, and divided with that great man the philosophers of his time, almost all of whom were Cartesians or Gassendians. Gibbon calls him the most philosophic among the learned, and the most learned among the philosophic of his age. He died in 1655, leaving nine volumes of his philosophical works.

GASSICOURT, CHARLES LOUIS CADET DE, a modern French philosopher and advocate, was the son of an apothecary at Paris, and first attracted notice by a pamphlet, published in 1797, on the Theory of Elections; which he followed up by a variety of essays on political subjects, viz. "On the Private Life of Mirabeau," "On the Influence of the Masonic Societies in the Process of the Revolution," "The Four Ages of the National Guard," &c. On the death of his father, who was himself a man of scientific pursuits, and the personal friend of Buffon, Lalande, and Condorcet, he turned his attention somewhat from politics to chemistry and physics; and in 1803 appeared his new "Dictionary of Chemistry," afterwards introduced into the Polytechnic School. He followed the French army into Austria in 1809, and wrote a history of the campaign. The modern plan for the organisation of the French board of health owes its origin to him, and he had not only the satisfaction of seeing it eagerly adopted, but that of obtaining the appointment of reporting secretary, which situation he held till his death, in 1823. Besides many other productions not here enumerated, he was the author of a series of epistles on London and the English nation; and a treatise "On the Application of the Physical Science to Military Purposes."

GASTRELL, FRANCIS, an English bishop, was born in 1562, at Slapton, in Northamptonshire. He was educated at Westminster School, and at Christchurch, Oxford. In 1797, he preached the Boyle's lectures, which he published as one discourse; to which he afterwards added another, on the "Necessity of the Christian Revelation." In 1702 he was presented to a canonry of Christchurch, at which time he published "Considerations concerning the Trinity." In 1707 he printed his excellent scriptural manual, entitled "Christian Institutes;" and in 1714 he was promoted to the bishopric of Chester. He was a sound scholar and an able polemic. Died, 1725.

GATAKER, THOMAS, an English divine, was born, in 1574, in London, and educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He became preacher to the society of Lincoln's Inn, and in 1611 obtained the rectory of Rotherhithe. In 1619 he published a curious treatise on the "Nature and Use of Lots," which occasioned considerable controversy. He was also the author of "Opera Critica," and other eminent works, chiefly of biblical criticism. In 1620 he made a tour through the Low Countries; and, in 1624, published in London a work, entitled "Transubstantiation, declared by the confession of the popish writers to have no necessary foundation in God's word." He wrote also a defence of this discourse. In 1642 he was chosen one of the famous assembly of divines at Westminster; but he disapproved of the introduction of the covenant, and declared in favour of episcopacy. He zealously opposed the trial of Charles I. Died, 1654.

GATES, HORATIO, an American officer who greatly distinguished himself in the war of independence, was born in England, in 1728. After serving in the army, and obtaining considerable promotion, he purchased an estate in Virginia, and resided on it until the commencement of the revolutionary war in 1775, when congress appointed him adjutant-general; and during the struggle which followed, he rendered many brilliant services to his adopted country. On the 8th of October, 1777, he totally defeated General Burgoyne, who, on the 16th, was compelled to surrender his whole army, which was considered the most important achievement of the whole war, and had the greatest effect in obtaining the result that followed. He was, however, unfortunate after he had obtained the chief command of the southern districts, being signally defeated at Camden, by Lord Cornwallis. Died, 1806, aged 77.

GATTERER, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a learned German historian; author of a "History of the World to the time of Cyrus," "An Essay towards a General Universal History," &c. His treatises display a spirit of deep research and sound criticism. Died, 1799.

GATTEY, F. C., born in 1756; a French royalist bookseller, sentenced to death by the revolutionary tribunal, in 1795. His only sister, on hearing his sentence, repeatedly exclaimed "Vive le Roi," and was guillotined with him.

GAUBIL, ANTHONY, a learned French missionary in China, was born at Calllac, in 1708, and died at Pekin in 1759, where he was interpreter to the court. He wrote the history of Genghis Khan, and an "Historical and Critical Treatise on Chinese Astronomy."

GAUBIUS, JEROME DAVID, a celebrated physician, was born at Heidelberg in 1705. After studying medicine under his uncle, a physician at Amsterdam, he went to Handerwyck, and from thence to Leyden, where he contracted an intimate friendship with Boerhaave, whom he succeeded as lecturer in botany and chemistry; and in 1734 he obtained the medical professorship. His treatise on the "Method of Prescribing, or of Writing Receipts," contains the best rules on that important subject. But his greatest work is his "Principles of Nosology." Died, 1780.

GAUDEN, JOHN, an English divine, born at Mayland, in Essex, in 1605; though he professed reforming principles, and was even nominated one of the assembly of divines at Westminster, and presented with a living, yet as soon as he saw the king was in personal danger, he changed sides, and strongly protested against his trial. He had also committed to his care the collating and publishing the king's meditations, to which he gave the name of "Icon Basilike, or the Portraiture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitude and Sufferings." In 1659, he became preacher at the Temple; and when Charles II. was restored he was preferred to the see of Exeter, and in 1622 to that of Worcester, where he died soon after.

GAUDENTIO, an historical painter of Milan, was born about 1480. He painted in fresco and oil a number of pictures for the churches in his native city.

GAUDENTIUS, ST., bishop of Brescia, in the 5th century. He was sent to Constantinople to hold a general council in that city, in 405; and died about the year 427.

GAULTIER, LOUIS, a French abbé, whose life was laudably spent in rendering education a scientific amusement rather than a task, was born about the year 1745. He had observed that the ordinary course of scholastic discipline deprived children of that portion of happiness so necessary to the development of their moral and physical faculties, and he endeavoured to smooth the rugged path of education by inventing various games which should combine amusement with instruction. The horrors of the revolution drove him from France; and he retired to the Hague, where he became tutor to the children of the British ambassador, whom he accompanied to England. After the peace of Amiens he returned to France, and continued to teach according to his system until his death, which took place in 1818, the abbé being then in his 75th year. His works are well known, and very popular.

GAUTHIEY, EMILIAN MARIE, an eminent civil engineer, was born at Chalons-sur-Saone, in France, in 1732. He filled several important posts; and under his direction many public works of magnitude were undertaken and completed. He conceived the idea of forming a canal from Chalons to Dijon, which is termed the "canal du centre," and is 23 leagues in extent. This was completed in 1791. He also executed the junction canals of the Saone, Yonne, and Doubs; and built several bridges and quays. He wrote several professional treatises, the principal one of which is entitled "Traité complet sur la Construction des Ponts et des Canaux navigables." Died, 1806.

GAVARD, HYACINTHE, one of the most able anatomists of the 18th century, was born at Montmelian, in 1753, and was a pupil of Desault. He published treatises on osteology, myology, and splanchnology, the latter of which especially has been highly praised. Died, 1802.

GAY, JOHN, an eminent English poet, was born at Barnstaple, Devon, in 1688, and was apprenticed to a silk-mercator in London; but, showing a marked aversion to trade, his indentures were cancelled by mutual agreement, and he devoted himself to literature. In 1711 he published his "Rural Sports," which he dedicated to Pope, then a young poet like himself; a compliment that introduced them to each other, and proved the foundation of a friendship which lasted for life. The year following he was appointed secretary to the Duchess of Monmouth. About this time came out his burlesque poem, entitled "Trivia, or the Art of Walking the Streets of London;" which was succeeded, in 1714, by the "Shepherd's Week, a series of Pastorals," in ridicule of Phillips. The same year he went to Hanover with the Earl of Clarendon, as secretary to the embassy; but though he had great expectations from the court, they were never realised. In 1720 he published his poems, in 2 vols. 4to., by subscription; which produced him a considerable sum, but he lost it all in the South Sea scheme. After producing many ingenious and agreeable works, some instances of court favour encouraged him to employ himself in his well known "Fables," written professedly for the instruction of the Duke of Cumberland, and published with a dedication to that prince in 1726; but though they were popular, they failed to serve him at court. He thereupon wrote "The Beg- gar's Opera," which was first acted in 1727, and ran for 63 successive nights; but it so offended the persons in power, that the lord chamberlain refused to license for performance a second part of it, entitled "Polly." This resentment induced his friends to come forward on its publication with so handsome a subscription, that his profits amounted to 1200*l*. The cause of Gay was taken up by the Duke and Duchess of Queensberry, who gave him a residence in their house, where he died, Dec. 11. 1732. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, and a monument was erected to his memory.

GAY-LUSSAC, NICOLAS FRANÇOIS, whose important discoveries in numerous branches of physics and chemistry have placed him in the foremost ranks of science, was born at St. Leonard, in France, 1788. At an early age he distinguished himself by his aerial voyages for the observation of atmospheric phenomena at great heights; and the numerous experiments he made in conjunction with Humboldt, Renard, and Berthollet, on an infinite variety of subjects connected with the general laws that regulate the composition of bodies, have proved of eminent practical utility. He closed a long life of almost unparalleled scientific industry, May 9. 1850.

GAY VERNON, J., a French military officer and mathematician, was born at St. Leonard, in the Limousin, in 1760. He entered the army, and, having obtained a captaincy, greatly distinguished himself, in 1793, on the Rhine and in Flanders. He was one of the founders of the Polytechnic School, and acted as second director of it for 17 years. In 1818 he defended the fortress of Torgau with great gallantry, but was made prisoner, and died in 1822.

GAYOT DE PITAVAL, FRANCIS, a French writer, was born at Lyons, in 1673. He was at first an ecclesiastic; next he entered into the army; and, at the age of 50, he became an advocate. He compiled the "Causes Célèbres," in 20 vols. 12mo. Died, 1743.

GAYTON, EDMUND, was born in London, in 1609, and educated at Merchant-Tailors' School, and at St. John's College, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He became superior beadle of the university, but was ejected, in 1647, by the parliamentary visitors. However, he recovered his place at the Restoration, and died in 1666. He wrote several books, the chief of which is entitled "Pleasant Notes upon Don Quixote."

GAZA, THEODORE, one of the chief revivers of Greek literature in the 15th century, was born at Thessalonica, in 1398. On the invasion of his country by the Turks, in 1430, he went to Italy, where he obtained the patronage of Cardinal Bessarion, to whom he presented a manuscript of the Iliad. He was afterwards employed at Rome in translating Greek authors into Latin; but, on presenting one of his finest performances to Sixtus IV., who gave him a trifling sum for it, he threw the money into the Tiber, exclaiming, "It is time to return home, since these asses have no relish for anything but thistles." He then went to Ferrara, whence he removed to Calabria; but it appears that he again went to Rome, and died there in 1478.

GEBER, an Arabian philosopher of the 8th century, whose skill in astronomy and alchemical researches obtained for him in that dark age the character of a magician. He is said to have been a Greek by birth, and to have apostatised from Christianity to Mahometanism. His works, under the title of "Lapis Philosophorum," prove that his knowledge of chemistry was by no means so limited as that of many who wrote subsequently to his time.

GEBHARDI, LOUIS ALBERT, a voluminous historical writer; author of the histories of Denmark and Norway, the Wendes and Slavonians, Courland, Hungary, the Sovereign Houses of Germany, and various portions of the Universal History published at Halle. He was librarian at Hanover, where he died in 1802.

GED, WILLIAM, the inventor of the art of stereotyping, which he practised in 1725, was a goldsmith of Edinburgh. In 1729 he entered into partnership with Fenner, a stationer of London, but no advantage to him resulted from the connection, and he returned to Scotland. Died, 1749.

GEDDES, Dr. ALEXANDER, a Roman Catholic priest, born in Ruthven, Banffshire, in 1737. He had the charge of a congregation at Auchinhalrig, where he remained 10 years; and in 1779 the university of Aberdeen granted him the degree of LL. D., being the first Catholic since the Reformation to whom it had been given. About this time he removed to London, and began to devote himself to a translation of the Bible into English. In 1786 he published his prospectus of that work; and in its progress he was liberally supported by Lord Petre. The first volume of it appeared in 1792, comprising the Pentateuch and the Book of Joshua; and in 1797 appeared the second volume; after which he published "Critical Remarks," in vindication of his work, and an "Apology for the Roman Catholics of Great Britain." He died in 1802. Dr. Geddes was a man of learning; but he assumed so many new views in respect to scriptural authority and doctrine, that he was regarded with suspicion by orthodox Christians of all denominations.

GEDDES, JAMES, an ingenious writer, was born in Tweeddale, Scotland, in 1710; educated at Edinburgh; entered on the study of the law, and was admitted an advocate. He was the author of "An Essay on the Composition and Manner of Writing of the Ancients, particularly Plato." Died, 1749.

GEDDES, Dr. MICHAEL, an eminent English divine of the 17th century. He was chaplain to the factory at Lisbon, where he was apprehended by the Inquisition in 1686, and interdicted from officiating in his ministerial capacity; on which he returned to England, and was made chancellor of Salisbury. He wrote the "History of the Church of Malabar," the "Church History of Ethiopia." Died, 1741.

GEDOYN, NICOLAS, the translator of Quintilian and Pausanias into French, was born at Orleans in 1667, and died in 1744.

He was abbot of Beaugency, and a member of the academy.

GEER, CHARLES DE, a celebrated Swedish naturalist, was born in 1720. He studied at Utrecht and Upsal, and at the latter place had Linnæus for his master. He possessed a share in the iron-works at Dannemora, which mines he improved by the application of new machinery. He also invented an apparatus for drying corn by the heat of the smelting houses. By these means he gained great wealth, which he applied to the noblest purposes, in feeding the poor, repairing churches, and establishing schools. He was appointed marshal of the court, knight of the polar star, and created a baron. He wrote "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Insectes," &c. 7 vols. Died, 1778.

GEHLEN, ADOLPHUS FERDINAND, a German chemist, and a member of the academy at Munich. He was one of the conductors of the Journal of Chemistry, published at Berlin, and the author of some original treatises on the science. Died, 1815.

GEHLER, JOHN SAMUEL, an eminent natural philosopher and a senator of Leipsic; author of a "Dictionary of Natural Philosophy," 6 vols. Died, 1795.

GELASIUS, bishop of Caesarea in the 4th century, was the author of a history of the church, of which some portions are still extant. Died, 394.

GELASIUS I., was elevated to the papal chair on the death of Felix III. in 492. He had a contest with the patriarch of Constantinople, and by his arrogance prevented a union between the two churches. He condemned the practice of communicating only in one kind, though that practice became afterwards a standing rule in the Roman church as far as relates to the laity. Several of his works are extant. He died in 496.

GELASIUS II., a native of Campania, was elected pope in 1118. Cencio, marquis di Frangipan, who was in the interest of the emperor Henry V., drove him from Rome; and he retired to the abbey of Clugny, where he died in 1119.

GELL, Sir WILLIAM, a celebrated antiquarian and classical scholar, was born in 1777, and graduated at Emanuel College, Cambridge, where he had been a fellow. He devoted his time to literary pursuits, and published "The Topography of Troy," "The Geography and Antiquities of Ithaca," "The Itinerary of Greece," "The Itinerary of the Morea," "The Topography of Rome," and, lastly, his interesting and beautiful work, entitled "Pompeiana, or Observations upon the Topography, Edifices, and Ornaments of Pompeii;" by Sir W. Gell and J. P. Gandy, esq." For many years Sir William had resided in Italy; first at Rome, and afterwards at Naples. He was knighted on his return from a mission to the Ionian Islands in 1803; and in 1820 the late Queen Caroline appointed him one of her chamberlains. Died, 1835.

GELLERT, CHRISTIAN FÜRCHTEGOTT, a German poet and writer on morals, was born at Haynichen, in Saxony, in 1715. He received his education at Leipsic, and acquired great celebrity by his tales, fables, and essays. He was appointed extraordinary professor of philosophy at Leipsic, where he read lectures on poetry and eloquence, which were received with great applause. His complete works were published in 10 vols. Died, 1769.

GELLERT, CHRISTLIEB EHREGOTT, brother of the preceding, was a celebrated metallurgist. He introduced very important improvements into the method of separating metallic substances by amalgamation, and wrote on the arts. Born, 1713; died, 1795.

GELLI, GIAMBATISTA, an Italian poet and dramatic writer, born at Florence, in 1498. He was bred to some low trade, but became a member of the academy of Florence, and had a high reputation in his day. Besides his original works, consisting of comedies, poems, and remarks on the Italian language, he translated the "History of Euripides," into Italian. Died, 1563.

GELLIBRAND, HENRY, a mathematician, born in London, in 1597, and educated at Trinity College, Oxford. In 1627, he was elected professor of astronomy at Gresham College; but, in 1631, he was brought into the high commission court for publishing an almanac, in which the names of the saints were changed for the Protestant martyrs. As, however, similar almanacs had been printed, the information was dismissed. He wrote several useful works on the longitude, the variation of the magnetic needle, on trigonometry, and on navigation. Died, 1636.

GELLIUS, AULUS, a Roman lawyer, born in 130. He studied at Athens, and is the author of "Noctes Atticæ," a work full of interesting observations, critical and philological.

GEMINIANI, FRANCESCO, an eminent musical composer, was born at Lucca, in 1666, and completed his studies under Corelli. In 1714, he came to London, and was patronised by George I. He published various compositions, all of which are remarkable for the excellence of their style, and for the skill necessary for their proper execution. His chief work is entitled, "Guida Harmonica, or a sure Guide to Harmony and Modulation." Died, 1762.

GEMISTUS PLETHO, GEORGE, a philosopher, born at Constantinople, in 1390, but who resided chiefly in the Peloponnesus, where he acquired great fame for his wisdom and virtue. He was a zealous defender of the Platonists against the Aristotelians, and of the Greek Church against that of Rome. On going to the council of Florence, 1433, his zeal and eloquence gained him the admiration of all parties. He contributed to the revival of Platonism, in Italy; and was the means of laying the foundation of the academy in that city. He died in his native country, at the age of 101. His works are chiefly controversial and theological.

GENDEBIEN, a distinguished Belgian, born in 1733; took part, in 1789, in shaking off the yoke of Austria; in 1790, sat as a deputy for the Belgian republic, when united with France in the council of five hundred. In 1815 he was nominated one of the commission for drawing up the constitutional act, uniting Belgium and Holland as the kingdom of the Netherlands. As a member of the second chamber, he steadily opposed the arbitrary acts of the royal authority, especially those which emanated from Van Maanen, the minister of justice; and took a decided part in the Belgic revolution of 1831, by which Belgium again separated itself from Holland, and declared its independence.

GENGHIS-KHAN, or JINGHIS-KHAN, the son of a petty Mongolian prince, was born in Tartary, in 1163. After a species of intestine warfare with various Tartar tribes, this renowned conqueror invaded China, the capital of which was taken by storm, in 1205, and plundered. The murder of the ambassadors whom Genghis-Khan had sent to Turkestan, occasioned the invasion of that empire, in 1218, with an army of 700,000 men; and the two great cities of Bokhara and Samarcand were stormed, pillaged, burnt, and more than 200,000 individuals destroyed with them. He continued his career of devastation for several years; and in 1225, though more than 60 years old, he marched in person, at the head of his whole army, against the king of Tangut, who had given shelter to two of his enemies, and refused to surrender them. A great battle was fought on plains of ice, formed by a frozen lake, in which the king of Tangut was totally defeated, with the loss of 300,000 men. This ambitious warrior, whose ravages had cost the human race upwards of 5,000,000 human beings, by dint of successive victories, became monarch of a territory extending 1,500 leagues, including Northern China, Eastern Persia, and the whole of Tartary. He died in 1227, in the 66th year of his age, and in the 52nd of his reign; having, before his death, divided his immense territories between the four princes whom he had by the first of his four wives.

GENLIS, STEPHANE FELICITE, Countess de, celebrated for her literary talents, and by many for the independent principles which prevail through all her writings, was born near Autun, in 1746. Her maiden name was Ducrest de St. Aubin, and the connection of her family with that of St. Aubin procured her admission, at four years of age, to enter as a canoness into the noble chapter at Aix; from which time she was called La Comtesse de Lancy. At 17, a letter of her writing having fallen into the hands of the Count de Genlis, he was so fascinated with its style as to make her the offer of his hand and fortune, which she accepted. By this marriage she became niece to Madame de Montesson, who was privately married to the Duke of Orleans; and his son, the Duke de Chartres, chose her, in 1782, to superintend the education of his children. It was, soon after, rumoured that an improper attachment existed between her and the duke; and Pamela, afterwards the wife of the unfortunate Lord Edward Fitzgerald [which see], was supposed to be the issue of that connection. At that period, Madame de Genlis wrote several excellent works, producing, in rapid succession, "Adela and Theodore," "The Evenings of the Castle," "The Theatre of Education," and "Annals of Virtue," all of which were highly popular. In 1791 she came to England with her pupil, Mademoiselle d'Orleans; and on their return to France, the following year, both were ordered to quit the territories without delay. After some time, they went to Switzerland, but were not permitted to reside there; and General Montesquieu obtained them an asylum in the convent of St. Clair. In 1800, she returned to France; and in 1805, Napoleon gave her apartments in the arsenal at Paris, and allowed her a pension of 5000 francs. On the return of the Bourbons, she seemed to forget her old patron, and her love of republicanism gave way to admiration for the restored dynasty. When her old pupil, Louis Philippe, ascended the throne, both he and his family paid the kindest attention to the comforts of Madame de Genlis; and her pen was actively employed to the last day of her existence. So numerous are her works, amounting altogether to about 90 volumes, that the mere enumeration of their titles would occupy too much of our space. They embrace nearly all subjects, and are characterised by fertility of imagination and a pleasing style. Died, 1830.

GENNARI, CÆSAR and BENEDICT, two painters, who were the nephews and disciples of Guercino. After working together some years, Cæsar established himself at Bologna, and Benedict went to England, where he became painter to James II., on whose expulsion he returned to Italy. He died in 1715, aged 82.

GENNARO, JOSEPH AURELIUS, a civilian, was born at Naples, in 1701. He became chief magistrate in his native city; and his works, which are all on legal subjects, are remarkable for purity of style and depth of erudition. Died, 1762.

GENOVESI, ANTHONY, an Italian philosopher and metaphysician, was born at Castiglione in 1712. He read lectures in philosophy at Naples with great reputation for some time; but at length he was attacked by numerous enemies for publishing his metaphysics, in which he recommended the works of Galileo, Grotius, and Newton. The king of Naples, however, protected him, and made him professor of political economy and moral philosophy in the Neapolitan university. He was the author of "Philosophical Meditations on Religion and Morality," a "System of Logic," "Humorous Letters," and "Italian Morality," which last is accounted his principal performance. Died, 1769.

GENSONNE, ARMAND, fatally distinguished in the French revolution, was born in 1758. He was one of the best and most eloquent of the Girondist party, who struggled first to save Louis XVI., and next to arrest the sanguinary violence of Robespierre and the Jacobins of the "Mountain," by which they were finally overwhelmed. The 10th of August, 1792, which established the republic on Louis XVIth's destruction, was fatal to Gensonné; for Robespierre then became paramount, and never forgave his bitter witticisms on him. Gensonné refused to fly, and he and his 23 Girondist colleagues were guillotined, on the 31st October, 1793. A tranquil heroism characterised his death. "Respect the laws," he said, "my countrymen, while you reject tyrants."

GENT, THOMAS, a native of York, and by trade a printer in that city. He was author of "An Ancient and Modern History of York," "The History of Kingston-upon-Hull," and other similar publications. Born, 1691; died, 1778.

GENTILIS, or GENTILI, ALBERICO, an Italian civilian, born at Ancona, in 1550. His father, who was a physician, embraced the reformed religion, and came to England, where Alberico became professor of law at Oxford; and died in 1608. He wrote "De Jure Belli," and other works on jurisprudence.—His brother SCIPIO, who was professor of civil law at Altdorf, and died in 1616, was the author of "De Jure Publico Populi Romani," &c.

GENTLEMAN, FRANCIS, a dramatic writer and actor; born in Ireland, in 1728. Besides some theatrical pieces, he was the author of "The Dramatic Censor," in 2 vols., and a volume of "Royal Fables, in Imitation of Gay." Died, 1784.

GENTZ, FREDERIC VON, a distinguished publicist and an uncompromising antagonist of revolutionary France, was born at Breslau, 1764; studied at Königsberg; and after a short sojourn in England, where he gained the good will of Pitt, he repaired to Vienna in 1803, where he entered into the Austrian civil service, under the most favourable auspices and hopes. Here his skilful and facile pen was soon turned to account. His able manifestoes and pamphlets proved almost as formidable obstacles to the invasions of Napoleon as the combined forces that opposed him; and Austria and Prussia hastened to do honour to the man who could so vigorously support their views and defend their cause. He was appointed one of the secretaries at the Congress of Vienna in 1814, and at Paris in 1815, and he took an active part in the various congresses that sprung out of the restoration. A selection from his various works, comprising political questions, a "Life of Mary Queen of Scots," and numerous articles written for the Journal Historique, was published in 1838. Died, 1832.

GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH, a British historian who flourished in the 12th century. He was a native of Monmouth, became its archdeacon, and was raised to the see of St. Asaph; but, in consequence of the disturbed state of the north of Wales, he left his bishopric, retiring at first to the monastery of Abingdon, and then taking up his abode at the court of Henry II. His chief work is entitled "Chronicon sive Historia Britonum," and is full of legendary tales respecting the early British monarchs.

GEOFFROI, STEPHEN FRANCIS, a French physician, and professor of chemistry at Paris, where he was born in 1672. He was the author of a Pharmacopœia, called "Le Code Médicamentaire de la Faculté de Paris," and was a member of the Royal Society of London. Died, 1731.

GEOFFROY, JULIAN LOUIS, a French critic, remarkable for the severity of his dramatic censures. He conducted the Literary Annals after the death of Freron, and published a "Course of Dramatic Literature," in 5 vols.; a "Commentary on Racine," &c. Born, 1743; died, 1814.

GEOFFROY, STEPHEN LOUIS, an eminent French physician and naturalist; author of a "Manual of Practical Medicine for Surgeons," a "Dissertation on the Organ of Hearing," a "History of Insects," &c. Born, 1725; died, 1810.

GEOFFROY SAINT HILAIRE, ETIENNE, a distinguished zoologist and comparative anatomist, sprung from a family well-known in science, was born at Etampes, 1772. He was originally destined for the church, but he preferred dedicating himself to the science of nature, a taste for which he had imbibed from the instructions of Brisson, at the college of Navarre, and in the company of Hady his colleague at the college of Cardinal Lemoine. During the massacres of September, 1792, he saved, at the risk of his life, several priests, and among others Hady, who had been imprisoned for recusancy. This act of devotion so endeared him to his teachers, especially Daubenton, that he was through their instrumentality, in 1793, appointed to an office in the Jardin des Plantes, where he founded the vast zoological collections, which are one of the glories of Paris. In 1798 he formed one of the great scientific expedition to Egypt, explored all the conquered countries, and was one of the founders and most active members of the Institute, of which he afterwards became professor. In 1808 he went on a great scientific mission to Portugal; in 1815 he was a member of the chamber during the hundred days; but, on the return of the Bourbons, he retired from political life, and thenceforward devoted himself solely to study. The great merit of Geoffroy Saint Hilaire as a naturalist consists in his discovery of the law of unity that pervades the organic composition of all animal bodies—a theory glanced at by Buffon and Goethe; and in his having founded the theory of "Analogues," or the method by which the identity of organic materials is determined in the midst of all their transformations. With him too originated the doctrine of "development," which has found so able a supporter among ourselves in the author of the "Vestiges of Creation." His chief works are "Histoire Naturelle des Mammifères," "Philosophie Anatomique," "Principes de la Philosophie Zoologique," "Etudes Progressives," &c. Died, 1844. His "Life, Works, and Theories" has since been published by his son, who bids fair to emulate his father's scientific zeal and ability.

GEORGE, LEWIS, I., king of Great Britain, was the son of Ernest Augustus, elector of Hanover, by Sophia, daughter of Frederic, elector-palatine, and grand-daughter of James I. He was born in 1660; was trained to arms under his father; married his cousin, Sophia Dorothea, daughter of the Duke of Zell, in 1682; served in three campaigns with the emperor's army, against the Turks in Hungary; and succeeded to the electorate in 1700. In 1706 he was created Duke of Cambridge, and succeeded to the throne of England on the death of Queen Anne, in 1714. The next year a rebellion broke out in Scotland, in favour of the Pretender, but this was soon entirely quelled, and several of the leaders lost their lives on the scaffold. The new family, however, was by no means popular; and the Whigs, with a view to support it, introduced septennial parliaments; while the king, who probably considered the British crown precarious, endeavoured to increase his continental power by the purchase of Bremen and Verden. This involved him in a quarrel with Charles XII. of Sweden, who, in conjunction with the czar Peter, meditated an invasion of Scotland in favour of the Pretender; but the death of Charles XII., in 1717, put an end to this alarm. The same project was afterwards attempted by Spain, whose minister, Cardinal Alberoni, had formed the celebrated quadruple alliance to carry it into effect. This was met on the part of England by the sailing of a naval expedition under Sir George Byng, who nearly destroyed the whole of the Spanish fleet, and recovered Sicily and Sardinia, which the Spaniards had seized. In 1720 the famous "South-sea Bubble" was the source of great calamity to thousands of families, and produced such disturbances, that the king, who had gone to visit his German possessions, was suddenly recalled. In 1722 a new conspiracy against the government was discovered, but no serious result occurred from it. In 1725 a treaty between Spain and the emperor excited the jealousy of the king, who deemed it necessary to counteract it by another between Great Britain and most of the other European powers. The Spaniards then commenced the siege of Gibraltar; but all disputes being arranged by negotiation, the British monarch set out on a journey to the Continent, where he was seized with a paralytic attack, and died at Osnaburg, June 11. 1727, in the 68th year of his age, and the 13th of his reign. George I. was plain and simple in his taste and appearance; though grave and sedate in public, he was gay and familiar with his intimates; combining a good share of sense with natural prudence, and showing much skill in the management of his hereditary dominions. His marriage was an unhappy one, and he had repudiated his wife many years before his death.

GEORGE, AUGUSTUS II., son of George I., was born in 1683; married, in 1705, the Princess Caroline, of Brandenburg-Ansbach, who died in 1737; came to England with his father at the accession of the latter; was created Prince of Wales; and in 1727 succeeded to the throne. The country was at this time in the most flourishing condition both at home and abroad, and had a powerful influence in all the courts of Europe, Spain excepted; but peace being restored in 1729, great attention was given to the private safety and welfare of the subjects. At length, owing to an infraction of the late treaty by the Spaniards, and their repeated encroachments on our foreign trade and settlements, war was declared against Spain in October, 1739; and Admiral Vernon was sent with a squadron to the West Indies, where he demolished Porto Bello, but failed in his attempt on Carthage. In 1743 the king headed his army on the Continent, and gained the battle of Dettingen. In 1745 the Pre-tender's eldest son, Charles Stuart, called the young Pretender, landed in the Highlands, and was joined by several clans. After obtaining various successes, the rebels were finally defeated by the Duke of Cumberland, at Culloden, in 1746. During these events the king received numerous demonstrations of attachment to his person and family; and it was obvious that the majority of the nation were satisfied that, by supporting the House of Hanover, they, in fact, maintained the interests of civil liberty. In 1748, the war, which had produced no good to England, was concluded by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. In 1751 died, universally lamented, Frederic, prince of Wales, between whom and his father there never was any cordiality. In 1755 war broke out between England and France, which was at first very unpromising; but soon after Mr. Pitt (first Earl of Chatham) took the helm of state, public affairs wore a different aspect. In 1758 a treaty was entered into between England and Prussia. The French power was nearly destroyed in the East Indies. In America, Louisburg was taken; and the capture of Quebec was followed by the conquest of Canada. The island of Gaudaloupe and the settlement of Senegal were taken by the English. Admiral Hawke defeated the French fleet under Conflans, and the British flag waved triumphant in every part of the world. Amid these triumphant successes, George II. died suddenly, Oct. 25. 1760, in the 77th year of his age, and the 33d of his reign. He was a plain, blunt man; of an ingenious disposition, but hasty, obstinate, and parsimonious; and wholly regardless of science or literature. Still he was not unpopular; for dying in the midst of a successful war, the blaze of national glory would have been strong enough to eclipse his personal defects, had they even been much more glaring.

GEORGE III., king of Great Britain, eldest son of Frederic, prince of Wales, and grandson of George II., was born June 4. 1738, being the first sovereign of the Hanoverian line that could boast of England as the place of his nativity. On the death of his father, in 1751, his education was entrusted to the Earl of Harcourt and the Bishop of Norwich; though he was greatly indebted to the princess-dowager, his mother, for the formation of his mind and character. He ascended the throne on the death of his grandfather, in 1760, being then in his 23rd year; his reputation was unspotted; and the first speeches he delivered to his council and parliament were hailed as omni-nous of a patriotic regard for the liberties of the people, over whom he was destined to rule. A highly prosperous war had made the existing administration exceedingly popular, and no immediate change was thought necessary; but the Earl of Bute had always possessed great influence with the king, while Prince of Wales; and when Mr. Pitt (who had been outvoted in the cabinet on the subject of a war with Spain) resigned, and was raised to the peerage as earl of Chatham, Lord Bute was made prime minister. On the 8th of Sept. 1761, he married the Princess Charlotte of Mecklenburg Strelitz. The new administration, formally headed by Lord Bute, having entered into negotiations with France and Spain, preliminaries of peace were signed Nov. 3. 1762, at Fontainebleau. In 1763, the country was kept in continual agitation by political pamphlets and libels of various kinds; foremost among which was the memorable "No. XLV. of the North Briton," by Wilkes; and the result of which is said to have been favourable to the interests of civil liberty. Be that as it may, there was at the time a sort of infatuation in favour of licentious and abusive writings, ill calculated to benefit public morals, or to afford satisfaction to a well-intentioned king. In 1764, Lord Bute retired, and Mr. George Grenville, the new premier, began those measures in relation to the American colonies, the consequences of which proved so momentous, and the American stamp act was passed the following year. The most alarming irritation prevailed among the colonists. In the lower house of representatives at Virginia, Patrick Henry, a popular orator, exclaimed, "Cæsar had his Brutus, Charles the First his Cromwell, and George the Third"—cries of "Treason!" here interrupted the speaker; but, after a moment's pause, he continued, "and George the Third may profit by their example. If this be treason, make the most of it." Early in this year, the king was attacked by an illness of six weeks' duration, which is supposed to have been similar in its nature to, though less in its degree than, the malady which obscured his latter days. Soon after his recovery, he went down to the House of Peers, and, in a speech from the throne, proposed a legislative enactment, by which he might be enabled, under his sign manual, from time to time, to appoint the queen, or some other member of the royal family, guardian to the heir apparent, and regent of the kingdom. The bill was soon afterwards brought into parliament, and eventually passed; although it met with so much opposition in its progress, even from some of the ministry, who wished the term "royal family" to include only the descendants of the late king, to the exclusion of the princess dowager, that another change in the administration ensued, and the Marquis of Rockingham was placed at the head of the treasury. The Rockingham party repealed the obnoxious stamp act; yet, notwithstanding this and some other popular measures of the new cabinet, it was dissolved in July, 1766. The Duke of Grafton succeeded the Marquis of Rockingham as first lord of the treasury, and the Earl of Chatham once more took office; but in 1768, being disgusted with the conduct of his colleagues, he resigned the privy seal, and was succeeded by Lord Bristol. The same year was distinguished by the return of Mr. Wilkes for Middlesex, and the popular tumults attending upon his imprisonment and outlawry. The aspect of affairs in America grew more serious every day, and public discontent was at its height; when, at the close of the year 1769, Junius published his famous letter to the king. At the beginning of 1770, Lord North succeeded the Duke of Grafton, and increased rather than alleviated the national calamities. Popular clamour kept pace with
